By that section any pauper in a state of destitution, and requiring parochial relief, is entitled to such relief from the parish in which he or she happens to be at the time when necessity for relief arises, and that relief must be continued until the proper parish of settlement of the pauper is ascertained. Then, if a dispute arises as to the true parish of settlement, if the relieving parish cannot get the necessary admission, it may bring an action to have the question of liability determined, but should it be once determined judicially or by admission what parish is liable, I do not see how the parish so found liable can relieve itself of the burden put upon it as long at least as no material change of circumstances occurs. If an admission of liability is obtained, the result, under the 70th section of the statute, is the same as if there had been a judicial determination of the matter. The meaning of the statute is, that a parish is not entitled to proceed with an action if it should, without any action, obtain an admission of liability, and it would be most unreasonable to hold that a parish could go on with an action after a statutory admission,—for it is really such,—has been given. The admission being given, what more can the relieving parish require? What more can it be entitled to? Any expense after such admission that might be incurred in an action by it would most certainly be laid upon itself.

I do not mean to say, however, that in all circumstances an admission is to be for ever conclusive. Circumstances may undoubtedly emerge to render it no longer binding,—such, for example, as the pauper having become after a time self-supporting and acquiring a new settlement; but the parish which has given the admission must, I think, establish very clearly that such circumstances have emerged. What is said here by Cambuslang Parish is (first) that the admission was given by it on a misleading statement by the inspector of the Barony Parish, and (second) that it could only be operative so long as the pauper had not again become self-supporting, which, in point of fact, she did. With regard to the first of these points, I apprehend the statement of the inspector of Cambuslang in the record is quite conclusive, independently of the letter which your Lordship in the chair has commented upon. His statement in the record, in answer to the averment of the Barony Parish, is merely that "the admission of liability of Cambuslang was given under a mistake." It is not there or anywhere else said that the mistake was induced by the inspector of the Barony parish, and far less that there was any actual misrepresentation by that parish, nor is it even said that there was a mistake by any one except the inspector of Cambuslang himself. But I cannot hold that a mistake of the functionary representing and entitled to represent Cambuslang in the matter is entitled to relieve that parish from the statutory admission which has been unquestionably made and acted on for about five years, any more than it would be sufficient to enable it to get rid of a judgment of a Court, supposing that had been obtained in place of the admission which the statute refers to as equally effectual. But then it has been, in the second place, pleaded for Cambuslang that the pauper here became self-supporting in 1868. The circumstances, as regards this matter, are not clearly established. The utmost that can be said in regard to it is that the pauper neglected,—probably from supervening insanity,—to draw her regular allowance from Cambuslang for a few months; but undoubtedly there is no sufficient evidence of her having become self-supporting, and no allegation even that she had acquired any new settlement. I cannot hold, therefore, that Cambuslang has succeeded in relieving itself of the statutory admission which had been given by it, and acted upon by all concerned for a considerable time.

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875.
Beattie v. Arbuckle.

I abstain from commenting upon the effect of the proof which was led in the Sheriff-court, as in the view I have taken of the case otherwise it is quite unnecessary for me to do so. I have only to add that inspectors for the poor ought to know that while it is highly commendable that, in order to save litigation and expense, a statutory admission of liability should, whenever the circumstances are such as to require it, be at once given, it is not when given to be got rid of except upon very sufficient and clearly established grounds.

LORD GIFFORD.—I agree with the opinion of all your Lordships that the admission of liability originally made by Cambuslang is binding on that parish, and that there is no cause stated why effect should be denied to it. It is extremely important that in questions between parishes, and in the practical administration of the poor-law, effect should be given to admissions when deliberately given, fairly obtained, and acted upon in bona fide. No doubt such admissions do not constitute res judicata, but they come in place thereof, and they are the things which prevent a res judicata following, and therefore they should have the same effect. An admission is better in some cases than res judicata if the parties acted fairly, and I am quite clear that an admission should not be displaced unless the party challenging it can establish very clear grounds for so doing. If not a statutory proceeding, it is at least recognised in the statute as one of the modes in which the liability of a parish for the relief of a pauper may be ascertained.

I adhere to the views which I expressed in the case of Arthur v. Stewart, reported in the Poor-Law Magazine, where my decision was acquiesced in, and I think that holding all parties bound by a deliberate admission is a most wholesome and salutary rule. At the same time, I do not in the least differ from what was laid down in the case of Innes v. Ironside, which was referred to. As to an admission obtained by bad faith or by fraudulent misrepresentation, even a decree got by bad faith or fraud would be reducible.

If, then, the admission be binding, the only question that remains is, For how long? The answer is, as long as the pauper is chargeable and the circumstances remain the same. When the chargeability permanently ceases, of course, the admission comes to an end, because the claim has come to an end. What would be the effect of rehabilitation, as it is sometimes called, and how long it must subsist, does not fall to be decided in this case. There was here no rehabilitation of the pauper. She was a pauper all through, and remains a pauper still. A relative, such as a sister, may sustain a pauper for a short time, as happened here, without asking parochial relief for her, but that will not have the same effect as marriage or the pauper becoming again self-supporting.

I am of opinion, first, that we must give effect to the admission; and, second, that the liability never was interrupted.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find it proved that, on the 6th of March 1863, the inspector of the parish of Cambuslang admitted liability for the support of the pauper by his letter of that date: Find that no facts or circumstances have been proved which are relevant to relieve the respondent from the effect of that admission: Find it admitted from the bar that the parish of Cambuslang continued to support the pauper down to the month of September 1868: Find that from that date until the month of March 1869 the pauper received no relief either from Cambuslang or

No. 68.

Jan. 15, 1875. Beattie v. Arbuckle.

Barony, and that in that month she became insane, and was sent to Gartnavel Asylum, where she has been ever since, the insanity being certified by the medical officer to have, in March 1869, subsisted for six weeks previously: Therefore find that the parish of Cambuslang was effectually bound by the said admission, and that the same is still effectual: Sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment complained of, and decern against the respondent (defender) in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in both Courts; modify the expenses of the proof to one-half the taxed amount thereof, and remit," &c.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 69.

Jan. 19, 1875. Hume v. Young, Trotter, & Co.

J. A. ROSS HUME AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Balfour—Mackintosh. YOUNG, TROTTER, AND CO. AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Macdonald.

Process—Jury Trial—River—Nuisance—6 Geo. IV. c. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 28—13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 49—29 and 30 Vict. c. 112 (Evidence Act), sec. 4.—An action of declarator and interdict to prevent the pollution of a river, being an action for nuisance, must be tried by jury, unless special cause is shewn to the contrary.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

THIS was an action by Mr J. A. Ross Hume and others, riparian proprietors on the river Whitadder, against Messrs Young, Trotter, and Company, and others, paper-makers, concluding for declarator that the defenders had no right to pollute the river, and for interdict. After the record was closed, the Lord Ordinary reported the case on a motion by the pursuer that the case should be tried before the Lord Ordinary without a jury. The defenders opposed the motion.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The 28th section of the Judicature Act contains a comprehensive enumeration of causes which are thereby required to be tried by jury, and not otherwise. The first relaxation of that enactment was introduced by the 49th section of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, which provided that it should be "competent for the Court to allow proof on commission in any of such enumerated causes, where the action is not an action for libel, or for nuisance, or properly and in substance an action of damages." The Legislature were therefore of opinion at that time that actions for nuisance were not suited for trial in any other form than by jury. The only other alteration in the law is to be found in the 4th section of the Evidence Act, 1866. That clause introduced a further relaxation so that even the cases excepted by the Act of 1850 may be tried without a jury, upon condition either that the parties consent to that course, or special cause is shewn. It appears to me that there is nothing in the Act of 1868, or the Act of Sederunt of 1870, which deals with this matter, or interferes with the 4th section of the Act of 1866.

I am therefore of opinion that we can lay down no general rule for the guidance of the Judges in the Outer-House. Where there is nothing special in the case it must be tried by a jury. I see nothing special in this case, except that it is an action for nuisance. That is just the reason why it ought to be tried by jury. It stands on a different footing from a case of right of way, which is not one of the excepted causes under the Act of 1850. In my opinion, this case is very suitable for trial by jury.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM JOHN ARMSTRONG AND COMPANY, Pursuers and Claimants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Asher.
D. M'GREGOR AND COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
HANDYSIDE AND HENDERSON, Claimants.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

No. 70.

Jan. 19, 1875.

Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

Sale—Ship.—A seagoing steam-ship lying at Glasgow, ready to sail, was sold by missive, "with all belonging to her on board and on shore." Held that a chronometer, previously used in the vessel, which was in the hands of an optician on shore for the purpose of regulation at the date of the sale, was included in the sale, a chronometer being a necessary instrument of navigation, and there being no local or general usage of trade to lead to a different construction of the missive.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

JOHN WILKIE, shipbroker, Glasgow, acting for Handyside and Henderson, shipowners, Glasgow, entered into the following memorandum of agreement on 30th November 1871 with Armstrong and Company, shipowners and shipping agents in Glasgow, for the sale of the ship "Macedon," which was ready to sail on a voyage:—"Glasgow, 30th November 1871.—Memorandum of Agreement.—John Wilkie, acting as broker for owners, agrees to sell, and W. J. Armstrong and James Hay, jointly and severally, agree to purchase the screw-steamer 'Macedon,' now at Glasgow, with all belonging to her on board and on shore, for the sum of five thousand one hundred and fifty pounds (£5150), immediate settlement, and cash against bill of sale; two hundred and fifty pounds deposit payable by buyers on signment hereof."

At the date of the sale the chronometer which had been previously used in the vessel was in the hands of M'Gregor and Company, opticians, for the purpose of being regulated. It was sent back by the opticians immediately after, as the ship was about to start on a voyage. When the vessel came back from her voyage the chronometer was again sent to M'Gregor and Company to be regulated, and they refused, by the orders of Handyside and Henderson, to restore it to the ship. Thereupon Armstrong and Company raised an action in the Sheriff-court against M'Gregor and Company for delivery of the chronometer, and for damages. Handyside and Henderson also raised a multiplepoinding in name of M'Gregor and Company, as possessors of the chronometer. The actions were conjoined.

Handyside and Henderson averred;—"The chronometer so placed on board the 'Macedon' did not belong to or form any part of a ship's fittings; and at the time of the sale before mentioned none of the contracting parties contemplated or intended that it, or any chronometer whatever, should be embraced in the sale, or be covered by the memorandum of agreement between them, nor is the value of any chronometer included, or intended to be included, in the price agreed to be paid by the other claimants. Moreover, according to the custom of trade and daily practice then existing and relied on the terms of said agreement would not include the chronometer in question."

Armstrong and others made the following answer to this averment;—"Denied. Explained that the terms of the memorandum of agreement were expressly used and meant to include the said chronometer, and some other articles belonging to the steamer which were temporarily on shore at the time. The alleged custom and practice of trade is denied."

A proof was led.

The Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the chronometer in question is the property of the claimants, William John Armstrong and others, having been included in the memorandum of

No. 70.

Jan. 19, 1875. Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

sale of the s.s. 'Macedon:' Therefore, in the original action at the instance of William John Armstrong and others against D. M'Gregor and Company, repels the defences, and ordains the defenders, within six days, to deliver over to the pursuers the chronometer in question, under certification: (2) In respect of the above finding in the said first action, dismisses the action of multiplepoinding, reserving to pronounce further, and to dispose of the question of expenses."*

On appeal the Sheriff (Dickson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defence stated by the claimants, Armstrong and others, to the competency of the multiplepoinding: Finds that the chronometer in question is the property of the claimants Handyside and Henderson, and accordingly assoilzies the party M'Gregor and Company from the conclusions of the petitory action: Sustains Handyside and Henderson's claim in the multiplepoinding: Ranks and prefers them to the chronometer in question; and accordingly decerns and ordains the nominal raisers, D. M'Gregor and Company, to deliver it to the said Handyside and Henderson, and, on their doing so, exoners and discharges them of all claims with reference thereto at the instance of the other claimants, Armstrong and others, owners of the 'Macedon,' under the present actions: Finds the said Armstrong and others liable to Messrs M'Gregor and Company, and Handyside and Henderson respectively in expenses in both actions: Allows," &c.†

Armstrong and Company appealed, and argued;—No usage of trade was proved. The agreement included a chronometer, which was essential for the navigation of the ship.[1]

The respondents answered;—A usage of trade had been proved, which established that a chronometer was not a part of the ship, and did not pass with it. There was no reason why a chronometer should pass with the ship.[2]

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . . In the view of the Sheriff-substitute there is no ambiguity in the clause 'with all belonging to her.' It means all her necessary appurtenances; everything that is essential for her proper navigation, or is habitually used for that purpose, whether absolutely essential or not, if it belongs to the owners. A fixed chronometer is part of a ship, as much as her compass, or her masts, sails, or rigging."

† "NOTE.—The proper principle of interpretation is thought to be the same as in all mercantile contracts,—that unless where general words have a recognised meaning in law, the question what they include is not to be decided by paraphrasing or amplifying them, without regard to their understood meaning according to the usage of the trade; but, on the contrary, with special reference to such usage, as being that which the parties are presumed to have had in view when contracting.—(See Bell's Commentaries, 465, and cases noted in the Sheriff's work on the Law of Evidence, sec. 232, et seq.) On this principle it was held, in an American case (Richardson v. Clark, quoted in 1 Parsons on Shipping, p. 81), that, 'in the absence of any agreement of the parties or proof of usage of trade, a bill of sale does not include the chronometer as an appurtenance of the ship.'

"Upon the evidence, the Sheriff held that usage of trade had been proved in favour of the construction excluding the chronometer from the sale."

[1] Langton v. Horton, June 6, 1842, 5 Beavan, 9, 11 L. J. (N. S.), p. 299; 1 Bell's Com. 440; Kircher v. Venus, February 4, 1859, 12 Moore's Privy Council Reports, 361; Sweating v. Pearce, 1861, 9 Scott's C. B. Reports (N. S.) 534.

[2] Gale v. Lawrie, 1826, 5 Barnwell and Cresswell, 156; the "Dundee," Jan. 28, 1823, 1 Haggart's Admiralty Cases, 109; Parsons on Shipping, pp. 78 to 81.

At advising,— No. 70.

Jan. 19, 1875. Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, the memorandum under which the sale of the "Macedon" was made bears date November 30, 1871, and is in these terms :— "John Wilkie, acting as broker for owners, agrees to sell, and W. J. Armstrong and James Hay, jointly and severally, agree to purchase, the screw-steamer 'Macedon,' now at Glasgow, with all belonging to her on board and on shore, for the sum of five thousand one hundred and fifty pounds (£5150) immediate settlement, and cash against bill of sale; £250 deposit payable by buyers on signment hereof." The question which has arisen under this contract is, whether or not it carries the chronometer. Now, it must be borne in mind that the "Macedon" was a seagoing ship, for which a chronometer was necessary, and it must also be borne in mind that the words used have no technical sense, and so, apart from any interpretation put upon them by usage of trade, they must be fairly and reasonably interpreted. It has been said in the course of the argument that nothing can be said to belong to a ship unless it is specifically appropriated or devoted to that ship, and even that it would be necessary to have the ship's name on it. I cannot entertain that idea as a reasonable one. Things may belong to a ship which might be used just as well in any other ship. There are many small things belonging to a ship which may be transferred from one to another, such as nautical instruments, charts, tools, &c., without which it would be impossible to get on in the voyage, and why the chronometer, which is just as necessary as any of them, should be held not to fall under the same category I cannot see. Its peculiarity seems to be that it does not remain constantly on board the vessel, but the reason for that is that it is necessary that it should be taken on shore from time to time in order to be rated. In practice, when a seagoing ship returns from a voyage, the chronometer is taken to the makers, and stays there till the next voyage, but it does not on that account cease to belong to the ship. It may be transferred from one ship to another, and perhaps more easily than most things, but with that exception I cannot see any difference between a chronometer and any other instrument; they are all equally necessary, and cannot be used except in reference to each other.

I see no ground for any distinction. The law, so far as there is any law in the matter, is well expounded in the "Dundee" case, which came first before Lord Stowell in the Admiralty Court, where the question was to what extent the "Dundee" was liable for damage done by a collision, under the Act 53 Geo. III., cap. 159. The "Dundee" was a whaler bound for the Greenland fishery, and a question arose whether the fishing stores fell under the term "appurtenances." It was contended by the owner of the sunken vessel that all stores necessary for the purposes of the particular voyage on which she was sailing were included in that word. Lord Stowell said,—"A cargo cannot be considered as appurtenances of the ship, being that which is intended to be disposed of at the foreign port for money or money's worth vested in a return cargo. Its connection with the ship is merely transitory, and it bears a distinct character of its own. But those accompaniments which are essential to a ship in its present occupation not being cargo, but totally different from cargo, though they are not direct constituents of the ship (if indeed they were they would not be appurtenances, for the very nature of an appurtenance is that it is one thing which belongs to another thing), yet if they are indispensable instruments without which the ship cannot execute its mission and perform its functions, it may in ordinary loose application be included under the term "ship," being that which may be essential to it—as essential to it as any part of its own immediate machinery." Accordingly sentence was given against the owners of the "Dundee" for the value of the ship, including her fishing stores. Proceedings in the same case were afterwards taken in the Court of Queen's Bench in the shape of a prohibition against the execution of the sentence, which came before Lord Chief-Justice Abbott, a very high authority on such questions, and the Court arrived at the same result as Lord Stowell, the Lord Chief-Justice observing:—"We think that whatever is on board a ship for the object of the voyage and adventure on which she is engaged belonging to the owners constitutes a part of the ship and her appurtenances within the meaning of this Act, whether the object be warfare, the conveyance of passengers or goods, or the fishery." Now, giving effect to that judgment, the question one naturally asks is whether the chronometer was necessary for the voyage, and the answer must be in the affirmative. It is said to be a peculiarity in this case that the chronometer was not on board at the time of the sale, and that, therefore, the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in the case of Langton v. Horton does not apply. Now, that seems to me to be a very narrow distinction to draw, and I can see no sound principle for it, for this chronometer would not have been absent from the vessel except for the purpose of making it useful for the next voyage, and so we find that the maker, who knew nothing of a sale having taken place, brought it back again as a matter of course. The chronometer was understood to belong to the ship, and thus was in use to be taken away and brought back as matter of course. I think it was as clearly belonging to the ship as anything could be. Yet we are told that the usage of the trade does not include a chronometer in such a sale as this. I think it would be a very curious usage which selected the chronometer for such exclusion, but I am quite satisfied that no such usage has been proved; indeed, I never saw a more inadequate attempt to prove usage. You must have a thing universally understood and acted on in order to establish usage, and if your Lordships will only think whether on the evidence before us you are prepared to affirm a principle of consuetudinary law you will see how weak the evidence is. I am for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

No. 70.
Jan. 19, 1875.
Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

Lord Deas.—I am of the same opinion with your Lordship and the Sheriff-substitute. I think that, under this memorandum of sale, the chronometer is carried to the purchaser. I do not say that because this was a written bargain, and because the sale of a ship must always be made by a written document, that the same rule would apply to the chronometer. If the chronometer had been verbally excluded at the time of sale that might have been enough. Wilkie says that he was told to exclude the chronometer, and that he did so, while Armstrong denies that anything was said on the subject. I see nothing against the credibility of either of these witnesses, and nothing to enable us to prefer the memory of the one to the memory of the other. The result seems to be that nothing is proved on either side but the fact that Wilkie was told to exclude the chronometer, and that is a fact against the seller.

The prima facie reading of the document of sale is against the sellers, and the case against them becomes considerably stronger by its being admitted or proved that many other articles, such as telescopes, barometers, sextants, &c., go with the vessel. It would require a very distinct and discriminating usage of trade to admit all these articles and exclude a chronometer, which is in precisely the same position, except that it is more frequently taken on shore than the other articles.

No. 70.
Jan. 19, 1875.
Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

I agree in thinking that the proof of usage is of the weakest kind. I can give no effect, in this question, to the alleged usage of shipbuilders, and beyond what relates to their practice there is nothing to overcome the words of the contract.

Two circumstances tell against the sellers. I have already referred to one of them—that the sellers thought it necessary to instruct their agent Wilkie to except the chronometer. The other is that the ship was about to commence her voyage at the time of the sale, and it is not maintained that she could have done so without a chronometer. The sellers ought consequently to have been careful to make an exception as to the chronometer. Therefore any special circumstances we have here are in favour of the purchasers.

Taking into view the whole circumstances, I think we ought to recall the judgment of the Sheriff, and return to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Both the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute have very carefully considered this case, and they have arrived at opposite conclusions. I have come to be of the same opinion as your Lordships that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right.

The competency of a proof of usage I admit when the words of the contract are doubtful. When the words have a clear meaning no proof of usage is competent. But, when competent, the proof of usage must be satisfactory, and the usage proved must be sufficient, for proof of a divided usage will not sustain a judgment against the words of the contract.

Here I cannot say that the words in the contract are so clear as to exclude a proof of usage. But the proof must be clear and the usage uniform. Both parties are Glasgow merchants and shipowners, and must be held to have known of any such established usage of trade.

On the proof, I am of opinion that it has been established that a chronometer is a usual, proper, and necessary instrument on board a seagoing vessel. I think that the fact that the chronometer happened to be on shore at the time of sale is of no consequence, because the only reason for its being on shore was that it required to be rated or regulated. It is not material that the owners may change, and occasionally do change the chronometers from one vessel to another. Neither is it, on the other hand, material that the chronometer was sent back to the ship before she sailed, because it is admitted that this was done in ignorance of the fact that the ship had been sold. But it is of more importance that the vessel had a chronometer on her last voyage, and, when sold, was about to proceed on another voyage, and that she did require a chronometer for that voyage, and that she did sail with the chronometer on board, and that the captain would not have sailed, or would most reluctantly have sailed, without a chronometer. I think the case of purchase of a ship from a builder is different. It has been proved that the builder of a ship does not usually supply a chronometer. But the reason is that the owner prefers to select his own chronometer.

This forms a large part of the defenders' proof of usage, and I do not think that such a limited proof of usage in sales by builders can be held sufficient to control the very general words of the contract. Nothing but a clear proof of a settled usage, so general and so recognised as to amount to a rule of trade, would be sufficient. I am disposed to think that the proof, so far as it goes, and

No. 70.
Jan. 19, 1875.
Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co.

including transactions with shipbuilders, is rather in favour of the sellers, but that, apart from shipbuilding transactions, the proof adduced to instruct usage as limiting the words of the contract is insufficient. It is in its import and character conflicting, and the usage is divided, not uniform. The seller has not established a settled usage of trade among merchants and shipowners which can take off the effect of the very general words of the contract.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated respectively the 20th April 1874 and 21st October 1874: Find that when the appellants, in the month of November 1871, purchased the screw-steamer 'Macedon,' then lying at Glasgow, 'with all belonging to her on board and on shore,' under the memorandum of sale No. 11/1 of process, the chronometer in question on shore belonged to her: Find that it is not established by the proof that there is any local or general usage of trade that under such a clause the ship's chronometer was not included or intended to be included in the said purchase; but find that the chronometer in question did, in terms of the said clause, pass with the said ship at the time of the said purchase, and is the property of the appellants, William John Armstrong and others."

J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 71.
Jan. 20, 1875.
Watson v. Watson's Trustees.

ROBERT WATSON AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—Balfour.
REV. JAMES ALEXANDER GEORGE AND OTHERS (Watson's Trustees), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.

Expenses—Trustee.—It is a question of circumstances whether testamentary trustees who have unsuccessfully defended the trust-deed in an action of reduction will be allowed their expenses out of the estate.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford, M.

JAMES WATSON, banker in Airdrie, died on 26th April 1873. He left three testamentary writings, (1) a trust-disposition, dated 19th February 1873, in favour of the Rev. J. A. George and other trustees; (2) a trust-disposition, dated 11th March 1873, in favour of different trustees; and (3) a codicil to the deed of 19th February, dated 27th March 1873, by which he revoked the second deed.

The testator's property amounted to about £5100.

He was not married. His nearest of kin were a brother, Robert Watson, and a sister, Mrs Martin. They were beneficiaries to a considerable extent under the first and second deeds, but not at all under the codicil. The first deed contained a bequest of £200 to Jessie Robertson, a servant of the testator, and £150 to her sister, Maggie Robertson. By the second deed these bequests were not materially altered. But by the codicil Jessie Robertson was to receive £1000, Maggie Robertson £500, and other relations of theirs £200. All the deeds contained provisions in favour of the children of a deceased brother, and some legacies for charitable purposes.

Robert Watson and Mrs Martin brought an action of reduction of the codicil, which was defended by the trustees of the first deed. The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury on the issues of (1) no

No. 71.

Jan. 20, 1875.
Watson v. Watson's Trustees.

deed; (2) impetration by Jessie Robertson. The jury found for the defenders on the first issue and for the pursuers on the second.

When the verdict was applied the defenders moved for their expenses out of the trust-funds. The pursuers opposed the motion.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—As I tried this case perhaps your Lordships will expect me to state my impression on this question of expenses. The jury found for the defenders on the first issue, and thus completely negatived the allegation that the testator was incapable of making a deed. Had the verdict on that issue been different, it might have been an important consideration in the question of expenses, that the trustees ought to have satisfied themselves of the testator's capacity. But the verdict on the second issue was in favour of the pursuers, and the jury thereby found that the deed was impetrated by Jessie Robertson.

I am bound to say that the trustees stand perfectly free from any accession to the proceedings of Jessie Robertson, and I may say, further, that the case was a very narrow one, and in every respect a fair case to try. I think therefore that the trustees are entitled to their expenses out of the trust-funds.

I do not think any general rule can be laid down on this subject. If trustees have been accessory to impetrating a deed it is very obvious that that is a ground for refusing their expenses, or finding them liable in expenses. On the other hand, if they have defended the deed in good faith, they will be, as a general rule, entitled to their expenses. But it is more to the purpose to say that every case of the kind depends on its own circumstances. I think that the circumstances here are strongly in favour of the defenders.

LORD DEAS.—I do not think that much turns here on the fact that the defenders were successful on the first issue while unsuccessful on the second; because it is a usual and convenient course to put these two issues before the jury, and the expense is not much affected by that course being followed.

There is no general rule obliging us to find the defenders entitled to expenses on the one issue, and liable in expenses on the other. The whole question of expenses is, on the contrary, a question of circumstances, and to attempt to apply to it any general rule is only calculated to mislead.

I attach, of course, very great weight to the opinion of your Lordship who tried the case, and I am satisfied that, in the circumstances, the trustees were fairly entitled to defend the deed, and ought to get their expenses out of the trust-funds.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT allowed the defenders their expenses out of the estate.

DAVID DOVE, S.S.C.—P. S. BEVERIDGE, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] Authorities quoted.—Graham v. Marshall, Nov. 22, 1860, 23 D. 41, 33 Scot. Jur. 21; Chalmers' Trs. v. Scott, June 23, 1830, 8 S. 961; Morrison v. Morrison's Trs., Dec. 23, 1848, 11 D. 297, 21 Scot. Jur. 73; Munro v. Strain, June 18, 1874, ante, vol. i. 1039.

No. 72.

Jan. 20, 1875. Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

ALEXANDER M. PEEBLES AND SON AND MANDATARY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Blair.
THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Johnstone.

Railway—Retention—Carrier—Tolls—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, sec. 90.—The 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, provides,—"If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods; or if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid."

Goods were delivered by a manufacturer to a railway company to be forwarded to his agent, who had accepted bills against the consignment. Held that, as against the onerous consignee, the company were not entitled under the enactment above quoted to detain the goods in security of a general balance due to them by the manufacturer for carriage of goods.

Observations on the scope and meaning of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

Railway—Retention—Carrier—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, sec. 7—Special agreement.—Goods were delivered for carriage to a railway company, with a consignment-note initialed on its face by the sender, bearing, "the Caledonian Railway Company will please receive the under-mentioned goods, and forward them, subject to the conditions on the back hereof," one of the conditions on the back being as follows:—"That all goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a general lien for money due to them, whether for carriage of such goods or for other charges, and in case the general lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the day when the company first received the goods the same will be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of such lien and expenses." Held that this was not an effectual condition, in terms of the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, in respect (1) that the condition was not duly signed; and (2) that if the condition was meant to give the company a general lien over the goods for arrears of carriage due by the sender to the prejudice of an onerous consignee it was not just or reasonable.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

THIS was an action at the instance of A. M. Peebles and Son, paper-merchants, London, against the Caledonian Railway Company, for delivery of a quantity of paper to the value of £184, 15s. 8d., delivered to the defenders on 28th and 30th January 1874 by Robert Philp, paper-maker, Bridge of Allan, to be forwarded to the pursuers in London.

The facts, as ascertained by a proof, are thus stated by the Lord Ordinary:—"Philp is a paper-maker at Bridge of Allan. The pursuer is his agent in London, and sells paper for him on commission, making advances on the consignments by accepting bills. The consignments were made from time to time, according to the actual or anticipated demand, of which Philp was apprised by the pursuer, sometimes to enable the pursuer to implement orders already accepted, and sometimes to be kept in stock with a view to future orders. The consignments of 28th and 30th January referred to on record were made in the ordinary course of business, partly for stock and partly to implement existing orders, two bills for £100 each being drawn by Philp and accepted by the pursuers against the consignments. The bills were returned to Philp accepted on the receipt by the pursuers of the ordinary advice that the consignments had been made and that the goods were on their way, and these bills have been discounted, and are now current. The goods (the bundles of paper

No. 72.

Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

in question) were, on 28th and 30th January, delivered by Philp to the Caledonian Railway Company (the defenders) at Bridge of Allan, addressed to the pursuer, the contemplated and arranged course of carriage being (as it had always been) by rail to Grangemouth, and then by sea to London in one of Carron Company's steamers. The practice was for Philp to pay directly to the railway company (with whom, by arrangement, he ran an account, payable monthly) the carriage to Grangemouth, and for the pursuer to pay the sea carriage on delivery, charging the same against Philp on settlement.

"The goods in question were detained by the defenders at Bridge of Allan in security of a general balance of £176 due to them by Philp for carriages in November and December preceding, and the question in the case is whether they are entitled to do so against the pursuer.

"A general lien at common law is not maintained. But the defenders say they have such lien in this case,—1st, by express written agreement;* and 2d, by section 90 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845." †

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences, and ordains the defenders forthwith to deliver to the pursuers the bundles of the paper referred to in the summons, reserving to the pursuers to move for decree for the value thereof in money, should the same not be delivered in obedience to this order: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.‡

---

* The alleged agreement was thus constituted. Consignment or forwarding-notes were furnished by the defenders to those trading with them in the following terms:—"The Caledonian Railway Company will please receive the undermentioned goods, and forward them, subject to the conditions on the back hereof." A schedule followed for the species and weight of the goods, name of consignee, &c. Upon the back were printed a number of conditions, one of them being:—"10. That all goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a general lien for money due to them, whether for carriage of such goods or for other charges, and in case the general lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the day when the company first received the goods, the same will be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of such lien and expenses." These notes were filled up and sent along with the goods to be forwarded, a counterfoil being retained by the sender. The forwarding-note sent with one of the parcels of the paper in question was initialed, but on its face only, by Philp's clerk, who had authority to sign forwarding-notes on his behalf.

† "If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods; or if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid, and all charges and expenses of such detention and sale, rendering the overplus, if any, of the monies arising by such sale, and such of the carriages or goods as shall remain unsold, to the person entitled thereto; or it shall be lawful for the company to recover any such tolls by action at law."

‡ OPINION.—(After the above narrative)—"The questions thus raised, though not, in my opinion, attended with difficulty, are of such magnitude and interest to the mercantile community that it is important they should be so decided as to dispel any doubts which may exist respecting them.

"It is not, as I have observed, maintained by the defenders that carriers have a general lien at common law, but I nevertheless think it not amiss, as preliminary to and having a legitimate bearing on the remarks which I have to offer on the questions presented, to say that I consider it is quite settled in our law that they have not.

No. 72.

Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for them;—The contract of carriage was entered into between

"The interests of third parties (I refer to consignees) in goods delivered to carriers for conveyance to their destination are such that it is, I think, improbable that a usage for a general lien will ever come to exist, though, if it should, the fact of its general recognition and allowance by the trading community would probably be received as sufficient evidence of its consistence with public policy and mercantile convenience, to induce the Court to receive it as part of the law merchant.

"A common carrier is not at liberty to refuse goods tendered to him for carriage to their destination, or so far on their way thereto as his means of conveyance extends. Further, the delivery of goods to a carrier has much legal significance and effect in creating or perfecting rights in the consignee. In the case of a sale, such delivery may, and generally does, divest the consignor (the seller), and invest the consignee (the purchaser), with the property of the goods; and when there is no transference of property, as in the case of consignment to an agent or factor, a valuable interest may be, and frequently is, created by the fact of such delivery, for the consignee may (as happened in this case) have made advances or accepted bills on the faith of the consignment so soon as delivery to the carrier on his account was notified.

"These considerations are hostile to a general lien in favour of common carriers. Their position is exceptional, particularly in these two respects which I have noticed, viz., first, that on grounds of public policy they are not permitted to refuse to carry goods tendered to them for carriage; and, second, that on similar grounds the delivery of goods to them raises, or may and often does raise, rights with respect to these goods in third parties, in whose favour consequently the law imposes duties upon the carrier, for the performance of which he is directly responsible to them, although not parties to the contract of carriage. In the case of the Scottish Central Railway Company v. Ferguson (February 27, 1864, 2 Macph. 781, 36 Scot. Jur. 385) it was held, and I think on clear grounds, that the consignee of goods, although no party to the contract of carriage, has a right of action against the carrier for delivery.

"But these considerations are not only adverse to a general lien at common law; they also bear on the question of general lien by agreement. The rule, no doubt, is that the absolute owner of goods may make any contract about them he pleases, and so by agreement subject them to lien for a prior debt or general balance, just as he may pledge them to any extent. But, independently of the Act of 1854, which, on considerations of public policy, disallows unreasonable agreements with carriers, I should greatly doubt the validity at common law of an agreement between a carrier and the sender of goods which professed to create a general lien to the prejudice of the consignee, to whom the carrier was legally bound to carry them at the usual rate of carriage. It is, however, unnecessary to dwell upon this view, for I think it clear that such an agreement must be disallowed under the Act as unreasonable. A carrier has a particular lien on every parcel of goods for the carriage thereof, and should he choose to give credit and allow his customers to run an account he has the ordinary legal remedies for recovery of his debt. But he remains subject to the public law, which obliges every carrier to receive and carry goods for the ordinary charge, and it would be unreasonable and detrimental to the interests of third parties and of trade to allow him, on the tender of a new parcel for carriage to a purchaser or other consignee, to exact an agreement subjecting it to a lien for the prior debt of the sender.

"I cannot, therefore, allow the defenders' plea that there was here a general lien by special agreement. I may add that I do not think the agreements founded on are signed agreements within the meaning of the Act.

"With respect to the plea founded on section 90 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, I have no difficulty in disallowing it. I am disposed to agree with the view that the term 'tolls,' as used in the clause, is not limited to tolls for the use of the road merely, and tables of which must be exhibited, but extends

No. 72.

Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son
v. Caledonian
Railway Co.

the railway company and Philp, the owner of the paper. Peebles and Son were not the purchasers of the paper; they were the general agents of Philp. The case of Ferguson, Rennie, and Company,[1] merely decided that an agent consignee has a general title to sue for delivery, and this the defenders did not dispute. But it was a different question whether to charges for the carriage of goods. But I think the provision does not apply apply to goods with respect to which the law has imposed on the company as common carriers an obligation or duty in favour of a third party, as in the case of goods received by them for carriage to, or so far on their way to, a consignee according to the address. When they have within their premises goods belonging to their debtor, and in which no other has any legal interest, or with respect to which they have incurred no duty or obligation to any other, they may detain and sell them for the carriage of other goods which were removed without payment. This is sufficient to satisfy the provision, without extending it so as to injure the rights of third parties, or annul the company's obligations as common carriers in their favour,—an extension never hitherto, so far as I know, contended for. This is sufficient for the decision. But I must add that I think the clause, so far as it authorises the detention and sale of goods on the premises for tolls due for goods that have been removed without payment, applies only where goods have been improperly, or without the consent of the company, removed before payment of the tolls demanded therefor. The language and provisions of the group of clauses regarding tolls shew that the Legislature contemplated an immediate demand and payment of the tolls exigible for carriages of goods before removal from the company's premises, and that the sharp and summary remedy of clause 90 was intended to apply to cases of evasion, and not to cases where credit was given by contract. At the date of the Act, railway companies had not settled into the position of common carriers which they now occupy, and practice of running monthly or other periodical accounts for tolls was not contemplated in any of the provisions of the Act. In this view I think it is in the power, and according to the duty of the Court, by construction, to restrain the powers of section 90 within reasonable limits, and to refuse to permit them to be exercised under circumstances, or in a manner which would do injustice or inflict hardship not contemplated by the Legislature. When a railway company has, by agreement (or otherwise), deliberately allowed a customer to run an account and get largely into their debt for carriages, it would, in my opinion, be unreasonable and unjust, and not according to the true intent and meaning of the Act, to permit them to detain and sell goods subsequently handed to them for carriage to the persons to whom they were consigned in the ordinary course of trade.

---

"It is so important that the law on the several points to which I have adverted should be settled one way or other that I have stated my opinion and the grounds of it at a length somewhat disproportioned to any difficulty which I have experienced. The result may be summarised in these propositions:—First, That common carriers have not a general lien at common law. Second, That a common carrier is bound to receive goods for conveyance at the ordinary rate of carriage, and is not entitled to refuse to receive them except on the condition of the sender agreeing to subject them to a general lien for his debts to the carrier. Third, That with respect to goods consigned to third parties in the ordinary course of business, and delivered to a carrier for conveyance, an agreement between the consigner and the carrier that they shall be subject to a general lien for the debts of the former to the prejudice of the interests of the consignees must be disallowed as unreasonable under the Act of 1854. Fourth, That when a railway company allows a customer to run an account for carriages, they are not warranted by section 90 of the Railways Clauses Act to detain and sell for any debt due on such account goods which the customer has delivered to them as common carriers for conveyance to persons to whom they have been consigned in the ordinary course of business."

[1] Scottish Central Railway Co. v. Ferguson, Rennie, and Co., Feb. 27, 1864, 2 Macph. 781, 36 Scot. Jur. 385.

No. 72.
Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

he took the goods free of all liability attaching to them in the person of the consigner. The paper was the property of Philp, and the defenders were entitled to retain it in security of the arrears due by him for carriages, both under the special agreement constituted by the consignment note, and under the statute founded on. Although a more limited sense had been given to the word "tolls" by the Court of Exchequer in England in the case of Wallis,[1] the Court of Session, in the case of North British Railway Company v. Carter,[2] assumed as not doubtful that the term included dues payable to the company as common carriers.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The questions raised under this reclaiming note are of very considerable importance. The action is brought by Messrs Alexander Peebles and Son, who are paper-merchants in London, and it appears from the proof that they acted as consignees and agents for the sale of paper manufactured by Robert Philp, paper-maker, Bridge of Allan. The course of dealing, as explained by Mr Peebles, was that the London agents sold in their own name to customers, sometimes out of stock transmitted by Philp, and sometimes in anticipation of consignments of paper to be sent, crediting Philp in either case with the price received, charging their commission against the manufacturer. Philp was in the habit of drawing on his consignees against consignments either already made or in anticipation of those which had been ordered.

Without going into the proof, which is clearly summarised in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, it seems sufficiently clear that Philp had drawn on the pursuers for the two parcels of paper in question to the extent of £200, and that these bills had been accepted by the consignees before delivery. These parcels of paper were delivered on the 28th and the 30th of January 1874 to the defenders the Caledonian Railway Company, addressed to the pursuers, the consignment note bearing that they were to be forwarded to A. M. Peebles and Son, by Carron Company's steamer to London, from Robert Philp. There is no doubt that the company undertook to deliver on board the Carron Company's steamer, at Grangemouth. Philp sent the invoices to the pursuers, and advised them by post that the goods had been sent. The company received the goods, but they did not forward them, claiming a right to detain them in liquidation of an unpaid balance on general account alleged to be due to them by Robert Philp. The account in question is produced, and contains a record of transactions extending over several months, and amounts in all to £176, 0s. 7d., being charges for goods carried on his account. The question is whether this claim for retention and liquidation is good against the pursuers.

In regard to the position of the pursuers, I am of opinion that they are onerous consignees,—that Philp was under an onerous obligation, in respect of their advances, to deliver goods to them to the amount which these advances covered, and that this obligation was duly fulfilled by Philp, by delivery to the railway company, as carriers, of the parcels in question. From the date of delivery to the defenders the goods were at the disposition of the pursuers for the purpose of the consignment, they paying the charges incident to the carriage. It is im-

[1] Wallis v. London and South-Western Railway Co., Jan. 17, 1870, L. R. 5 Exch. 62.

[2] North British Railway Co. v. Carter, July 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 998, 42 Scot. Jur. 611; see also Guild v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 20, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 198.

No. 72.
Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

material in this question whether the consignees were proprietors or not, seeing that they were consignees for value. If they had sold by anticipation,—Mr Peebles explains that he cannot precisely tell whether it was so or not in the present instance,—they might be held to be substantially in the position of buyers. But that is immaterial.

It is certain that the railway company, as public carriers, had no right at common law to retain these goods in liquidation of a general balance due by Philp. But the claim is maintained on two grounds,—1st, that the goods were delivered subject to certain conditions endorsed on the back of the consignment note, one of which bears, "Art. 10. That all goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a general lien for money due to them, whether for carriage of such goods or for other charges, and in case the general lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the day when the company first received the goods, the same will be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of such lien and expenses." It is said that the goods were delivered on this condition only, and the plea is founded on the terms of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, cap. 31, sec. 7.

This section requires, first, that to make such conditions effectual they must be signed by the customer, and, secondly, that they must be such as the Court shall adjudge to be just and reasonable.

In regard to the first of these requisites I am of opinion that the initials of the clerk adhibited to the consignment note is not a subscription in terms of the statute, and in regard to the second that the condition is not in itself just or reasonable. It is an attempt to introduce by convention not only a general lien for a general balance, but in addition a right of distraint and sale without judicial authority to enforce these conditions against consignees. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in his observations on this head. It is inconsistent with the ordinary duties of carriers, and plainly adverse to the public interest, that the carrier having undertaken to carry and deliver the goods as addressed can convert his contract into one of pledge, as here, for an illiquid balance arising out of prior transactions. The case of the Scottish Central Railway Company against Ferguson, Rennie, and Company[1] seems to be conclusive on this head.

The second ground on which the defence is founded rests on the 90th section of the Railway Clauses Act, and raises some considerations of great public importance. That section is as follows:—"If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods; or if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid."

It has been found in England, in the case of Wallis, that this clause only applies to tolls due for the use of the line. Had the case turned on this question I should have been anxious to have had further argument. My first impression was that that judgment could not be supported. The reverse was [1] Scottish Central Railway Company v. Ferguson, Rennie, and Company, Feb. 27, 1864, 2 Macph. 781, 36 Scot. Jur. 385.

No. 72.
Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

certainly assumed in the recent case of Carter[1] in the First Division, and has been very elaborately maintained by Lord Shand in the case of Guild v. The Caledonian Railway.[2] But although I think the judgment by the English Court is placed on very narrow ground, when rested on the meaning of the word "tolls," I wish to reserve my opinion as to the scope and construction of this clause. The clause does not appear to me intended to create any lien between carrier and customer, but to create a right of retention and sale between the owners of the railway and the carrier using it. It was intended to give the owners of the line a right against the carriages and goods of the traders carrying their own goods along the line, or common carriers using the line to carry the goods of others, and that for payment of the tolls due for the use of the line. The right is incident to the contract of hire, not to the contract of carriage; and when the company become themselves common carriers, I doubt if the section applies. It certainly would not, as far as I see, without something in the special Act, give any such claim to a railway company running over the line of another company, and I do not think it was meant to regulate the relations of carrier and customer at all.

But the words are general, and certainly ambiguous, and assuming that they have the construction contended for by the defenders they have two important qualifications. The primary right created by the clause in any view of it is to enable the owners of the line to retain carriages or goods for payment of the dues of carriage for which they are liable at common law, and also to sell without judicial authority after a demand has been made. This last power is of course a stringent and important privilege. But as regards goods other than those the tolls on which are in arrears, these are only subject to the terms of the clause, first, provided the goods primarily liable have been removed from the company's premises, and, secondly, when they are the property of the debtor.

It is thus seen that the clause does not introduce a general lien for a general balance over any goods in possession of the company belonging to the debtor. The lien is, in the first instance, special over the goods, the carriage of which is unpaid; and it is only in the event of their being removed that the company can have recourse to other goods within the company's premises. The Lord Ordinary thinks that these words refer to improper or surreptitious removal. This is perhaps stating the proposition too broadly. I think it also includes the case of carriages and goods necessarily removed from the custody of the company, owing to the nature of the service required. But I doubt greatly if this substituted or accessory lien will ever emerge, if possession is voluntarily parted with, without demand for the tolls, and much more if delivery be voluntarily made on an established course of credit, by which payment of the debt is conventionally postponed. A specific lien is discharged by credit being given for the debt; and though it may revive when the period of credit expires, if the subject of it remain in the possession of the creditors, yet if possession be voluntarily parted with it is absolutely extinguished.

I have thought it right to indicate these views, because they seem very material on the construction of this clause, and would certainly prevent rail-

---

[1] North British Railway Company v. Carter, July 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 998, 42 Scot. Jur. 611.

[2] Guild v. Caledonian Railway Company, Nov. 20, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 198.

No. 72.
Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

way companies, which act as common carriers, combining a system of giving credit for their tolls with this substituted right of lien. But even supposing that the clause is to be construed as the defenders contend for, the ground on which I wish to place my judgment, coinciding as I do in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, and in his forcible exposition of the views by which he reaches it, is that these bales of goods could only be dealt with by the railway company as the property of their debtor, subject to the onerous right acquired in them by the consignee. The pursuers had an absolute right to delivery in any question with the carriers, whatever the right of the latter might be, if they were only in a question with their debtor; and holding that the goods were not the property of the debtor in the sense of the statute, I think the case must be decided on the same principle and in the same way as the analogous case of Ferguson[1] to which we have been referred.

LORD NEAVES.—I entirely concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordship. The law of Scotland proceeds reasonably in all matters relating to the delivery of moveable goods. When they are in possession of the seller or the person giving them in pledge, the proper mode of completing the transference is by corporal delivery of the articles, the principle being that the new party must be brought into the same relation to the goods transferred in which his author stood. Where the goods are not in possession of the first party but in the hands of a custodier, the law does not require actual delivery to the buyer or pledgee to complete the transference. The principle is still the same. What is required is, that the custodier shall be placed in the same relation to the new party as he stood to his author. We were familiar with this principle long before the days of railways in the case of bills of lading. The transference of the bill of lading operates as a complete transference of the cargo. In the same way with regard to land carriage, when goods are put into the hands of a carrier with a document setting forth that they are to be delivered to another party, if there is a substantial contract between the sender and the consignee for the purpose of creating a real right in the goods in the latter, that new right is completed, whether it be the right of a purchaser or of an agent making interim advances upon the goods. These principles ought not to be interfered with except upon the best grounds.

In the present case a manufacturer sends paper to his London agent. No doubt, if it turns out that there is no onerous contract between the parties, that the agent is coming under no obligation in regard to the paper, that may give the railway company right to deal with the consignee as with the principal. But this must be clearly proved. In transactions of this kind onerosity is presumed. We are bound not to injure the right of the consignee, unless there be clear ground to entitle the company to detain the goods in a question with the consignee, particularly where the detention is attempted, not merely for the carriage of that particular parcel, but for arrears due by the sender.

The grounds founded on by the company are, in the first place, the indorsement on the consignment note. To this there are more answers than one. I do not think that the signature complies with the statute in any way. The Legislature intended that the signature should be adhibited with some degree of solemnity. But, however well signed, I think the condition is not just and reasonable if it is to act in prejudice of an onerous consignee. I do not think that an article received for carriage to a particular party named and designed should be subject to retention for the debt of another party. The first thing that the company here do, having received the article for the purpose of carrying and delivering it to a certain party, is to refuse to carry it. They propose not to give it back, but to sell it, it may be, on very short notice.

[1] Scottish Central Railway Company v. Ferguson, Rennie and Co., Feb. 27, 1864, 2 Macph. 781, 36 Scot. Jur. 385.

No. 72. Jan. 20, 1875. Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Then comes the question in regard to the Railways Clauses Act. I concur with your Lordship in the doubts which you have expressed as to the meaning and scope of the word "tolls." I am of opinion that to this case the 90th section does not apply. I think that section only confers upon the company the common law right of special lien, with the addition of a power of sale at their own hands, instead of having to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant, and with this further addition, that if by some accident a particular article be removed without payment of carriage, the company shall have recourse against the next article belonging to the party that comes into their hands. The section cannot apply to a case where the parties deal on the footing that there shall be no lien. In any view, all that the company can take in lieu of the articles removed is something belonging to their debtor. I cannot hold that this article belongs to their debtor, subject as it is to a real right on the part of an onerous consignee. The company are not entitled to extend their lien to the prejudice of one who has a jus quæsitum in the article.

Lord Gifford.—I am of the same opinion. It was not contended for the defenders that a carrier has at common law anything but a special lien over the particular goods conveyed for the carriage of the same. It is quite clear that at common law, and apart from statute and from special contract, a carrier has no general lien. The Caledonian Railway Company, however, maintain two points, 1st, that a general lien was conferred by statute, and 2d, that such general lien has been conferred by special contract.

The statute founded on is the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, sec. 90. I concur with your Lordships that it is not necessary to determine whether the word "tolls" applies to the charges for carrying all goods put into the hands of the railway company as common carriers. I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and notwithstanding the case of Wallis,[1] I think it does. But the province of the statute certainly does not cover a case like the present. It only enables the railway company to detain goods which are the property of their debtor. The words are that the railway company "may detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls." Now, I think it clear that the goods in question could not be said to be the property of the debtor. It was conceded that if the goods had been the subject of an ordinary contract of sale they could not have been detained for a debt due by the seller; and I do not think that the case is different where the consignee, instead of buying the goods, has made advances upon them, In both cases delivery to the carrier is delivery to the consignee, so far as the consignee is interested in the goods either as purchaser or as pledgee.

The only other ground maintained for the defenders was the condition

[1] Wallis v. London and South-Western Railway Company, Jan. 17, 1870. L. R. 5 Exch. 62.

No. 72.

Jan. 20, 1875.
Peebles & Son v. Caledonian Railway Co.

printed on the back of the consignment note. The question only arises as to one parcel, for one consignment note only can be held to be signed at all. I agree with your Lordships that even this note is not signed in the sense of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. The conditions themselves must be signed, and not merely referred to as existing elsewhere, and although there may be cases where the signature on one side of the same piece of paper may be held as affixed also to what is printed on the back, I do not think that is the case here. The initials on the face of the consignment note can hardly be held as a statutory signature of the conditions on the back. But even if the conditions are to be held as signed, I agree in thinking that they are not just and reasonable. Still further, I think that the words of the condition are not sufficient to cover goods in which the consignee has a real right. It is stipulated, or attempted to be stipulated "that all goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a general lien for money due to them;" but it fails to define to whom the goods belong. It cannot mean that goods belonging to one man shall be subject to a lien for the debt of another.

LORD ORMIDALE was absent at the debate.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN LATTA, S.S.C.—HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

WILLIAM ANDERSON (Watson and Campbell's Trustee), Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
WILLIAM HAMILTON AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. Guthrie Smith.

Bankrupt—Trustee—Power to implement or cancel Bankrupt's Executory Contracts—Current Contract—Delectus Personæ—Mora.—A firm contracted to supply shipbuilders with iron for certain vessels which were to be built, and had partially implemented the contract, which was a beneficial one for them, and was daily becoming more so, when they became insolvent. The day after the insolvency the shipbuilders wrote cancelling the contract. Two days afterwards the firm's manager wrote asking for time to make arrangements. Twenty-six days after the insolvency the trustee on the sequestrated estate wrote offering to go on with the contract or to come to terms upon which it might be cancelled, which offer was refused. In an action for damages at the instance of the trustee, held that, without deciding whether the contract was one which the trustee could competently have taken up as not involving delectus personæ, in the circumstances he had not declared his option to go on with the contract tempestive, and that the shipbuilders were not liable in damages.

Question, whether the contract was one that could competently be taken up by the trustee and creditors?

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

ON 4th December 1873 Watson and Campbell, iron merchants in Glasgow, through their manager, applied to William Hamilton and Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, for an order. Hamilton and Company informed them that they expected to get an order to build certain vessels, and that they would take the iron for such of these vessels as they might get orders for.

The following missives then passed:—"Messrs Wm. Hamilton and Co., Port-Glasgow.—Glasgow, 4th Dec. 1873.—Dear Sirs,—We have to-day sold you say 2000 tons, more or less, as you may require, best ship plates and angle iron, to your specifications, at the sum of £13 p. ton overhead, also all filling and stanchion iron required for the above quantity of angles and plates at the sum of £12, 10s. p. ton overhead, all delivered at your works, payable on the following conditions:—Payments to be made after the completion of each specification ('which we guarantee to be delivered in seriatim'), on the first cash day of the second month following completion of said specifications.—Yours, &c., pro WATSON & CAMPBELL, J. C. STEEL. All iron to be delivered not later than six weeks after receipt of specification.—(Initld.) pro W. & C., J. C. S." On the same day Hamilton and Company addressed to Watson and Campbell a letter, in which they said:—"We have your sale-note of even date for plate angles, &c., which we hereby accept."

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875. Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

Watson and Campbell subsequently delivered a portion of the iron thus contracted for, but on 13th March 1874 they became insolvent. On 13th March Hamilton and Company had written to them demanding an assurance that the iron would be duly delivered, and having received no answer, they, on 14th March, wrote cancelling the contract.* The estates of Watson and Campbell were sequestrated on 17th March, and William Anderson, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed judicial factor on the estate. Mr Anderson was afterwards elected trustee in the sequestration on 27th March, and his election was confirmed by the Sheriff on 30th March.

Anderson, as Watson and Campbell's trustee, and with the consent of the commissioners on the estate, raised, on 12th May 1874, this action against Hamilton and Company for £4000 as damages incurred through the defenders not taking delivery of iron under the contract.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 7) "On 19th March 1874, the pursuer, as judicial factor foresaid, addressed to the defenders a letter in the following terms:—'Gentlemen.—Watson and Campbell.—Yours of the 17th inst., addressed to this firm, has been handed to me. I am not aware that there has been any delay in the execution of your contracts, and I cannot accept your notice of cancelment.' To this letter the defenders returned no reply." (Cond. 9) "After receiving the act and warrant of confirmation in his favour, the pursuer, of date April 8, 1874, addressed to the defenders a letter in the following terms:—'Gentlemen.—Watson and Campbell's sequestration.—As trustee on this estate I am prepared to complete the contract entered into between you and this firm on 4th December last for plates and angles; or, if you prefer it, I am prepared to arrange the terms on which I can cancel the contract.' Notwithstanding of this, and the previous offers of due fulfilment on Watson and Campbell's part of the said contract, and that such fulfilment would have been duly given, the defenders have persisted and still persist in their refusal to take delivery of the iron contracted for, and have thus been guilty of a breach of the said contract."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The contract founded on being for continuous deliveries of iron over a lengthened period the defenders were entitled to rescind it on the insolvency of the sellers, and their failure timeously to make and intimate satisfactory arrangements for its being carried on. (2) The bankrupts not being ready and willing to deliver the said iron at the time of their failure, and having acquiesced in the defenders' proposal that the contract should be abandoned, the defenders were thereby discharged from all liability. (3) The pursuer having failed within reasonable time to intimate to the defenders that he was prepared to implement the contract, the defenders are no longer bound thereby. (4) The pursuer was not entitled, after the time for implement of the first specification had elapsed without its being implemented, to insist on the contract being carried on. (5) The defenders, not being bound by the terms of the said contract to take more iron than they might ask to be delivered, are not liable in damages.

* For these letters see infra, p. 357.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875. Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

A proof was allowed.

The parties admitted that specifications for iron had been sent to Watson and Campbell by Hamilton and Company on 24th and 26th February 1874, and on 7th, 9th, and 10th March 1874, the quantities ordered being respectively 80 tons, 11 tons, 4 cwt., 40 tons, and 9 tons—in all 140 tons 4 cwt. They also admitted that Watson and Campbell had, by 13th March (the date of the insolvency), delivered 51 tons of the 80 tons ordered on 24th February, 4 tons of the 11 tons ordered on 26th February, the whole 4 cwt. ordered on 7th March, and no part of the 49 tons ordered on 9th and 10th March. The quantity thus admitted to have been delivered was 55 tons 4 cwt., leaving 85 tons still to be delivered.

It was also admitted that between the date of the contract and 14th March 1874 the price of iron had fallen £1 per ton, and by the date of the action £2 per ton, and had still continued to fall from that date, the contract thus being a beneficial one for Watson and Campbell.

From the proof which was led it appeared that Messrs Hamilton had agreed to take, and Watson and Campbell to supply the iron, in the expectation that the shipbuilders would obtain orders for four steamers and a sailing vessel, and that the amount of iron in the contract (2000 tons) was the quantity which they calculated would be required for these vessels.

Hamilton and Company did obtain an order for steamers, which they were bound to supply respectively on 7th November 1874, 14th February 1875, and 14th May 1875, under the penalty of paying, as liquidated damages for delay, a sum at the rate of 7½ per cent on the advances made for the time being to them, and on £3000 deposited under the contract.

Hamilton and Company stated on record and in evidence that although Watson and Campbell had supplied them with a certain amount of the iron under the contract the iron so supplied was not delivered seriatim so as to be capable of being used for the building of the steamers which had been commenced, and that in consequence the work in their shipbuilding yard had been brought to a standstill.

It appeared that they had frequently written to Watson and Campbell complaining of the inconvenience they were suffering and the risk of heavy penalties they were incurring owing to the delays caused by the irregular delivery of the iron under the specifications. In particular, on 13th March they wrote that unless they were assured by the next day that the rest of the iron already ordered was to be delivered within a week they would need to put the contract into the hands of other parties. To this they received no answer, and accordingly on 14th March wrote as follows:—"Dear Sirs,—Not having heard from you in reply to ours of yesterday, we now beg to intimate that we are compelled to cancel our contract for iron with you of date 4th December '73, as we are compelled by contract to deliver our ship within a limited time under a heavy penalty. We are exceedingly sorry that you are unable to carry out the contract, as it will put us to great loss and inconvenience through the detention which will be caused by putting the specification into other hands."

To this letter Watson and Campbell's manager replied, by the instructions of Anderson:—"16th March 1875.—Gentlemen,—Yours of 14th inst. to hand. We must ask you to keep our contract with you on your books for a few days longer, till we get the necessary arrangements made for its fulfilment. We hope to write you definitely on the subject in a day or two."

To this Hamilton and Company replied:—"17th March 1874.—Dear Sirs,—In answer to your note of yestdy., we were obliged to cancel our contract and place our specifications in other hands. From the uncertainty of your business we could not wait any longer, as we are bound under heavy penalty with the ship."

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875. Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

Anderson produced his letter-book at the proof in support of his statement that he wrote on 19th March the letter quoted in the condescendence, supra, in answer to the above letter.

Hamilton and Company, however, denied that they had ever received this letter, and no trace of it was to be discovered in their office.

Afterwards, on 8th April 1874—the day after the six weeks from the date of the first specification on 24th February expired—Anderson wrote the letter quoted in article 9 of the condescendence, supra, p. 356.

In answer to this Hamilton and Company referred him to their letters of 14th and 17th March above quoted.

Anderson thereafter raised this action. It appeared that he had never informed the general body of the creditors of the existence of the contract, and had not therefore been instructed by them to continue to supply the iron.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and remits," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuer, as trustee in the sequestration of Watson and Campbell, seeks to recover damages from the defenders for breach of the contract contained in the missive offer and acceptance quoted in article 1 of the condescendence.

"The contract was made with the bankrupts, and it is not alleged that there was any breach on the part of the defenders prior to the bankruptcy. The alleged breach on which the action is founded consists in the refusal of the defenders to go on with the contract after the pursuer's letter of 8th April (quoted in article 9), wherein he expressed his readiness to complete it, and their adherence to their determination to cancel notified to the bankrupts on the 14th and again on the 17th March.

"The defenders contend that they were entitled to cancel the contract on 14th March, and that at all events on 8th April, when the pursuer intimated his election to adopt the contract, they were no longer bound to proceed with it. The pursuer disputes this, and so the main question in the case (for there is a subsidiary question) arises.

"The defenders are iron shipbuilders in Port-Glasgow, and the contract may, for the purposes of the question which I have stated, be represented as made by them with the bankrupts, who were iron merchants in Glasgow, for the iron that might be required to build certain ships for which at the date of the contract they expected (and in the event obtained) orders. This fact, which is clear on the evidence, and was in the knowledge of both parties, explains the language of the missives, and enables the Court to read and understand them as the parties did. It appears that the defenders expected orders for five ships, and that the quantity of iron stated in the missives was the quantity which the parties thought would probably be required for that number, but that in the result they got orders for only three ships. This is important with reference to a subordinate question in the case, but is immaterial to that which I have represented as the main question. It could not be accurately known how long it would take to build the ships, and the views of the parties regarding the period over which the execution of the contract would extend must therefore be taken as only matter of reasonable judgment. From the defenders' statement and evidence it appears that, according to the building contracts as afterwards made, the last of the ships was to be delivered on 14th May 1875, which would give the iron contract a currency of about eighteen months from its date—the supplies of iron under it to be furnished as required during that time.

"Between 24th February and 10th March the defenders specified for, i.e. required to be supplied with, 140 tons of the iron contracted for, and received from the bankrupts 55 tons, leaving their specification unfulfilled to the extent of 85 tons. It is the import of the evidence, in my opinion, that the specifications were not fairly answered, and that the defenders suffered considerable in-

Anderson reclaimed.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.

Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

Argued for him;—(1) On the general question of law involved.—Bank-convenience and detriment in their business in consequence. But although I think the defenders were entitled to complain, as they did, of a failure on the part of the bankrupts to furnish them with the supplies which they had repeatedly and urgently required, I am not of opinion, and did not understand it to be contended, that the failure prior to the public stoppage of the bankrupts was such as to entitle the defenders to cancel the contract.

"The stoppage of the bankrupts became publicly known on 13th March, and the defenders having received no reply to their communications of 12th and 13th March, pressing for deliveries, wrote to them on 14th cancelling the contract. On the 16th the bankrupts wrote to the defenders requesting them to keep the contract on their books for a few days longer, till they should get the necessary arrangements made for its fulfilment, which, by letter of the 17th, the defenders declined to do, intimating that they had placed their specifications in other hands. The sequestration was awarded on that day, 17th March.

"Regarding the case as at this date—that of the sequestration—the question occurs, whether or not the defenders were then entitled to cancel the contract. They contend that it was important to their business that they should have a contract on which they could rely for due supplies of the iron required for the ships which they had in hand, and that the contract which they made having failed by the stoppage and bankruptcy of the contractors they were at liberty to make a new one with a responsible party, and were not bound to delay in order to see what might be the views of the trustee or the creditors of the bankrupts, as to the expediency of taking up the contract for the benefit of the estate. To have done so would, they say, have been not only to go in the meantime without the iron which they immediately required, but to take upon themselves the risk of an unfavourable change in the iron market, which is exceedingly uncertain. For although the market was then falling, it might immediately rise, in which case (as the trustee and creditors would then certainly decline to take up the contract) they would be under the necessity of making a more unfavourable contract than it was in their power to make at the date of the failure.

"The pursuer answered that he, as trustee, was entitled to exercise his judgment with reference to the current contracts with the bankrupts, and to take up such of them as he thought advantageous for the estate; that the contract in question was subsisting at the date of the sequestration, the failure of deliveries prior to that time not having been such as to entitle the defenders to cancel it; that the bankruptcy did not itself cancel the contract, and that after his letter (as judicial factor) of 19th March, he was entitled to a reasonable time to exercise his option, which he did, without undue delay, on 8th April, when he notified his readiness to fulfil the contract. He admitted that the bankrupts had no iron, and that he had none, but said he was prepared to procure it in the market at the cost of the estate under his charge. It did not appear that the creditors had been consulted, or that the trustee had any authority beyond that conferred on him by the Bankrupt Act.

"My opinion is in favour of the defenders' contention, and against that of the pursuer.

"It appears from the evidence that at the date of the bankruptcy iron was lower than at the date of the contract, and that the market was falling, and continued to fall for some time. This circumstance exposes the defenders to the remark that it was their interest to get free of the contract. But I am not of opinion that their conduct ought on that account to be regarded by a Court of law with disfavour or suspicion. The exigencies of their business required that they should make themselves secure of supplies of iron sufficient to build the ships for which they had contracted, and the building of which was to extend over a period of about fifteen months from the bankruptcy of Watson and Campbell. Their iron contract was an important matter, and might well make all the difference between profit and loss on their building contracts; and with

No. 73.
Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

ruptcy did not of itself necessarily rescind a contract. Contracts were habitually taken up by trustees and creditors. A trustee so taking up a a market so sensitive and so liable to be affected by speculators as the iron market the delay of a few weeks or even days might have been ruinous. The rule governing their rights in the circumstances in which they were placed by the bankruptcy of Watson and Campbell must, I think, be founded on considerations more certain and satisfactory than the momentary condition or probable prospects of the iron market.

"With respect to the right of a trustee in bankruptcy to adopt advantageous contracts made with the bankrupt, and to enforce their execution for the benefit of the estate, I did not understand it to be disputed. But it exists within limits, and without attempting to express and guard a rule on the subject for general guidance, but confining my attention to the particular case, I venture to doubt whether it is according to the right and duty of a trustee in bankruptcy to involve the estate in the risk of a contract of so speculative a character, and having so long currency as that now before the Court. It was not capable of immediate execution with a certain or ascertainable amount of gain or loss, but extended over the period necessary to build the ships, and was to be implemented according to specifications furnished as the work proceeded. He may possibly have found an iron merchant willing to take it over at a premium. But a contract by a shipbuilder for materials, and extending over a period of time, implies confidence in the contractor, and when he is disappointed by the bankruptcy of the party whom he selected I think he is clearly not bound to submit to a sale of the contract by the trustee, to the effect of making his supply of materials for a considerable time dependent on a party not of his selection, and in whom he may have no confidence. Nor is he bound, in my opinion, to accept of the security of the bankrupt estate for the fulfilment of a contract having a tract of future time. To fulfil or secure the fulfilment of such contracts is beyond the scope and purpose of sequestration in bankruptcy, which is realisation and distribution. These considerations are inapplicable to the case of a contract which is capable of immediate execution. In that case the estate, on the one hand, is involved in no speculation by the adoption of the contract, and the party, on the other, is exposed to no hardship or risk, for he obtains immediately and certainly what he contracted for. To cases of this class, therefore, I should be inclined to say, generally, that the right and duty of the trustee to adopt apparently advantageous contracts is limited, though I am indisposed to lay down any rule going beyond the exigencies of the case in hand.

"But whatever opinion may be formed regarding the right of the trustee to adopt the contract, there is and can be none as to his right to repudiate it. The estate might be liable to make good any damage, though, for reasons which it is unnecessary to state, I think this more than doubtful; but the trustee was clearly at liberty to refuse implement, and assuming (contrary to my opinion) his right to bind the estate to give implement, it would have been a strong proceeding on his part to do so without consulting the creditors and obtaining their authority. This suggests the question, how long were the defenders to wait or abstain from protecting what I must regard as their legitimate and reasonable interests by a new contract. The pursuer's answer must be—at least till the 8th of April, for that is the date of his letter announcing his election to adopt the contract. In other words, the pursuer's contention is that the defenders, who had only received about the half of the iron specified for in February (55 out of 91 tons), and no part of that specified for on 9th and 10th March, were bound, on being informed that their contractors had publicly stopped payment, to allow the matter to stand over for three or four weeks longer to allow him as trustee to judge whether or not he would take up the contract for behoof of the creditors. But by that time the market might have so risen that he would certainly or probably have elected otherwise than he did, and left to the defenders the whole loss of the rise, with only a claim (I think a very problematical one) for a dividend on its amount. I do not think that the law on the subject is such as to expose a party to the risk of being placed in such a position.

No. 73.
Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

contract became the contractor, as if he himself had made the original contract and bound himself personally, and could not rescind the contract

I should have thought the 8th of April too late even for an actual tender of delivery under the specifications of February and March; but it may not be immaterial to remark that the pursuer never tendered delivery, and in fact had no iron to tender. The bankrupts were possessed of none at the date of the sequestration, and the pursuer had, in the exercise of his undoubted right, cancelled their current contracts with ironmasters. All he did or could do on 8th April was to express his willingness to take up the contract with the defenders as a promising speculation for the estate, and for that purpose to go into the market as a purchaser on account of the estate.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defenders acted according to their right, and with no undue disregard of the rights of others, when they cancelled the contract on 14th March, and made a new contract with another party. Further, assuming that cancellation to have been premature, and that the trustee was at liberty to adopt the contract (both of which assumptions are contrary to my opinion), I think the trustee's letter of 8th April came too late, and that then, at all events, the defenders were entitled to decline to be longer bound by the contract.

"I may refer to the opinion of the Judges in the case of Kirkland v. Cadell, 9th March 1838 (16 S. 860), for some important observations generally to the effect that the primary duty of a trustee in bankruptcy is to ingather and distribute the estate, and that he is neither bound nor entitled to adopt the undertakings of the bankrupt 'having a tract of time,' or to carry on any such undertaking as a speculation for behoof of the creditors.

"The importance of this topic in the present case is not, of course, that the defenders were concerned with the interests of the creditors or the duty of the trustee as in a question with them, but that they were entitled to take immediate measures for the protection of themselves and the interests of their business, on the footing that their contract with the bankrupts was not such as the trustee would, in the ordinary course of his duty, take up and bind the estate to fulfil. With the opinion which I entertain I must approve of and uphold their conduct, proceeding on this view of the matter.

"According to the opinion which I have formed on the main question, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, and it is unnecessary to decide any question which bears only on the amount of damages. But a subordinate question of this character having been raised and argued, I think it proper to express my opinion upon it. It regards the construction of the contract with respect to the quantity of iron contracted for. The pursuer contends that the contract imports an absolute sale of 2000 tons or thereby of plates and angle iron, with the filling and stanchion iron required for that quantity of plates. The defenders, on the other hand, contend that the bargain was conditional on their obtaining contracts to build all or one or more of five ships (four steamers and a sailing-vessel) which they had in prospect, and was only for so much iron as might be required for the execution of these contracts, or such of them as they should obtain. The dispute must, of course, be decided upon a just construction of the missives when read in the knowledge of the facts proved to have been known to and in the view of the parties when the missives were written and exchanged. Evidence of such facts is generally admissible with a view to the construction of such missives, and the language of those in question being such as, in my opinion, to require it in order to enable the Court to read them as the parties certainly or probably did, I admitted the evidence, although objected to by the pursuer. The parties between whom the contract was made agree in their evidence as to these facts, and reading the missives, with the light thereby thrown on them, I have experienced no difficulty in adopting the construction of the defenders.

"The three steamers for which the defenders obtained contracts required, according to the evidence, about 1050 tons of plates and angle iron, together with about 105 tons of filling and stanchion iron.

"In my view these quantities are to be taken as the limit of the contract, according to which damages for breach, if held to be due, must be estimated."

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1876. Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

if he had once elected to go on with it.[1] When a contract was adopted in this way it was not the insolvent estate that was bound, it was the trustee personally, and the creditors as cautioners. The rights of the other contracting parties were thus preserved intact, and they were under no hardship. The only exception to the general rule was not as laid down by the Lord Ordinary that a contract extending over a tract of time could not be taken up, but that one involving delectus personæ could not competently be executed by a trustee. (2) On the special character of this contract.—This was not a contract involving delectus personæ. Neither was it a contract for any particular brand of iron. The subject-matter of the contract was simply a marketable commodity which could be bought from any one. (3) There was no breach of contract on the part of the trustee or the bankrupt, but only on the part of the shipbuilders, who had at their own hands, on 14th March, cancelled the contract. After that letter had been received it was unnecessary for the bankrupts or their trustee to go on fulfilling the contract. The defenders would not have taken delivery. They had repudiated the contract, and not being, in the circumstances, entitled to do so, the present claim for damages arose. Up to the 14th of March the iron had been delivered under the contract by the bankrupts in the proper way.

Argued for Hamilton and Company;—Although bankruptcy did not, eo ipso, rescind every contract, it altered all contracts to the extent that notice of the intention of the trustee and creditors to fulfil the contract in full must be given to the other contracting party, and for the reason that he could not compel fulfilment.[2] When this notice was not given the practical conclusion was that there was no intention of fulfilment. This contract was one which the defenders were entitled to assume would not be taken up. It was a contract of risk. The whole structure of the Bankruptcy Acts was that no speculative contract should be taken up by the trustee. It was against the policy of these statutes that a trustee should trade. A trustee who speculated did not bind the creditors. Decree against him was not res judicata against any creditor, even though he had assented to the speculation being gone into.[3] In this particular case the trustee professed to act within his competency, and not under the authority of the creditors. The consent of the commissioners, which he asserted he had, was of no use in such a case. In the special circumstances of this case it would be unreasonable to hold the defenders bound by the contract, so as to be compelled to wait an indefinite time for the trustee to make up his mind as to whether he would take up the contract or not. It was evident that the trustee had been induced to offer to go on with the contract on 8th April by the fact that iron had fallen £1 a-ton since the contract had been entered into. Supposing that the defenders, owing to the delays and neglects of the bankrupts and their trustee, incurred the heavy penalties contained in their contract for the steamers, how could they operate their relief? Only by ranking for the loss and damage on the bankrupt estate. That was a very anomalous state of affairs. Even prior to the insolvency the bankrupts had been in breach of the contract, and that gave the de-

[1] Cuthill v. Jeffrey, Nov. 21, 1818, F. C.; cases collected in Murdoch on Bankruptcy, p. 116; Kirkland v. Cadell, March 9, 1838, 16 S. 860, 10 Scot. Jur. 363.

[2] Ex parte Chalmers, in re Edwards, Jan. 31, 1873, L. R. 8 Chanc. 289; Morgan v. Bain, Nov. 22, 1874, L. R. 10 C. P. 15; Bloomer v. Bernstein, L. R. 9 C. P. 588.

[3] Kirkland v. Cadell, supra, Lord President, and Lords Gillies, Mackenzie, and Corehouse, p. 881.

No. 73.
Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

fenders the right to cancel, which they exercised on 14th March. The true meaning of the contract was that the defenders were to be supplied with iron in the order in which it could be worked up from day to day throughout the six weeks which were allowed for supplying each specification. They had supplied a certain weight of iron, but it was useless, not having been sent seriatim, as stipulated in the contract. No offer had been made to go on with the contract till 8th April, and by that time twenty-nine tons were over-due under the specification of 24th February. Moreover, at that date the trustee had no iron ready, and a still longer delay must have taken place before the contract could have been fulfilled.

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This case involves questions of importance and delicacy in bankruptcy and commercial law.

The Lord Ordinary has treated the subject fully in his opinion, and in the result to which his Lordship has come I concur. At the same time I wish to guard myself from being supposed to adopt all the views expressed in that opinion. His Lordship has been careful to avoid laying down any stringent rules upon the point, but in my opinion some things are said that seem unnecessary for the decision of this case, and as to which I desire to reserve my judgment.

It is a general principle in bankruptcy that all beneficial contracts may be taken up by the trustee and creditors, subject to certain limitations. For instance, no trustee or creditors are entitled to take up a contract the execution of which involves a delectus personæ. Where it is of the essence of the contract that the thing to be done requires special skill, genius, art, or even strict personal supervision, such a contract cannot be taken up by a trustee and creditors. Reliance is there placed on the personal power of the party contracting to do the special thing. This is so not only in such a case as the painting of a picture, but, generally, wherever it appears that a delectus personæ is involved.

Of those things, which it is competent for a trustee to take up with the consent of the creditors, or some of them, it seems a general condition that they must be carried out in a manner imposing no hardship or loss on the other contracting party.

There are two parties to such a contract, the one solvent and the other insolvent. If the trustee of the insolvent party can arrange to take up the contract and carry it out as efficiently as the bankrupt could have done, well and good, but he cannot expect that he will be entitled to subject the solvent contracting party to undue hardship.

That is the sort of question which we have to consider here.

A beneficial contract is certainly one of the assets of a bankrupt's estate, if it can be well carried out.

Let us see what the circumstances are here. It is plain that we must construe the contract as to its mode of fulfilment with due attention to the subject-matter and the object of the contract. There is a provision that six weeks shall be allowed for the delivery of the iron, but I do not think it the fair construction of this stipulation that the debtors in the contract were to be allowed five weeks and some days during which they need furnish no iron whatever, and then suddenly deliver the whole on the last day of the time allowed. The true object of the parties was, without doubt, that delivery was to commence as early as possible, and then to go on continuously in a reasonable and regular order, those parts being supplied which required to be completed before the others were superadded.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

If the trustee had said at once, I will go on with the contract without delay, Hamilton and Company could not, I think, have refused to take delivery of the iron he offered, unless some special ground of objection had arisen. But the question comes to be, were Hamilton and Company bound to wait, with all the workmen in their yard standing idle, for an indefinite period, when also they had no security that the contract would ever be fulfilled?

In contracts of this sort it is the duty of the bankrupts and their creditors to see that there is no delay. If they delay they subject the other party to hardship if he is obliged to await their arrangements, and this, it is thought, they are not entitled to do. If the bankrupts are embarrassed and doubtful what to do, they ought to call their creditors together and make them aware in good time that they have a valuable contract, and then, whether sequestration follows or not, it is in the power of the leading creditors to make arrangements immediately, so that the other contracting party shall not suffer hardship. That, I think, could be done by any one interested in the bankrupt's estate who wishes to reap the profits of such a contract for the general behoof. But that was not what was done here. Delay was asked by Anderson for a very short time, and then nothing was done, or concluded, until 8th April. It is impossible here to overlook the letter written by Hamilton and Company on 14th March, in which they intimate that they have cancelled the contract. It was urged on behalf of the trustee that the terms of that letter justified him in doing nothing. But the fact of Hamilton and Company saying that they have cancelled a contract would not entitle them to cancel it, if they had not the power to do so. The letter must be read as merely a strong expostulation against any further delay. No answer was made to that letter, or any assurance given that the contract would be proceeded with, from the middle of March until the 8th of April. To be sure there was the letter of 16th March, wherein delay is asked, but that gives no assurance or even indication of an intention to fulfil the contract, and when the six weeks expired nothing more had been done.

It is in these special circumstances, there being failure on the part of the bankrupts and their creditors to make immediate arrangements and to assure the other party that the contract was to be kept on, that this case fell to be decided. The iron might easily have been got in the market and sent to the shipbuilders. This, I consider, was not a contract in which there was any delectus personæ, or any element which could make it non-transferable. But when weeks passed without any iron being tendered to them the shipbuilders were entitled to go elsewhere for their iron, and that is a bar against the other party afterwards reverting to the original contract.

In so far as the Lord Ordinary has decided upon that ground I entirely concur with him, and any remarks of his which go beyond that it is not necessary to discuss here.

The result of my opinion is that where there is no delectus personæ in a contract the creditors and trustee of a bankrupt contracting party are, in general, entitled to take it up, provided they do so timeously, and do not interfere with the equitable rights of the other contracting party, who must not be subjected to indefinite delay or disappointment.

In the special circumstances, we ought to adhere.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur so far with Lord Neaves in thinking that the Lord Ordinary, in his very able and learned opinion, appears to have indulged in some speculations which, when taken by themselves, and not in connection with the particular case which he had to dispose of, could not be adopted. But it is important to observe that he says,—"With respect to the right of a trustee in bankruptcy to adopt advantageous contracts made with the bankrupt, and to enforce their execution for the benefit of the estate, I did not understand it to be disputed. But it exists within limits, and without attempting to express and guard a rule on the subject for general guidance, but confining my attention to the particular case, I venture to doubt whether it is according to the right and duty of a trustee in bankruptcy to involve the estate in the risk of a contract of so speculative a character, and having so long currency as that now before the Court." It may be inferred from this that the Lord Ordinary was designedly careful to express the result at which he arrived in reference alone to the particular case with which he was dealing; and so the views which might otherwise be called speculative must be taken very much, if not entirely, in connection with the specialties of the present case.

One thing I agree with Lord Neaves in holding, and it was not indeed disputed at the bar, is, that where the element of delectus personæ does not enter a contract it cannot be doubted that the creditors of the insolvent party have it in their power to adopt such contract and to proceed with it notwithstanding the bankruptcy. And there can be as little doubt that they have it in their power to repudiate any contract, whether it involves the element of delectus personæ or not.

It is important, in this case, to observe the position of the solvent contracting party—the defenders. They were under a contract to build three steamers; this contract was one of considerable magnitude, and involved large outlays, and the risk of very heavy penalties, in case it should not be completed within the stipulated time. Prior to the insolvency the bankrupts had evidently been remiss and out of time in furnishing the iron, as contemplated in the contract in question; but on the insolvency being announced, as it was on 13th March, and more completely by the sequestration on 17th March, there was not only no offer made of continuing to deliver iron under the contract, but the pursuer caused a letter to be written to the effect that no promise could be given that the contract would be fulfilled, and asking for delay for a few days. Had the disputed question turned on a few days' delay it might not improbably be determined differently from what it is likely to be.

The shipbuilders—that is, the defenders—were entitled to be informed at once—or, at any rate, with very little delay—whether the contract was to be implemented or not. They wrote a letter on 14th March, which was perhaps somewhat premature and absolute in its terms, stating that they held the contract as cancelled. On 27th March a meeting of the creditors of the other party took place, and the pursuer was then elected trustee on their sequestrated estates.

It is not explained why—and it is certainly a remarkable circumstance—that this matter of the contract with the defenders was not brought under the consideration of the creditors at that meeting, and their instructions regarding it taken. The pursuer, however, in place of acting on his own responsibility then, allowed nearly a fortnight to elapse; and it was not till 8th April that he wrote saying that he was prepared to complete the contract, or, alternatively, that he was ready to arrange terms on which it might be cancelled. Observe, in that letter he does not say, "I have hitherto been offering or ready to complete the contract;" and he could not in truth have said so, for he had not previously said whether the contract was to be adopted or given up.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875. Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

It was, however, very plausibly and forcibly argued for the pursuer, that as the defenders had already, so early as 14th March, rescinded the contract, it would have been idle and absurd for the pursuer to have, after that date, offered to implement it. Why, then, did he in his letter of 8th April make such an offer? The reason was doubtless because he knew that, without doing so, he could not be in a position to insist for damages against the defenders, as no party can be heard to insist for damages, or for breach of a contract, unless it is made clear that he himself was ready, duly and timeously, to implement his part of it. In other words the pursuer, being here alone in petitorio, must establish his case before he can prevail. But can it be held that he has established his case if he is unable to say and to instruct that he duly and timeously offered to implement the contract, so far as it was incumbent upon him? I am very clear that he has not. The iron was over-due for a considerable time before 8th April, and the building of the three steamers is proved to have in consequence been brought to a stand. Even up to the present moment it does not appear that the trustee, who pursues this action, had the instructions or consent of the creditors to carry out the contract, and it is by no means free from doubt whether a trustee can take up such a contract as that in question at his own hand, or whether the other parties would be bound to recognise and accept of him as equivalent to the parties originally bound to them. But I am not to be understood as deciding these points. I have merely referred to them as shewing the embarrassing position in which the defenders were put, from no fault on their part. It is sufficient, in my opinion, for the decision of the case as it stands that the offer to implement on the part of the pursuer on 8th April—supposing it to be otherwise unobjectionable—was then too late. Things were no longer entire. The shipbuilding yard of the defenders had, in consequence of the delay, been previously brought to a stand, and they had incurred, and were continuing to incur, the risk of very heavy penalties. Not only was this so, but it was also admitted on the part of the pursuer in the course of the discussion that on 8th April he had not any iron to deliver, and had not even ordered any. It is therefore clear that considerable farther delay after 8th April must have taken place before any supply of iron could have been obtained from the pursuer.

For all these reasons I am of opinion that the pursuer has no sufficient grounds on which he can prevail in the present action; and if authority were necessary in support of this conclusion it is to be found, I think, in the English case of ex parte Chalmers in re Edwards,[1] which was cited in the course of the argument.

Lord Gifford.—I entirely concur in the opinions pronounced by your Lordships, and in the result at which your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary have arrived.

The Lord Ordinary seems, however, to have been of opinion that this contract was not one which could be taken up by a trustee and creditors, in respect that it involved a long period of time, that it might unduly delay the realisation and [1] Supra, p. 362.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

distribution of the sequestrated estate, and that the shipbuilders were entitled to some security on which they might rely that the materials would be regularly furnished. I agree with both of your Lordships that there is nothing in this contract to prevent it being taken up by the trustee on the sequestrated estate, or by the creditors. No doubt the object of a sequestration is the winding up of a business, and not the continuance of the bankrupt's trade, but that is a matter which it is jus tertii for the other party in such a contract as this to plead. The creditors are the only parties to judge whether they will adopt or not a beneficial contract in which there is no delectus personæ, as to which they are in the full and absolute right of the bankrupts, and so I think that if this contract had been timeously taken up and carried on for the behoof of the creditors it would have been perfectly competent to do so.

At the date of the bankruptcy the contract had not been so violated as to entitle the shipbuilders to put an end to it at once, but at the same time it had not been fully implemented by the bankrupts before they were sequestrated. Prejudice was being suffered by the shipbuilders, prior to the insolvency, by delay in delivering the materials, and by failure to deliver them in the proper order. It is in evidence that the shipbuilders' yard was at a standstill, or nearly so. In these circumstances it was a very serious matter for the shipbuilders, and, to say the least of it, they were entitled instantly to know whether the creditors were or were not to take up and implement the contract. The shipbuilders could not compel implement; all they could have done would have been to rank on the estate for damages.

When they found themselves insolvent, Watson and Campbell should have called a meeting of their creditors, and informed them of this contract, and taken their instructions; for it is quite manifest, from the nature of the contract, that, if it was to be taken up by the creditors at all, this must be done without a single day's delay.

The contract, however, stood over, and nothing was done till 8th April. I think it is clear that the delay from 17th March to 8th April was too long, and also that, by that time, it was too late to offer to implement the contract.

The shipbuilding yard could not be allowed to stand idle for so long, nor were the shipbuilders to be exposed to the risk of incurring these heavy penalties which they were under if the steamers were not finished in time. I think, therefore, that this trustee came into the field too late.

The only doubt I had was that raised by the Dean of Faculty, that it was not the trustee who broke the contract, but the shipbuilders themselves, who, whenever the bankruptcy occurred, intimated that they held the contract at an end, and would go elsewhere for a supply of materials. But really this is not so. I read the shipbuilders' letter as merely stating in strong terms, "we cannot wait any longer for you—we must go on with our steamers, and in order to do so must go elsewhere for iron." Though perhaps the shipbuilders were sharp enough in giving this intimation, it was done at their own risk, and if the trustee had come next day and offered to deliver the rest of the iron, or part thereof, they would have been bound to take it or else pay damages. But no notice was taken of their statement that they had gone elsewhere, and so the breach was really with the bankrupts and not with the shipbuilders.

I think the Lord Ordinary's conclusion perfectly sound, but it is not necessary for this case to hold, as the Lord Ordinary seems inclined to do, that contracts with a tract of future time cannot be taken up by a trustee and creditors.

No. 73.

Jan. 22, 1875.
Anderson v. Hamilton and Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As I heard only the speeches in reply, I would not have spoken if my vote had differed.

The plain and simple ground on which I go is, that the defenders here were not bound to wait from 13th March to 8th April without knowing whether they had a party bound to them or not. I do not think the pursuer has made out any case for damages. It is not necessary to go further for a good ground of judgment.

THE COURT adhered.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR & BEATSON, W.S.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

JOHN WARDLAW, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Pearson.
JAMES LEECHMAN WARDLAW AND OTHERS (Wardlaw's Trustees), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Millie.

Fee and Liferent—Minerals.—Where a testator by a general settlement left his estate (the minerals under which were wrought during his life, and were let on a lease current at the time of his death) to his two daughters, one-third each pro indiviso in fee, and to his granddaughter the other one-third pro indiviso in liferent allenarly, and to the heirs of her body in fee,—held that the granddaughter as liferentrix was entitled to enjoy the one-third of the mineral rents during her life, and to concur with the fiars in renewing the leases when necessary, provided there was no substantial danger of exhaustion of the minerals.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

ON 9th July 1833 Mr William Thomson of Stevenson's Beath executed a disposition and deed of settlement whereby he conveyed his lands of Stevenson's Beath, Cowden Beath, and Mowbray's Beath, in the county of Fife, as follows, viz.—"To and in favour of my daughter, Mrs Agnes Thomson alias Stenhouse, spouse of James Stenhouse, Esquire, of North Fod, and to her heirs and assignees, one-third pro indiviso; to my other daughter, Miss Margaret Thomson, residing in Edinburgh, and her heirs and assignees, one-third pro indiviso; and to my granddaughter, Mary Leishman, daughter of the marriage between Mr James Leishman and the late Mary Thomson alias Leishman, in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs lawfully procreated of her body (whom failing to the said Agnes Thomson alias Stenhouse and Margaret Thomson and their foresaids) equally in fee, the remaining one third pro indiviso." The disposition and deed of settlement contained this clause:—"And, farther, I hereby make and constitute my disponees my cessioners and assignees . . . . in and to the rents, maills, and duties thereof to become due from and after the period of my death and in all time thereafter, surrogating hereby and substituting my said disponees for their respective interests foresaid in my full right and place of the premises for ever."

Mr Thomson died on 11th March 1837.

His granddaughter, Mary Leechman, was married in 1841 to Adam Low Wardlaw, surgeon in Kinross. She and her husband enjoyed the liferent of the one-third pro indiviso of his estate of Stevenson's Beath, &c., settled on her by her grandfather during her life. On her death, on 9th January 1865, John Wardlaw (the pursuer), her eldest son, succeeded under Mr Thomson's disposition to the fee of the one-third pro indiviso liferented by his mother.

Under the lands of Stevenson's Beath, &c., there existed valuable seams of coal, &c., which had been wrought to a certain extent, at any rate from the beginning of the present century. In particular, a lease had been granted of the whole coal and ironstone under the lands to Matthew Parker and William Scott by Mr Thomson himself before the year 1828.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875. Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

Another lease for twenty-one years was granted by Mr Thomson to Robert Gibbon in 1835 at a fixed annual rent of £90, or one-tenth of the gross output. This lease was allowed by Mr Stenhouse, who managed the property after Mr Thomson's death for behoof of the pro indiviso proprietors in fee and liferent, to be assigned by Gibbon to Messrs Dixon and Wright about the year 1840. The workings were of small extent during Mr Thomson's lifetime and for some years after his death. From the evidence it appeared doubtful whether Mr Thomson ever recovered the fixed rent from his tenant Mr Gibbon, but after his death Mr Stenhouse, as acting for his representatives, always did so, whether the colliery was being worked or not. In 1849 a greater demand for Fife coal having arisen, Mr Stenhouse and Dr Wardlaw, as acting for the pro indiviso proprietors, were granted a lease for thirty-one years at the enhanced fixed rent of £500 a-year to the Forth Iron Company, who had obtained an assignation from Messrs Dixon and Wright of the remainder of their lease. This lease was current at the death of the pursuer's mother in 1865.

In these various leases, both during Mr Thomson's life and after his death, the right given to the lessees was substantially the same. The rents and output, however, were gradually increased with the increasing demand for the coal. There was not, however, any allegation of approaching exhaustion of the coal field, which proved, on being properly opened up, a very valuable one.

During his wife's lifetime Dr Wardlaw received the one-third of the mineral rent, as well as of the ordinary agricultural rent of the estate, in virtue of her liferent. After his mother's death the pursuer, being of age, entered into possession in virtue of his own right of fee.

Dr Wardlaw died in 1873, and John Wardlaw, the pursuer, then claimed from his trustees repayment of the mineral rent received by him and his wife from Mr Thomson's death in 1837 down to her death in 1865, on the ground that they were not included in her right of liferent.

He brought this action against them, concluding for declarator that his mother's right was one of liferent allenarly,—that he was entitled to the fee,—that she in virtue of her liferent right to the one-third pro indiviso of the lands had no right to the coal, ironstone, lime, or other minerals in the same, beyond what was necessary for her beneficial possession, and that the rents and profits received for such coal, &c. from 1837 to 1865 belonged to him as fiar,—and further, for a count and reckoning for these rents and profits.

The pursuer pleaded;—3. The pursuer's mother having been merely a liferenter, she was not entitled to grant a lease of the coal, ironstone, and other minerals in the said lands, or to work the same, or cause them to be worked, beyond what was necessary for her beneficial possession of the lands, and the pursuer is accordingly entitled to decree in terms of the third declaratory conclusion of the summons. 4. The said Adam Low Wardlaw, or his wife, Mrs Mary Leechman or Wardlaw, having received payment of the rents or royalties of the minerals belonging to the pursuer, the defenders are bound to count and reckon with the pursuer, in terms of the conclusion to that effect.

The defender pleaded;—3. Mrs Wardlaw had right to one-third pro indiviso of the produce of the coal and ironstone mines in the said lands during the period of her survivance, in respect (1) that she was a testamentary liferentrix; (2) that the mines were open mines at the commencement of her possession; and (3) that Mrs Wardlaw's two aunts as proprietors of one-third each . . . . had power to work the minerals, and that the sum which the pursuer claims is the produce of mineral workings in operation independently of the act of the liferentrix. 4. Mrs Wardlaw having bona fide uplifted and consumed the said rent and royalties on a probable title, her representatives are not liable in repetition.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875. Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

The Lord Ordinary, on 21st October 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"(1) Finds and declares that the pursuer, under and by virtue of disposition and deed of settlement, dated the 9th day of July 1833 and 20th day of May 1834, and registered in the Books of Council and Session upon the 31st day of May 1837, granted by William Thomson, Esq. of Stevenson's Beath, in the parish of Beath, and county of Fife, and by Mrs Mary Inglis or Thomson, became entitled, upon the death of Mrs Mary Leechman or Wardlaw, the pursuer's mother, to the fee of one-third part pro indiviso of All and Whole the several lands and heritages pertaining and belonging to him, or that might pertain and belong to him at the period of his decease, and especially, without prejudice to the foresaid generality, of one-third pro indiviso of All and Whole his lands of Stevenson's Beath, Cowden Beath, and Mowbray's Beath, houses, biggings, yards, tofts, crofts, parts, pendicles, and whole privileges, teinds, and pertinents thereof, lying within the parish of Beath and shire of Fife, and to the rents, maills, duties, and profits thereof, and that the same pertain and belong to him still: . . . . (3) Finds that the minerals in said lands of Stevenson's Beath and others had been wrought by or on behalf of the testator during his own lifetime, and were at the time of his death under lease granted by him: Finds that, according to the formal construction of the said disposition and deed of settlement, it was the said testator's intention that his granddaughter, the said Mrs Mary Leechman or Wardlaw, the pursuer's mother, under her right of liferent, should be entitled during her life to the rents and royalties of the minerals pertaining to the one-third pro indiviso share of said lands and others: Finds accordingly that she was entitled during her life to said rents and royalties, and that the pursuer is not entitled to count, reckoning, and payment therefor: Appoints the case to be enrolled with a view to the application of these findings and for further procedure, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to or by either party."

Against this interlocutor the pursuer obtained leave to reclaim.

Argued for him;—

1. A liferentrix by constitution has no right to work minerals not actually worked at the date when her liferent opens. She is only entitled to the enjoyment of the estate salva rei substantia.[1]

2. When minerals are worked at the date of the opening of the liferent, under leases then current, the liferentrix is not necessarily entitled to the rent, unless there is evidence of such being the intention of the testator or other person in constituting the liferent. There is in the present case no evidence of such intention, except the facts (1) that the settlement is a universal settlement; (2) that there was a lease current which was not excluded from the liferent. But that is not enough to take the case out of the ordinary rule, and to bring it up to the only two cases[2] that have been decided in favour of the liferentrix. They were both decided on

[1] Ersk. 2, 9, 57; Lady Preston, 1677, M. 8242; Belschier v. Moffat, 1779, M. 15,863; Stair, 2, 3, 74; Bankton, 2, 6, 6; Bell's Com. (M'Laren's ed.) i. pp. 60, 61; Swinton v. Duchess of Roxburghe, Feb. 1, 1814, F. C.; Duke of Roxburghe v. Duchess of Roxburghe, Jan. 19, 1816, F. C.

[2] Waddel v. Waddel, Jan. 21, 1812, F. C.; Guild's Trustees v. Guild, June 29, 1872, 10 Macph. 911, 44 Scot. Jur. 497.

No. 74.
Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

specialties. Waddel's case was decided on the ground that there was a universal settlement and a current lease, but a current lease of such an extraordinary kind that it really created the mineral rent a perpetual annuity for 999 years. The Court looked upon the settlement as intended to give a right not to the minerals but to this perpetual annuity into which they had been converted. Neither was Guild's case decided on the ground merely that there was a universal settlement and current lease. It went on the ground that although the liferentrix worked the clay field she did so really salva rei substantia. It so happened that on the clay being cleared away the land could be feued for much more than the clay rent, and so in working the clay she was benefiting the estate. These two cases, therefore, did not touch the general principle that something more is necessary to shew intention than a general settlement and current leases. And failing that the liferentrix is not entitled to the mineral rents. That there was no nominatim fiar in the present case does not alter the general rule. The liferentrix was fiduciary fiar for her heir, and as such bound to accumulate the mineral rents for his benefit.

3. Even if a liferentrix is entitled to the profits of current leases she is not entitled to let new leases to new tenants at increased rents, and so as to extend the workings and increase the output. Under the circumstances, she could not indeed prevent the leases being granted, but she was all the more bound to accumulate the proceeds.

4. The plea of bona fide consumption is, in the circumstances, untenable. Dr Wardlaw was the only person really interested. He was at once the guardian of his son, and in right of his wife's liferent. His representatives cannot be heard to plead his bona fide consumption in the one character of what fell under his own administration in the other. But the plea can only be stated where there is a colourable, though imperfect, title. And in this matter there is a strong distinction between an onerous and a lucrative title. The holder of a lucrative title must have something more to found on than a mere assumption in his own mind that his title is good. He must have a probable title in law, or else a tacit acknowledgment on the part of the person having the opposing interest, such as in the Roxburghe[1] case.

Argued for the respondents;—No doubt, the general rule is that a liferentrix must enjoy the subject salva rei substantia. But this rule suffers exception where the original proprietor has done anything to alter the nature of the subject, and turn part of the substance into annual fruits, as by working or leasing minerals.[2] In that case, the liferentrix is entitled to continue such working under these limits:—(1) That there is no hazard of exhaustion; (2) that her use follows the measure and method of the use enjoyed by the original fiar. In the present case Mr Thomson was not working the coal himself, but he had granted leases of it, and these leases must be taken as the measure and method of his working. The liferentrix did not exceed that measure and method, even in granting new leases, because the new leases were in substantially the same terms as the old, excepting in the matter of rent. The institutional writers referred to are all dealing with rights of fee and liferent coexisting, and created by force of law, or otherwise than by testamentary deed. The strict rule laid down by them does not apply to liferents constituted by testamentary deeds. In such cases the testator's intention must be the guide. Where a testator is working his own minerals for profit, and still more so where he has leased them out and is turning them into an

[1] Duke of Roxburghe v. Duchess of Roxburghe, Feb. 17, 1815, F. C.
[2] Stair, 2, 3, 74; Dig. 7, 1, 13, secs. 4 and 5.

No. 74.
Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

annual fruit-bearing subject, the strong inference is that he intends to give the liferentrix who succeeds him the same beneficial enjoyment of the estate that he has himself.[1] The present case is more strongly in favour of the liferentrix than any that have previously occurred, for here there is no nominatim fiar. The fee is conveyed to an uncertain person, who cannot be ascertained till the death of the liferentrix. To all intents and purposes, excepting the disposal of the estate, she is fiar during her life, and it would be a very strong thing to hold that she was debarred from enjoying such a natural part of the annual profits as the mineral rents, but was bound to account for them to the person who should turn out to be fiar on her death. Even assuming that she had no legal title to the mineral rents, her representatives are protected by her bona fide consumption from any claim for repetition. Of the bona fides there can be no doubt, and that the title was sufficiently probable is evidenced by the fact that the Lord Ordinary has sustained it as good.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question whether the general grantee of the fruits of an heritable subject acquires a right to the annual produce of coal workings on the property has been a question ever since the days of Sir Thomas Craig. That acute and ingenious writer discusses the question whether a widow is so entitled in respect of her terce, and although he resolves the question by assimilating the produce of coal mines to growing timber and against the right of the widow, he refers to a case in which in his own time the reverse was very deliberately decided.

Lord Stair treats this question with his usual discrimination, and lays down the principle which, with more or less consistency, our lawyers have followed ever since. That principle seems to be that unworked minerals cannot be considered as fruits of the heritable subject, but simply as partes soli and accessories of the land,—but that when the fiar has himself worked the minerals and let them on lease the minerals themselves cease to be mere accessories, become a separate rent-yielding subject, and therefore are presumed to pass to those to whom the fruits of the subject are conveyed.

No doubt this doctrine is laid down with two reservations,—1st, That there is no danger of exhaustion of the minerals, and 2dly, That the measure of the fiar's use shall not be exceeded. But these, after all, are only elements which, in the question of intention, as such questions under settlements necessarily are, are only exceptions to the general presumption, which I take to be this,—that where a testator, being the fiar of an estate containing coal workings which had been let under lease, conveys a general liferent of his whole estate, he must be presumed to give right to those mineral rents which he himself had treated as the fruits of the heritable subject, unless the reverse is established by contrary expression or presumption of intention. If the mineral be in danger of exhaustion and be shewn to be so, that element may indicate a contrary intention on the part of the granter. The measure of the former workings is a much more slender presumption, and in the general case it is more easy to presume that the granter contemplated the letting of his minerals for what they would bring, assuming that there is no danger of exhaustion, than that the liferenter was to [1] Waddel v. Waddel, and Guild's Trustees v. Guild, ut supra, p. 370, note: Spencer v. Scurr, July 28, 1862, 31 Beavan, 334, and 31 L. J. Ch. 808.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

lose the accruing benefit which a better market and enhanced prices would give.

We had occasion to consider the authorities in the recent case of Guild, which, however, was decided on the question whether the workings complained of diminished the value of the estate. On the very able review of the authorities which we have had from the bar I have come to be of opinion that, in the general case, it is to be presumed that a liferenter is intended not only to enjoy the rent of going collieries, but to let new leases as long as there is no substantial danger of exhaustion of the mineral. It is a presumption of intention and nothing more, but one which derives much additional strength in the present day from the increased mercantile value of the commodity, and the much larger proportion which such rents generally bear to the income of an estate. In the case of Waddel, in which the very able opinions of great Judges entirely sanctioned the views I have expressed, Lord Gillies says,—"It is said that the minerals are more valuable than the lands themselves, and when the testator gave a total liferent I cannot conceive that he meant that she should want the most valuable part of it." Mr Bell in his Principles indicates very clearly his opinion that the case of Waddel substantially affirmed the doctrine which I have deduced from it.

I think this is the general presumption as regards the intention of the granter of such a universal right. In the present case I have no doubt of it whatever. The testator divided his estate into three pro indiviso parts. Two of these he left to his two daughters pro indiviso, and their heirs and assignees in fee. The third he left to his granddaughter in liferent allenarly, and to the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing to his two daughters. There was a lease of the minerals current at the testator's death. There can be no doubt that the testator intended that the liferentrix should enjoy the rents under that lease. There seems as little doubt that he intended that whatever the fiars enjoyed as the produce of the land during their lives the liferenter should enjoy during hers, and that when the mineral lease expired she should have her share of any renewed use of the subject, whether it yielded more or less than it did before. If the question of legal right be solved, the question of intention seems to exclude any other theory. He never could have intended that on the expiration of the current lease this source of revenue should terminate. The opposite view came to this, that the liferentrix, while she could not help the coal being worked and the rents being paid, was under an obligation to accumulate the latter for the benefit of a possible but uncertain heir, seeing that until her death it could not be known who the heir might be; that the testator intended to lay her under an obligation to accumulate these rents for the benefit of her aunts in case she herself had no family; and that after the expiration of the lease, as she had no right as liferentrix to enter into a new lease, it was intended that she should prevent the minerals from being worked, and so force a division of the subject. And it is now maintained in this action that because she did not do these unusual things her representatives are to be liable to account for all the profits which the minerals yielded during her life.

This contention carries the doctrine of a fiduciary fiar to a practical extent of which I know of no example. On the hypothesis of the argument, Mrs Wardlaw had no interest of any kind in these coal workings, and we are asked to presume that the testator meant her to undertake the labour and responsibility of collecting and accounting for these rents during the whole period of her life, from which she was not to receive a single farthing of profit. I cannot affirm a proposition which seems to have so little foundation either in law or intention.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875. Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

In regard to the second plea on bona fide consumption, I think it unnecessary and undesirable that we should express any opinion. The bona fides of Mrs Wardlaw is unquestionable; but if her title, as regards these mineral rents, made her only a fiduciary fiar for behoof of a possible heir, and carried with it the consequences for which the pursuer has contended, there might be difficulties in the way of sustaining that plea, which it is not necessary, in my opinion, to solve.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur. I think that the law is settled, as explained by your Lordship.

In their natural state, while yet unworked, minerals are partes soli. But it is laid down by high authorities that the proprietor, whose will with regard to the disposal of his property must be the guide where it is well declared, may so deal with the mineral estate while in his own person that it may become not the subject of sale from time to time, but the subject of a lease. I do not think it can be maintained that the contract of lease is incapable of being applied to minerals. If once minerals are leased they are brought into the category of a subject bearing fruits. By granting such a lease the proprietor turns his right of bare property into a right to receive the prospective fruits. If it were held that what is popularly termed a lease of minerals is not truly in law a lease, it can be nothing but a periodical sale, and the sums paid as the consideration must be regarded as a price paid by instalments. To this extraordinary position, for which there is no countenance in law, are the parties driven who plead that minerals are, and always must be, dealt with as partes soli.

If a lease of minerals is possible and implies the conversion of the proprietor's ordinary right of disposal into a right to prospective periodical payments or rents, this has been done in the present case. And on that footing I cannot doubt that the liferentrix was entitled to these rents for her lifetime, just as she was to any of the ordinary fruits of the soil.

The circumstances, moreover, of the present case are peculiarly favourable to the liferentrix. The testator plainly intended the three pro indiviso thirds, into which he distributed his estate, to be all managed in the same way. The two absolute fiars were surely not to be crippled by the inability of the liferentrix to concur with them. For if it were held that she could not concur with them in granting a lease of the minerals practically they would be debarred from doing so at all. What he meant obviously was that the estate should be managed as if there were three habile fiars in existence.

If, then, the pursuer's mother had the power to concur in a new lease of the minerals, where do we find the obligation on her to accumulate or account for the profits? The mere fact that she was what, fictione juris, is termed a fiduciary fiar, or fiar in trust for a possibly existent and surviving heir, does not necessarily imply an obligation to accumulate. There is nothing that can lead us to hold that she was a mere steward, bound to administer a third of the mineral estate, to superintend the workings and to uplift the rents, and then to pay them into bank, or otherwise to invest them for the benefit of the future fiar. Such an implication seems to be absurd and untenable.

The minerals having been converted by the testator into a subject yielding annual fruits, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the liferentrix has followed the intention of the testator in appropriating and consuming her third share of them. Holding this strong opinion on the merits of the case, I abstain from deciding or expressing any formal opinion on the question of bona fide consumption, though I am inclined to think there are fair grounds for contending that there was bona fide consumption on a sufficiently colourable title to protect her had she required the defence.

No. 74.
Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The disputed question between the parties in this case appears to me to depend upon what is to be held to have been the intention of the testator, looking at the terms of his settlement, the nature of the estate with which he was dealing, and the other circumstances under which his settlement was executed, so far as they have been disclosed to the Court.

It is easy to understand that the testator might have made it quite plain that no part of the profits of the colliery, so far as his granddaughter, the liferentrix, was concerned, were to go to her, but that they were to be preserved for the fiar. He has not, however, so expressed himself, or, to put it differently, he has not in so many words stated that such was his desire and object. His true intention must therefore be collected from the considerations to which I have alluded. And having regard to these considerations I cannot doubt,—and I found my opinion very much on the grounds stated by your Lordships,—that the testator intended to place his granddaughter during her life in much the same position, so far as the beneficial enjoyment of his estate, including the colliery, went, as his two surviving daughters. She was not to be entitled to dispose of the fee, but she was to have the enjoyment of the annualrents or profits of a third pro indiviso share of his estate, but limited to her own lifetime, in the same way as his two daughters.

In arriving at this conclusion, the first and main consideration by which I have been influenced is the condition of the testator's estate at his death, and in particular the circumstance of it having then, and for some time previously, consisted of a going colliery yielding annual profits or returns. That colliery could not, so far as I can see, have been worked by two of the pro indiviso proprietors to the extent merely of their own shares, but necessarily required to be worked if worked at all, for the three parties having an interest in it. Unless this were done the colliery would soon be closed up, and in that way the machinery and workings would go to waste, and the capital,—and it might have been considerable,—which had been expended in opening and setting it a-going, would be lost. I cannot suppose that any such result could have been contemplated by the testator. Then, if it is to be assumed that the working of the colliery was to go on, it almost necessarily follows that he must be held to have intended that his granddaughter was to enjoy one-third of its annual fruits or profits during her life, for he makes no provision whatever for preserving such fruits or profits for the future fiar. He does not constitute a trust for that purpose, and he lays no obligation on his granddaughter to that effect.

The only conclusion, therefore, that can, in my opinion, be arrived at is that the annual rents or profits of the colliery in question, to the extent of one-third thereof, were intended by the testator to be enjoyed by his granddaughter during her life. This conclusion is also, I think, sufficiently supported by authority, if authority were necessary, especially by that of Lord Stair, and the cases of Waddel and Guild.

The only doubt in my mind is, whether the liferentrix, assuming her to have had right to a third of the annualrents or profits of the colliery arising under the lease which was current when the testator died, was entitled to renew or prolong that lease in the manner she did. Was that not, it has been asked, exceeding the measure and method of the use which the testator himself had and exercised of the colliery. The affirmative of this question would, I think, require a very narrow view to be taken of the matter,—so narrow that, on careful consideration, I feel myself unable to entertain it. I feel myself, on the contrary, well warranted in concurring with your Lordships in holding that in continuing, by prolongation or renewal, the workings of the colliery which existed at the testator's death, the liferentrix did not, in any reasonable sense, exceed the measure and use which had been exercised of it by the testator himself. It may be that the workings have been increased and much larger lordships paid under the renewed leases, but that arose from altered times, and in particular from changes which had taken place in the coal market, and not from any undue or unreasonable acts of the liferentrix, and indeed the record contains no averment on the part of the pursuer to that effect.

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875. Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

On all these grounds I entirely concur with your Lordship. And with regard to the question of bona fide perception and consumption, I also concur in thinking it quite unnecessary to enter upon it, seeing that it is not only superseded, but all room for it excluded, by our holding that the annualrents or profits of the colliery, to the extent of one-third thereof, accruing during the life of the testator's granddaughter, belonged to herself in her own right.

Lord Gifford.—I take the question in this case to be different from that which would arise under a disposition of a special subject to one in liferent and another nominatim in fee. The question arises under the terms of a universal mortis causa disposition and settlement, whereby the late William Thomson of Cowden Beath provided for the disposal of his whole means and estate, and it raises simply a question of construction,—What was the intention of the testator? In order to arrive at that we must place ourselves as nearly as possible in the position of the testator when he left this deed, and have in view the exact nature and position of the subjects of which he was disposing, and on a consideration of the deed and of the whole circumstances we have to say whether he intended his granddaughter to receive a third of the mineral rents. Now, keeping everything in view, I have no difficulty in holding that the testator intended his granddaughter to enjoy her share not only of the agricultural rents but also of the mineral rents.

I reach that conclusion on these grounds:—1. This was an old going colliery open and under lease at any rate in 1816, and wrought from a much earlier period, and not a new and unwrought mineral subject. 2. It was a colliery always under lease, and not wrought by the proprietor himself. If it had been worked by the proprietor himself, either for his own purposes or for sale, other considerations would have been introduced which might affect or restrict the right of liferent. 3. The testator's settlement was a universal settlement. And a liferent given by such a deed is much more nearly a liferent by reservation than one by constitution, and therefore to be interpreted favourably for the liferenter. 4. There is in the disposition and settlement no direction for accumulation, which is the only possible alternative to the liferenter's personal enjoyment of the profits, for the fiar is an uncertain person till the date of the liferenter's death. No trustees are appointed who could accumulate for the future, nor

No. 74.

Jan. 23, 1875.
Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees.

No check is placed on the liferentrix. No obligation is laid upon her to accumulate, and no indication of any intention that there was to be accumulation. These considerations seem to me to be conclusive that Mr Thomson intended Mrs Wardlaw to enjoy the mineral rents just as he himself had done, and just as his daughters who had the other two-thirds of his estate were to do.

If Mrs Wardlaw was entitled to enjoy the profits of the existing lease she was also entitled to join with the other parties interested in prorogating the lease, and also to concur in granting new leases. None of the leases extend the subject let. It is always the same minerals which are let, and the increase of rent or lordship is quite immaterial. The amount of lordship depends on the extent of the working, and this is the act of the mineral tenant and not of the liferentrix.

Were we not satisfied on these points, I think that there was a sufficient colourable title to support the plea of bona fide consumption, but it is not necessary to decide the separate question as to bona fide perception and consumption.

THE COURT adhered.

DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—MACGREGOR & ROSS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 75.

ALEXANDER WEBSTER AND OTHERS (Grant's Trustees), Complainers.—Scott.
WILLIAM ROGER MORISON, Respondent.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

Jan. 26, 1875.
Grant's Trustees v. Morison.

Property—Title—Proof.—When a written contract relating to heritage is impugned by one of the parties, and the other, while denying his opponent's averments, admits that the documents do not give a true account of the agreement, the proof is not limited to writ or oath.

Property—Title—Proof.—In a suspension and interdict brought to prevent the sale of a heritable subject by the respondent, who held a disposition in his favour as a purchaser from the complainer's author at the price of £250, qualified by a back-letter, bearing that the disponer should have power to redeem on payment of that sum within a certain time, failing which the respondent should have power to sell, the respondent admitted that he had not paid £250 for the property, but only £125. Held that the complainers were not limited to proof by writ or oath of their averments as to the true nature of the transaction.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

THIS note of suspension and interdict was brought by the marriage-contract trustees of John Scott Grant, rope manufacturer in Arbroath, against W. R. Morison, merchant, praying that the respondent should be interdicted from selling certain subjects in Arbroath occupied by Grant as a rope manufactory.

The title to these subjects was as follows:—(1) Disposition by the previous owner to Grant, dated 30th March 1871, for the price of £125. (2) Disposition by Grant to Morison, dated 15th June 1871, for the price of £250. (3) Letter, styled a letter of reversion, by Morison to Grant, dated 18th August 1871, and signed by both, in these terms:—"Considering that, by disposition and assignation granted by you in my favour, dated the 15th day of June 1871, you, in consideration of the sum of £250 sterling, advanced by me to you, sold and disponed to me, my heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, (First), All and Whole," &c. . . . "And whereas it was agreed on between you and me that although said disposition and assignation in my favour was conceived in an absolute form yet the same should be held by me only as a security for the said sum of £250 sterling, which was that day advanced and lent by me to you, the said John Scott Grant, and of any subsequent advances I might make to you or on your account, and interest thereof as aftermentioned, and that I should grant a letter of reversion in your favour in terms underwritten." It bore further, that in case Grant should fail to pay the principal sum before Martinmas 1871, or to pay the interest regularly, it should be in the power of the respondent to sell the subjects, he being bound to hold count and reckoning with Grant for the balance.

No. 75.

Jan. 26, 1875. Grant's Trustees v. Morison.

The complainers, to whom Grant had assigned his rights, averred substantially as follows:—When Grant purchased the property for £125 the price was advanced by Morison. The disposition to Grant by Morison was in security only, and the price was stated at £250 to secure previous advances, which Morison had from time to time made to Grant. In October 1874 Morison had called upon Grant to pay £250, intimating that if he failed to do so within ten days the property would be advertised for sale. Nothing was now due except the £125 advanced as the price of the property, and that he was ready to repay.

They pleaded, that as they were ready to pay the whole sums due under the letter of reversion, as they might be ascertained by the Court, they were entitled to interdict.

The respondent averred, that Grant, desiring to purchase the ropework, but having no means, proposed to the respondent that he should purchase it, and offered, if he would hold it for a few years, to give him a handsome profit, and buy it from him for £250. The respondent agreeing to this, Grant purchased for him at the price of £125. As the sellers insisted on introducing into the conveyance a clause binding the purchaser to protect the ground from the encroachment of the sea, and the respondent was unwilling to undertake this obligation, it was arranged that the title should be taken to Grant, with the obligation, and that he should reconvey to the respondent, omitting the clause, and that the respondent's obligation to convey to Grant, on payment of £250, should be embodied in a separate letter.

The respondent pleaded;—(4) None of the complainers' material allegations could be proved otherwise than by writ or oath.

The Lord Ordinary, on 19th January 1875, sustained the fourth plea for the respondent.*

---

* "NOTE.—The complainers aver that the ex facie absolute disposition by John Scott Grant in favour of the respondent was granted only in security of £125, and that the amount specified in this disposition, and also in the relative letter of reversion executed by the respondent and by Mr Grant, was stated at £250, in order also to secure the current balance on the accounts between Mr Grant and the respondent's firm of W. R. Morison and Company, which balance has been extinguished. They further aver that they are Mr Grant's marriage-contract trustees, and that by this contract Mr Grant conveyed to them his right, title, and interest under that letter of reversion: And they maintain that they are entitled to a proof at large, for the purpose of establishing these averments, on the ground that where a party, founding on a deed, admits on record that it does not contain a true account of the agreement of parties, parole proof is competent.

"But the respondent does not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, admit that the said deeds do not truly carry out the agreement between Mr Grant and him. The respondent's averment is that Mr Grant came to him in 1871, and stated that the rope-work premises in Arbroath, then held by him on lease, were for sale, and could be got a great bargain, but that he had no means wherewith to purchase them, and that if the respondent would purchase them, with the working

No. 75.

Jan. 26, 1875.
Grant's Trustees v. Morison.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued that, as the respondent did not stand upon the documents, but himself gave a different version of the facts, the way was left open for proof at large.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—On the face of the titles it appears that in February 1871 Grant purchased those subjects, and obtained a disposition which bears that the plant, which could be done for £125, he would agree to buy them from the respondent in a few years at the price of £250. The respondent also avers that he agreed to enter into the transaction proposed by Mr Grant, and that, in implement of the agreement so made between them, Mr Grant purchased the subjects for the respondent at the price of £125. The respondent further avers that this agreement and purchase were attended with serious risk to him, as the sellers of the subjects found it exceedingly difficult to resist the encroachments of the sea, and as if these encroachments were not successfully resisted, or, if the subjects ceased to be used as a rope-work, for which purpose alone they are suitable, they might become almost valueless. The respondent also states that the sellers insisted upon introducing into the disposition a clause binding the purchaser to take precautions for defending the ground from the encroachments of the sea, with the view of protecting an adjoining property belonging to them, and that, being unwilling to undertake this obligation, while Mr Grant was ready to do so, it was arranged that the agreement above-mentioned should be carried out by the disposition from the sellers being taken in favour of Mr Grant, subject to the obligation to defend the ground from the sea; that Mr Grant should convey the subjects to the respondent by a disposition which should not convey that obligation; that the respondent's obligation to convey the subjects to Mr Grant at the price of £250 should be embodied in a separate letter of reversion; and that this arrangement was accordingly carried out by a disposition from the sellers in favour of Mr Grant, and by the disposition of Mr Grant in favour of the respondent, and letter of reversion above-mentioned.

---

"By this letter of reversion, which proceeds upon the narrative of the disposition in the respondent's favour, it was agreed to between Mr Grant and the respondent that, although the disposition in the respondent's favour was conceived in an absolute form, yet that the same should be held only as a security for the sum of £250 sterling, and of any subsequent advances which the respondent might make, together with the expenses of the disposition in the respondent's favour and of the letter of reversion, the premiums of insuring the premises, the expenses incurred by the respondent in completing his title, and the interest of the said sum of £250, and of any subsequent advances, at the legal rate. By the letter of reversion the respondent bound and obliged himself, upon payment of these sums and interest, to reconvey the subjects to Mr Grant, and, as the letter bears, Mr Grant did, by subscribing the same, 'accede to and approve of the terms hereof in all respects.'

"This letter of reversion is a formal deed executed both by the respondent and Mr Grant. It embodies, in clear and distinct terms, the conditions on implement of which Mr Grant is entitled to have the subjects reconveyed to him. The respondent makes no admission in the record contrary to the terms of the disposition in his favour and of the letter of reversion, or of the original agreement between Mr Grant and him, under which he purchased and paid the price of £125 for the subjects, and in pursuance of which these deeds were executed. The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that the complainers, who are now litigating, as in right of the letter of reversion, are not entitled, except by the writ or oath of the respondent, to contradict the terms of that letter, and to prove that they are entitled to a reconveyance of the subjects upon payment of £125."

[1] Hotson v. Paul, June 7, 1831, 9 S. 685; Miller v. Oliphant, March 7, 1843, 5 D. 856, 15 Scot. Jur. 358.

No. 75.

Jan. 26, 1875. Grant's Trustees v. Morison.

price paid was £125. Thereafter he conveyed the same subjects to Morison by an ex facie absolute disposition, the price contained in the disposition being £250. But a letter of reversion, as it is called, was granted at the same time to Grant by Morison, in which he says,—"Considering that, by disposition and assignation granted by you in my favour, dated the 15th day of June 1871, you, in consideration of the sum of £250 sterling, advanced by me to you, sold and disponed to me, my heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, (First) All and Whole—[here follows description of property]—and whereas it was agreed on between you and me that although said disposition and assignation in my favour was conceived in an absolute form, yet the same should be held by me only as a security for the said sum of £250 sterling, which was that day advanced and lent by me to you, the said John Scott Grant, and of any subsequent advances I might make to you or on your account, and interest thereof as after mentioned, and that I should write a letter of reversion in your favour in terms underwritten,—therefore, in case you shall repay to me, or my heirs, executors, or successors, the foresaid principal sum of £250 sterling, and any subsequent advances made by me to you or on your behalf, at the term of Martinmas 1871, or at any term of Martinmas or Whitsunday thereafter previous to the term of Whitsunday 1872," and on certain other conditions with reference to interest, expenses, and insurance,—"then I and my foresaids shall be bound and obliged, as I hereby bind and oblige myself and my foresaids, to redispone to you, the said John Scott Grant, and your heirs and successors, heritably and irredeemably, in fee, All and Whole the foresaid subjects in usual form." Then, if Grant does not repay the advances before Martinmas 1871, or fails to pay the interest, the letter stipulates for a power of sale in favour of Morison, subject to the obligation of accounting for the price.

Now, the complainers, who are the marriage-trustees of Grant, allege that £250 was not actually advanced, that nothing was advanced but £125, and therefore they seek to interdict the respondent from bringing the subject to sale under the power of sale contained in the letter. If the respondent had met that allegation by a simple statement that the disposition and letter of reversion truly express the arrangement which was entered into, if he had taken his stand on these documents, I do not see that the complainers could have proposed to prove their averments otherwise than by writ or oath. But the respondent has not taken up that position. It is his case that the letter is false, as much as it is the case of the complainers. The parties are not agreed on what the truth is, but they both agree that the letter is not true. The respondent says in substance—"I agreed at Grant's request to purchase the property for £125, and to hold it for a few years, on the footing that Grant was afterwards to take it off my hands for £250. I did not become the direct disponee, because the seller insisted on inserting conditions by which I did not wish to be bound. Therefore the disposition was taken to Grant, and he reconveyed to me without these conditions. The letter correctly enough narrates the substance of the transaction,—that is, that I am not bound to reconvey till I receive £250,—that being my stipulated profit for holding the subjects for a certain number of years." But he admits very distinctly that £125 was the only sum advanced by him. That is a direct contradiction of the letter, which speaks of the contemplated payment of £250 as repayment of a loan.

Now, it appears to me that when a party, who professes to found upon deeds of this description, admits that they give an untrue account of the facts, he loses

No. 75.

Jan. 26, 1875.

Grant's Trustees v. Morison.

the protection of the rule of law which would otherwise entitle him to say that allegations impeaching the accuracy of the deeds can only be proved by writ or oath. It is agreed that the deeds are false. The consequence is that the truth must be ascertained in the ordinary way. Neither party is now in a position of any advantage in this respect. I think the principle of the cases of Hotson v. Paul and Miller v. Oliphant is applicable. I therefore cannot agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORDS DEAS, ARDMILLAN, and MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the disposition and assignation dated 15th June 1871, and letter of reversion dated 16th and 18th August 1871, are admitted by the respondent to contain an untrue account of the transaction between the parties: Therefore recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, repel the respondent's fourth plea in law, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of their averments in common form, reserving all questions of expenses."

RENTON & GRAY, S.S.C.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875.

Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

ALEXANDER SELLAR AND OTHERS, Suspenders.—D.-F. Clark—Brown.
WILLIAM AITON, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Pearson.
WILLIAM AITON, Pursuer and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Pearson.
ALEXANDER SELLAR AND OTHERS, Defenders and Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Brown.

Lease—Proof—Writ—Rei interventus.—Letters between the proprietor of a fishing village and his son and factor shewed that the landlord had been negotiating with the fishermen in the village, who were possessing on tacit relocation, as to their either purchasing their houses or taking leases for fifty-seven years at a certain increased rent; that by the landlord's desire the final answers of the fishermen had been obtained and marked by the factor in a list which specified neither the rent nor the term of endurance of the lease; and that thereupon the landlord, wishing that a larger number should purchase, directed his factor to inform the fishermen that the question of lease or purchase might lie over for another year. From the following term the fishermen were allowed to occupy their houses at the increased rent, and continued so to occupy for four years.

In an action of removing against three of the fishemen who had been marked as willing to take leases, held (1) that verbal contracts for leases of fifty-seven years had been proved by writ of the landlord; and (2) that sufficient rei interventus had followed to prevent the landlord from resiling.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. I.

ON 30th September 1872 William Aiton of Boddam raised a summons of removing against Alexander Sellar, Alexander James Stephen, and James Sellar, fishermen, tenants of dwelling-houses in the village of Boddam, belonging to the pursuer, concluding to have the defenders decerned to remove from their respective dwelling-houses at Martinmas 1872.

The defenders alleged that they were lessees of their houses under a concluded agreement of lease for fifty-seven years from Martinmas 1867, followed by possession and rei interventus. In support of their averments they referred to letters and documents in the hands of the pursuer and those acting for him, which they were allowed to recover under a diligence granted before the closing of the record.

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The defenders have a good and valid right and title to possess the subjects in question in virtue of their agreement with the pursuer, extending for years beyond the term at which they are sought to be removed. (2) The agreement between the parties has been validated and completed by rei interventus, as well as by homologation and acquiescence on the part of the pursuer. (3) In respect of said concluded agreement the pursuer is bound to grant a lease to the defenders of the subjects in question for fifty-seven years from Martinmas 1867. (4) The pursuer is, in the circumstances, barred by his acts and conduct from maintaining that the said agreement was not entered into.

The Sheriff-substitute (Comrie Thomson), on 24th June 1873, pronounced the following interlocutor :—"Finds the defenders entitled to prove by the writ or oath of the pursuer the lease which they allege the pursuer granted to them : Finds that the defenders may prove prout de jure the alleged rei interventus, and appoints the case to be enrolled for farther procedure."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) who, upon 8th October 1873, recalled his substitute's interlocutor, and, before answer, allowed the defenders a proof of their averments, and the pursuer a conjunct probation.

A proof was accordingly taken.

The general facts of the case were shortly as follows :—

The fishing village of Boddam was formed about 1830. Most of the houses were built by the fishermen upon sites leased from the proprietor of Boddam for twenty-one years from Martinmas 1830, which period was extended by subsequent agreement for seven years more. The defenders averred that the fishermen had a right to remove the materials of their houses when they left the village, or to be paid for the same, and adduced some evidence to this effect. The existence of this right was denied on the part of the pursuer. In 1865 the pursuer purchased the estate of Boddam, and a correspondence passed between him, his son Mr John Aiton, civil engineer in Glasgow, and Mr Robert Stephen, fish-curer, Boddam, who collected his rents in the fishing village.

The parts of the correspondence chiefly founded upon were as follows :—

On the 26th August 1867 the pursuer wrote from Wales, where he was then residing, to his son :—"It would be well if you could learn what the fishermen intend doing about their houses, as I must have their final answers by the 15th of Sept. at latest, so as to have time to warn them away at Martinmas if we cannot agree."

On 3d September 1867 Mr Robert Stephen wrote to Mr John Aiton : —"You was to send a list of all the houses in Boddam, to see those who was to buy their houses and those who was to take a lease of their houses. Please do so, that I may give you the information before the 15th, as you intimated to me before you left Boddam."

On the same day Mr John Aiton wrote to Mr Stephen a letter which crossed the last :—"Glasgow, 3d Sept. 1867.—Mr Robert Stephen, Boddam. Dear Sir,—Herewith I send you list of occupiers of houses in the village of Boddam, to be filled up according as they may purpose to purchase said houses or lease them. Opposite the name of one who intends purchasing write, Will purchase house, and opposite the names of intending leaseholders write, Will lease house, in the respective columns ; and those who will neither purchase nor lease, write such opposite his name. If the full name of each person is not written down, please write it, and if junr. or senr. can be added anywhere put it in, so that the full name may be put upon the roll. When that is done send

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

the list to me, and I will at once make out the roll, inserting the value of each house and the payment to be made by intending purchasers, also length of lease, opposite the name of purchasers, and opposite the name of intending leaseholders I will insert the length of their lease and annual rent, and then send the whole to you to be signed by each tenant personally. They are not to sign the list I now forward to you to be filled up. Please return it as soon as possible.—Yours truly,

"JOHN AITON.

"P.S.—Since writing the foregoing I have bethought me to add to the list in pencil the valuation of each house and the annual rent put thereon in case some may have forgot, and may ask you for the information.

"J. A."

Mr Stephen replied:—"Boddam, 4th Sept. 1867.—Mr John Aiton.—Sir,—Yours to hand of yesterday's date, with list of houses, which I shall call on all the tenants in Boddam and see if they are to purchase or lease their houses."

Some other letters followed between Mr John Aiton and Mr Stephen, asking and giving information on details.

On 11th September 1867 Mr Stephen wrote Mr John Aiton:—"Sir,—Enclosed I hand you your schedule, which I hope you will find correct. Those in the schedule without lease or purchase written after their name has not as yet decided whether they will purchase or lease until they see if they have any privilege round their houses, but they will do either of them."

The schedule * sent with this letter contained 117 names, with three columns, headed "Lease," "Purchase," and "Open,"—66 names being noted under the first, 21 under the second, and 30 under the third.

On 13th September 1867 Mr John Aiton wrote to Mr Stephen from Glasgow:—"Sir,—I have got the lists you sent me, but I see I will have to trouble you for further information than is contained therein. . . . If any of the fishermen should change their mind before I send you the roll for signature, and will purchase instead of lease, be kind enough to advise me of it."

To which Mr Stephen replied on 14th September, saying, inter alia;—"If any of the fishermen should change their mind about their houses I shall at once let you know."

On 17th September 1867 the pursuer wrote from Wales to his son:—"After looking carefully over all the information you have been kind enough to send me regarding the fishermen's houses at Boddam, I think that the best way would be to leave them the option of lease or purchase open for another year, but upon the distinct understanding that they pay £2 rent for next year, that is, from Martinmas '67 to Martinmas '68."

On receiving this letter Mr John Aiton wrote to Mr Stephen:—"Glasgow, 18th Sept. 1867.—Sir,—After a careful consideration of the information you have sent me, and due attention being given to the fact that this season's herring fishing is likely to turn out but a poor average for the fishermen of Boddam, the proprietor writes me that, under these circumstances, and a knowledge of their wishes, he will be willing enough to leave the fishermen the option of a lease or purchase of house property in the village of Boddam open for another year, if they should wish it,

* This schedule, which was produced by Mr John Aiton, was not the same as that mentioned in his letter of 3d September 1867 as having been sent to Stephen, and as containing certain pencil marks. The latter was not recovered.

No. 76.
Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

but upon the distinct understanding that they pay the lease rental, that is, two pounds (£2) rent for the year from Martinmas 1867 to Martinmas following, and that without any garden ground.

"I think that what has been proposed above will meet with a unanimous acquiescence from the fishermen, as it gives them a very fair chance of providing themselves by next season with means for the purchase they all desire to make; but put the proposal to them, and let me know the result; at the same time write the proprietor direct on the subject. Ascertain as far as you can generally if they be satisfied, and if there be any dissenting, let me know who they are, and what it is."

On the following day (19th) the pursuer himself wrote to Mr Stephen a letter containing the following passage:—"I wrote John to say that if the fishermen wished it I would keep the question of their purchasing their houses open for another year, but on the distinct understanding that they pay the £2 rent for next year. They quite understand already that they are to have no gardens after this year. Please to let me know whether they wish the chance of purchase kept open, or wish their leases at once."*

On 27th September Mr Stephen wrote to the pursuer:—"I have had an interview with the most of the fishermen in Boddam, and they are very thankful that you have been so good as let their houses lie over for another year; they quite understand that they are to have no garden ground after this year, and they are quite willing to pay the £2 of rent for the year until they see if they are able to purchase. If they are not able to purchase after the year is done, they will take a lease and pay £2 rent."

On the same date Mr Stephen wrote a letter in similar terms to Mr John Aiton.

The correspondence after this date was incomplete, all the writings recovered being a few letters from the pursuer to his son and to Mr Stephen, extending over the year 1868. On the 21st August 1868 he wrote to his son:—"I am glad to hear that the herring fishing is doing well, and I hope a good many of the fishermen will be able to purchase their houses at Martinmas."

On 10th October the pursuer wrote to Mr Stephen:—"I expect to be north in November, and would like to know what prospect there is of the fishermen buying up their houses this season, so that something definite could be done when I am on the spot. I suppose the fishing has been a good one in Boddam, and should enable the most of the fishermen to secure their houses at this term."

In a letter of 3d December 1868 to his son, in reference to persons who made the getting of additional land a condition of purchasing, he wrote:—"You must tell these two persons that no additional land will be given; and seeing that to be their objection to purchase, and not inability to do so, I shall not give them a lease of their houses at all, but just keep them in my own hands, unless they choose to purchase, pure and simple, as they are valued. This rule to apply to all who make additional land a condition of purchase."

On 14th December 1868 the pursuer wrote to his son, inter alia, "you need be in no hurry with the leases."

In addition to the correspondence the defenders founded upon an entry in Mr John Aiton's note-book, "fishermen's answers anent houses, June

* The pursuer in his examination as a witness for himself, being shewn this letter, and asked to explain the meaning of the concluding sentence, deponed,—"The word 'leases' there referred to the 999 years' leases."

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

1867." The names of most of the fishermen were entered, followed by a jotting, which was in most cases "Depends upon fishing." "At end of herring-fishing will see about it." "Will purchase if fishing turns out good," or something similar. Some few names had opposite them the words "£1, 2s. 6d., years 999," and two, one of which was that of the defender, Alexander James Stephen, the words, "£2, 57 years."

The fishermen, other than those who elected to purchase, and, amongst others, the defenders, paid £2 a-year for the next four years instead of £1, 2s. 6d. as before. In September 1872 each of them was served with a notice that the house occupied by him as tenant would be let for one year from Martinmas following at £4 a-year, and requiring him to retake it if he wished to continue as occupier. The present summons of removing was then raised.

The parole evidence for the defenders was to the effect that two proposals, and only two, were made in the summer of 1867 to the community by the pursuer and those acting for him, viz., purchase or lease, the purchase to take the form of a lease for 999 years at a rent of £1, 2s. 6d., the tenant paying half the estimated value of the house, and the lease proper to be for 57 years, with a rent of £2 a-year, except for a few of the smaller houses.

With regard to the question how far Mr John Aiton and Mr Robert Stephen had power to bind the pursuer, Mr John Aiton deponed:—"I had no authority from my father to grant leases. I simply collected information for the proprietor. I had authority from my father to ask the tenants whether they were willing to purchase or lease."

With reference to the entries in his note-book, and the list made up by Mr Robert Stephen, he explained,—The entries were made to give information to pursuer. They were not made for the purpose of fixing any arrangements with fishermen. Nothing was fixed except the valuations, and the rental from Martinmas 1867 to Martinmas 1868. Pursuer fixed those. The lists made up were made without instructions from pursuer, to give him information. He did not even know that I was making them."

Mr Robert Stephen deponed,—"I cannot reply whether I had any authority from pursuer to conclude a bargain. The documents are there, and speak for themselves."

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson), upon 23d February 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that in the year 1867 the pursuer offered to the defenders a lease of their respective premises libelled for fifty-seven years from the term of Martinmas 1867; (2) that the defenders accepted said offer; and (3) that since Martinmas 1867 the defenders have been in possession under said offer and acceptance: Finds in law that the pursuer is not now entitled to resile from his offer, and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the libel: Finds them entitled to expenses of process," &c.

Against this interlocutor the pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), who, upon 10th April 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the said interlocutor: Finds that the defenders have failed to instruct by competent evidence an agreement for a lease of the subjects in question for a term of years as alleged: Therefore repels the defences, decerns removing in terms of the conclusions of the summons, but only at the term of Martinmas next 1874, reserving the defenders' claims for the materials of the houses so far as competent: Finds no expenses due, and decerns."

The defenders presented a note of suspension of the decree of the Sheriff, which was passed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and a record was adjusted and closed before Lord Gifford.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session against the Sheriff's

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

interlocutor, in order to maintain two points—(1) that he was entitled to decree of removing as at Martinmas 1872, in terms of the conclusions of his summons, whatever might be the legal effect of such decree; and (2) that he was entitled to expenses in the Sheriff-court.

In respect of the dependence of the appeal at the pursuer's instance, Lord Gifford, in the process of suspension, made avizandum to the Inner-House.

Argued for the defenders;—Their case was rested on a verbal agreement of lease, proved by writ, and followed by possession under the lease.[1] The letter of 26th August 1867 by the pursuer to his son shewed that the negotiations which had been going on were so far complete that nothing remained to be done but for the fishermen to give their final answers to the pursuer's offer, and their answers were given in writing in the list made by Mr Stephen, the landlord's agent. All the essentials of the lease were proved by writing. About the subject, viz., the respective dwelling-houses, there could be no question. The rent was proved by the receipts. The duration was also proved by writ, for the letters shewed that the same terms were offered to all,—Mr John Aiton's note-book shewed that the duration of the defender, Alexander Stephen's lease, was to be fifty-seven years, and therefore that was the duration of all the leases. Even if it were held that the duration was not proved scripto, the letters shewed that there was a definite term of years in the view of the parties as the duration of all the leases, and it was competent to resort to parole evidence to explain the writings and find out what that period was.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—The terms of the lease must be proved scripto of the landlord, there being no proposal to refer to his oath. There was no evidence to shew that either Mr John Aiton or Mr Robert Stephen had authority to grant leases, or to make an agreement binding upon the pursuer. The utmost that the letters shewed was that they were instructed to place certain proposals before the community, and collect information, as a preliminary step to the landlord dealing with the fishermen severally. Even if their letters could be held to be writ of the landlord they did not instruct the alleged lease. It was not every memorandum under the hand of the landlord or his factor which, when followed by possession, constituted a lease. It must be a memorandum made with the view of putting on record the relation of landlord and tenant.[3] The cases relating to entries in rental-books did not support the defenders' case. A rental-book was kept for no other purpose but to shew the state of let of the landlord's property, and therefore there could not be a more authentic record of what the landlord believed to be the rights of the tenant. Here the writings founded on by the defenders merely shewed that there were negotiations going on about leases. The list sent by Mr Robert Stephen to Mr John Aiton was not a list of tenants but a list of persons willing to do a certain thing. The direction by Mr John Aiton, in his letter of 3d September 1867, that the fishermen were not to sign the list, was alone conclusive against there being any binding agreement at that date. Lastly, no rei interventus had been proved. Mere posses-

---

[1] Bell on Leases, pp. 305, &c., and cases there cited; Macleod v. Urquhart, May 25, 1808, Hume, p. 840; Macrorie v. Macwhirter, Dec. 18, 1810, F.C.; Lord Arbuthnot v. Campbell, Feb. 27, 1793, Hume, p. 785; Russell v. Freen, May 14, 1835, 13 S. 752, 7 Scot. Jur. 351; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. pp. 415, &c.

[2] Macleod v. Urquhart, supra.

[3] Maxwell v. Grierson, 1812, Hume, p. 849.

sion was in this case of no significance. For ten years past the houses had been let from year to year, and the payment of a rent of £2 per annum was equally consistent with a yearly tenancy as with a lease for fifty-seven years.

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—I have found this case to be one of very great delicacy and difficulty both in point of fact and in point of law. For although the question raised is mainly one of fact, whether the leases alleged by the respondents, the fishermen of Boddam, are sufficiently instructed, this question involves most important legal considerations as to the competency and sufficiency of the evidence adduced, and as to the nature of the rei interventus which is necessary to validate the tenant's right.

The case is also one of considerable importance to the parties. For although the heritable subjects are individually not of great value a lease of fifty-seven years involves important rights both to landlord and to tenant. It is a claim of heritable right—the right of the respondents to their dwelling-houses, and while we can only deal with the three individual cases which are raised in the present action, it is quite right to keep in view that the cases of many others of the fishermen may be practically decided by our judgment.

The question is whether the three defenders in the action of removing have sufficiently, and by competent evidence, established valid and subsisting leases between them and the pursuer, Mr Aiton of Boddam, for fifty-seven years from Martinmas 1867, of the cottages or houses respectively possessed by the respondents, and that at the annual rent of £2 each. While fully admitting the difficulties and the force of the legal objections pleaded by the landlord, and very ably argued at the bar, I have come to be of opinion, on the whole, that the defenders have succeeded in establishing by sufficient legal evidence the subsistence of the leases claimed by them.

The rule of law is that leases for more than one year, being heritable rights, can only be instructed by writing, and the writing ought to be either holograph of the respective parties, or duly tested according to law. But it very often happens, especially with the humbler classes of tenants, that possession of the subject is given and enjoyed, and important rei interventus takes place on the faith of the lease without any formal or legally tested written lease, and in these cases the subsistence of the lease is allowed to be proved by writing, although the writing be destitute of or defective in the usual legal solemnities. For example, there may be merely a written offer signed by the landlord, but not holograph of him, and there may be no written acceptance by the tenant, but if, on the faith of the improbative offer, possession has followed, and the lease has been acted upon, both parties will be bound for the whole period of duration expressed in the imperfect writing. And so in many other cases, where what is called a defective lease is validated and rendered binding on both parties rei interventu, or where the terms of a lease never formally reduced to writing are instructed by informal writings acted on by both parties, and followed by possession and enjoyment of the subject, and by actings on the faith of the lease.

This rule of law has been established in almost every variety of circumstances by a very long and a very numerous series of cases, which will be found collected in Mr Hunter's work on Leases, vol. i., p. 412, and subsequent pages, and by other writers. It is not necessary that I should refer to these cases, because their authority and the rule of law which they establish were admitted by both parties, the dispute being not as to the general rule of law, but as to its application to the circumstances of the present case. I do not understand that it was contested that a defective lease may be validated rei interventu, or by possession having followed on it, or that the terms of a lease clothed with possession may be instructed by informal writings. The contest in this case really is, whether the writings founded on by the tenants are in law the writings of the landlord, whether they are sufficient to instruct a concluded lease, and whether the possesion of and acts done by the tenants are referable to the contract of lease alleged by them, and are sufficient to validate it even supposing its terms to be made out from the imperfect writs founded on.

No. 76.
Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

Now, on all these points I have come, though not without hesitation, to form an opinion favourable to the tenants, although certainly the case is one of the narrowest which has yet occurred.

In the circumstances of the present case I think that the writings of Mr John Aiton, engineer, the son of the pursuer, and of Mr Robert Stephen, the factor of the pursuer, must be held as equivalent to the writing of the pursuer himself, at least whenever the son or the factor were acting on the instructions of the pursuer. It has never been doubted that rental-books or rental-rolls made up by a factor duly authorised are held as made up by the landlord himself. In this sense the maxim is applicable qui facit per alium facit per se. In the present case, however, there is a great deal of evidence directly under the landlord's own hand.

Now, without going over the evidence in detail—it is long and complicated, and to specify and distinguish the items of evidence would serve no good purpose—I think the following facts are sufficiently instructed by writings which are either directly or constructively the writ of the landlord.

(1) It is proved that the pursuer, Mr Aiton, offered and proposed to give the fishermen in his village of Boddam one of two things,—either, first, a long lease of their houses or cottages for 999 years at the existing rent, £1, 2s. 6d., they paying one-half of the estimated value of the house or its materials; or, second, to give them a shorter lease of their cottages for fifty-seven years at the advanced rent of £2 per annum. Throughout the whole correspondence and communings the first proposal was called a purchase by the fishermen, the second alternative was called a lease to them. No other proposal was made. There was no third alternative.

Originally this offer was made by the landlord verbally at meetings and otherwise, but its terms are all got from the writings of either Mr Aiton himself, or of his son or factor acting under his instructions.

(2) It is proved that Mr Aiton instructed his son, an engineer in Glasgow, to put himself in communication with the fishermen, and "learn what they intend doing about their houses, as I must have their final answers by the 15th of September at latest, so as to have time to warn them away at Martinmas if we cannot agree."

This is proved by the pursuer's own letter of 26th August 1867, which clearly shews that he wanted an answer from the fishermen,—an answer, that is, to his alternative proposal, and an answer which would constitute an agreement; for if "we cannot agree," the fishermen not agreeing were to be warned away.

(3) It is proved that the pursuer's son, following out his father's instructions, put himself in communication with the fishermen, through the factor, with the view to get their final answers to the pursuer's proposals. Mr John Aiton had already been in personal communication with many of the fishermen, and we have his note-book, in which he had noted in June 1867 the answers of many of them to the pursuer's offers. But he now sent down final lists to the factor, and instructed the factor to write opposite each fisherman's name whether he will purchase or lease his house, or whether he will do neither. Obviously this was intended to be the "final answer" which the pursuer instructed his son to get.

No. 76.
Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

I may notice in passing that Mr John Aiton's note-book, which, being written in carrying out his father's instructions, I think is really the father's writ, proves 999 years to have been the length of the proposed lease called the "purchase," and fifty-seven years that of the "lease," as well as the rent to be paid in each case. The different cottages are indicated by numbers.

(4) It is proved that the pursuer's factor, acting upon the pursuer's instructions communicated through his son, went through the fishermen, and upon a list prepared for the purpose noted their final answers in writing. This written list the factor transmitted to Mr John Aiton for the pursuer, with full explanations. In his letter the factor states that all the fishermen will either purchase or lease, and it appears from other letters that their ability to purchase depended on the success of the year's fishing.

In the list so transmitted by the factor all the present respondents are marked as "lease," which means that they will take a lease for fifty-seven years of their cottages at a rent of £2 per annum. The cottages had all been built by the tenants themselves.

This written list, made up by the factor under the pursuer's orders and instructions, seems to me to be very like a rent-roll made up by and for the landlord, and a rent-roll where possession has followed has often been held a good and sufficient evidence of a long lease,—see the recent case of the Tobermory fishermen,[1] where the only evidence of the lease was the rent-roll made up by the factor of the fishery company. It is not necessary that the tenant shall hold any writing whatever.

(5) It is proved that the pursuer, on considering "all the information" sent him by his son and factor, agreed, in order to encourage the fishermen rather to purchase than to lease—that is, rather to take the long lease for 999 years than the short lease for fifty-seven years—to delay issuing or making out the leases for fifty-seven years for a year, provided the lessees should pay in the meantime the advanced rent of £2—that is, the rent agreed on for the fifty-seven years' lease. At the same time the pursuer offered, if any of the fishermen wished it, to give them their leases—that is, their shorter leases—for fifty-seven years, at once. This is proved, inter alia, by the pursuer's holograph letters of 17th and 19th September 1867. It was simply the proposal of the pursuer which delayed or postponed the making out and the granting of formal written leases of fifty-seven years.

(6) It is proved that the defenders, who had all agreed to take leases of fifty-seven years, and to whom formal leases would have been granted if they had asked them, possessed on the faith of the lease, and paid the advanced rent of

[1] Campbell v. M'Lean, &c., April 4, 1870, 8 Macph. H. L., 40, 42 Scot. Jur. 392.

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

£2 for four or five years. There was a change of tenure indicated by the change of rent, and it seems impossible to ascribe the possession subsequent to Martinmas 1867 to anything else than the agreement for leases of fifty-seven years.

I am, therefore, of opinion that there is here sufficient writing, which we must hold in law to be the writing of the landlord, to instruct an agreement to grant a lease of fifty-seven years at the rent of £2, and that this agreement has been followed by sufficient possession and rei interventus. There is therefore in law a subsisting lease, and the tenants must be assoilzied from the conclusion of removing. I concur generally with the judgment and opinion expressed by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD SHAND.—The decision of this case is attended with difficulty, and I am not surprised that it should have given rise to a difference of opinion between the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. I concur, however, in thinking that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is right, finding that the defenders have instructed their alleged right to leases for fifty-seven years of the houses occupied by them respectively.

The parties are agreed that at Martinmas 1867 a change occurred in the terms of the tenure on which the defenders continued to possess their houses. The question in dispute is as to the nature of the change. Was it merely an arrangement for an increase of rent and for one year's possession in order to give time for deliberation and a permanent arrangement being made for a lease of 999 years on certain conditions, or for a lease of fifty-seven years; or was it an arrangement concluded for a lease of fifty-seven years at the increased rent, with power to the defenders during the first year of that lease, to make their right substantially a right of property by taking a 999 years' lease, subject to the condition of making payment of one-half of the estimated value of their houses? I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking the latter was the agreement between the parties.

It lies of course with the defenders to instruct the existence of the right they allege, as being one for a period of years; and it must, I think, be conceded that the rei interventus founded on, which consists entirely in the payment of increased rents, is not of a kind which aids the defenders materially in their contention. A new and informal arrangement for a lease is often followed by expensive operations on the tenant's part, executed with the knowledge of the landlord, in erecting buildings or making drains and fences, or the like, and sometimes by the payment of a grassum. In such cases the acts of rei interventus are usefully, and properly founded on, not merely to shew that the agreement of the parties was acted on, but as throwing light reflectively on the agreement itself. In such cases the nature and amount of the expenditure affords a strong presumption that the arrangement was one for a term of years. In the present case, I think, any such element is wanting. The increased rent paid for about four years before the present dispute arose is equally consistent with an agreement for tenancy for a single year, continued by tacit relocation, as with an agreement for a fifty-seven years' lease. The increased rent is not necessarily to be accounted for by an arrangement for a tenancy of years. The rei interventus is thus of use only in the way of shewing that the new agreement, whatever it was, was acted on, and indeed acted on by both parties, but not as shewing what the agreement was.

The agreement must thus be found entirely in the writ of the landlord, by which the defenders say its existence has been proved. There were no writings which passed between the parties, such as informal missives, or even a draft lease, revised or adjusted, which, when followed by rei interventus, might have been held to constitute a lease. The only document directly communicated to the defenders was the schedule made up by Stephen, the factor for the pursuer, on which the verbal answer of each defender to the question of lease or purchase was recorded. This document was not signed, and was not intended to be the writing constituting a lease in favour of the parties whose answers were there recorded. But although there be no writing, which, though informal, can be represented as constituting a lease, when followed by rei interventus, I think the agreement, as alleged by the defenders, has been proved by writ, i.e. by the writ of the pursuer.

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

The parole evidence can be competently resorted to in order to prove the relation of agency between the pursuer and his son and factor, both of whom acted for him in the transaction between the parties, and recorded in writings at the time for the pursuer the result of their communications, and may also be legitimately referred to to prove the surrounding circumstances necessary to make the writings intelligible, and to enable the Court to construe the terms there used. To this limited extent only I have proceeded on the evidence of the witnesses. In the writings of the landlord I am of opinion that evidence is to be found that, before Martinmas 1867, he and the defenders had agreed that, on the one hand, the defenders should each pay an increased rent, the difference being £2 in place of the former rent, £1, 2s. 6d., and that, on the other, they should be tenants on leases for fifty-seven years, with an option or privilege, however, open to them during the first year, of taking leases for 999 years, on payment of one-half the value of their houses, and of reverting in that case to their old rent of £1, 2s. 6d. for the longer period.

The documents, which, I think, prove the agreement, are, in the first place, the pursuer's own letters of 26th August and 17th September to his son, and of 19th September to Robert Stephen, with the entries in Mr John Aiton's note-book of the fishermen's answers as to their houses, the letter by Mr Stephen of 11th September to Mr John Aiton, and the list or schedule it contained, and the letter by Stephen of 27th September to the pursuer. Such of these writings as are in the handwriting of Mr John Aiton and Robert Stephen respectively are to be taken in the present question as the writ of the pursuer,—in the same way as the record by a factor in the rental-book of his employer of the terms of a lease is held to be the writ of the landlord. Mr John Aiton and Stephen were employed by the pursuer to act as his factors or agents in communications made for him to the defenders, and the books or writings in which they recorded, on the landlord's behalf, the terms on which the parties had negotiated, and the result of the negotiation, are to be regarded as his writ.

From these writings I think it is proved (1) that prior to 26th August the pursuer and the defenders and other fishermen in the occupation of houses had been negotiating as to their purchasing their houses by taking leases for 999 years, or otherwise taking leases for the shorter period of fifty-seven years; (2) that by the pursuer's desire, communicated through his son to Stephen, the final answers of the defenders and the other fishermen to the pursuer's proposal to allow either purchases or leases were called for and given, and were recorded in writing; and (3) that while all who answered the proposal by agreeing to lease were thereby held bound to do so, yet the pursuer, being anxious that as many as possible should yet purchase their houses, agreed to keep the right or chance of purchase open for another year, and thus put them in the position of tenants on long leases, with a power of purchasing the houses which were the subject of lease. I think this arrangement is distinctly recorded in the pursuer's letter of 19th September to Stephen, when he says, "Please to let me know whether they wish the chance of purchase kept open, or wish their leases at once," and I cannot adopt his explanation that the leases there mentioned, as to be sent at once if wished, were leases, not for 57, but for 999 years. It appears to me to be further proved that the leases mentioned in the writings to which I have referred, as distinguished from the purchases, were leases for a period of fifty-seven years. The note in John Aiton's book referring to the defender, Alexander James Stephen, expressly states this to be the term of endurance of his lease. The whole other writings shew that one and the same term of endurance of lease at the increased rent was in the mind of the parties negotiating, so that when the term of fifty-seven years is proved in reference to one it is truly proved as to all.

No. 76.
Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

On the whole I am of opinion that the rei interventus which unquestionably took place followed on a verbal agreement with the defenders, proved by the writ of the pursuer to have been not an arrangement for what has been called a year's grace only, with no obligation beyond that time, but an agreement concluded for leases of fifty-seven years, with a power or privilege to the defenders to purchase the subjects of their respective leases, if they desired to do so; and this being so, I think the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action of removing at the pursuer's instance.

Lord Neaves.—I concur so entirely with your Lordships that I shall state in very few words the grounds of my opinion.

The case is of considerable importance and delicacy, because a lease for the period of fifty-seven years partakes of the nature of an alienation, and is not to be established or enforced except upon evidence which complies with the cardinal rules of law in regard to the alienation of land.

The essential question is, whether there is writ binding upon the parties. But let us first consider whether, supposing this to have been a consensual contract, where, without requiring solemnities, we had to determine the meaning of the parties, there is any doubt about the agreement to which they came.

The houses in question had been held on a strange sort of customary tenure. They had been built by the fishermen, and it appears that when they removed they were entitled to carry off the woodwork of the houses. This was evidently not a very convenient arrangement, and the proprietor became desirous of putting things on a new footing. Accordingly, he proposed to the fishermen generally an option of a lease of fifty-seven years, or, what is called a purchase, viz. a lease for 999 years. It is of importance to notice that the proposal originated with the landlord. Some declared their willingness to purchase, but the greater number, including the defenders, indicated their willingness to take a lease. This was not so satisfactory to the landlord as he expected. He would have preferred to have had the houses sold. A proposal was then made to them that a year's interval should be allowed to elapse, in order that those who were then willing to lease for fifty-seven years might, if they saw a good opening, choose the longer endurance. The paucity of those willing to buy was attributed to the want of success which had attended that year's fishing, and it was hoped that another year would put them in funds. An arrangement was made to this effect, upon the condition that they should pay an increased rent of £2 for their houses for the next year, which was to be the rent under the fifty-seven years' lease. I think that this was agreed upon, not upon the footing that if the option to purchase was not exercised all parties should be free, but that the fishermen were to get the lease at any rate. They were to have the option of an alternative proposal, but if, at the end of that year, they chose to fall back on the original proposal, they were to be entitled to get, and bound to accept, a fifty-seven years' lease.

No. 76.

Jan. 26, 1875.
Sellar, &c. v. Aiton.

If that be the nature of the agreement, is it proved in a habile manner by what is equivalent to the writ of the parties, followed by rei interventus? It appears to me that the letters founded on are sufficient to prove the offer by the landlord, and the extension of that offer, with the proviso that if the fishermen did not choose to extend the lease to a purchase the parties were to be bound as by a lease. There is sufficient writing to constitute writ by the landlord, such as, if followed by rei interventus, will make a contract binding on the parties. It was followed by rei interventus, for from that time the new rent of £2 became payable, and has been paid ever since.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD ORMIDALE were absent.

(In the Suspension.)

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find it proved in point of fact that the suspenders are tenants of the houses possessed by them respectively under valid and subsisting leases to them by the respondent for fifty-seven years from Martinmas 1867, and that they have possessed under such leases since Martinmas 1867: Find in point of law that the respondent is not entitled to remove the defenders from their respective possessions: Therefore suspend the decree of removing of date 10th April 1874, pronounced by the Sheriff of Aberdeen in the action raised at the instance of the respondent against the suspenders set forth in the record, and threatened charge thereon, and decern: Find the suspenders entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

(In the Appeal.)

(After findings as in the above interlocutor)—"Therefore and with reference to the judgment of this date in the relative action of suspension at the instance of the respondents, recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and assoilzie the respondents from the conclusions of the action of removing, and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses, both in this Court and in the inferior Court, and remit," &c.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—JOHN AULD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

THE EDINBURGH LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Rutherfurd.

THE SCOTTISH WIDOWS' FUND AND LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Rutherfurd.

Revenue—Inhabited House-Duties—48 Geo. III. c. 55—57 Geo. III. cap. 25, sec. 1—5 Geo. IV. cap. 44, sec. 4—32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, sec. 11.

The Act 48 Geo. III. c. 55, imposed a duty upon houses.

The Act 57 Geo. III. c. 25, sec. 1, introduced an exemption in respect of houses occupied "for purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, no person inhabiting, abiding, or dwelling therein, except during the daytime only for the purposes of such trade."

The Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 44, sec. 4, after referring to the exemption introduced by the previous Act "to persons in trade," enacted that the exemption "shall and may be extended" to every person in respect of any house or building "which shall be used by such person or persons as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, &c., no person inhabiting, abiding, or dwelling therein, except in "the daytime" only, for the purpose of such profession, &c.

The Act 32 and 33 Vict. c. 14, sec. 11, enacted that any house "occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, or being used as a shop or counting-house, shall be exempt from inhabited house-duties, although a servant or other person may dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for protection thereof."

Held that the last of these enactments applied only to houses used for purposes of "trade" in the sense of the Act 57 Geo. III. c. 25, and therefore did not apply to houses used as insurance offices with resident servants.

Exchequer Cause.
1st DIVISION.
B.

AT a meeting of the commissioners for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house-duties for the county of Edinburgh on 3d December 1874 the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, Edinburgh, appealed against the charge of £13, 2s. 6d. made upon them for inhabited house-duty at the rate of 9d. per pound on £350, the annual value of the premises occupied by them for the purpose of carrying on their business of life insurance.

The area flat, consisting of four apartments, having internal communication with the offices above, was occupied as a dwelling-house by a servant of the company, who went messages, superintended the cleaning of the premises, and acted as a clerk to the company to the extent of addressing and booking letters, and with whom resided his wife, and a female servant whose wages were paid by the company.

The appellants claimed relief from the assessment under the Act 14 and 15 Victoria, cap. 36, and under the 11th section of 32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14,* on the ground that they were a proprietary company engaged in trade, that the business carried on for the benefit of, and at the risk of

* "From and after the 5th day of April 1869 any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, or being used as a shop or a counting-house, shall be exempt from inhabited house-duties, although a servant or other person may dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for the protection thereof."

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875. Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

the shareholders, of insuring lives, buying and selling annuities, reversions, &c., was essentially a trading business, that the part of the tenement occupied by them in 22 George Street was used "for the purpose of trade only," and that the person dwelling in the area flat lived there "for the protection thereof," and to take care of the premises.

The appellants maintained that an insurance office was as little liable as a bank (which the surveyor admitted was not liable unless where it was also used as a dwelling-house), and that an insurance company could be sequestrated as well as a bank, or any other trading company. The appellants further contended that the case of the National Bank of Scotland (1115)* was totally different from theirs, because the upper stories of the bank were inhabited by the cashier and his family.

The surveyor contended that the premises did not fall within the exemption quoted,—1st, Because the business carried on by the appellants was not of the nature of trade in the meaning of the Act, and the premises were not therefore used "for the purposes of trade only." . . . . The Act made a clear distinction between trades and professions. And under it the offices of writers, accountants, &c., were charged, although a considerable part of their business was akin to that of banking, inasmuch as they lent money, purchased shares, &c.; but it was considered that their offices were not solely used for the purposes of trade, and they were therefore taxed. Life insurance was not a trade; there was neither a buyer nor a seller, but for an annual payment the company guaranteed a sum at death. 2d, Because, even if the business carried on was of the nature of trade, the premises did not come under the exemption claimed, inasmuch as the person residing in them did not dwell there solely for the protection thereof, but was otherwise occupied, sometimes in discharging the duties of a messenger, and at other times the more important duties appertaining to the position of a clerk. The surveyor cited the English case (No. 2850), the Atlas Assurance Company, and the Scotch case (No. 1115), the National Bank of Scotland.

The commissioners were of opinion that the business carried on was not of the nature of trade, and that therefore the premises did not come within the exemption granted by the statute, and accordingly refused the appeal and confirmed the assessment. But the appellants being dissatisfied with their decision, craved that a case might be stated for the opinion of the Court under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1874, 37 Vict. cap. 16.

A similar case was stated for the Scottish Widows' Fund and Life Assurance Society, a "mutual" office.

The appellants argued;—These companies, whether proprietary or mutual, were traders, just as a bank was admitted in practice to be. The words "inhabited dwelling-house" were not applicable to their premises, and, besides, they were exempted as being used for purposes of trade only.

The respondent argued;—The companies were not traders, and even bankers and underwriters were not traders.†

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the case of the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company the company claim exemption from the inhabited house-duty upon the ground that they are within the meaning of the 11th section of the statute 32 and 33

* These numbers refer to Assessed Taxes Cases printed for the Office of Inland Revenue.

† The Acts of Parliament founded on by the parties are quoted in the Lord President's opinion.

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Vict. c. 14, and the commissioners have refused to sustain that exemption because they are of opinion that the business carried on by the company is not of the nature of a trade, and therefore the premises do not come within the exemption of the statute.

Now, in order to determine whether the business carried on by this company is of the nature of a trade, it is necessary, of course, to ascertain what is the meaning of the term "trade" as used in this statute. But for that purpose, again, it seems to me to be necessary to attend to the legislative history of this inhabited house-duty,—what it is in itself, and how the exemptions have arisen and been introduced into the statute. The duty itself was imposed originally in the year 1808 by 48 Geo. III. c. 55, along with a great many other taxes, and there cannot be much doubt, I think, in reading that Act, that it was intended to assess all houses or tenements which were occupied, not merely by persons residing in them, but also by persons occupying them during the day for business purposes. In short, although it was called an inhabited house-duty, it really was something more extensive than that, because an inhabited house, in the popular sense of the term, is a house in which persons dwell, reside, and spend the night as well as the day. The tax, in its original conception under the 48th Geo. III., was of a more comprehensive description than that. But after it had been in operation for some time, there was first one exemption introduced by the Act of 57th Geo. III. c. 25, and afterwards another by the 5th Geo. IV. c. 44. The 57th Geo. III. c. 25, sec. 1, introduced this exemption, that on due proof that "any person, or any number of persons, in partnership together respectively occupy a tenement or building . . . . . as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, no person inhabiting, dwelling, or abiding therein, except in the day time only, for the purpose of such trade, such person or each of such persons in partnership respectively residing in a separate and distinct dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, charged to the duties under the said Act, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, according to the provisions of this Act, to discharge the assessment made for that year in respect of such tenement or building which shall be so used for purposes of trade, or so employed as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house." Now, this is an exemption applied to trade premises solely, and confined entirely to that, and the words used in this statute are extremely important. It must be a house used for the purposes of trade only, or a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, and merchandise, or a shop or counting-house, and it must be occupied only during the day for the purposes of such trade, and not occupied during the night as a dwelling-house. Now, prima facie, certainly under that statute the word "trade" is used as meaning the trade of a merchant or shopkeeper,—that is to say, of one who buys and sells as a merchant does, on a large scale, or of one who deals in retail like a shopkeeper; and, reading that statute alone, one would be very much disposed to come to the conclusion that the exemption was not intended to extend beyond either a merchant, in the proper sense of the term, or a shopkeeper. But then we have the next statute, 5th Geo. IV. cap. 44, which, by sec. 4, extends the exemption to another class, and it is not immaterial to observe that that section has a special preamble referring back to the 57th of Geo. III. in these terms:—"The provisions in the said Act contained for granting exemptions from the said duties to persons in trade in respect of houses, tenements, and buildings in

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

the said Act described." Now, here is the interpretation of the previous statute in this preamble. The exemption extends to persons in trade in respect of houses used solely for the purposes of trade. That is the meaning of the clause in the 57th Geo. III., as construed by the Parliament which passed the Act of 5th Geo. IV., and it extends that provision, and enacts that the exemptions "shall and may be extended and applied by the respective commissioners and officers acting in the execution of the said Act and this Act, on due proof, to all and every person, or any number of persons in partnership together, for or in respect of any house, tenement, or building, or part of a tenement or building in the said Act described which shall be used by such person or persons as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business, or calling by which such person or persons shall seek a livelihood or profit, no person inhabiting, abiding, or dwelling therein, except in the day time only, for the purpose of such profession, vocation, business, or calling; such person, or each such persons, in partnership respectively residing in a distinct and separate dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, charged to the said duties."

Now, it seems to me that the question we have to solve in the present case is, whether the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company is within the first statute or the second, whether it is a trader within the meaning of the 57th Geo. III., or is a company carrying on a business or calling within the meaning of the 5th Geo. IV. In these two statutes the two classes of persons are placed exactly in the same position. They are equally exempt, but the necessity of distinguishing between the two in this case arises from the provisions of the 11th section of the recent statute 32d and 33d Vict., which provides—"From and after the fifth day of April one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, or being used as a shop or counting-house, shall be exempt from inhabited house duties, although a servant or other person may dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for the protection thereof." The persons who are exempted under the 57th Geo. III. have this additional privilege under the statute of the 32d and 33d Vict., that they may enjoy their exemption although they have a servant dwelling in the house for the purpose of protection; and this is not extended to those who enjoy their exemption under the 5th Geo. IV., and thence arises the necessity of determining to which class of exempted persons this insurance company belongs. Now, I am of opinion that the term "trade" is used in the first of these statutes in its strict meaning, and that there are a great many businesses which may be regarded as falling within the description of trading that are not trading within the meaning of that statute. I am satisfied, taking these two statutes conferring the exemptions together, that the distinction intended to be made between the two is, that the one exemption is confined to traders in the proper and legitimate sense of the term—merchants and shopkeepers,—and that the exemption is extended to all other persons who are carrying on any other kind of business for profit, not being traders in that proper sense; and as the 11th section of 32 and 33 Vict. repeats the very words of the 57th Geo. III. in giving the additional privilege, that additional privilege must be confined to the persons within the meaning of the 57th Geo. III.; and I am therefore of opinion with the commissioners that this insurance company is not a trader. That renders it quite unnecessary to enter upon the question whether the servant whom they had in

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

charge of their premises is within the meaning of the 11th section of the recent statute, for the purposes of protection, and for no other purpose. That might raise some little difficulty, but it is not a question of the same importance as the other. It is sufficient for our judgment, I think, to adopt the same ground that has been adopted by the commissioners, and in which, I think, they are quite right. With regard to the case of the Scottish Widows' Fund it is not necessary to say much, because if a proprietary company like the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company are not traders, still less are the mutual society called the Scottish Widows' Fund. I think, if we had held that a proprietary office was a trader in the meaning of the statute a very serious question would have arisen whether the same construction of the statute would have applied in the case of a mutual office; but it is not necessary to enter on that question.

I think we can fairly dispose of both cases upon the ground which has been taken by the commissioners.

LORD DEAS.—I am of opinion with your Lordship that neither of these companies are to be held as carrying on a business of the nature of trade, so as to entitle them to come within the exemption in the sense of these statutes. I cannot say I see any substantial difference between them. There may be more difficulty in regard to the Scottish Widows' Fund than in regard to the other, but it is not necessary to go into that, and I cannot see at present that any distinction can be taken between them. It is sufficient to hold that neither of them are carrying on a trade in the sense of the statute.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—When a court of law is called to decide a question affecting the incidence and distribution of taxation the question is necessarily important. We have been told that a taxing statute must be construed liberally and favourably to the subjects. In one sense that is true, and the remark is well founded; but, on the other hand, equality and impartial justice in the incidence of taxation is of greater moment, and the statute should be construed so as to promote that equality and that impartiality of justice. There is no presumption in favour of the exemption of the few from the incidence of the general tax. I think the presumption is for equality, and rather against the partiality which is involved in special exemptions. Therefore, in deciding any case I would consider the question on the statutes according to their true meaning. So viewing the case, I arrive at the conclusion that these insurance companies are not traders within the meaning of the 32d and 33d Vict.—construing that statute by the aid of the preceding statutes imposing and regulating taxation—and that the premises which they occupy are not houses for the purposes of trade only. The question is one of difficulty. I have felt it to be so; but on the whole I am quite satisfied with the construction which your Lordship in the chair has adopted and explained of the series of these Acts, and I have come to the same conclusion that neither of these insurance companies are the occupants of premises used for trade only. There is a distinction between the two, and I do not undervalue it. I think there was a great deal of ingenious argument about it, and if we had come to the conclusion that the proprietary company were engaged in trade there might have been a doubt whether a mutual insurance society, where every man insures himself as well as the others, is a proper trading company. There may be subtle and delicate questions involved in that. I do not know it is trade for a man to insure himself with himself. I do not know it is sale when a man sells to himself and buys from himself. But it is not necessary to enter upon these questions. Holding—as I concur with your Lordship in doing—that both societies are liable, and not within the exemption, it is not necessary to consider whether one is more liable than the other.

No. 77.

Feb. 2, 1875.

Edin. Life Assurance Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Lord Mure concurred.

The Court affirmed the judgment of the commissioners without giving expenses.

Scot. Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

James Mylne, W.S.—Party.—Agents.

William M'Kinnon (Hannay and Sons' Trustee), Pursuer.—Balfour—Mackintosh.
Armstrong Brothers and Company, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Asher—Lorimer.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.

Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

Agreement—Proof—Settlement of contra accounts—Parole.—A, a firm of iron merchants, had an account against B, an iron merchant and broker, for £9562. B, as broker for C, had an account against A for £7536. Both accounts were payable on the same settling day. B's account as broker for C was, at a meeting for settlement, not disputed, but A's was to a certain extent. B paid the balance admitted by him to be due, and the payment was marked as a payment to account on the copy of A's account held by him, and a receipt for the sum so paid was written upon it. A having subsequently become bankrupt, held, in a question between A's creditors and B, (1) that the account, with the receipt for the payment to account, though there were pencil markings of figures on the back shewing that the amount of the sum so paid to account had been fixed, after deducting B's account from A's, were insufficient to establish a settlement between A and B by crossing accounts and payment of the balance; and (2) that it was not competent to supplement the proof of settlement by parole evidence.

Compensation—Concursus Debiti et Crediti—Bankruptcy—Bill.—When certain bills were discounted by indorsees for value, and subsequently retired by them at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, held that they were entitled to plead compensation upon them against a debt due by themselves to the bankrupt; and the special objections (1) that they were neither the holders at the date of the sequestration nor the drawers, but only intermediate indorsees, (2) that they held a letter of guarantee from a third party, whose name did not appear on the bills, but for whose behoof they had been drawn, against any loss they might sustain on the bills, and, therefore, were pleading compensation in the interest of the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, repelled.

Observed (per Lord Gifford) that prior to the maturity of the bills the indorsees, in respect of their liability to be called on for payment, had a right of retention as against the bankrupt.

2d Division. Ld. Mackenzie.

The pursuer of this action was the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Hannay and Sons, ironmasters, Glasgow, of which sequestration was awarded on 28th March 1874. The defenders, Armstrong Brothers and Company, were iron merchants and iron brokers in Glasgow, the partners of the firm being W. J. Armstrong and his brother T. N. Armstrong.

Previous to 31st December 1873 W. J. Armstrong carried on a similar business in Glasgow as a partner of the firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, the other partner being C. Müller. That firm was dissolved on that date, and the firm of Armstrong Brothers and Company was then formed, and thereafter carried on the business of iron merchants and brokers formerly carried on by Armstrong, Müller, and Company.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

W. J. Armstrong, by the contract of dissolution of the copartnery of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, undertook to liquidate the business, and to take over and carry out for his own behoof, and at his own risk, all the existing and unexpired contracts of the firm, paying to his partner, Mr Müller, merely his interest in the firm as it stood at the date of dissolution of the partnership.

The firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company acted for Thomas Vaughan and Company, ironmasters and merchants in Middlesborough, as their agents in Glasgow, up to July 1873, and from that date to 31st December 1873 as their brokers in Glasgow. After 31st December 1873 the defenders, Armstrong Brothers and Company, acted as the brokers in Glasgow of Thomas Vaughan and Company.

Between June 1872 and the date of the sequestration of Hannay and Sons several contracts for the delivery of pig-iron were entered into, in some one or more of which the several parties, Hannay and Sons, Armstrong, Müller and Company, Armstrong Brothers and Company, and Thomas Vaughan and Company, were each interested.

The pursuer in this action sought to recover payment from Armstrong Brothers and Company of, inter alia, a sum of £8501, 7s. 7d., being the amount alleged to be due by them on two contracts entered into between them and Hannay and Sons on 6th and 16th February 1874, after giving credit for a sum of £863, 9s. 11d. paid to account on 11th March 1874, and of £197, 12s. 6d. for fifty-one tons acknowledged to have been short delivered under the contract of 6th February.

Two defences were stated for Armstrong Brothers and Company.

First, That a settlement had taken place between them and Hannay and Sons on 11th March 1874, being the monthly settling day in the Glasgow iron market. That on this occasion, the two firms being duly represented by Mr Moir, cashier to Hannay and Sons, and Mr Picken, book-keeper to Armstrong Brothers, the settlement was effected by crossing accounts, which had been previously rendered by the parties to one another for settlement on that settling day, and by payment by Armstrong Brothers of the balance of £863, 9s. 11d. due by them to Hannay and Sons by cheque for that amount.

Second, That the defenders held bills of Hannay and Sons to the amount of £13,057, 10s. 4d., on which they pleaded compensation or retention.

I. As regarded the first of these defences the defenders averred;—(Stat. 8) "A settlement of accounts was made between the defenders and Hannay and Sons on 11th March 1874. . . . There were placed to the debit of the defenders the prices of the iron sold by Hannay and Sons on 6th and 16th February, viz.:—

"1500 tons, sold on 6th February, at 77s. 6d., .	£5812	10 0
"1000 on 16th February, at 75s., ...	3750	0 0
	£9562	10 0
"From which was deducted the price of the 300 tons short delivered in February of the contract of 6th February, ...	1162	10 0
Leaving due, .	£8400	0 0

"And to the defenders' credit were placed—

(1) The price of the 1000 tons of pig-iron	£4125	0	0
Carry forward,	£4125	0	0	£8400	0 0

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

Brought forward,	£4125	0	0	£8400	0	0
(2) The price of 808 tons 17 cwt.,	3336	10	1
(3) The commission due to the defenders on the sales, conform to invoice herewith produced, .	75	0	0
				7536	10	1
" Leaving a balance against the defenders of . .				£863	9	11

" For which sums they gave Messrs Hannay and Sons a cheque upon the Clydesdale Banking Company and this squared accounts as at 11th March 1874."

The two following accounts were produced:—

No. 115/30 of pro. " Glasgow, 28th Feby. 1874.

Messrs Armstrong Brothers & Co., Glasgow,

Bought of Hannay & Sons.

Feb. 4.	No 4 forge G.M.B. pig-iron, 1500	79/6	. .	£5962	10	0*
6.	" " " 1500	77/6	. .	5812	10	0
16.	" " " 1000	75/	. .	3750	0	0
				£15,525	0	0

F.o.b. and f.o.t. makers' wharves and works.

Mar. 11.	By cheque to a/c.	863	9	11
	Balance, . .	£14,661	10	1

HANNAY & SONS,
p. JAS. S. MOIR.
£863 9 11
11/3/74.

£4700 *
HANNAY & SONS,
JAS. MOIR.
12/3/74.

12.	Bills from Vaughan	£4700	0	0*
		£9961	10	1
	Contra a/c. com.	75	0	0
		£9886	10	1

[Pencil Note on Back.]

£775 0 0	£9562 10 0	£7461 10 1
387 10 0	1162 10 0	75 0 0
£1162 10 0	£8400 0 0	£7536 10 1
	7536 10 1
	£863 9 11"

* It was admitted by both parties that these entries referred to a contract in which Armstrong Brothers and Company were merely brokers for disclosed principals, Thomas Vaughan and Company, and should not have been entered in this account.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

No. 116/29 of pro. " Glasgow, 4th March 1874.

Messrs Hannay & Sons, *Thomas Vaughan & Co. To ~~Armstrong Brothers & Co.~~

Contract of 28 Aug. /73.

		T.	Cwt.
Feb. 28.	To	808	: 17	No. 4 forge M'bro' pig-iron	82/6	£3336	10 1
		1000		4 "	82/6	4125	0 0
						£7461	10 1"

It was not disputed that this account fell to be paid to Armstrong Brothers, as brokers for Thomas Vaughan and Company, on 11th March.

The following excerpt was produced from the settlement-book of Hannay and Sons:—

No. 116/30 of pro. " 10 Mar. /74.

Armstrong Bros. & Co.

Feby.	A/	£15,525	By accepts. from Vaughan, ...	£4,700	0 0
Mar.		2,310
"		825	Mar. 11, cheque, . .	863	9 11
			~~Contra A/ . . . .~~	~~7,461 10 1~~†
				13,096	10 1
		18,660.		18,660	0 0"

[Figures in italics are in pencil.]

The pursuer, on the other hand, denied that any settlement had been come to on 11th March 1874. He contended that as the account 115/30 of pro. was due by Armstrong Brothers and Company as principals to Hannay and Sons as principals, whereas the account 116/29 of pro. was due by Hannay and Sons as principals to Armstrong Brothers as brokers for Thomas Vaughan and Company, compensation could not take place, but a distinct and probative agreement to settle must be proved. He founded on the terms of the account No. 115/30 of pro. as inconsistent with the idea of any such settlement having been made, and explained that the pencil jottings on the back having been made by Mr Picken, the defenders' book-keeper, before his meeting with Mr Moir, as embodying his idea of the settlement which should be come to by the parties, he had accordingly taken with him to the meeting merely a cheque for the balance which he had so brought out, and which he handed to Mr Moir, on the latter refusing to agree to a settlement, as all the payment which he was then in a position to make to account.

It is not necessary to refer to the parole evidence on this branch of the case, as the Court held that the settlement alleged could only be instructed by written evidence.

II. The bills upon which the defenders pleaded compensation were seven in number, amounting in all to £13,057, 10s. 4d. They were granted in relation to different trantsactions from those already mentioned in connection with the first defence.

---

* The alteration from Armstrong Brothers and Company to Thomas Vaughan and Company in the heading was made by Mr Moir, Hannay and Son's cashier, after the alleged settlement of 11th March.

† Mr Moir, cashier for Hannay and Sons, deponed:—"My impression is that the deleted entry was made a few days after 10th March, and it may have been deleted the day after it was made; but I cannot speak positively as to that."

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

On 26th June 1872, Armstrong, Müller, and Company sold to Hannay and Sons 6000 tons No. 4 Middlesborough forge pig-iron at £4, 12s. per ton, delivery to be at the rate of about 1000 tons a-month, commencing in July 1873, and payment to be made in cash on the last cash day of each month for the monthly quantity delivered, or by acceptance at four months' date.

On the same day Armstrong, Müller, and Company purchased from Thomas Vaughan and Company 6000 tons No. 4 Middlesborough forge pig-iron at £4, 5s. per ton, f.o.b. at their wharf on the Tees, delivery to be at the rate of about 1000 tons per month, commencing in July 1873, and payment to be "nett cash on last cash day of the month for quantity delivered during previous month, or by Messrs Hannay and Sons' acceptance (payable London), at four months' date."

The seven bills in question were accepted by Hannay and Sons in payment of the deliveries to them in November and December 1873 and January 1874, under the contract of 26th June 1872 first above-mentioned.

In terms of this contract they were drawn at four months by Armstrong, Müller, and Company upon and accepted by Hannay and Sons, and were all current at the date of Hannay and Sons' sequestration. In virtue of the contract of dissolution of the firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, dated 31st December 1873, they were endorsed by that firm in liquidation to Armstrong Brothers and Company, who discounted them with the Clydesdale Bank. W. J. Armstrong, as liquidator of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, at the same time received from his new firm of Armstrong Brothers and Company an advance of £5000 as against the bills discounted, which he handed to his late partner Mr C. E. Müller, as payment of the first instalment of the assets of the dissolved firm due to him in terms of the contract of dissolution. On the bankruptcy of Hannay and Sons, Armstrong Brothers and Company were obliged to retire the bills as they fell due.

In their contract of 26th June 1872 with Thomas Vaughan and Company second above mentioned (which was avowedly entered into with reference to their contract of same date with Hannay and Sons), Armstrong, Müller, and Company stipulated, as above mentioned, that payment should be "nett cash on last cash day of the month for quantity delivered during previous month, or by Messrs Hannay and Sons' acceptance (payable London) at four months' date." Some difference of opinion existing between Armstrong, Müller, and Company and Thomas Vaughan and Company as to the meaning of this stipulation, and Thomas Vaughan and Company declining to draw upon Hannay and Sons direct, it was agreed that Armstrong, Müller, and Company should draw upon Hannay and Sons, and either hand over the bills endorsed to Thomas Vaughan and Company or discount them and hand over the proceeds, Thomas Vaughan and Company giving them this letter of indemnity:—"Middlesbro', Oct. 23d, 1873.—In consideration of your having to-day agreed to draw upon Messrs Hannay and Sons for all pig-iron delivered and to be delivered under our contract of June 26th, 1872, with you, and hand such drafts over to us when accepted, we hereby agree to indemnify you from any loss in respect of such drafts handed over to us or discounted by you."

Armstrong, Müller, and Company having taken the latter course, and discounted the bills in question accepted by Hannay and Sons, Thomas Vaughan and Company admitted their liability of relief under this letter, they getting the advantage of anything recovered from Hannay and Sons' estate. They also made advances to Armstrong Brothers and Company under their obligation of relief, in order to assist them in taking up the bills.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

After a proof, the Lord Ordinary, on 29th October 1874, pronounced a judgment in favour of the pursuer, and found the defenders liable in expenses.*

* "NOTE.—. . . . There are two questions raised between the pursuer and defenders in regard to the dealings of Hannay and Sons and the defenders . . .

"The first question is—Whether, on 11th March 1874, being the iron-market account day in Glasgow for the preceding month, no settlement of accounts took place between Hannay and Sons and the defenders, under which, as the defenders maintain, the sum of £7536, 10s. 1d. (consisting of £4125, the price due by Hannay and Sons to Thomas Vaughan and Company for 1000 tons of iron delivered under the contract of 28th August 1873, and of £3336, 10s. 1d., the price of 808 tons 17 cwt. of iron alleged to have been delivered, and to be due by Hannay and Sons to Thomas Vaughan and Company under the same contract, and of £75 due to the defenders for commission on iron sales), was set against £9562, 10s., the amount due by the defenders to Hannay and Sons for the iron contained in the contracts of 6th and 16th February, less £1162, 10s. deducted on account of 300 tons alleged by the defenders to have been short delivered under the contract of 6th February, and the balance of £863, 9s. 11d. was paid by the defenders.

£4125	0	0
3336	10	1
£7461	10	1
75	0	0
£7536	10	1
£9562	10	0
1162	10	0
£8400	0	0
7536	10	1
£863	9	11

"The second question is—Whether the defenders are entitled to set off against the sum now sued for the sum of £13,057, 10s. 4d., contained in the seven bills mentioned in the defences, drawn by Armstrong, Müller, and Company upon and accepted by Hannay and Sons, and endorsed to the defenders in January and February 1874 by the then dissolved firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, for the purposes of the liquidation of that firm.

"1. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no settlement of accounts took place on 11th March 1874 such as is averred by the defenders. The statements of the witnesses upon this point are very conflicting. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that the actings with reference to the account No. 115/30 of process, of Hannay and Sons' cashier, and of the defenders' book-keeper (who are averred by the defenders to have made the settlement), support the evidence for the pursuer, and are conclusive against the view that such a settlement of accounts took place.

"Messrs Hannay and Sons sent the account No. 115/30 of process to the defenders on or about 28th February 1874. It then contained three entries, the first being a charge for the 1500 tons of iron sold by the defenders on behalf of Hannay and Sons to Thomas Vaughan and Company on 4th February 1874, and payable by bill at four months from 10th March 1874, and the remaining two entries being the price of the 1500 tons and 1000 tons of iron sold on 6th and 16th February 1874 by Hannay and Sons to or through the defenders for cash on 10th March 1874. These three entries are added together in the account, and amount to £15,525.

"On the 4th March 1874 the defenders sent to Hannay and Sons an account (No. 116/29 of process) containing the sums alleged to be due for the 1000 tons and the 808 tons 17 cwts. of iron delivered under the contract of 28th August, amounting to £7461, 10s. 1d.

"Now, with regard to these two accounts it is important that Hannay and Sons did not admit, as then maintained by the defenders, that 300 tons of the iron sold on 6th February had not been delivered, or that they had received the whole of the above-mentioned 808 tons 17 cwt. of iron. And it is proved that the defenders, who had then got delivery-orders for the whole of the iron sold on 6th February, have received the whole aforesaid 300 tons thereof, with the exception of 51 tons, although it does not appear from the proof when these 249 tons were delivered. It is also admitted in the record by the defenders

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.

Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

The defenders, Armstrong Brothers and Company, reclaimed.

Argued for them;—(1) The evidence shewed that on 11th March 1874 there had been a crossing of accounts between Mr Moir and Mr Picken, that of the said 808 tons 17 cwt. of iron there have never been delivered to Hannay and Sons 32 tons 13 cwt., the price of which amounts to £134, 13s. 7d.

"When the cashier and book-keeper of the parties met on 11th March the cashier of Hannay and Sons received from the book-keeper of the defenders their cheque for £863, 9s. 11d., which the defenders' book-keeper had taken to the meeting with a view to such a settlement as is now maintained by them. But instead of the two accounts No. 115/30 and No. 116/29 of process being fitted and settled on that footing, the entry which was made by Hannay and Sons' cashier on 11th March on the first of these documents, in acknowledgment of the cheque for £863, 9s. 11d., is entirely inconsistent with any such fitting or settlement.

"That entry is as follows:—'Mar. 11. By cheque to ac/t, £863, 9s. 11d.;' and that sum is deducted by Hannay and Sons' cashier from the sum of £15,525, and there is brought out, and entered on the account by him as still due, the 'balance, £14,661, 10s. 1d.' The account, with that entry, and with that balance brought out, was then taken away and retained by the defenders' book-keeper as their voucher. On the following day (12th March) the defenders' book-keeper delivered to Hannay and Sons' cashier bills drawn by Hannay and Sons on and accepted by Thomas Vaughan and Company for £4700 to account of the 1500 tons of iron sold to Vaughan and Company on 4th February, and first entered in the account No. 115/30 of process. And he again produced that account, and got Hannay and Sons' cashier to make the following entries thereon, under date 12th March, in reduction of the foresaid balance of £14,661 10 1

'Bills from Vaughan, . .	4,700	0	0
	£9,961	10	1
'Contra ac/t comn., . .	75	0	0
	£9,886	10	1'

"The defenders' book-keeper then took away with him that account with these entries thereon, and he has since retained it as the defenders' voucher. There were no entries made on that account by which any deduction was made of £1162, 10s. on account of the 300 tons of the contract of 6th February said to be short delivered. And there were no entries made on that account, or on the defenders' account No. 116/29 of process, by which the price of the 1000 tons and 808 tons 17 cwt. of the iron sold under the August contract by Vaughan and Company to Hannay and Sons were settled or placed against the account No. 115/30 of process.

"Such a settlement of accounts as is contended for by the defenders is quite customary in the iron trade on the settling day, when the parties are agreed as to the sums due. But the Lord Ordinary considers that such a settlement cannot be held to have taken place when it is denied by Hannay and Sons' cashier, and when the voucher taken does not make any mention of the alleged deduction of the £1162, 10s. on account of the 300 tons said to be short delivered, or of the alleged set off of the contra account of £7461, 10s. 1d., and where the entries made on that voucher, so far from shewing a settlement, bring out, after delivery of the cheque of £863, 9s. 11d., a balance as due by the defenders to Hannay and Sons of £14,661, 10s. 1d. on 11th March; and after delivery of the bills for £4700, a balance of £9961, 10s. 1d. on 12th March; and, after crediting the £75 due for commission, a balance of £9886, 10s. 1d., also on that date. . . .

"2. In regard to the defenders' claim to set off the seven bills of Hannay and Sons for £13,057, 10s. 4d., against the sums now sued for, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that such compensation cannot take effect, because the sums con-

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

acting and authorised to act for Hannay and Sons and the defenders respectively. It was true the defenders' account of £7461, 10s. 1d. was for sums properly due to Thomas Vaughan and Company, but they were due tained in these bills are not the property of the defenders, but of Thomas Vaughan and Company.

"The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that there were two separate and distinct contracts entered into under date 26th June 1872; the one being entered into on that date by the firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company on their own account, for the sale to Hannay and Sons of 6000 tons of iron, and the other being entered into shortly after that date for the purchase on their own account, by Armstrong, Müller, and Company, from Thomas Vaughan and Company, of 6000 tons of the same kind of iron. No doubt Armstrong, Müller, and Company were then the agents in Glasgow of Thomas Vaughan and Company, but it is established by the proof that in selling the 6000 tons of iron to Hannay and Sons, Armstrong, Müller, and Company acted on their own account, and not as agents for Vaughan and Company. Although this is the case it was stipulated in the contract between Armstrong, Müller, and Company and Vaughan and Company that payment was to be made either in cash 'or by Messrs Hannay and Sons' acceptance.' When payment fell to be made under this contract Armstrong, Müller, and Company required Vaughan and Company to draw direct upon Messrs Hannay and Sons. This Vaughan and Company refused to do, and required Armstrong, Müller, and Company to become drawers of the bills upon Hannay and Sons. This dispute was ultimately settled by Vaughan and Company granting the following letter to Armstrong, Müller, and Company, on 23d October 1873:—'In consideration of your having to-day agreed to draw upon Messrs Hannay and Sons for all pig-iron delivered and to be delivered under our contract of June 26/72 with you, and hand such drafts over to us when accepted, we hereby agree to indemnify you from any loss in respect of such drafts handed over to us or discounted by you.' On the faith of this letter Armstrong, Müller, and Company drew the seven bills now founded on by the defenders upon Hannay and Sons, and paid Vaughan and Company in cash the price of the 6000 tons of iron. After the dissolution of Armstrong, Müller, and Company these bills were endorsed by that firm to the defenders, as liquidators of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, who discounted them, and applied £5000 of the proceeds in payment of that amount due to Mr Müller, under the contract of dissolution of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, and retained the balance. Before the seven bills became due Hannay and Sons were sequestrated; and these bills were, when due, retired from the bank by the defenders, who received from Vaughan and Company £4207, 10s. on 3d April, and £4207, 10s. on 3d June 1874, to enable them to do so. It is proved that Vaughan and Company admit that they must pay the defenders any balance of these bills which may remain unsatisfied after deduction of the said two sums of £4207, 10s., and of any dividend recovered from Hannay and Sons' sequestrated estate. In short, Vaughan and Company admit that they are the parties truly interested in these bills, and in the plea of compensation now insisted in by the defenders.

"Such being the case, the Lord Ordinary considers that the defenders have no interest, in respect of which they now plead compensation, and that they plead compensation in the interest and for the benefit, not of themselves, but of Vaughan and Company. The letter of indemnity of Vaughan and Company was granted in respect of their obligation to take, in terms of their contract with Armstrong, Müller, and Company, of 26th June, Hannay and Sons' acceptances in payment of the prices of iron delivered under that contract to Armstrong, Müller, and Company—that is, to draw upon Hannay and Sons for these prices. Armstrong, Müller, and Company maintained that they were bound to do so; and they must have admitted that this was the true construction of the contract, because the consideration for granting the indemnity is as set forth in the letter,—that Armstrong, Müller, and Company have 'to-day agreed to draw upon under a contract whereby payment was to be nett cash and not by bill, and under such a contract it was the custom of the market to make payment to the seller's broker.* It was therefore natural that the parties should cross accounts on the settling day, and such was their understanding at the time. It was only afterwards and on their bankruptcy that Messrs Hannay and Sons and their trustee found it convenient to repudiate the settlement and fall back upon Messrs Vaughan and Company with a view of enlarging their assets.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

(2) Armstrong, Müller, and Company were the drawers of certain bills upon Messrs Hannay and Sons. They endorsed them to the defenders for value. The defenders discounted them with the bank, and they were in the hands of the bank at the date of Hannay and Sons' sequestration. The defenders were obliged to retire them at maturity, and were now entitled to plead compensation upon them. The contention of the pursuer that no one could plead compensation in bankruptcy on a bill who was not either the holder at the date of the sequestration or the person ultimately liable, i.e., the drawer, was not sound. Scotch law acknowledged concourse in bankruptcy of future or contingent debts. The English case of Hale,[1] founded on, went too far. Besides, it rested upon the statute of 5 Geo. II. c. 30, which was afterwards amended.[2] Neither was it true that the defenders were really only the hands of Armstrong, Müller, and Company in recovering the sums in the bills, and therefore not entitled to set off these sums against their own private debt. No doubt the defenders were only indorsees and not drawers of the bills, but they had made advances against them, they had assumed the whole responsibility for them. They could not recover against Armstrong, Müller, and Company, the drawers, in the event of their being unsuccessful in this defence. They were stating this plea of compensation on their own behalf, and it should therefore be sustained.

Argued for the pursuer;—1. Inasmuch as the account which the defenders contended was on 11th March 1874 crossed with Hannay and Sons' account consisted of sums not due to the defenders themselves directly, but only as brokers for Thomas Vaughan and Company, there could be no compensation by law, but only by special agreement. Such agreement could only be proved by writ. Now, the writ produced and Messrs Hannay and Sons' for all iron delivered by Vaughan and Company to Armstrong, Müller, and Company under their June contract.

---

"Further, the defenders acted in endorsing and discounting these bills as the liquidators of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, and for behoof of that firm. They were therefore merely the agents or mandatories of that firm in the liquidation. And in that capacity they paid Mr Müller £5000 of the proceeds of the bills, and retained the balance. Armstrong, Müller, and Company, for whom they acted, are bound to relieve them, and have a good claim under the letter of indemnity against Vaughan and Company, for whom Armstrong, Müller, and Company acted on the faith of that letter in drawing the bills."

* J. S. Moir's evidence—"When a purchase of iron is made through an iron broker it is the practice to make payments for it through the broker. When a sale is made, the money, if it is a cash payment, is received through the broker in the same way. If the settlement is by bill the practice varies. The broker might draw for the iron on the purchaser, and endorse the bill to the seller. If the purchaser was disclosed it would be left to his discretion; it might be done one way or the other,—by the seller drawing on the buyer, or the seller's broker drawing on the buyer and endorsing the bill."

[1] 3 Vesey jun., 304.

[2] 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, sec. 50; Bell's Com. 5th ed. ii. 129-30; Collins v. Jones, 1830, 10 Barn. and Cres. 777.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

founded on as proving a settlement, viz., the account No. 115/30 of process, by its very terms contradicted the idea of a settlement. The pencil markings on it could not be looked at, for they were not Hannay and Sons' writ. Even if they could be looked at as explanatory of the account itself, they proved nothing except that the defenders' cashier proposed a settlement on the 11th March, while what was subsequently entered on that day and on the 12th, without objection from the defenders, shewed conclusively that no settlement was agreed to.

2. On the plea of compensation.—(1) An intermediate indorsee who was not the holder at the date of sequestration could not plead compensation on a bill on retiring it after sequestration. Compensation could only be pleaded on debts mutually due at the date when the question arose. The date of sequestration was the date at which the rights of parties were fixed. In the present case, at the date of sequestration there was no concourse except between Hannay and Sons and the bank, who then were holders of the bills. No subsequent acquisition of the bills could give a right to plead compensation.[1] (2) There was indeed a limitation to the common law rule of compensation introduced by the law of balancing accounts in bankruptcy in favour of the parties to a bill. But this only covered the parties ultimately liable. Professor Bell's doctrine went no further than that.[2] The acceptor being bankrupt the concourse of ultimate liability was between the bankrupt and the drawer. The law allowed the latter to make an equitable set off, but no one else. The defenders were not in this position, and therefore could not plead compensation. (3) In the present case the bills were really taken up by the defenders as the hands of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, and therefore, in no view of the law could they set them against their own private debt. (4) Besides, the real interest in these bills was not either in the defenders or in Armstrong, Müller, and Company, but in Thomas Vaughan and Company. It was solely in their interest that the plea was stated, and it was therefore clearly untenable. Had the letter of indemnity of 23d October 1873 stood alone this might not have been the case. But if the original contracts of 26th June 1872 were referred to it would be seen in what position Vaughan and Company really stood. The fact truly was that Vaughan and Company were originally bound to draw on Hannay and Sons, though to avoid dispute the defenders afterwards consented to draw and discount the bills for Vaughan's behoof on receiving the letter of indemnification. The bills were therefore, in a question like the present, to be considered as truly Vaughan and Company's bills, though their names did not appear upon them.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case the defences stated for Messrs Armstrong Brothers and Company raise some important questions.

The first point decided by the Lord Ordinary is how far, on 11th March 1874, there was a settlement of accounts between the parties in which a debt due by Hannay and Sons to Armstrong Brothers was deducted from that due by the latter to the former, and the balance paid by cheque. I do not mean to go into the circumstances connected with this alleged settlement, because I have come to a clear opinion in concurrence with the Lord Ordinary.

I have no doubt that both Mr Moir and Mr Picken, as representing the firms of Hannay and Sons and Armstrong Brothers, were in a position to make such settlement as is alleged. Neither have I any doubt that on 11th March [1] Hale, 3 Vesey jun. 304.

[2] Com. 5th ed. ii. 130.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

1874 both these gentlemen believed that they had crossed accounts and set off the sum of £7461, 10s. 1d. due by the one firm, pro tanto against the larger debt due by the other. All questions as to the position occupied by Armstrong Brothers in relation to these iron contracts, and as to the character of their agency for Vaughan and Company and its bearing upon their power to agree to such a settlement, or as to whether the receipt of the cheque was to account or as settlement of a balance, are afterthoughts, and have no bearing on what was done at the time.

The true account of the transaction is given in Mr Moir's evidence:—"Q.) Did you intimate to Messrs Armstrong that you had deleted the entry in your book with reference to the £7461? (A.) No. (Q.) When you deleted the entry was your opinion different in regard to the nature of the transaction of 11th March from what it was when you made it? (A.) Yes, my opinion was altered. (Q.) What was the change in your opinion? (A.) On referring to the contract I found that it was a direct contract with Vaughan and not with Armstrong Brothers, who were simply agents in the transaction, and that we could in this particular case look upon the debt as due to them instead of to Armstrong Brothers. It suited our convenience better to look at it in that light at that particular time. (Q.) Did you know that Armstrong's idea of that transaction with reference to the contra account on 11th March was the same as yours on 11th March? (A.) I think our opinions were both the same at that date. . . ." So that, in point of fact, there was not at the meeting on 11th March 1874 any dispute as to whether or not the £7461 should be deducted. Any dispute was as to the sum which remained over after that deduction was made. I concur, therefore, with reluctance, in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, because I think it is giving effect to a most valuable principle of our law in circumstances where it unfortunately leads to an inequitable result. But as the law requires written evidence of such an agreement, and as the only document founded on does not amount to such evidence, Armstrong Brothers and Company must fail.

The debt claimed must therefore be held to be still due, but the debtors have raised a plea of compensation on certain bills of which they are holders and endorsers, and in which the bankrupts stand as acceptors. The questions raised under this plea are important, and it is necessary to keep the precise facts in mind. These bills were granted as the price of iron furnished by the drawers, Armstrong, Müller, and Company, to the bankrupts under a contract dated 26th June 1872. The partners of the firm of Armstrong, Müller, and Company were W. J. Armstrong and C. E. Müller, W. J. Armstrong being also a partner of Armstrong Brothers and Company. Armstrong, Müller, and Company dissolved partnership in December 1873, and by the terms of the agreement of dissolution all current contracts were taken over by W. J. Armstrong for his own behoof, he undertaking to pay £5000 to his partner as in part of his share of capital, and to account for any further right he might have. The bills in question were either current at or were drawn and accepted after the dissolution of the copartnery, and in the course of winding up W. J. Armstrong used his new firm of Armstrong Brothers and Company practically for the purpose of obtaining advances for current purposes. And with that view he endorsed to Armstrong Brothers and Company the bills in question, who discounted them on their own credit with the Clydesdale Bank and advanced the proceeds to W. J. Armstrong. The bills were at four months, but before they fell due Hannay and Sons became bankrupt on the 28th of March 1874. The bills were retired at maturity by the last endorsers, Armstrong Brothers, who now plead compensation upon them.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

There is no doubt that on the face of these documents Armstrong Brothers are the creditors. They are the holders, with the legal presumption that they became so for value. Unless, therefore, the acceptors and the trustee on their sequestrated estate can overcome that presumption they are good documents of debt. But several legal propositions have been maintained in defence against this plea.

Before considering the question of compensation I propose to inquire into the effect of these propositions as defences against an action or charge on the bills.

The legal propositions which are maintained against the plea of compensation, as I gather them not from the record but from the argument at the bar, seem to be these:—

1. That Armstrong, Müller, and Company held a guarantee or obligation of indemnity from Vaughan and Company to keep them free of loss on these bills, and that therefore the plea is truly stated in the interest of the latter.

2. That the defenders were not holders of the bills at the date of the sequestration, that they were then in the hands of the bank, and that the defenders were only prior endorsers, to whom the plea of compensation is not competent.

3. That the defenders gave no value for the bills, but were only the agents or hands of Armstrong, Müller, and Company in liquidation.

On these grounds it is maintained that compensation is not pleadable by them in respect of these bills against their company debt due to the acceptors' estate.

In considering these pleas it must be kept in mind that Armstrong Brothers are, ex facie of the documents, holders of and creditors in the bills, and that the law presumes onerosity unless the contrary be proved by the writ or oath of the holder; and secondly, that these pleas are raised on the part of the primary debtor in the bills, who does not dispute that he received value for his obligations.

In regard to the first plea, founded on the letter of indemnity, I am of opinion that it is entirely irrelevant. The bankrupts' obligation was undertaken to Armstrong, Müller, and Company, not to Vaughan, and that is the obligation he is asked to fulfil. It is nothing to him that others with whom he has no contract have given collateral and subsidiary obligations, to take effect solely in the event of his not fulfilling his engagements. The loss which Vaughan undertakes to indemnify could not possibly occur unless Armstrong, Müller, and Company were creditors of Hannay.

It is said, however, that the real interest in these contracts was in Vaughan, and that Armstrong, Müller, and Company were only his agents. But this is also irrelevant, as pleaded against Armstrong Brothers, the endorsees of these bills. It is enough that the obligations were granted to Armstrong, Müller, and Company in their own name, and the debtor, having so granted them, must fulfil them in their terms. If they are in the hands of a third party for value, no such allegation is of any avail against him.

But I am further of opinion that the plea would have been quite inefficacious, even if the question had arisen with the drawers themselves. The contracts are here, and they are solely in the names of Armstrong, Müller, and Company. They dealt in their own name. They were liable to fulfil the contracts, and they were entitled to demand the price. Whether they were agents or not they did not deal as such, and they could have set off these obligations against any debt due by themselves to Hannay. This is well settled. But further, it seems quite clear that Vaughan had no contract with and incurred no liability to Hannay. His contract was with Armstrong, Müller, and Company solely, and he was quite entitled, if he chose, to deal on that footing.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

2. But it is said, secondly, that at the date of the sequestration the Clydesdale Bank was the holder of these bills, and that the defenders, who were only the last endorsees, are not entitled in that character to plead compensation. It was argued that this right was competent only to the actual holder or to the primary creditor, meaning, I presume, the original creditor. But the argument proceeds on misapprehension of the legal principles applicable to this subject, which, although for some time in dispute, are now fully recognised. They will be found well summarised and the authorities quoted in the last edition of Mr Thomson's work on Bills of Exchange at p. 570, &c. The rule is this: There can be no double ranking for the same debt, nor can a prior endorser plead compensation when his endorsee is in possession of the document of debt. But in respect of his contingent right of relief against the holder's demand, he is entitled to retain what he owes to the debtor in the bill until he is relieved of that demand. "The holder of such a security," says Mr Thomson,[1] "if he has endorsed it to a third party, seems entitled to retain any debts due by him to the other party till he is relieved from his liability," and he would in like manner, apart from retention, be entitled to rank and have a dividend set aside to meet his contingent claim. But we have no case of double ranking here. It is the ordinary case where the holder of a bill who has discounted it retires it from the bank on the acceptor's failure to pay. The debt is precisely the same in the person of the endorsee as it was before the bill was discounted. He remains the acceptor's direct creditor, and is entitled not to retain but to set off the debt he owes against the obligation which he holds.

It is pleaded, in the third place, that the defenders gave no value for this bill, and were only the hands or agents of Armstrong, Müller, and Company in liquidation. This again is irrelevant. It is no concern of the primary debtor in this bill on what terms the holder acquired it. It is enough that he has the right to receive and the power to discharge the debt, and the acceptor has not the right, nor has he any interest to inquire farther, seeing that he got full value for his obligation. It is, however, quite obvious from the facts of this case that the plea of want of value is without any foundation. Armstrong Brothers discounted these bills on their own credit, and advanced the proceeds to their own partner for behoof of the drawer. The former became directly liable to the bank, and whatever claims or liabilities in account they may have with the drawers the transaction was clearly onerous. They acted, in truth, as the bankers of the liquidator of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, and furnished him with funds in the first instance to carry out the agreement between the partners.

Neither is it relevant to allege that on the failure of the acceptor other parties subsidiarily liable have aided in retiring these bills. A payment to account from a co-obligant after the date of the sequestration, it has been decided, does not deprive the holder of his right to rank on the estate of the bankrupt acceptor for his full debt. I could understand the plea, and give some weight to it, if it were alleged that the endorsation was a device to enable Armstrong Brothers to evade payment of this debt. It could not be so, seeing it took place long before the bankruptcy. But the allegation here truly amounts to no more than asserting that, by subsequent transactions, the holder had come to be the debtor of the prior endorser, an assertion of no value or significance whatever in the mouth of the primary debtor as against this liquid document of debt.

[1] Ed. 1865, p. 583.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

I am, therefore, of opinion that this plea of compensation is well founded.

Lord Neaves.—In this action at the instance of Hannay and Sons' trustee against Armstrong Brothers for the price due on certain iron contracts, two main pleas in defence have been stated,—the one that the debt sued for had been set off, while Hannay and Sons were still solvent, against a counter claim of the defenders against them, the parties having met and fitted accounts bringing out a balance due to Hannay and Sons, which was paid by cheque.

The second defence was that at the time when the debt now sued for became due by the defenders to Hannay and Sons, and anterior to the bankruptcy of the latter, Hannay and Sons were the acceptors and debtors in certain bills now held by Armstrong Brothers, and that that fact founded a plea of compensation or retention on their part.

On the first of these questions it is unnecessary for me to pronounce a definite opinion, because, whichever way it were decided, I am prepared to assoilzie the defenders on their second plea. I may say, however, that I see no good reason for differing from the views of the Lord Ordinary. Whatever may have been the intention of the parties, and certainly the evidence of Moir on the one side and Picken on the other is anything but satisfactory, there is no doubt that a payment of £863 having been made by cheque by Picken on account of Armstrong Brothers to Moir on behalf of Hannay and Sons, yet no proper docquet of adjustment was appended to the account, nor any other document taken to extinguish the larger sum alleged to have been settled by set off. On the face of the account produced matters remained as they were with regard to this larger sum, and the result in that view would be that, whatever was the intention of the parties as to that matter, it was not carried out.

On the other hand, I do not agree with the Lord Ordinary on the second point, and there I am prepared to reverse his judgment and decide in favour of the defenders. I think we have here a sufficient set off to afford a good answer to the claim of Hannay and Sons. No doubt the claim of Hannay and Sons against Armstrong Brothers is for the price of iron supplied on contract. To that claim Armstrong Brothers say, Here are your bills held by us as endorsees, endorsed by us indeed to the bank, but now on your bankruptcy retired and held by us,—here is your proper debt met by us, which we are entitled to compensate by our debt to you.

I think, technically speaking, this is more properly retention than compensation. But I see no objection to the soundness of the plea stated for Armstrong Brothers, unless it can be said either that they have no real interest in these bills, as holding them merely as the hand of another, or that they obtained them after the bankruptcy for the purpose of putting themselves artificially in a position in which they could plead compensation or retention on them. But neither of these things is proved against the defenders. The bills are in Armstrong Brothers' hands by the natural sequence of events which was in progress before the bankruptcy, and the course of which was merely altered by the fact of the bankruptcy. Had Hannay and Sons remained solvent the defenders would never have had to relieve the bank. But they were under a contingent liability to do so in the event of Hannay and Sons' failure to pay. And that contingent liability has become an actual one, and has been met by them by payment. It cannot be doubted that in common justice the party who is subsidiarily and contingently liable for the true debtor in a bill is entitled to retain any funds of that debtor that may come into his hands, because his obligation may be enforced on the bankruptcy of the true debtor. I cannot say I see any difficulty in this. The operation of the principle of retention in the case of bills of exchange is familiar to our law. The person who is an endorser is a kind of cautioner, and if he is in bankruptcy liable and certain to be distressed he cannot be prevented from working out his own relief by retention, if he is fortunate enough to be debtor to the bankrupt in a similar sum. Accordingly, Mr Bell, both in his Commentaries and Principles, carries out this doctrine most clearly. He distinguishes most properly retention from compensation. Thus, he says (Prin. sec. 1410), "Compensation is payment and extinction of mutual debts; whereas retention of a debt is nothing more than an implied security for performance, a power of suspension or right to withhold payment or performance till satisfied of some counter demand. Compensation, therefore, can be pleaded only where the debt in extinction of which it is meant to be applied is due and liquid; whereas retention may be pleaded in security of debts, future, contingent, or illiquid." The same doctrine will be found laid down by Erskine (iii. 4, 11). I cannot therefore see any answer to this plea of the defenders, and I am of opinion that on this point the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

With regard to the objection that Armstrong Brothers were only the liquidators of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, I think it necessary to add this merely, that whatever may have been their apparent outward relation to Armstrong, Müller, and Company, they were personally concerned in the winding up of that concern. They gave value for their assets and undertook their liabilities. They were, therefore, onerous holders of these bills, so far as Armstrong, Müller, and Company were concerned, and are entitled to indemnify themselves in the way proposed.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. Two questions have been raised and submitted to the Court for decision in this case. The first is, whether or not a settlement of accounts such as that founded on by the defenders took place on the 11th of March 1874; and the second is, whether, at any rate, the pursuer's claim in this action has not been more than met and extinguished by counter claims or debts due to them by Hannay and Sons.

In regard to the first of these questions, I think the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that there is no evidence sufficient to shew that there was any such settlement of accounts on the 11th March 1874 as that relied on by the defenders. The account (No. 115/30 of pro.), which the defenders say is the fitted account on which the settlement was made, in place of shewing the result contended for by them, instructs that a large balance, —much larger than the claim now sued for,—was, on the 11th of March resting owing by the defenders to Hannay and Sons. Nor do I see that there is any reliable evidence, or, indeed, any competent evidence at all, to entitle the Court to alter and transpose the figures in the account referred to, so as to shew the result contended for by the defenders, as on the 11th or 12th of March 1874. It is unnecessary for me, however, to enter into detail in support of this view, seeing that, independently altogether of it, I am of opinion, with your Lordships,

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

that a determination of the second question is sufficient of itself to entitle the defenders to absolvitor.

The second question raises undoubtedly considerations of great importance and of some nicety in the law of compensation or set off in bankruptcy. In the present case it relates to the seven bills referred to in articles 12 and 13 of the defenders' statement of facts. All these bills bear to be drawn by Armstrong, Müller, and Company upon and accepted by the bankrupts, Hannay and Sons, and if they had remained in that state till the bankruptcy the present defenders could not have had any ground for their plea of compensation or set off in respect of them. But the fact is undoubted and has not been disputed that the defenders had, previous to the bankruptcy or known insolvency of Hannay and Sons, acquired right to the bills by endorsation from Armstrong, Müller, and Company. When, therefore, after the bankruptcy, the pursuer, as trustee on Hannay and Sons' sequestrated estates, insisted against the defenders for payment, as he does in the present action, of the debt owing by them to that bankrupt firm, they answer and defend themselves on the ground that the debt sued for is more than met and extinguished on the principle of compensation or set off by the seven bills referred to. The question thus arises for the determination of the Court whether, in the circumstances which here occur, that is a good and available defence to the defenders. The pursuer maintains that it is not, on various grounds:—

(1) He has maintained, first, that although the defenders are apparently the holders of the seven bills, they, in truth and reality, hold them not in their own right, but for and in the right of Vaughan and Company, and this appears to be the pursuer's sole plea on the subject for which any foundation is laid in the record. In regard to the pursuer's plea as so maintained, I have no difficulty or hesitation in disregarding it. Vaughan and Company are not parties to the bills at all. Armstrong, Müller, and Company are the drawers, and Hannay and Sons are the acceptors of them. No doubt Vaughan and Company, although not parties to the bills, undertook by letter No. 115/43 of process to indemnify Armstrong, Müller, and Company for any loss they might sustain in respect of them. But I am not aware, and can neither find authority or see any good reason in equity for holding that the circumstance of a party having a cautioner or collateral security for his debt is destructive of his right of compensation or set off, supposing it to be otherwise well founded. I did not, indeed, understand that any such contention was ultimately maintained by the pursuer, although it seems to be the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in deciding this branch of the case in his favour.

(2) It was, however, strenuously urged, in the second place, for the pursuer, that although his plea to the effect that the defenders were in right of Vaughan and Company is to be taken as ill founded, still it could not be held that they are vested in the bills for and in their own right, but merely for and in the right of Armstrong, Müller, and Company, who had and have the sole and exclusive interest in them. But this view,—irrespective of the circumstance that it is not only not in accordance but inconsistent with the case of the pursuer as presented by him in the record,—cannot, I think, be sustained. The defenders are, in point of fact, the holders of all the bills in question, and are therefore alone in titulo to insist in payment of them, and they alone can deliver them up on payment of their contents. Nor do I see that any competent evidence has been produced or referred to for the purpose of shewing that the defenders are not onerous and bona fide holders of the bills. They must, therefore, according to the facts as they have been presented to the Court, be held to be the true creditors on the bills, and, if so, it follows that they are entitled in respect of them to the benefit of the plea of compensation or set off in answer to the demand now made for the debt due by them to Hannay and Sons.

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

(3) But it was further maintained, in the third place, on the part of the pursuer, that in point of law no such plea was available to the defenders, in respect the bills were not due at the date of the bankruptcy, and in place of being at that date actually held by the defenders they were held by the bank at which they had been discounted. But it neither was nor could be denied that it was the defenders who, as endorsees and holders of the bills, had endorsed them to and discounted them with the bank before the bankruptcy, and so had, beyond all question, become liable for their contents to the bank. Nor was it disputed that the defenders when the bills fell due, after the date of the bankruptcy, retired them, as they were bound to do, and so had again become the holders of them, and were the holders of them when the pursuer's claim was made. And it is clear,—at least the contrary is neither shewn nor alleged,—that all this took place in good faith and in ordinary course of business. Why, therefore, should the defenders' plea of compensation or set off not be available to them as against the pursuer, the trustee of Hannay and Sons, the primary and proper debtors in the bills, merely because they had not actually been retired and in the hands of the defenders till after the bankruptcy? No precedent or other authority was cited by the pursuer in support of his contention, and it was acknowledged by him that he was aware of none. On the other hand, the defenders, besides Mr Thomson, have the high authority of Mr Bell, who, while he states (2 Bell's Com., 5th ed. p. 128) the ordinary rule that "in compensation the debts must both be due at the same time," goes on to explain that, on the principle of the balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, "if one of the parties become bankrupt the other may defend himself against a present demand by setting off a debt that is future or contingent, although the term of payment be after the bankruptcy." Mr Bell (pp. 129 and 130) enforces the equity of this doctrine, which, indeed, is obvious, by various illustrations. And I must own for myself that to allow the pursuer in the present case to insist for payment of the debt he sues for, irrespective of the bills held by the defenders, would be tantamount, as it appears to me, to allowing Hannay and Sons' creditors to be paid with the defenders' money, while they, the defenders, are only to receive a dividend on the large debt due to themselves.

I am, therefore, for the reasons now stated, of opinion that the defenders are entitled to set off against the pursuer's claim of debt the counter debt due to themselves by Hannay and Sons, the consequence of which will be to entitle the defenders to have the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary recalled and absolvitor pronounced in their favour.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur. And although the case is somewhat intricate I have come at last, without much difficulty, to be of opinion that upon the second branch of the case the defenders are entitled to prevail.

There is now no dispute as to the amount of the debt sued for as due to the sequestrated estate of Hannay and Sons. If all defences fail, then a sum of £9562 is due by the defenders to Hannay and Sons' trustee. The defence, however, is twofold. Firstly, Armstrong Brothers and Company say that part of their debt to Hannay and Sons was settled on 11th March 1874, a sum of £7536,

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

10s. 1d. due by Hannay and Sons to them having been deducted from their debt to Hannay and Sons and the balance paid by cheque. On the question raised by this defence I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary. The settlement is not proved in the only way in which it competently could be proved. The debts so crossed were not due in the same character, and therefore compensation did not take place ipso facto. An agreement to set off, or rather an actual settlement and discharge, was necessary, and that agreement can now only be proved by writing. So far from there being a written settlement, or any written evidence of settlement produced, the only document founded on proves clearly that there was no settlement. The parties may have intended one, but if so, what they intended they did not carry out, because they did not reduce it to a writing which imported a settlement and was legal evidence thereof. On the first question, therefore, I agree entirely with the Lord Ordinary that the defence has failed.

But, secondly, the defenders raise another defence much more formidable. Hannay and Sons' trustee sues for the amount due for iron delivered on certain contracts. In defence the defenders produce certain bills of which they are endorsers which are now in their hands, and in which Hannay and Sons are acceptors, and they plead that against the debt due by them to Hannay they are entitled to set off in bankruptcy the bills accepted by Hannay, and of which the defenders are onerous holders. They say the amount in these bills in which Hannay and Sons are liable to them exceeds their debt to Hannay and Sons, and therefore the debt sued for is extinguished.

Now, suppose, in the first place, that the defence had been stated without any question of bankruptcy arising: It was conceded, I think, that there could have been no answer to it. There would not even have been room to inquire how Armstrong Brothers got the bills. It would have been no objection that they had got them gratuitously, provided Hannay and Sons were debtors for value. Apparently, therefore, if there had been no sequestration, and assuming that there had been no question as to proper concursus debiti et crediti, Armstrong Brothers, on getting right to the bills, would have been entitled to plead on them as they now do.

Let us see, then, whether bankruptcy makes any difference. When Hannay and Sons became bankrupt the bills were in the hands of the Clydesdale Bank, being still current. Now, compensation, in the strict sense of the term, can only be sustained between debts simultaneously liquid. But when Hannay and Sons became bankrupt certain rights instantly arose to every person interested in the bills. Hannay and Sons' acceptances were discounted in the ordinary course of business with the bank, therefore the bank had recourse against all the previous endorsers up to the drawer. That would not have prevented the bank pleading compensation had they been debtors to Hannay and Sons in any obligation,—for instance, had they owed Hannay and Sons a balance on current account. But at the same moment there arose a right to every one of the endorsers in the sequence of liability to the bank. Each was entitled to pay the bank and take up the bills. Armstrong Brothers were the last endorsers. They were entitled to pay the bank and retire the bills and operate their own relief in any way that was open to them. They do so by pleading retention in bankruptcy. It is no answer to that plea that at the date of the bankruptcy their claim against Hannay and Sons was not liquid, or not mature, for their plea was not compensation strictly so called, but retention in bankruptcy, that is, retention until the final

No. 78.

Feb. 2, 1875.
Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co.

liabilities and rights of parties shall be ascertained, and until the bills current shall be paid and taken up. But now that the bills have been taken up by Messrs Armstrong and the currency of the bills has expired there is nothing to prevent a final settlement, and it is not now mere retention, but set off, compensation, or settlement in bankruptcy, which is to determine the balance due to or by the defenders.

I am of opinion that in these circumstances Messrs Armstrong, the holders of these bills, are entitled to set them off against their debt to the bankrupts. It is equally incompetent after bankruptcy, as it would be before it, to inquire whether there are prior indorsers liable to Armstrong Brothers or not. In short, I think the law may be stated with correctness as broadly as this: that compensation or retention to the effect of ultimate compensation may be pleaded after bankruptcy in the same way as before it, provided the debt pleaded on has not been acquired after bankruptcy for the purpose of producing compensation. The defenders do not come under this exception. Their contingent liability on the bills was incurred before the bankruptcy, and their again becoming the holders was a direct consequence thereof, and not a mere device for producing compensation. On Hannay and Sons' bankruptcy, and the bills becoming due, they might have been at once compelled to pay to the bank, and therefore were entitled to retain while the bills were current and not met by the acceptors, and on paying the bank and getting up the bills to compensate their own debt to the bankrupts so far as the amount of the bills went.

Upon this simple ground, therefore, that we have here a concurrence of debtor and creditor, I think we are entitled to sustain the defenders' plea of compensation, seeing that there is nothing to put them in mala fide or to shew that they acquired the debt for the purpose of founding the plea.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find the defenders entitled to expenses, subject to modification to the extent of one-half of the expense of the proof, including the printing thereof, and remit," &c.

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

ALEXANDER ROBB, Pursuer.—Scott—A. J. Young.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF LOGIEALMOND, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Keir.

School—Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62) sec. 60—Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107) sec. 19.—The Parochial and Burgh Schools Act, 1861, sec. 19, provides that when it shall be found that "the schoolmaster of any parish is disqualified because of infirmity or old age for the due performance of the duties of his office, or that from negligence or inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties, it shall be lawful to the heritors and minister . . . . to permit or require such schoolmaster to resign his said office, ... and in every case of such resignation the heritors and minister may grant to such schoolmaster a retiring allowance . . . . provided that where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance."

The Education Act, 1872, sec. 60, empowers school boards to remove teachers if they are "incompetent, unfit, or inefficient," and provides that teachers, appointed previous to the passing of the Act, who may be so removed, shall have the same rights to retiring allowances as were vested in parish schoolmasters by the Act of 1861.

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

Held that, assuming that a teacher could only have claimed a retiring allowance under the Act of 1861, if removed in consequence of old age or infirmity, inasmuch as these were the only causes for which he could be removed without fault, he might, under the Act of 1872, be removed for other causes without fault, and might therefore be entitled to a retiring allowance although not removed for old age or infirmity.

1st Division. Lord Young. B.

THIS was an action by Alexander Robb, formerly teacher of the side school of Logiealmond, against the school board of the parish of Logiealmond, claiming a retiring allowance.

Mr Robb had been teacher of the school since 1858.

In July 1873 the school board intimated to the pursuer that, in pursuance of the powers conferred on them by section 60 of the Education Act, 1872,* a special report regarding the school, and the pursuer as teacher, had been required from Her Majesty's inspector for the district.†

---

* 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 67, sec. 60.—"Any teacher of a public school appointed prior to this Act may be removed from his office in manner following, that is to say, . . . (2) If the school board of any parish or burgh shall consider that any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector charged with the duty of inspecting such school; and on receiving such report the school board may, if they see cause, remove such teacher from office, provided that before proceeding to give judgment on the matter they shall furnish to the teacher a copy of such report, and that a judgment removing the teacher shall not have effect until confirmed by the Board of Education: Provided also that in the case of teachers of parish schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act who may be so removed, school boards shall have the same powers of granting retiring allowances, and the teachers shall have the same rights to retiring allowances, as were vested in heritors and ministers and in parish schoolmasters respectively by secs. 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861, in the case of parish schoolmasters permitted or required to resign, or dismissed or removed from office, as therein provided."

† The inspector reported,—"There are no pupils in attendance; only 6 have been enrolled during the school year, 3 in December and 3 in January, and no scholar since March. According to lists of names on loose copy leaves, kept mostly in pencil—the only school registers for the last seven years—the number enrolled in 1871-1872, was 9; in 1870-1871, 9; in 1869-1870, 27; in 1868-1869, 14; in 1867-1868, 25; in 1866-1867, 32. In these loose leaves no record of attendance has been kept; but so far as the fact can be ascertained from jottings of fees the attendance has always been small compared with the number on the roll. According to last census there are in the district 8[illegible] children receiving instruction; with the exception of 10 or 12 in outlying parts they go to school either at Heriotfield, about a mile west of Logiealmond school or to Millhaugh, about a mile east of it. The former school is kept in premises much inferior to those of Logiealmond, and has had nine teachers within the last eight years. It has at times had as many as 90 scholars, while Mr Robb had none; and on 4th August, when I looked in, it had 33 present. The support of it has, according to the statement of the U.P. minister, been always felt to be a heavy burden upon the managers, and it would have been discontinued long before this but for the state of the side parish school. The other school at Millhaugh is an adventure school kept in a room in a cottage unsuited for the purpose, by a mistress who has had no special training. It was in vacation at the time of my visit; but had had during the year an attendance reaching a maximum of 23.

"Mr Robb's explanation that the absence of pupils from his school is due to party feeling, clerical squabbles, and sectarian differences in the district is to a certain extent corroborated by the fact that of 34 names adhibited to a petition against him (of which I send a copy herewith) presented to the school board on

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

On 26th August 1873 the clerk of the school board wrote to the pursuer as follows:—"The school board for the parish of Logiealmond, at their meeting held yesterday, directed me to intimate to you that, in consequence of Mr Walker's, H. M. inspector's report, they have now resolved to remove you from the office of teacher." The resolution of the school board was confirmed by the Board of Education. The pursuer applied for a retiring allowance, but the school board refused the application.

The pursuer then brought this action. He averred that after receiving the inspector's report, the defenders, "without inquiring whether culpa existed on the part of the pursuer," removed him from his office. (Cond. 5) "The report so returned does not set forth any fault on the part of the pursuer, and his removal by the school board from his office of teacher of the said side school was not occasioned by any fault on his part, but was due to other causes, for which he was not responsible."

He contended that his removal not having been occasioned by his own fault he was entitled to a retiring allowance under sec. 60 of the Education Act, 1872,* taken in connection with sec. 19 of the previous Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Act, 1861, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 107.†

The grounds of defence were (1) That the statements were not relevant. (2) That the pursuer was not a parochial schoolmaster, and therefore not entitled to a retiring allowance. (3) That the pursuer having been removed from his position as teacher in respect of inefficiency, caused by his fault, the defenders were not, in the circumstances, liable in a retiring allowance.

On 18th November 1874 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.‡

---

the day of my visit, only two are those of adherents to the Church of Scotland, to which Mr Robb belongs.

"However this may be, the state of the school gives evidence that it has not been efficiently conducted, and that Mr Alexander Robb, however he might succeed elsewhere, is unfit for the post of schoolmaster of Logiealmond."

* Supra, p. 418.

† Sec. 19.—"In case it shall be found, on a report by one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, made on the application of the heritors of the parish, and concurred in by the presbytery of the bounds, that the schoolmaster of any parish is disqualified because of infirmity or old age, for the due performance of the duties of his office, or that from negligence or inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties, it shall be lawful to the heritors and minister, at any meeting called and held as aforesaid, to permit or require such schoolmaster to resign his said office, and in case of his refusal to do so, to dismiss or suspend such schoolmaster, and, when necessary, to declare the school vacant; and in every case of such resignation the heritors and minister may grant to such schoolmaster a retiring allowance, payable during the remainder of his life; provided that, where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two-third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to said office at the date of said resignation thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary, which retiring allowance shall be payable in all respects in like manner with the salary of the schoolmaster . . .

‡ OPINION.—"The validity of the removal of the pursuer from his office under clause 60 (2) of the Education Act, 1872, is not questioned, and must be assumed. The questions in the case are—1st, Whether he was teacher of a parish school within the meaning of the Act? and 2d, whether the cause of his removal was such that he might, under section 19 of the Schoolmasters Act, 1861, have been required to resign or been dismissed therefor, 'as therein provided;' but with right to a retiring allowance by the provisions of that Act, applicable to resignation or dismissal for such cause.

"On the first question my opinion is with the pursuer, and I should accord-

No. 79. The pursuer reclaimed.

Feb. 5, 1875. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer is the schoolmaster of the parish school of Logiealmond. He was removed from his office by the School Board in August ingly be prepared to repel the 2d, 3d, and 4th pleas for the defenders, were it possible thereby to reach a result favourable to the pursuer. It is unnecessary to express the grounds of this opinion, because the pursuer has no case unless the second question also shall be answered in his favour, and upon this question my opinion is against him, for the reasons which I proceed to explain.

"The provisions of section 60 (2) of the Act of 1872, with respect to the grounds on which a teacher may be removed, are in marked contrast to those of section 19 of the Act of 1861. In the former, the grounds are that the teacher is 'incompetent, unfit, or inefficient,' no matter from what cause. In the latter the grounds are—1st, that the teacher 'is disqualified because of infirmity or old age for the due performance of the duties of his office;' and 2d, 'that from negligence or inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties.' The former statute (1872) permits the removal of a teacher who is in fact incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, taking no account (so far as concerns the removal) of the cause of the incompetency or inefficiency. The latter (1861), on the contrary, takes such account of the cause that removal is thereby permitted only with reference to the cause, which must be either disqualification 'because of infirmity or old age,' or failure in duty 'from negligence or inattention.' The law, as it stood on the Act of 1861, was defective (at least the Legislature of 1872 thought so), inasmuch as it made no provision for the removal of an incompetent, unfit, or inefficient schoolmaster, unless his incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency was attributable to the natural disqualification of 'infirmity or old age,' or to 'negligence or inattention.' Hence the more comprehensive provision of the Act 1872.

"But the latter Act, while providing absolutely, as the interests of the community seemed to require, for the removal of incompetent, unfit, or inefficient teachers, preserved the rights to retiring allowances conferred by the Act of 1861 upon teachers removed 'as therein provided,' and it is to these accordingly that the pursuer appeals in support of his demand. The question is whether they apply to his case. Now, although the provision (sec. 19 of Act 1861) is, in the passage principally relied on, expressed in general terms thus,—'that when such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance,'—the expression 'any fault,' must, I think, be read and construed with reference to the premises, or preceding part of the clause, which specifies the cases in which alone resignation can be required or permitted under the Act. These are, as I have observed, exactly these two, viz., 1st, disqualification, 'because of infirmity or old age;' and, 2d, failure in duty 'from negligence or inattention.' I must therefore limit and confine the words 'shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster' to cases of disqualification because of infirmity (not occasioned by the man's own fault) or old age, for in no other case is removal or forced resignation without fault on the teacher's part permitted by the Act.

"Now, it is not pretended that the pursuer was removed by the school board because of infirmity, or old age, or unfitness, or inefficiency thence arising, and his counsel declined to put an averment to this effect on record. The only averment on the subject is (Art. 5) that his removal was not occasioned by any fault on his part, but was due to other causes for which he was not responsible. But, in my opinion, such generality of averment cannot be taken as sufficient to support a case laid upon the provisions of the Act of 1861 as imported into the Act of 1872. For this purpose it is, I think, clearly necessary to aver a cause of removal which might have led to removal or resignation under the Act of 1861, and removal for which, 'as therein provided,' would have entitled the teacher to a pension by the provisions of that Act.

"It was not intended to give pensions to teachers who should be removed under the Act of 1872 for any cause which would not have warranted removal

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

1873, under the 60th section of the Education Act, 1872, his removal proceeding, as required by the Act, on a report of one of her Majesty's inspectors, to the effect that he is unfit for the post of schoolmaster of Logiealmond.

He now brings this action, claiming a retiring allowance as a matter of right. The grounds of defence are that he is not entitled to a retiring allowance,—1, Because he is not within the class to whom it is provided by statute; 2, Because he was removed in respect of inefficiency caused by his own fault. The first defence the Lord Ordinary has repelled. The second he has not disposed of. But he has decided against the pursuer on a particular construction of the 60th under the older law, but only to teachers removed for a cause which would have warranted removal or resignation with a pension under the Act of 1861; and this is, in my opinion, clear on the language of the Act. Thus (to put a conceivable case) such singular natural stupidity or inaptitude for teaching that the school was totally deserted for years, on account of the incompetency of the teacher, was no case for removal prior to the Act of 1872, certainly not under section 19 of the Act 1861. The law with respect to such a clamant case was amended by the Act 1872, but without giving right to a pension, unless indeed it can be held to be given by reference to section 19 of the Act 1861, which does not contemplate or provide for such case at all. It is true that all cases to which section 19 of the Act 1861 was formerly applicable now pass under section 60 (2) of the Act 1872, with the rights of pension, as therein provided, preserved. But these rights are not extended to cases to which the statutory provisions on which they stand were inapplicable. In short, the result, as I read the provisions of the Act of 1872, is, that a teacher appointed prior to the Act, who is subsequently removed for incompetency, &c., arising from disqualification because of infirmity (without fault) or old age, is entitled to a retiring allowance exactly as if he had been removed under section 19 of the said Act 1861, 'as therein provided,' but that such right does not attach to any other case of removal under section 60 of the later Act, there being no other possible case of removal, without fault, under the former. I ought perhaps to notice, though it is apparent on the face of the Act, that section 55, which reserves the rights of teachers in office prior to the passing of the Act (1872), does so subject to the provisions of section 60 regarding their removal from office.

---

"I may observe, in conclusion, that were I able to adopt the view on which the pursuer relies—viz., that a teacher removed for incompetency not occasioned by his own fault, but 'due to other causes for which he was not (I presume morally) responsible,' is entitled to a pension—I should still think that the case here presented is defective in substance. Not one child has been attracted to the school for a very considerable period of time, although there are plenty of children of school age in the district for which it exists. The school board have signified their opinion that the pursuer's removal, confirmed by the Board of Education, is due to his own fault. He rests his action on a simple averment of the negative, without condescending on any tangible fact capable of being sent to proof, to account for the deplorable state of matters, which the proper authorities have by deliberate statutory judgment attributed to his incompetency and unfitness. The validity and propriety of the removal must be assumed, and also, prima facie, the refusal of a pension. The pursuer, who by action appeals to this Court to correct the judgment and resolution of the proper public authority in the matter, is in my opinion required, as a condition of having his case entertained, to state distinctly, and in such form as to admit of investigation (if thought relevant), to what his incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency (which led to the total desertion of his school) was attributable. But he only says that it was due to 'causes for which he was not responsible,' pointing, as was explained, to unpopularity arising from ecclesiastical jealousies and discord. I do not think such a case can be entertained.

"I have said nothing about expenses, meaning to give none in the circumstances of the case."

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

section of the Act of 1872, taken in connection with the 19th section of the previous Act of 1861, according to which he holds that no schoolmaster can claim a retiring allowance as matter of right, unless his inefficiency is caused by infirmity or old age. This ground of defence is not stated in any of the pleas, and before we could sustain it, it would be necessary that it should be put upon record. But that is not necessary under existing circumstances.

The question is important and of extensive application, and in order that my view of it may be fully understood I shall mention what the history of the legislation on the subject has been.

Under the Act of 1803 no schoolmaster could be removed except by sentence of the presbytery of the bounds, proceeding on a libel charging him with neglect of duty, or immoral conduct, or cruelty. By the Act of 1861 the jurisdiction of the presbytery was abolished, and the trial of schoolmasters for immorality or cruelty was transferred to the Sheriff, and in place of a libel for neglect of duty before the presbytery there was substituted the procedure under section 19—(supra, p. 419). Now, there are two grounds on which procedure may be taken under this section,—first, old age and infirmity; secondly, inefficiency by reason of negligence or inattention, which appears to be just another term for "neglect of duty" under the older statute; and the heritors are bound to grant a retiring allowance where the resignation has not been occasioned by any fault.

Now, it may well be, as the Lord Ordinary holds, that the absolute right to a retiring allowance under this section is confined to cases of disqualification by old age or infirmity, because that is the only case mentioned in the clause where the removal can be without fault, the other case, inefficiency by negligence or inattention, being one in which there always must be fault. It is not necessary to determine whether that is so or not. Possibly there may be some kind of inattention which does not infer fault, and yet does not come up to infirmity. But I am willing to assume with the Lord Ordinary that section 19 provides for two cases only, old age and infirmity, and inefficiency inferring fault, and therefore that while the heritors were always entitled to give a retiring allowance, the schoolmaster could demand one only in the former case.

But now we come to section 60 of the Act of 1872—(supra, p. 418). The Lord Ordinary's construction of this clause is, that no one can demand of right a retiring allowance who has not been removed on account of old age or infirmity, because these are the only cases under the Act of 1861 which give the right, and he holds that the right is not by the new enactment extended to any cases not within the letter of the previous Act.

My Lords, I cannot help thinking that his Lordship has forgotten that he was construing a remedial statute. A remedial statute is not to be strictly construed, and I think this is one of the strictest constructions that I ever saw applied to an Act of Parliament. A remedial statute ought to receive a benign and favourable construction, and is often applied ad consimiles casus. But it is not necessary to rely on that principle in order to arrive at an opposite conclusion from the Lord Ordinary, for the natural meaning of the words is, in my opinion, entirely against his reading. The clause extends the category of causes for which a schoolmaster may be removed. Under the previous Act nothing justified removal except old age and infirmity, or inefficiency by reason of negligence and inattention. But here the school board is empowered, on the report of an inspector, to dismiss a teacher as incompetent, unfit, or inefficient. These words appear all to mean substantially the same thing. Now, there may unquestion ably be cases in which a teacher is, in the judgment of the school board, unfit for his post, when his unfitness arises neither from old age or infirmity, nor from fault of his own. The qualifications required by the statute are such that a schoolmaster may not be able to meet them, though he may have been fit for the post when he was appointed many years ago. He may even have improved during his tenure of office, and yet not be up to the mark of the present day. Here there would be no fault, but the reverse, and yet the Lord Ordinary holds that such a teacher would not be entitled to a retiring allowance.

No. 79.
Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

Such a construction appears to me contrary to the clear meaning of the statute The application of the one statute to the other is this. The principle that a retiring allowance is to be granted as a matter of right where there has been no fault is contained in the older statute. That principle is imported into the new Act, and applied in terms to all the cases under it. The teacher may be dismissed if inefficient, whether from his own fault or not. If there is a fault he is entitled to no retiring allowance. If there is no fault he is entitled to one. The causes of and liability to removal being extended by the new enactment, it is plain that the right to a retiring allowance must be extended in a corresponding ratio.

But the Lord Ordinary proceeds farther to say that, even if his construction of the statute be wrong, the pursuer has not presented a relevant case. This is a more difficult point. I am not prepared to differ from the Lord Ordinary, but I think it will be fair to allow the pursuer an opportunity of amending his statement. The inspector has reported that the schoolmaster is unfit for his post. His report does not state what the causes of that unfitness are. But the schoolmaster's right to a retiring allowance depends on what these causes are, and till we know what they are I do not see how we can dispose of the case. The pursuer gives us no information beyond stating in vague terms that his dismissal was due to causes other than personal fault on his part. I am unwilling to say more as to how far there is a presumption against the pursuer till we know whether he desires to amend his record.

Lord Deas.—I entirely agree with your Lordship as to the construction of the statute. There are just two classes of cases,—one where the schoolmaster has been dismissed for fault, in which case he has no right to a retiring allowance; the other, where he has been removed for causes which cannot be attributed to fault, in which case the statute gives him a legal right to a retiring allowance.

The only difficulty I have about the present case arises from this: I do not see that it is clear, on the face of the proceedings, that the school board dismissed the pursuer for fault. They do not say that they did. It appears to me that when the school board intend that a teacher should not have a retiring allowance they ought to frame their deliverance so as to shew that he was dismissed for fault. At all events, when a schoolmaster asserts his right to a retiring allowance the school board ought to pronounce a distinct deliverance, affirming fault if they disallow his claim. But I do not find any such deliverance in these proceedings. There is, indeed, an allegation of fault in the record. But I cannot take that as equivalent to a deliverance by the school board, pronounced in their official character and on their official responsibility.

The only objection that I have to calling on the schoolmaster to amend his record is, that it seems to proceed on the footing that it lies on him to shew that he was not removed for fault. Now, I am not disposed to hold that in such a case, more than any other, it is incumbent on a man to prove his innocence. I would rather have been disposed to remit to the school board to explain the grounds on which they dismissed the pursuer. If the explanation was satisfactory, with or without further investigation, I should have been disposed to give all due weight to the deliverance of the board. But I cannot hold that the burden of proof, in the first instance, lies on the pursuer, and if that be implied in the suggestion of an amendment I could not concur in the course proposed.

No. 79. Feb. 5, 1875. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The pursuer, Mr Robb, was appointed schoolmaster in 1858 of the parochial school of Logiealmond. Some years ago the pupils attending his school were numerous, and he states that besides teaching the school—I presume satisfactorily—he discharged the duties of inspector of poor, registrar, and session-clerk. In August 1873 Mr Robb was removed from the office of parochial teacher in consequence of a report by the inspector of schools, dated 7th August 1873, in which the inspector states that there were no pupils in attendance, that only six had been enrolled during the year, and not one between March and August, and yet that in one school, a mile to the west, there were thirty-three pupils on the day of inspection, and there had been frequently a much larger number; and that in another school, a mile to the east, there had been during the year twenty-five pupils, though taught by a mistress only. The inspector concludes the report by stating that the school has "not been efficiently conducted, and that Mr Alexander Robb, however he might do elsewhere, is unfit for the post of schoolmaster at Logiealmond." Accordingly Mr Robb was removed by the school board. His removal was confirmed by the Board of Education in Edinburgh on 24th September 1873, and intimated to him, and on 31st October 1873 the school board intimated to him that they declined giving him any annuity. So standing the facts, Mr Robb has brought an action concluding for decree, ordaining the school board to pay him a retiring allowance of not less than two-thirds of his salary.

It is important to observe that no question is here raised in regard to the propriety, the legality, or the finality of the removal of the pursuer from the office of schoolmaster. He stands removed,—regularly removed,—and, as we must assume, rightly removed. The question is, being thus removed, is he entitled, as the case stands, and without inquiry, for he is not demanding inquiry, to enforce a retiring allowance? The pursuer, accepting his removal as lawful and effectual, demands the retiring allowance as matter of right, and without further inquiry. The school board, who removed him, and whose act of removing was approved by the Board of Education, had the power, on removing him, to give a retiring allowance if they thought fit. They, knowing all the facts and circumstances of the case, have declined to do so. This action is raised concluding for judicial decree, ordaining them to give the allowance. The pursuer craves decree on the case as it now stands.

But for the provision at the close of the 60th section of the Education Act of 1872 it is plain that the pursuer, being rightly removed, could not have any statutory claim to a retiring allowance. Of this there is, in my opinion, no doubt. The claim rests, and has in argument been urged, entirely on the provision in clause 60 of the Act of 1872, to the effect that "the teachers shall have the same rights to retiring allowances as were vested in parish schoolmasters by sections 19 and 20 of the Schoolmasters Act of 1861, in the case of parish

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

schoolmasters permitted or required to resign, or dismissed or removed from office as therein provided." In order to ascertain the nature and measure of the right reserved by this 60th section of the Act of 1872, and now claimed by the pursuer, we must go back to the 19th and 20th sections of the Act of 1861.

I have carefully considered the construction and application of these sections of the Act of 1861 in order to see whether they support this claim of the pursuer; and in the construction of the Act of 1861, an Act repealed by the Act of 1872, except in so far as the 19th and 20th sections are introduced by the provision in section 60, I have arrived at the same conclusion as Lord Young, and on that part of the case I have really very little to add to the explanations given in his Lordship's note. By the 19th section of that Act of 1861 the heritors and minister, whose powers are now transferred to the school board, are empowered to "permit or require" a schoolmaster to resign when "disqualified because of infirmity or old age," or when failing efficiently to discharge his duties "from negligence or inattention." In every case of such resignation the heritors and minister have power to grant a retiring allowance; and where the resignation, permitted or required, and therefore including removal, has not been occasioned "by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster," they were bound to grant a retiring allowance. Reading this Act of 1861, and construing it as it stands alone, I concur with Lord Young in opinion that in the case of removal for inefficiency caused by "negligence or inattention," and not caused by "infirmity or old age," the teacher being lawfully removed, could not have enforced a retiring allowance under that statute. The grounds of removal under the 19th section of that Act are inefficiency from negligence or inattention, implying, as I think, fault, or disqualification because of infirmity or old age, not implying fault. As I read the 19th section of this statute of 1861 the teacher could not be removed without some degree of fault unless he was removed as disqualified because of infirmity or old age.

The statute of 1872 did, however, extend the power of removal and multiply the causes or grounds of removal, so as to bring within the scope and reach of that power a number of cases where removal could not have been enforced under the Act of 1861, and perhaps among these cases there may be some where there is no fault on the part of the teacher.

The school board—popularly elected, and viewed as representing to a large extent the parentage of the district—have now power to remove a teacher in respect of ascertained actual incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency, from whatever cause that may have proceeded. It is quite possible to conceive cases where such inefficiency, though not arising from infirmity or old age, may not have arisen from actual fault on the part of the teacher. Such cases are no doubt exceptional. But there may be such. For that inefficiency without fault the teacher could not have been removed under the Act of 1861. It is only because of the extended scope and reach of the power of removal under the Act of 1872 that it takes effect in a case beyond the scope and reach of the Act of 1861. Now, it does appear to me that one of the objects of the Act was to secure efficiency without doing injustice, and that the protection given to the teacher against removal without fault under the limited scope of the Act of 1861 must in fairness be held to be extended under the Act of 1872, so as to be commensurate with the more extended and comprehensive scope of that Act.

Therefore, while I agree with Lord Young in his construction of the 19th section of the Act of 1861, I am disposed to think that the teacher's right to retiring allowance must be read with reference to the nature and measure of the power of removal, and that when, by the Act of 1872, other grounds of removal are introduced, not implying fault on the part of the teacher, then the teacher's right to retiring allowance cannot justly be left under the limitation created with reference to the limited power of removal. Justice demands, in my opinion, that the teacher's right to retiring allowance shall, under the new Act, as it was under the former Act, be commensurate with the power to remove without fault on his part. On this point I concur with your Lordship in the chair. If in this case it did appear that the teacher's inefficiency and unfitness was not occasioned by any fault on his part, but was explained on grounds not implying fault, that would be an exceptional case, and, in that case, I think that he would have a good claim to a retiring allowance, even though his inefficiency did not arise from "infirmity or old age."

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

But, while I am of this opinion, I have been compelled, in the actual circumstances of this case, so far as ascertained, to arrive at a conclusion unfavourable to the pursuer's claim.

I have no doubt that the pursuer was rightly removed. His continuance in the office of teacher, under the circumstances, would have been an abuse. He was pronounced inefficient and unfit by the inspector. He had no work and no pupils. That he is infirm or old is not alleged. He has failed as a teacher. The school is vacant. He has no pupils, though there are plenty of children requiring education. He has had experience and practice in teaching and in other departments, and want of mental capability is not suggested. No cause whatever to explain the entire failure of the school has been stated by him on record, and he has not alleged or offered to instruct any facts tending to explain a result so unfavourable to him. The inspector has reported him inefficient and unfit, and has reported the failure of the school, and the pursuer, who has been removed on that ground, has not suggested any reason in respect of which the fact can be explained apart from his own fault. Nothing like an exceptional case has been alleged. It is said that the inspector has not alleged fault. But it was not the province of the inspector to charge him with fault. The report of the inspector raises, in my opinion, a presumption that the failure of the school, and the unfitness and inefficiency of the teacher, has been occasioned by some fault on his part. Notwithstanding the report,—accepting it as accurate,—and not disputing the lawfulness of his removal, and not craving any inquiry, the pursuer demands his retiring allowance, founding only on the inspector's report, and on the absence from that report of reference to any fault. I think he is not entitled to do so. In the position in which he stands in relation to this report, and to the deliverance by the school board, confirmed by the Board of Education, I think that the pursuer must be considered as in petitorio bound to allege and instruct some explanation of the facts reported by the inspector, an explanation consistent with the absence of fault on his part. In the present state of the case, as presented to us by the pursuer, and on which, as it stands, the pursuer has called on us to pronounce judgment, I am of opinion that he is not entitled to the retiring allowance which he demands.

I do not say what might be the effect of distinct and relevant averment by the pursuer of special and exceptional facts tending to explain the failure of the school and his own unfitness on grounds inferring no fault of his. We have no such averments at present. Lord Gifford in the Whitburn case[1] appears to have

[1] Not reported, but see Morison v. School Board of Glenshiel, May 28, 1875; ante

No. 79.

Feb. 5, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

been of opinion that an inquiry by proof in this Court might be permitted if relevant averment were made and proof demanded. I am not disposed to differ from his Lordship's view. In such a case there should be some remedy. But in the meantime no such averments have been made, no proof has been craved by the pursuer, and no inquiry into his conduct and character has been demanded by him.

LORD MURE.—On the construction of this statute I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships. I am ready to assume that under the Act of 1861 a schoolmaster could only claim a retiring allowance, as matter of right, if his removal was occasioned by infirmity or old age, and not by fault on his part. But then, by the Act of 1872, greater powers were given to school boards relative to the removal of teachers for causes other than old age or infirmity, and not necessarily attributable to actual fault or neglect on the part of the schoolmasters; and when these additional powers were given, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature would make provision for some retiring allowance to teachers so removed. Now, this has, in my opinion, been done by the 60th section of the Act of 1872, by which the right of teachers, appointed prior to the date of the Act, to retiring allowances has, I think, been made co-extensive with and correlative to the additional powers of removal conferred on boards for causes other than fault on the part of the teachers.

The other question raised as to relevancy and onus is one of considerable nicety, and it is with some hesitation that I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. I agree with Lord Deas that the report of the inspector does not specify actual fault. We can only therefore gather from it by implication that there may have been fault. It does, however, bear that the pursuer was not incapacitated by any apparent physical defect; and after referring to certain statements which appear to have been made by the pursuer in explanation of the bad attendance at his school, for which the master ought not to be held responsible, the report proceeds:—"However this may be, the state of the school gives evidence that it has not been efficiently conducted, and that Mr Alexander Robb, however he might succeed elsewhere, is unfit for the post of schoolmaster of Logiealmond." Now, "unfitness" is one of the additional grounds of removal specified in the Act of 1872, and the school board, by adopting the report, seem to say that they removed the pursuer on that ground. Upon that being done the pursuer seems to have written to the Board of Education, and made some observations on the report. What these explanations were we are not informed, but after receiving them that board confirmed the school board's decision.

In this state of matters I agree with Lord Ardmillan that the pursuer may be considered to have been removed for some inefficiency or unfitness, and when he in such circumstances comes here in petitorio, he ought, I think, to have set forth something more specific on record than that he was removed for no fault, in order to found a relevant claim for a retiring allowance under the statute. I therefore concur in the course which your Lordship has suggested.

THE pursuer was allowed to amend his record.[1]

G. BEGG, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

[1] See sequel of case, infra, under date May 21, 1875.

No. 80.

Feb. 6, 1875.
Clark v. Henderson.

ANDREW CLARK, Pursuer.—Campbell Smith.
JAMES HENDERSON, Defender.—Thorburn.

Husband and Wife—Expenses—Agent.—A law-agent raised an action against a husband for his wife's expenses in an action of separation and aliment, in which the pursuer had been employed by her, stating that, before any inquiry into the facts, the parties had been reconciled, and decree of absolvitor pronounced, and that a motion by him for his expenses had, at the same time, been refused, on the ground that his claim could not properly be investigated except in a separate action. Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division, rev. judgment of Lord Young), that the action was competent, and a proof allowed.

Observed (per cur.) that the agent's claim for his expenses in such cases may be competently made, either in the original process or in a separate action, but that the Court will in general not entertain it in the original process if the case is settled before there has been any investigation into the facts.

Observations on Smith v. Smith, Feb. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 538.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THIS was an action by Andrew Clark, S.S.C., against James Henderson, stevedore, Leith, for payment of an account of £42 incurred to the pursuer by the defender's wife, for whom he acted as agent in an action of separation and aliment against her husband. The pursuer averred that in that action, after defences had been lodged, and about a month after the action had been raised, the parties were reconciled. (Cond. 5.) "The pursuer, at the calling of the cause, upon the motion of the defender for absolvitor, moved for decree for his expenses, which was opposed by the defender, and not granted by the Lord Ordinary (Gifford), in respect that the pursuer's claim could not be properly investigated except in a separate action. The defender having since refused payment, the present action has therefore become necessary."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having performed the business charged for in the account founded on, upon the employment of the defender's wife, he is entitled to decree therefor. (2) The defender is liable to the pursuer for said account incurred upon the employment of his wife, in respect that the action raised on her behalf was well founded on its merits, or at all events was an action which the pursuer had every reason to believe to be well founded in fact and law.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, in the circumstances averred by the pursuer, the action is not maintainable: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses."*

* "NOTE.—It is well settled, and was not disputed by the defender, that, in conjugal actions, as, indeed, in all actions, the Court before whom they depend has very ample jurisdiction in the matter of expenses, and may, and habitually does, exercise it in favour of the agents-disbursers, as well as the parties themselves. It may also be stated, as a general rule, that a wife pursuing an action of divorce or separation against her husband, or defending such an action at his instance, is entitled by herself or her agent to have decree against him for the expenses properly incurred by her, even when unsuccessful. There are exceptions to the rule, and whether a case falls under the rule or an exception is judged of and determined by the Court in the case itself.

"In the present case the pursuer, having been employed by the defender's wife to raise an action of separation and aliment against him, which was dismissed at an early stage without expenses in the circumstances stated in the record, sues the defender for his account of expenses, either as being his own proper debt, or that of his wife, for which, as her husband, he is liable.

"The pursuer cited no authority for such an action, and relied on the principle

No. 80.

Feb. 6, 1875.
Clark v. Henderson.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—In the original action the Lord Ordinary, in refusing the agent's motion for his expenses, had proceeded on the footing that it was decided by the case of Smith[1] that the claim was incompetent in the original process, and must therefore be made in a separate action. But the Lord Ordinary in the present case held that a separate action was incompetent, so that the pursuer was deprived of any remedy.

The defender argued;—The wife was not entitled, as matter of right, to her expenses in an action against her husband, and the short time that elapsed before the action was settled shewed that it had been precipitately raised.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action by a practitioner in this Court for recovery of an account of expenses incurred to him by the defender's wife, by whom he was employed as agent in an action of separation and aliment against her husband, the defender. The action was not prosecuted to a conclusion. When the record was in a position to be adjusted, and it became the duty of the pursuer's agent to have it printed and to send the process to the Lord Ordinary, he received intimation that the husband and wife were reconciled, and that the action was to be stopped. The defender then moved for absolvitor, and decree of absolvitor was pronounced. At that stage the present pursuer moved for decree for his expenses. But the Lord Ordinary did not think fit to entertain his claim, being of opinion, in consequence of a judgment of the Second Division, that the proper form of making his demand was by a separate action. He has accordingly raised this action, but he is met by the objection that that is not a competent mode of enforcing his claim, so that he finds himself in this of liability involved in the practice of the Court, to which I have referred in dealing with the matter of expenses in conjugal actions, undertaking to establish by evidence that he had reasonable grounds for accepting of the wife's employment to take proceedings against her husband.

---

"I am of opinion that the action is not maintainable.

"1st, It may be assumed, although it is not necessary to decide, that the claim is good against the wife, and that it may be enforced against any separate estate, which she has, or may come to have. But it does not follow that the husband is liable, and, having regard to the nature of the debt, I think he is not. 2d, It may be that the pursuer might have made his claim good against the defender by invoking the jurisdiction of the Court on the matter of expenses in the action of separation itself; but this is a peculiar jurisdiction, and is exercised in each case according to the Court's opinion of its merits, and the just claims of parties when the case itself is before the Court. 3d, The consideration which the pursuer urged,—that if the husband be not subject to such a claim as this an ill-used wife may have to go without a remedy from inability to find an agent willing to incur the risk of taking up her case, is worthy of attention, but is, in my opinion, greatly overbalanced by considerations on the other side. As I have already noticed, the wife's agent may always appeal to the Court in the action which he raises for her. But to allow him to make an independent claim by action at his own instance would involve an investigation, at his instance and for his purposes, into family differences after the spouses had, as in the present case, made them up and resumed their cohabitation,—a course which is, in my opinion, to be deprecated as inimical to family peace. 4th, I do not think it is desirable, on general considerations, to encourage agents to take up such cases by declaring any other liability on the part of the husband than that which the Court may, as hitherto, give effect to and enforce according to their judgment, in the wife's own action against him."

[1] Smith v. Smith, Feb. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 538, 43 Scot. Jur. 265.

No. 80.

Feb. 6, 1875. Clark v. Henderson.

dilemma, that his claim was not competent in the original process, and is held to be equally incompetent in a second action.

I am not able to assent to so startling a proposition. There may be a question on the merits whether the account was reasonably and properly incurred. But if it was, these are services of a necessary kind rendered to a wife, and the claim for remuneration for these services became the debt of her husband. It is a civil debt, and I cannot see why it should not be recovered in an ordinary civil action.

In consequence of the reference to the judgment of the Second Division we have thought it right to consult with the Judges of that Division, and the judgment which we now pronounce will be understood to have the assent of all the Judges of the Inner-House.

The case of Smith is reported in a way rather calculated to mislead. The rubric sets out "An action of separation and aliment at the instance of a wife against her husband, having been stopped, before decree, by the reconciliation of the parties, held that the wife's agent was not entitled to be sisted as a party to the action for the purpose of enabling him to get a decree against the husband for expenses." The only opinion reported is that of Lord Benholme, which does not affirm the proposition in the rubric. But we are informed that the Court did intend to decide, and did express an opinion, that in the circumstances of that case, and at the stage which it had reached, it was not a proper course for the party to be sisted and to recover in the original action. There was very good reason for so holding. The case was very similar to the present. A reconciliation took place before the case had gone very far, and a motion was made similar to the motion made by the present pursuer. The Judges were all of opinion that it was not expedient,—they did not decide whether it was competent,—to dispose of the matter at that stage. Nothing had been done in the case beyond lodging defences. The Lord Ordinary knew nothing of the facts. There had been no investigation. Where there has been proof, and the Lord Ordinary is acquainted with the facts, it may be very expedient that he should dispose of the claim in the original action, because he has it in his power to see whether the action has been properly raised, and whether the charges are reasonable. But wherever there has been no such investigation, I think, with the Judges of the Second Division, that as a general rule it is not desirable that that course should be followed.

There is no question of competency, whether the claim is disposed of in the one action or the other. It is a question very much for the discretion of the Court in the original process whether the claim of the wife's agent should be disposed of there or separately. Lord Gifford exercised that discretion here. He granted immediate absolvitor, I think rightly. It was the absolute right of the husband to demand immediate absolvitor. It would not be expedient that decree should be delayed. It was accordingly pronounced immediately, and, once pronounced, the process would seem to have come to an end. No doubt in the ordinary case it is in the power of the Lord Ordinary, in pronouncing judgment on the merits, to reserve the question of expenses, but that is the expenses of the process between the parties. But the agent is not a party, and I should doubt the competency of granting absolvitor, and then sisting the agent as a party to an extinct process.

But I cannot hold with the Lord Ordinary that the necessary consequence is that the claim is extinct. There would be great injustice in such a result, and it rests on no ground of law that I can understand.

No. 80.

Feb. 6, 1875.
Clark v. Henderson.

I therefore think we must recall this interlocutor, and allow the pursuer a proof.

LORD DEAS.—There is no incompetency in an agent enforcing a husband's liability for expenses incurred in acting for the wife, either by decree in the process itself, or by a separate action, or what may be cheaper than an action, by proceeding under the Act of Sederunt of 6th February 1806. The question of mode is merely one of expediency. I think the Second Division exercised a sound discretion in the case of Smith, considering the short way the action had gone, in not sisting the agent; and that for two reasons, first, because this would have hung up the case, whereas it is expedient, when a quarrel between husband and wife is to be made up, that the reconciliation should forthwith take effect; and, secondly, because the Judge in that action could not have had any better knowledge of the grounds of the agent's claim against the husband than anybody else. Both these reasons apply here, equally as they did in the case of Smith, and I am therefore of opinion that the action should be sanctioned.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Sustain the competency of the action; and in respect of the minute now lodged for the defender, No. 11 of process, decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons for £24, 1s., being the taxed amount of the account sued for: Find the defender liable in the expenses of process, and remit," &c.

PARTY, and WALLACE & FOSTER, Agents.

No. 81.

Feb. 16, 1875.
Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

ROBERT ADDIE AND SONS, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Rutherfurd.

Income-Tax—5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100, rule 3, and sec. 159.—Held that in computing profits for assessment of income-tax a tenant of minerals is not entitled to make deductions from the gross receipts of sums necessary to replace capital expended in sinking pits, or lost by depreciation of buildings and machinery, in respect that the Act expressly provides that "in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from . . . such profits or gains on account of any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade."

Exchequer Cause.
1ST DIVISION.
B.

THIS was a case for the opinion of the Court presented under 37 Vict. cap. 16, sec. 9, by Messrs Robert Addie and Son, coal and iron masters, Langloan, who were dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioners under the Property and Income-Tax Acts for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire.

Messrs Addie had appealed to the commissioners "against the assessment made on them under schedule D of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. chapter 35, entituled, 'An Act for granting her Majesty duties on profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices,' and subsequent Income-Tax Acts referring thereto, in respect of the profits arising from their business for the year preceding, in so far as the said assessment includes two sums of £5525, 19s. 9d. and £4435, being a percentage which they claimed to deduct for pit sinking and for depreciation of buildings and machinery respectively, and for which they maintained they were not assessable."

No. 81.

Feb. 16, 1875.
Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

The appellants stated that they were tenants in several mineral fields on leases of thirty-one years, which were in various periods of currency. 1. Pits were sunk nearly every year and were only wrought for a short time, and the appellants were not recouped for the cost of them, except out of the gross annual returns. 2. When pits were wrought out the price obtainable for the machinery and buildings was only breaking-up value, and they were not recouped for the difference between that and the original cost except out of the gross annual returns.

The surveyor maintained that the deductions claimed were not allowed by the Act.*

The commissioners dismissed the appeal.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The appellants, Messrs Addie and Sons, have been assessed under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act in respect of profits arising from their business as ironmasters, and they say there ought to have been deducted from the amount of profits upon which they were so assessed two sums of £5525 and £4435, being a percentage for pit sinking and for depreciation of buildings and machinery, and this they maintain upon the ground that the sinking of new pits, although it be only an occasional thing, is still part of what may fairly be called the annual expenditure which they necessarily incur in realising the profits from their trade. I think there is only one point to be determined here, and not two as represented, because the machinery and buildings connected with a pit appear to me to be just part of the pit itself. It is one compound structure necessary for the working of the mine, and the question comes to be whether, under the special rules of the Income-Tax Act, they are entitled to deduct something on account of the amount expended in making a new pit. Now, I am quite clear that the making of a new pit in a trade of this kind is, in every sense of the term, just an expenditure of capital. It is an investment of money, of capital, and must be placed to capital account in any properly kept books applicable to such a concern. Now, if that be so, it seems to me that the provision of the third rule under the 1st head of section 100 of the Property-Tax Act is conclusive upon the question before us, because it is there provided that "in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or be allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade." It seems to me that it is quite unnecessary to go beyond that one part of the statute. No doubt some support may be had also from the 159th section, but I think this rule is in itself perfectly conclusive. As soon as you ascertain that this is an expenditure of additional capital, there is an end to any proposal to deduct anything in respect of it, and on that simple ground I think the judgment of the commissioners right. No. 81.

* 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100, rule 3, quoted in the Lord President's opinion. Sec. 159. . . . "In the computation of duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned . . . it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act, . . . nor to make any deduction from the profits or gains arising from any property herein described, or from any office or employment of profit, on account of diminution of capital employed or of loss sustained in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern."

Feb. 16, 1875. Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion, and I think it is better not to run the risk of making any confusion in the grounds of judgment by adding anything to what your Lordship has said.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the two sections, taken together, are quite conclusive.

LORD MURE.—I think the third rule of section 100 is quite conclusive on the point.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Affirm the judgment of the commissioners: Find the appellants, Messrs Robert Addie and Sons, liable in costs," &c.

GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—PARTY.—Agents.

P. AND P. CAMPBELL, Pursuers and Appellants.—Scott.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

No. 82.

Feb. 18, 1875. Campbells v. North British Railway Co.

Proof—Onus—Carriers Act (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68, secs. 1 and 8).—The first section of the Carriers Act provides that carriers are not to be responsible for the loss of certain descriptions of goods carried by them unless the senders declare the nature of the goods and pay an extra charge. The eighth section provides that nothing in the Act is to be held as protecting the carriers from liability for loss of goods through any felonious act of their servants.

In an action against a railway company for the value of goods of the description specified, stolen while in the custody of the company as carriers, held that it was not sufficient for the pursuers to prove that there was a greater probability of the theft having been committed by servants of the company than by strangers.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire. M.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff-court of Perthshire by Messrs P. and P. Campbell, dyers, Perth, against the North British Railway Company, concluding for payment of various sums as the value of goods sent by the pursuers from Perth to Leeds by the defenders' railway and stolen on the journey. The defenders admitted their liability for all the sums except a sum of £23, 15s. 6d., being the value of silk dresses contained in a box belonging to the pursuers, numbered 196, which was delivered to the defenders on 14th July 1873 for conveyance to Leeds. The defenders maintained that they were protected by section 1 of the Carriers Act, 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68,* and the pursuers, while admitting that the articles in the box fell under the description of that section, and that no extra charge was paid, maintained that the goods had been abstracted by the servants of the defenders, and that, under section 8 of the Act,† the railway company were responsible.

* "Sec. 1. . . No mail contractor . . or other common carrier by land for hire shall be liable for the loss of or injury to any article or articles or property of the description following, viz. . . silks in a manufactured or unmanufactured state . . when the value of such article or articles shall exceed the sum of ten pounds, unless at the time of the delivery thereof . . the value and nature of such article or articles or property shall have been declared by the person or persons sending or delivering the same, and such increased charge as hereinafter mentioned, or an engagement to pay the same, be accepted by the person receiving such parcel or package."

† "Sec. 8. . . Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to protect any mail

No. 82.

Feb. 18, 1875. Campbells v. North British Railway Co.

A proof was led, in which the following were the leading facts proved: —The box was duly despatched from Perth at 6·20 P.M. on the 14th of July, securely packed and roped, containing silk dresses. It arrived at Portobello at 11·30 P.M. and left next morning at 1·30 A.M. The waggon in which the box was carried arrived at Carlisle at 6·30 A.M. and left at 7.25 A.M. There was no further evidence as to stoppages, but the box was proved to have arrived at Leeds at 7 P.M. on the 15th July. It was then apparent that the box had been tampered with, as the lid was partly off the box, and the rope had been taken off and tied again in a different way. The box was delivered on the 16th, and it was found that silk dresses to the value of £23, 15s. 6d. were amissing.

The Sheriff-substitute (Barclay) pronounced an interlocutor which, after detailed findings in fact, "finds that under the common law, and the provision contained in the 8th section of the said cited statute, the defenders, as carriers, are liable in payment to the pursuers of the value of said stolen articles: Therefore . . . decerns in terms of the conclusions of the action: Finds the defenders liable in expenses: Allows an account," &c.*

The Sheriff (Adam) recalled this interlocutor, and found "that it is not proved that the loss of the said articles arose from the felonious acts of any servant in the employment of the defenders: Finds therefore in point of law that under and in virtue of the Act 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1, the defenders are not liable for the loss of the said articles, and assoilzies them from the third conclusion of the summons: . . Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses to the 18th of December 1873 inclusive: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses subsequent to that date: Allows accounts thereof to be lodged, and remits," &c.

The pursuers appealed, and argued that the proof disclosed a greater probability of the theft having been committed by the defenders' servants than any of the public, and that fulfilled the requirement of section 8 of the Carriers Act.[1] contractor, stage-coach proprietor, or common carrier for hire, for liability to answer for loss or injury to any goods or articles whatsoever arising from the felonious acts of any coachman . . or other servant in his or their employ."

---

* "The Sheriff-substitute is not of opinion that it is necessary to fix the theft on any individual servant, or even on any collective number. It is not necessary to require such proof as would convict of felony any servant. But it is sufficient to establish that the theft must have been the act of the company's servants —(See the recent case in English Exchequer, Vaughton v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 43 L. J. 75.) The Sheriff-substitute feels satisfied that in this case there is such proof. There is more than a prima facie case of the theft by the company's servants, which, at all events, shifted the onus on the defenders to fix the theft on some persons not their servants, which they have not attempted. Of course if it were the act of discharged servants no longer in the company's employment this would be the same as any of the outside public. The mode in which the boxes were packed, roped, and screwed, and the selection from amongst many articles of such as were most valuable, all indicate considerable length of time and cool deliberation to accomplish. This therefore excludes the hasty act of a stranger with the risk of instant discovery, and fixes the act on persons who had access to the box, and considerable time to complete their act of transfer. The detective officer, Blagg, swears that the great majority of cases (of theft) were traced to servants of the company (defr's. proof, p. 5), and he swears that he has had only ten cases of theft by discharged servants in ten years (p. 6). Anderson, inspector for the company, swears that he has within five or six years 'sometimes detected the railway servants as the offenders, who were either punished or discharged.'"

[1] Boyce v. Chapman and Brown, Nov. 5, 1835, 2 Bingham's New Cases, p.

No. 82.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Campbells v. North British Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The claim which has been disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff is for £23, 15s. 6d., being the value of certain silk dresses contained in a box belonging to the pursuers, which box is No. 196. The pursuers allege that they delivered this box to the defenders at Perth on 14th July 1873, and it cannot be disputed that when the box was delivered it contained the articles in question. When the box arrived in Leeds it had been tampered with. The rope had been taken off, and upon examination it was found that the articles in question had been taken out of the box. It is quite clear that there must have been a thief interfering with the box between the time it left Perth and the time it arrived at Leeds. The defenders found on section 1 of the Carriers Act, because silk dresses are within the category of articles which require to be declared under that section in order to render the carrier liable. But the answer made by the pursuers is, that section 8 of the statute takes off the effect of section 1, and they maintain that they have established that the loss arose from the felonious act of the company's servants. Now, it would be out of the question to force the pursuers to prove a felony against one particular individual servant of the company. It is certainly enough if the pursuers of such an action can shew that the theft must have been committed by one of the defenders' servants. It might even be enough to shew that in all probability the theft was committed by one of the defenders' servants. But it will not do to infer this from the fact, common to all cases, that the railway company's servants have the best opportunity of committing a theft. But although this should not be enough, taken alone, to prove the case, it may yet be taken into account with the other circumstances of the case. What, then, are the circumstances which lead to the conclusion that the servants committed the theft beyond the fact that the company's servants had the best opportunity? I have the greatest difficulty in finding any such circumstances. The reasoning of the Sheriff-substitute is not made out on the evidence. He says,—"There is more than a prima facie case of the theft by the company's servants, which, at all events, shifted the onus on the defenders to fix the theft on some persons not their servants, which they have not attempted. Of course, if it were the act of discharged servants no longer in the company's employment this would be the same as any of the outside public. The mode in which the boxes were packed, roped, and screwed, and the selection from amongst many articles of such as were most valuable, all indicate considerable length of time and cool deliberation to accomplish. This, therefore, excludes the hasty act of a stranger, with the risk of instant discovery, and fixes the act on persons who had access to the box, and considerable time to complete their act of transfer." Now, I do not find any reason to suppose that the articles taken were of greater value than those left, and therefore these observations of the Sheriff-substitute can have no influence on my judgment. But he seems further to have thought that the theft must have occupied some time, and that therefore it was more likely to have been committed by a railway servant than by any one else. Any one who knows anything of the transit of a train from Perth to Leeds must know how many opportunities for a theft occur. This goods train was stopped for two hours at Portobello during the middle of the night, and again for nearly an hour at Carlisle. During these stoppages any 222; Metcalfe v. London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company, April 28, 1858, 4 Scott's C. B. Rep., N. S. 307; Great Northern Railway Company v. Rimmell, June 10, 1856, 18 Scott's C. B. Rep. 575; Vaughton v. London and North-Western Railway Company Co., Jan. 28, 1874, L. R. 9 Ex. 93.

No. 82.

Feb. 18, 1875. Campbells v. North British Railway Co.

person might have committed the theft,—not, indeed, without some risk, but we know that thieves are very adventurous. Certainly two hours' stoppage gave ample opportunity for the theft. But apart altogether from the stoppages, a theft from a train in motion is by no means improbable. An active man getting up on the back of one of the trucks would be quite out of the view of the guard and the driver, especially if the trucks were loaded high.

The condition of the case is this, that it is a very narrow one, and I am left in this position, that I cannot choose between the one suggestion and the other. I cannot see any circumstance, beyond the one circumstance that railway servants generally have greater opportunities of stealing goods during their transit. There might have been an obligation on the railway company to examine any one of their servants who could have been shewn to have been connected with the box. But as nothing has been proved by the pursuers to connect any one with the box in its transit they cannot found on the absence of witnesses.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—As carriers only, and apart from any charge of theft by a servant of the railway company, the defenders are not liable, because they are protected by the 1st section of the statute 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV., c. 68. The pursuers, if they had chosen, might have made themselves safe by paying a small additional charge, but they did not do so. They preferred to take their own risk.

Now, I agree with your Lordships that under the 8th section of the Act, which declares the carrier to be still liable for loss or injury arising from the felonious act of any servant in his employ, it would not be necessary to bring the felonious act home to the particular offender,—not necessary to prove theft by an individual servant. You do not require to prove the act of theft as you would in a criminal charge against a particular man; but something must be proved as the foundation of a prima facie case against the servants of the railway company. Mere opportunity on the part of the servants of the company is not enough, for that occurs in every instance of the loss of articles during transit by the railway company, since the servants always have at such a time the opportunity of stealing. The pursuer is bound to shew that there is a greater probability of the articles having been stolen by the servants of the company than by a stranger. Of course, in judging of the probability, the fact of opportunity cannot be left out of view. But, unless there is some special ground of liability, the first section of the Act takes effect, and the company are not liable. They are protected. In the ordinary case of such a loss as this there is no liability. A distinction must be proved. That which is common to both cases cannot be the distinction between them. Opportunity is common to all cases of carriage, and, taken by itself, it cannot be the distinguishing feature. If the pursuers had proved that any particular servant, or any particular class of servants of the company, were in a position of suspicion, so as to be likely to have committed the theft, then the railway company would have been bound to call that particular servant, or to call the whole of that particular class of servants. But we have no such proof here.

I think that the theft may possibly, and even probably, have been committed by a stranger during the two hours' detention at Portobello, or during the detention for above fifty minutes at Carlisle. And, further, I agree with your Lordship in the chair in thinking that it is by no means beyond possibility, or even beyond probability, that a dexterous thief might have got upon the waggon, or between the waggons, during transit, and have committed the theft while the train was in motion. Such a thing has been done, and one case, at least, I remember.

No. 82.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Campbells v. North British Railway Co.

On the whole, I am of opinion that nothing beyond opportunity has been proved, and that mere opportunity is not sufficient to sustain this action.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships that upon the evidence this is a narrow case, and that in questions of this description it is not necessary, in order to bring a case within the provisions of the 8th section of the statute, for the pursuers to prove that any particular servant of the railway company committed the felonious act. It is, in my opinion, enough to subject the company in liability if it can be shewn that the facts and circumstances connected with the transit and abstraction of the goods are such as are calculated to raise a very strong prima facie case, leading to the conclusion, in the absence of all counter evidence or explanation on the part of the company, that some servant of the company committed the theft. That, I think, is the fair import of the English decisions which have been referred to, and the fair and reasonable construction of the statute.

In dealing with the evidence I was at first much struck with the observation of the Sheriff-substitute that in the present case a considerable length of time would be required to make the selection of the articles which were abstracted; and that this indicated such an amount of deliberation on the part of the thief as was sufficient to exclude the act of a stranger, and to fix the theft upon some one or more of the company's servants who had time and opportunity to make the selection. But upon examining the evidence and comparing the list of articles stolen with that of the articles which remained in the box, I find nothing to shew that the one set of articles was more valuable than the other. The articles abstracted were no doubt all silk; but it appears from the evidence of the pursuers' manager that "many other articles in the box were also silk, and came safe to Leeds;" and this is, I think, sufficient to obviate the weight which I should otherwise have attached to the Sheriff-substitute's observation. There is nothing, therefore, as I apprehend, in the character of this theft which can be held to lead to the inference that it must have been committed by a servant of the company, and as it is in evidence that there was a stoppage of at least two hours' duration at Portobello, during the darkest period of the night, there was then ample opportunity for thieves of ordinary expertness to commit the theft. I am therefore satisfied that the pursuers have not made out such a case against the servants of the railway company as to throw the onus upon the defenders of leading evidence to meet the case made by the pursuers, and that the judgment of the Sheriff should be adhered to.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that it is not proved that the loss of the said articles arose from the felonious act of any servant in the employment of the respondents: Find therefore, in point of law, that under and in virtue of the Act 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1, the respondents are not liable for the loss of said articles: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expense, and allow an account," &c.

JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Graham v. Lamont.

THOMAS GRAHAM, Petitioner and Respondent.—M'Laren.
JAMES LAMONT, Respondent and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Hunter.

Heritable and Moveable—Fixtures—Sale—Personal Objection.—In a question between a purchaser of lands and a person who was entitled to the income of a trust-estate, of which the lands formed part, and who had taken an active part in the sale,—held that the latter was not entitled to remove wire fencing which he had put up at his own expense, when in occupation of the mansion-house by permission of the trustees, no notice having been given to the purchaser before the sale was completed that the fencing was not to go with the estate.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirlingshire, &c.
I.

IN April 1874 Thomas Graham presented a petition to the Sheriff of Stirlingshire against James Lamont of Knockdhu.

The petitioner set forth that for a number of years prior to Whitsunday 1873 he was tenant from year to year under the trustees of his father, the late Dr John Graham, of the house and grounds of Balfunning. In 1867, during his tenancy of the house and grounds, being desirous of acquiring some additional ground for grazing cows, he entered into an arrangement with the tenant of the adjoining farm of Clachanry, also belonging to his father's trustees, whereby the tenant sublet to him part of a field, and the petitioner, at his own expense, enclosed the portion of the farm of Clachanry so taken in with a moveable continuous iron fence about four feet in height. He had previously, also at his own expense, fenced off portions of the shrubbery from another portion of the grounds used for grazing cattle, with a similar fence. The whole of the fencing so erected extended to not less than 450 yards in length. In 1873 the estate of Balfunning was sold by the proprietors to the respondent, with entry at Whitsunday 1873, and the petitioner removed from the house and grounds at the said term.

Upon the further narrative that the respondent refused to allow him to remove the fencing, which he maintained belonged to himself, he prayed for an order upon the respondent to deliver up the fencing, failing which, to pay £120 as its value.

The defence was that the fencing passed with the estate, and that the pursuer by his actings in connection with the sale had barred himself from making the present claim.

A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared;—The petitioner's father, the Rev. Dr Graham, died in 1865, leaving a mortis causa settlement, by which he conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, including the lands of Balfunning, to trustees, who were directed, after the other purposes of the trust were fulfilled, to hold the residue of his means and estate in trust for behoof of his only son, the petitioner, in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to pay him annually the whole free annual produce of the said residue; and further, to hold the fee of the residue in trust for behoof of the petitioner's children. Full power was given to the trustees at any time to sell all or any part of the trust-estate, if they should deem it necessary.

Shortly after Dr Graham's death the petitioner was allowed by his father's trustees to occupy the house and grounds of Balfunning, and to draw the rents of the estate for his own benefit.

The fencing in question was erected by the petitioner at his own expense. Part of it stood upon the site of an old wooden paling, which he removed. It was fixed in the ground by prongs, but it was specially adapted for the purpose of being easily moved without injury to the soil or to the fencing itself.

In 1872 the petitioner began to treat with Mr Lamont as to a purchase of the estate. In his letters he always referred to the property as "my property," and generally held himself out as the proprietor and the party entitled to sell and arrange as to the price. The petitioner and Mr Lamont not being able to come to terms the estate was exposed for sale by public roup on 3d July 1872. The articles of roup were signed by the trustees, and by the petitioner "for all right and interest whatsoever which he had or could have in the said lands and others in any manner of way." The estate was not sold on that occasion, and it was exposed by the trustees alone at a reduced price on 5th March 1873, when Mr Lamont purchased it. By the articles of roup the purchaser was taken "bound to relieve the exposers of all claims anywise competent to tenants in virtue of their respective tacks for meliorations, or on any other account."

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Graham v. Lamont.

No intimation was given to Mr Lamont or his agent at or before the sale of any claim at the instance of the petitioner to the fencing in question.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sconce), on 16th October 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—"Finds in law that the disposition in favour of the defender gives him right to the whole fences on the estate, with a title to hold the same, but subject to such rights as might exist by paction, custom, or law in the tenants or others having preferable claims thereto: 12. Finds in law that the wire fencing in question in both its portions was, in the state of the facts foresaid, heritable, and passed to the defender as part and pertinent of the estate, and cannot be claimed by the pursuer, and specially in respect that he did not occupy the house, policy, and grounds as tenant, but under his liferent right, and that by his destination it was a pertinent of the estate, as well as a necessity for the common and beneficial use of the house, grounds, and policy as existing at the time of the sale to the defender: 13. Finds in law, separatim, that the pursuer, (1) by generally holding himself out as proprietor of the estate, and (2) specially to the defender, and (3) separately, by his signing the articles of roup, is barred, personali exceptione, from claiming the said wire fencing; and therefore sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the petition, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses."

The petitioner appealed to the Sheriff (Blackburn), who, on 24th November 1874 pronounced this interlocutor:— . . . "Finds that the said fencing is not of so fixed a character as to pass necessarily with the property of the land: Finds that there are no special circumstances to shew that the petitioner intended the fences to be permanently attached to the soil, or to shew that they were sold to the respondent as part of the lands of Balfunning purchased by him: Therefore sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor appealed against; repels the whole defences; ordains and decerns conform to the prayer of the petition: Finds the petitioner entitled to expenses."

Mr Lamont appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—The fences were of a heritable character.[1] But whether they were so or not, the appellant was in the circumstances entitled to take the estate as it stood. The petitioner took the principal part in the negotiations prior to the sale of the estate, and he never hinted that the fences were not to go with it. The purchaser gave a larger price on account of the existence of the fences, and of this enhanced price the [1] Tod's Trustees v. Finlay, Jan. 30, 1872, 10 Macph. 422; Ex parte Belcher, 1835, 2 Montagu and Ayrton's Bankruptcy Cases, p. 169 (Sir John Cross' judgment); Bell's Prin. sec. 743.

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875. Graham v. Lamont.

petitioner got the benefit. He could not call upon the purchaser to give them up or pay twice over for them.

Argued for the petitioner;—At the time when the fences were placed in the ground by the petitioner they were fences which in a question of landlord and tenant could be removed by the latter.[1] This being so, the next question was, whether, in consequence of the sale or of any incidents of the sale, the fences were transferred along with the estate to the purchaser. The petitioner's right was not strictly one of tenancy, but he held by a tenure which for the purposes of the present question must be held as equivalent to tenancy. He held on a precarious possession which did not induce him to make permanent improvements on the estate at his own expense. The trustees had power to sell the estate without his consent. He was not a proper liferenter. The only right which he had was strictly moveable, viz., a right to receive the income of the trust-estate. He must be presumed to have put up the fences, not with the view of permanently benefiting the estate, but for the convenience of his own occupation. If the trustees had simply sold the estate without the petitioner's consent the fences would not have been transferred to the purchaser. And the petitioner's consent did not really affect the question. He consented to the sale of what the trustees had power to sell, viz., the heritable estate, and not his own moveable property. The titles were ready for exhibition to intending purchasers. It was not even alleged that the estate was purchased as from the petitioner. It was said that the purchaser might assume from the appearance of the fences that they belonged to the estate, but the same might be said in the case of a tenant, who would certainly have had a right to remove them. Even in a question with a proprietor selling his own ground fencing like the present would not pass to a purchaser without a special contract, much less would it pass when it had been put up by a temporary occupant.

Lord Neaves.—The question here raised approaches a delicate province of law, but in the circumstances I see no difficulty. It is unnecessary to consider what would have been the result if Mr Graham's position had been outside altogether of the right of administration of this property,—if, for instance, he had been a mere legatee under the settlement of his father or of some one else. We must look at the contract of sale, and the position in which Mr Graham put himself with regard to the sale. He was de facto the occupant and liferenter of this property, and the fee was in his children. In the negotiations with Mr Lamont he comes out as the dominus of the subject, and manager of the transaction. His letters are those of a man who puts himself forward, as he might naturally do, for the interest of himself during his life, and of his children after his death, and therefore as the proper person to look after the sale. Not only does he take this position in the correspondence, but he becomes a formal party to the articles of roup. This is not a case in which the sale is effected behind Mr Graham's back. It is not a question in regard to agricultural fixtures, in which a tenant may be interested who has nothing to do with the sale. It is a question with a contracting party as to what is the fair meaning of the contract. This property was unquestionably sold as it stood, with everything necessary for its use or essential to its amenity. During [1] Duke of Buccleuch v. Tod's Trustees, July 18, 1871, 9 Macph. 1014, 43 Scot. Jur. 552; see also Syme v. Harvey, December 14, 1861, 24 D. 202, 34 Scot. Jur. 98; Dowall v. Miln, July 11, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1180; Brand's Trustees v. Brand, Dec. 19, 1874, supra, p. 258.

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Graham v. Lamont.

the whole of the negotiations with Mr Lamont not a word is said about these fences not going with the estate. By his silence or his conduct the petitioner allowed the purchaser to believe that he was getting everything as it stood, and he cannot now turn round and say that he was a mere outsider, like one of "the puir people that labouris the ground," and had nothing to do with the contract of sale.

In a sale of a heritable estate everything which is not unequivocally moveable, and whose character speaks for itself, passes with the estate in a question between seller and purchaser. Things of a debateable character the purchaser will generally be entitled to take, if he has not received notice to the contrary. Mr Lamont can say that for the estate in its existing state, including these fences, he has paid to the trustees, i.e., to the petitioner and his children, all that they demanded. On these grounds I think that there was an implied obligation on the petitioner to let things remain in their status quo. I am of opinion, therefore, that we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and revert in effect to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. It is important to keep in view that we are not here in a question between landlord and tenant. The principle of trade fixtures, which is all-important there, does not enter the present case. Neither is this a question between heir and executor, or between liferenter and fiar. The case is one which does not usually occur, but it is substantially one between seller and purchaser. It was said, no doubt, that Mr Graham was not to be held as the seller, because, looking to the feudal title, he was not absolute proprietor of the estate. But for the purposes of the present case he was substantially the seller. He was the liferenter, and therefore a limited proprietor, and his children were the fiars. He also took a very active part in the negotiations with Mr Lamont prior to the sale, and was a consenter to the articles of roup. If he was not strictly the proprietor, he stood in the place of the trustees, who were the feudal proprietors, and held himself out in the transaction of sale as if he had the control of the matter.

The real question is, therefore, as it appears to me, what must be held to have been the understood or implied contract between seller and purchaser as regards the fences. This leads us, in the first place, to consider the nature of the fences in themselves, and the object or purpose they served. It is true that they were moveable in themselves,—that is to say, they could be easily detached from the ground. But it does not follow that they are to be dealt with as moveable in the present dispute. Many things are moveable, in the sense that they could be removed from the subject to which they are attached without injury to that subject or to themselves,—as, for example, gates in permanent fences, or window frames and doors in a dwelling-house; but these are articles which certainly could not be dealt with as moveable in such a dispute as the present. It would undoubtedly be unwarrantable in the ordinary case of the sale of a dwelling-house on the part of the seller to remove after the sale the doors and window frames, on the pretence that they were moveable. Now, would not the removal by the seller of the fences in question be an act of the same kind? The purchaser, Mr Lamont, in this instance, examines the estate, or sends persons to examine it for him, and very likely he is attracted by the policy and the fencing round it. He is not told or warned in any way, although he sees the estate has an enclosed policy, that the wire fences which form the enclosure are to be removed and not to go along with the estate. But without some statement or warning to that effect, I think he was entitled to rely on his getting the fences as accessories of the property. The policy would, indeed, be no longer such if it were not enclosed and protected.

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Graham v. Lamont.

Having regard, then, to the fact that Mr Graham was substantially the seller of the estate, or held himself out as such,—that the fences had been put up for its permanent benefit,—and to all the circumstances as disclosed in evidence, I am very clearly of opinion that Mr Lamont was entitled to rely upon these fences being allowed to remain as parts and pertinents, or accessories of the lands which he purchased. I therefore concur with Lord Neaves that we must revert in substance to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, recalling that of the Sheriff.

Lord Gifford.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what was the fair meaning of the contract of sale? and what subjects were fairly included therein?—keeping in view that the petitioner was a party to the sale—a party to the contract of sale although he did not sign the formal disposition.

I think that the fence now claimed may fairly be taken as a proper part and pertinent of the estate. It appears that the larger part of it came in place of a stob and rail fence put up by Dr Graham. If the petitioner had simply renewed this stob and rail fence the present question could never have been raised. But with a view to amenity, and as more ornamental, he erected a new fence, being the wire fence now in question. It is important to see that the fence now claimed by the petitioner was a fence which existed in a place where an old fence formerly was, and where a fence should naturally be.

If the petitioner had not been a party to the sale he might have been in a more favourable position. But when he saw parties looking at the estate with a view to purchase, a duty was imposed upon him to warn intending purchasers that what appeared to be a pertinent of the estate really was a moveable subject belonging not to the sellers but to the petitioner himself. And the petitioner felt this, for he states on record that Mr Blair, the person who was advertised to shew the boundaries, had instructions to inform parties looking at the estate that the fences now in dispute belonged to the petitioner himself. What he thought necessary to tell Mr Blair to say, it was his duty himself to tell to inquirers who did not go to Mr Blair, but communicated directly with the petitioner himself.

I do not attach much importance to the fact that the fence was moveable in itself. We must look not only to the possibility of lifting it but to the purpose which it serves. A paling is physically moveable, but it may be heritable legally. Nor do I draw any distinction between the two parts of the fencing. I think they are really in the same legal position, and as to both I think the purchaser was entitled to take the whole as an accessory of the estate.

I do not think it necessary to advert to the nice distinctions in the law of heritable and moveable, according as the question may occur between landlord and tenant, heir and executor, and liferenter and fiar. This is a case of seller and purchaser, and for such a case we must look to the nature of the transaction, the meaning of the parties, and the nature, position, and use of the subjects which are claimed, on the one hand, as parts of the heritable estate, and, on the other hand, as separate moveable subjects. I think, on the whole, the fences in question must be held to have been really parts of the lands, and to have been sold therewith.

No. 83.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Graham v. Lamont.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree with your Lordships. As questions of this kind have come up rather frequently of late I shall express shortly the grounds of my concurrence.

Fences are prima facie held to be heritable accessories of the lands. When a man buys an estate he buys it, in general, with the ordinary demarcations as they stand. It may be otherwise, for heritable and moveable are not qualities of things but of rights. If Graham had been a tenant, and had put up these fences for his own convenience, the present question might have been different from what it is; though, even in that case, the purchaser might have had a great deal to say against the tenant claiming the fences, after having allowed them to remain in the ground till after the sale. But erection for a temporary purpose, by a temporary occupant, is essential to bring in the element of trade fixtures. The petition in this case is based on the allegation of tenancy, which is now disclaimed. Mr Graham was not a tenant. He was in possession of land the revenue of which went into his own pocket during his life. It is not even proved that he erected the fences for a temporary purpose; and it is quite as likely that he erected them to improve the estate, in which he had a liferent interest, and of which his children were the fiars. He negotiates the sale with Mr Lamont, and does not give him the slightest warning that the fences belong to himself. After the sale is completed and the price paid he claims that he is entitled to carry off the fences. I think this is against conscience.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appellant purchased the estate of Balfunning, in the year 1873, without any specific stipulation being made in regard to any of the fences on the property: Find that the respondent erected these fences while occupying the mansion-house and grounds of the estate by arrangement with his father's trustees, and that he had the life interest in the annual produce of the trust-estate: Find it not proved that the respondent was tenant of these subjects: Find that the respondent acted as a principal in transacting the sale to the appellant: Find that the fences in question are included in the said sale: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor complained of, assoilzie the defender (appellant), and decern: Find him entitled to expenses in both Courts, and remit to the Auditor of this Court to tax the expenses now found due, and to report."

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—W. & J COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

PETER ANDERSON, Pursuer.—Guthrie Smith—J. A. Reid.
NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Moncreiff.

Nautæ Caupones—Public Carrier—Railway—Contract—Negligence.—Where a railway company, which had been in the practice for twelve years of running a fast goods train, by which dealers could send meat and live-stock to N in time for market without paying any special or extra rates, failed on one occasion, as they alleged from excess of other traffic, to carry some trucks containing pigs from a station on their line to N by that train, and the pigs consequently arrived too late for the market, held (aff. judgment of Lord Young) that no sufficient cause of delay having been proved, they were liable to the owner of the pigs for damage incurred by loss of market.

Nautæ Caupones—Public Carrier—Railway.—Where, owing to an accident to a train, the cause of which could not be ascertained, a number of pigs arrived about five hours too late for a market to which they had been forwarded, held

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.

Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. I.

(rev. judgment of Lord Young) that the railway company were not liable to the owner of the pigs for damage incurred by loss of market.

THIS was an action of damages for loss of market at the instance of Peter Anderson, cattle salesman, Granton, against the North British Railway Company.

There were two separate claims, arising at different times and from different causes,—

I. The first claim was for the sum of £28, being the loss Anderson alleged he had suffered from the decreased price of seventy-one pigs delivered by him to the railway company for transmission from Granton to Newcastle on 7th October 1872. This claim was based on the following circumstances:—Anderson had been in the habit for a period of eleven or twelve years of forwarding pigs from Granton on Monday afternoons to Newcastle so as to arrive in time for the market there, which took place every Tuesday, and opened about 6 A.M. The pigs were usually trucked at Granton in time for a goods train leaving that station at 6·45 P.M., and timed to arrive at Portobello at 7·10 P.M., where the trucks going south were taken to the Joppa siding at the south-east end of the station, and left there till a train, called the "meat train," which was timed to leave Edinburgh at 8·2 P.M., arrived and took them up at 8·15 P.M. The "meat train" had the following note appended to it in the working time-tables of the company (from which the above times are taken):—"Train must keep strict time." This train was timed to reach Berwick at 11·10 P.M., and Newcastle at 4·5 A.M., and cattle and pigs forwarded by it were thus in good time for the Tuesday morning market there. The goods trains from Granton to Portobello were drawn by a pilot engine, which also had shunting and piloting to do. The working time-tables of the company are private, and are not published, being intended for the use of the company's servants. No special or extra rate was in use to be charged for cattle or pigs forwarded by the "meat train."

On Monday, 7th October 1872, Anderson himself assisted at the trucking of seventy-one pigs at Granton for Newcastle, the operation being concluded about 5 P.M. The 6·45 P.M. train, by which they were to be forwarded, however, did not leave Granton till 8·15 P.M.,—the engine not having come from Portobello till 7·25 P.M.,—and it did not arrive at the north-west end of Portobello station till 8·30 P.M., at which time the "meat train" was just leaving the south-east or Joppa end of that station. The pigs were accordingly kept at Portobello till the next through goods train from Edinburgh to the south arrived, and did not reach Newcastle till mid-day on Tuesday, 8th October, by which time Anderson's consignee considered the market over, and did not sell them. They were afterwards disposed of in various ways at a loss, as stated by Anderson, of £25.

Anderson immediately intimated to the railway company that he held them liable for the loss he had sustained, but no notice was taken of his demand, and he took no further steps until he raised this action in September 1874. He maintained that the company was liable for the loss he had suffered, because from the regular course of business, extending over a long period of years, he was entitled to assume that the pigs would arrive in time for the market, and that the railway company, by holding out that this train was a market train for meat and cattle, entered into a special contract with customers to deliver what was forwarded by the train in time for the market.

The railway company defended the action, and by way of explanation of the delay which had occurred in connection with these pigs averred that the Granton train had been late on the occasion in question owing to the extra and excessive traffic caused by the Falkirk Tryst which was being held at the time. They denied that they were under any special contract with Anderson to forward his pigs in time for the Newcastle market, and pointed out that only the usual rates were charged for the transmission of the pigs by the train in question. The delay in forwarding the pigs from Granton to Portobello they stated to be owing to the pilot engine, which was used for the traffic between these places, having got shut up in a siding at Portobello, through the unusual pressure of business. They further contended that no unreasonable delay had taken place in forwarding the pigs from Granton, the engine which brought them up having only remained fifty minutes at Granton after its arrival there, instead of two hours, which was its usual time. The time so spent was attempted to be accounted for as having been spent in marshalling the train. The company also complained that, owing to the space of time which Anderson had allowed to pass before pressing his claim they had lost the opportunity of procuring evidence which would more satisfactorily account for the delay.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875. Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

II. The second claim was for £18, 8s. 6d. as damage incurred by the loss of market for sixty-seven pigs sent on 4th August 1874. These pigs were trucked at Granton and forwarded to Edinburgh in time for a train leaving Edinburgh at 5 P.M. (also a "meat train.") The trucks were duly attached to that train and reached Berwick in safety, but at a station called Windmillhill, about six miles south of Berwick, five of the waggons went off the rails and blocked the whole line, and damaged the points at a crossing, in consequence of which the train was delayed for 5 hours and 40 minutes, and did not reach Newcastle till 8·40 A.M., instead of 3 A.M., and the market was again lost. Anderson contended that the accident was owing to the insufficiency of the waggons composing the train, for which the company was liable, and claimed repayment of his loss accordingly.

The railway company denied all liability, and in the course of the proof which was led in the action proved that all the waggons in the train had been duly inspected at Berwick almost immediately before the accident. The wheels of the waggon which caused the block, and the rails, were in good order and uninjured, but the body of the waggon was so smashed that it was impossible to discover the true cause of the breakdown.

After a proof had been led, the substance of which has been given in the foregoing narrative, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The two claims presented for consideration, although of the same general character, differ in their details, and each of them is, in some respects, more, and in others less, favourable to the pursuer than the other. I have not found either free from difficulty, but on the whole, after the best consideration I have been able to give to the evidence and to the law applicable to the facts which I think established, I have arrived at the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to succeed in both.

"The general rule of law applicable to the case, and on which the pursuer relies, is not doubtful. It is that a common carrier is bound to receive goods tendered to him for carriage, and to forward them to (or towards, as the case may be) their destination, according to the means of conveyance which he professes to maintain, and according to the ordinary course of such conveyance, without any unreasonable delay in their despatch, or detention by the way. In this case there is no question of the receipt of the goods by the carrier at Granton, on a common contract to carry them to Newcastle, and there is, I think, no question that the duty to despatch them without unreasonable delay, and to

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

The railway company reclaimed, and argued;—1. The working time-tables of the company being private and not published for the purpose of carry them without any undue detention by the way, thereby attached as matter of contract. This, indeed, as a general proposition, was not contested by the defenders. They only disputed the pursuer's contention that, on the facts of this case it so operated as to subject them in liability. And indeed, when a rule of law cannot be stated with more certainty and precision than is compatible with the use of such expressions as 'reasonable despatch,' or 'undue detention,' it is to be expected that disputes under it will turn on its application or operation with reference to the facts of individual cases. These expressions, which the poverty of language or the nature of the subject renders unavoidable, or suggests as the best that can be employed, are themselves incapable of useful definition, and involve an appeal to the good sense and judgment of the jury or other tribunal which is called upon to determine particular cases.

"The pursuer's first claim regards a lot of swine which he delivered to the defenders at Granton on 7th October 1872, in good time to be forwarded to Newcastle by the 6.45 P.M. train of that day. The pursuer had frequently sent pigs in the same way before during a period of several years, and the ordinary course of conveyance admittedly was, that the trucks containing the animals were despatched by the train which left Granton at 6.45 P.M., joined the 8 P.M. train from Edinburgh at Portobello, and were thence conveyed by that train to Newcastle, arriving there next morning between 5 and 6 o'clock, in time for the morning market, which opens between 6 and 7 o'clock. On the particular occasion (7th October 1872), the train (with the pursuer's swine), which ought to have started from Granton at 6.45, was not despatched till 8.15. It was accordingly too late to join the ordinary train at Portobello (the 8 P.M. train from Edinburgh), and the trucks with the swine being forwarded by a train later by several hours did not reach Newcastle till mid-day the following day, whereby the market was lost. The explanation of the unusual delay at Granton is, that there was no engine available to start the train at the proper time. It appears that a pilot engine was in use to be sent to Granton in time to leave again with the train at 6.45, but that on this occasion it did not arrive till about 8 o'clock. The reason suggested is, that it was the time of Falkirk Tryst, when the traffic on the line is always heavier than usual, and that thus it was, or might have been, impossible, with reference to the other traffic, to spare an engine sooner. The reason does not seem a good one in itself, and the evidence on the subject is of the most general description. I cannot hold that the extra traffic usual during a Falkirk Tryst is an admissible excuse for not sending an engine at the proper time to start a stated and ordinary train from Granton, by which the railway company had contracted to forward goods in the ordinary course of their business and with reference to which the contract immediately in question was undoubtedly made. The defenders, however, urged, that had the action been brought so as to enable the trial to take place nearer the time, they might have been able to assign a better or more precise reason, and to support it by better evidence, and claimed some indulgence by reason of the delay in bringing the action. I admit the validity of the topic, but am nevertheless unable to allow it such effect in the circumstances as to overcome the pursuer's case, which I regard as a strong one. I think it was according to the defenders' contract, and duty thence arising, to despatch the pursuer's swine from Granton at 6.45, or at least in time to be forwarded from Portobello to Newcastle by the 8 P.M. train from Edinburgh. This was according to the regular course of their conveyance, of which the pursuer had much previous experience, and with reference to which the contract was made. Not having done so, or assigned any admissible excuse, and the pursuer having sustained actual damage in consequence, I am of opinion that he is entitled to compensation.

"The pursuer's second claim is for alleged undue detention by the way of another lot of swine which he delivered to the defenders at Granton on 3d August last for carriage to Newcastle. The detention occurred on the line of the North-Eastern Railway Company, about six miles south of Berwick. It lasted

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.

Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

inducing traders to forward their goods, &c., in order to catch certain markets, or to get them earlier delivered, no special contract could be founded about five hours and forty minutes, and the consequence was that the train (with the swine) arrived at Newcastle about six hours behind the proper time, and that the pursuer in consequence again lost the market. The cause was a breakdown, occasioned by the front part of the train breaking away from the hind part, the couplings having given way. Four of the waggons immediately behind the point of breakage were thrown off the line, that nearest to it (the property of the defenders) being thrown over the fence into an adjoining field, and so broken that it was impossible to tell by examination whether the breakdown had been caused by any defect in it. The line was found to be in good order and unobstructed, and it was not suggested that any of the other waggons, or any of the equipments or arrangements of the train, were defective. Some defect in the defenders' waggon, which was so much broken as to preclude examination, or in its attachment to the preceding waggon, which was carried forward safely, is a probable cause of the accident, and the tendency of the evidence is to exclude any other. The question, on these facts, is, whether the defenders are liable to the pursuer for the damage occasioned to him by the detention.

"The liability of a carrier for delay in the delivery of goods, occasioned by an accident on the journey, stands on a different footing from his liability for damage thereby done to the goods, the element of insurance, which the contract of carriage implies, extending only to the safety of the goods, which the carrier is thereby, as an insurer, bound to deliver in the like good condition as he received them, the acts of God or a public enemy only excepted. Therefore, although the defenders would have been, I think, clearly liable for the destruction of the pursuer's pigs by the accident in question, or any inferior damage to them, it does not follow that they are liable for the mere delay of delivery thereby occasioned.

The case of passengers is more analogous; for with respect to them, even in the case of bodily injury, the liability of the carrier rests, not on implied insurance, but on his common law duty, arising from the contract, to carry safely, in so far as that can be done by the employment of proper carriages, and the exercise of due care and foresight. Had a passenger, booked by the defenders from Granton to Newcastle, been killed or injured by a similar accident befalling the train in which he travelled, I think it not probable that the defenders would have escaped liability on the ground that the accident was not such as might have been avoided by ordinary care and foresight. But not to dwell on this analogy, and assuming that a case of personal injuries may involve, upon the question of liability, other considerations than apply to the detention of goods, however long, I think it is the law that a carrier is responsible for excessive delay in the delivery of goods, though occasioned by such an accident in the course of the transit as occurred here, unless it shall appear that it could not have been avoided by due and ordinary care on his part, or that of those for whom he is responsible on his contract. I say 'excessive delay,' meaning thereby to throw out of account such ordinary delays as, having regard to the length of the journey and character of the conveyance, it shall appear to be reasonable, and according to the practice of life to allow for. Here, again, it is necessary to employ general language, and such as involves an appeal to the sense and judgment of the tribunals called on to consider the circumstances of individual cases.

"Now, it does not appear to me to be running the matter fine, or encroaching on the time-margin which a railway company may reasonably claim in the running of their trains or conduct of their traffic, to characterise a detention of about six hours beyond the ordinary time on a journey between Granton and Newcastle as prima facie undue or excessive, and therefore such as prima facie to infer liability for any actual damage thereby occasioned to a sender of goods. I should certainly not hold that a railway company, in the absence of express contract, were liable as on a guarantee of advertised or ordinary time for the disappointment (however injurious) of passengers or senders of goods, whenever their trains were late. People who, from necessity or choice, run the matter so upon them. The pursuer did not pay any extra or special rate to get his goods sent by this particular train, and when there was nothing unusual of that description there was certainly no presumption of special contract.[1] Where there was no special contract a carrier was not bound to deliver goods within a specified time, and he was not liable for delay unless he was in fault.[2] The action, as regards this claim, must therefore be laid on fault, and not on guarantee. The pursuer had failed to make out any case of negligence or fault. All that he had proved was that there was delay. The company had accounted for the delay as well as could be expected after the lapse of time. They had proved great pressure of traffic owing to Falkirk Tryst, and that was sufficient to relieve them of liability, after the delay which had occurred in bringing the action. The onus was shifted from the company by the pursuer's delay.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875. Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

2. The mere fact of an accident having occurred did not of itself establish a prima facie case of fault against the railway company.[3] The company had also proved in this case that all the usual precautions had been taken, and the waggons had been carefully tapped and inspected only a few minutes before the accident.

Argued for Anderson;—1. The sort of traffic and the nature of the articles conveyed by this train was so peculiar as to take it out of the rules which applied to ordinary goods trains. The mere fact of the note in the company's time-tables that it was to be punctual shewed that the purpose of the train was special, and the pursuer was entitled to expect it to fulfil its purpose. If this had been a question as to a passenger train there would be no doubt as to the liability of the company.[4] A course of dealing such as had existed in this case might lay a foundation for a special contract.[5] The attempted excuse about excess of traffic owing to Falkirk Tryst was not sufficient. There was no block at Granton, and yet it was there that the delay had occurred. A carrier was not bound close that such delays as experience shews ought, in common prudence, to be allowed for, must bear the consequences of their disappointment unless the delay shall be excessive. But there must be a limit, whatever difficulty may attend the fixing of it, or in determining whether it has been transgressed in individual cases. In my opinion, the delay of which the pursuer here complains transgressed due limit, and was excessive. I therefore think that it is incumbent on the railway company to account for it, and to shew that it was owing to a cause which was unavoidable by ordinary care and foresight, or otherwise to be liable for the consequences. On the evidence I am unable to hold that the defenders have so accounted for the delay complained of, and I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to compensation for the damage which he sustained.

---

"With respect to the amount of damages, I need only say that I think the sums claimed are reasonable, and fairly supported by the evidence."

[1] Finlay v. North British Railway Company, July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, 42 Scot. Jur. 552.

[2] Briddon v. Great-Northern Railway Company, Nov. 9, 1858, 28 L. J. (Exch.) 51; Lord v. Midland Railway Company, Jan. 25, 1867, L. R. 2 C. P. 339; Taylor v. Great-Northern Railway Company, April 24, 1866, L. R. 1 C. P. 385.

[3] Bird v. Great-Northern Railway Company, Nov. 4, 1858, 28 L. J. (Exch.) 3; Kearney v. London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company, June 15, 1870, L. R. 5 Q. B. 411; Lyon v. Lamb, June 22, 1838, 16 S. 1188; Readhead v. Midland Railway Company, May 10, 1869, L. R. 4 Q. B. 379.

[4] Denton v. Great-Northern Railway Company, Jan. 19, 1856, 25 L. J. Q. B. 129; Great-Northern Railway Company v. Hawcroft, Feb. 11, 1852, 21 L. J. Q. B. 178.

[5] Pickford v. Grand Junction Railway Company, April 27, 1844, 12 Mees. and Welsby, 766.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875. Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

to take an extra amount of goods, but when he did so it would not protect him that owing to an insufficient supply of conveyances he could not forward them.[1] In this case the company had undertaken to send these pigs by that particular train, and they were bound to forward them, or pay any loss incurred through their failure to do so. Time was of the essence of the contract here, when it was considered that this was a market train. The company were under an obligation to forward the goods, not to a place, but to a market, and they had failed to do so. The cause of their failure was something personal to themselves, and not a damnum fatale.

2. The railway company was bound to prove that they were not responsible for the accident which caused the delay complained of.[2] The pursuer had been able to establish this much, that the wheels and the rails had not caused the accident, therefore it must have arisen from malconstruction, over-loading, or insufficient coupling of the waggons, and the company was bound to prove it was none of these. It was settled law in such cases that all a pursuer had to do was to prove the accident, and then the defender was bound to prove that he was not to blame.[3] All the examination proved was that the wheels had been tapped at Berwick, but the wheels were all right. There was no evidence of how the waggon had been loaded, constructed, or coupled. If the company failed to shew that the cause of the accident was not owing to their fault, the presumption was against them.[4] The company was bound to deliver these pigs in reasonable time, but they had not done so, and were liable for the damage which had been suffered.[5]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two claims made by the pursuer in this action, both founded on the alleged detention by the defenders of separate consignments of pigs for the Newcastle market, despatched by the pursuer from Granton. The first of these transactions dates as far back as the 7th of October 1872. The second took place in August 1874. The question which is raised under both of these claims is whether the railway company is liable for the animals not having been delivered in due course, so as to be in time for the market to which they were sent. The cases must be considered separately.

In regard to the first the Lord Ordinary has very clearly stated the facts on which it rests, and I need not recapitulate them. There is no doubt that the railway company were aware, both from the course of dealing and from the circumstances of the consignment itself, that the animals were intended to be delivered in time for the early market next day. I adopt also the general views expressed by the Lord Ordinary as to the nature of the obligation undertaken by the railway company in regard to this contract of carriage. They did not undertake to deliver the animals at any specific time, but they did undertake to [1] Cohen v. Gaudet, 1863, 3 Foster and Finlason, 455, L. C. J. Cockburn, and note by the Reporter, 463.

[2] M'Glashan v. Dundee and Perth Railway Company, June 24, 1848, 10 D. 1397, 20 Scot. Jur. 508. Form of issue.

[3] Anderson v. Pyper and Company, March 18, 1820, 2 Murray, 261; Lyon v. Lamb, supra, p. 448.

[4] Dawson v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincoln Railway Company, Jan. 15, 1862, 5 Law Times, 682, Chief B. Pollock.

[5] Hodges on Railways, 564; Deas on Railways, 435, and cases there; Macdonald and Company v. Highland Railway Company, May 20, 1873, 11 Macph. 614, 45 Scot. Jur. 391.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

deliver them in reasonable time, looking to the nature of the goods and the circumstances in which the contract was made. I should say farther, that although the consignment was not, in the strict sense, one of perishable articles, yet, from consisting of live-stock, the undertaking to carry implied a greater obligation of despatch than would be inferred in the case of ordinary goods. But what is reasonable despatch is a question to be determined on the circumstances of each case, and is substantially a jury question.

In the present case it is not disputed that the train by which the consignment was despatched did not arrive until many hours after its ordinary time. The train was not timed by published time-tables, but the company must be held to undertake to deliver at or about their ordinary time, unless they can shew reasonable cause to the contrary. The cause alleged is the detention of the train during the whole of the day in question, owing to unusual pressure of traffic arising from the occurrence of the Falkirk Tryst, and this fact the company have satisfactorily established. To this extent I think the plea is relevant. The mere amount of time by which the train was delayed in arriving at Newcastle is not, in my opinion, the material test by which the question is to be solved. I think an unusual pressure on the resources of the line, arising from such an occurrence, is one of those contingencies the risk of which is taken by a trader who employs that mode of conveyance for the carriage of his goods. The railway company in such circumstances cannot be expected to extemporise either rails or plant. As their carriages can only run on one set of rails, their means of conveying the traffic are necessarily limited; and I should be sorry to give any countenance to the notion that an action like this will lie for the detention of goods on every occasion on which the line may be blocked. It would certainly not tend to the safety of this mode of conveyance, sufficiently hazardous as it is, if railway companies were impelled by such liabilities to forward their goods trains to the detention or risk of their passenger traffic. These are contingencies incident to a mode of transit, but for which the pursuer would have been obliged to carry his pigs to another market.

If, therefore, it had been established in this case, not merely that the line at Portobello was blocked on the day in question by the accumulation of trains, but that the delay in forwarding the pursuer's goods was directly owing to that cause, I could not have found the defenders liable. But I am of opinion that this has not been proved, and that it lay with the defenders to prove it. It seems that this traffic from Granton was worked by a pilot engine, which conveyed the goods trains up to Portobello, waited at that station until the train could be shunted to the main line, and then returned to Granton to be ready for the next train. On the occasion in question the pilot engine was two hours beyond its usual time in reaching Granton for the trip on which it ought to have left Granton at 6.55. In point of fact it arrived at Granton at 7.25, and did not leave for Portobello until 8.15. I think it is sufficiently proved that the delay in reaching Granton was caused by the pressure of traffic, but of the cause of the delay in starting from Granton we have no evidence whatever. This seems to me fatal to the defence. It was known that the train from Edinburgh, leaving at 8.2, by which the consignment was to be sent, would keep its time at Portobello. The train with the pursuer's pigs, which left at 8.15, arrived at Portobello at the part farthest from the Joppa siding at 8.30, almost simultaneously with the departure from that siding of the Edinburgh train, which they accordingly missed. The very fact that the trains had been detained all day put on

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

the defenders the obligation of greater alacrity in despatching their train from Granton, and as they have entirely failed to prove any reasonable cause for the delay in starting from Granton I think they have been rightly found liable in this first demand.

I think it unnecessary to refer to the numerous authorities which were quoted to us, as I think the views I have expressed are entirely consistent with the principles which have been established both in this Court and in England.

Two considerations were pressed upon us as sufficient to exonerate the company. The first,—the delay which has taken place in enforcing this claim; the second,—the fact that the pursuer might have sent his goods by an earlier train. As regards the delay, the consideration is not without weight; but it seemed hardly disputed that the claim was intimated immediately after the occurrence, and it has not been shewn that the defenders have suffered in the way of loss of evidence by the time which has elapsed. As regards the second, I think the pursuer was entitled to expect, when he put his goods on the train at five o'clock that afternoon, that they would arrive in time to join the 8.2 train from Edinburgh.

The second claim stands in a different position. It relates to a consignment of pigs despatched by the pursuer from Granton on the 4th of August 1874. The train by which they were sent, from some cause which has not been explained, ran off the line at Windmillhill Station, six miles south of Berwick,—one of the carriages which ran off was smashed to pieces, the line was blocked, and the pigs were consequently detained for several hours. The pursuer alleges a loss of market in this case also. The question is, whether the accident was owing to the fault of the defenders. On that question I am of opinion that the fact of the occurrence of the accident does not of itself prove that the defenders were in fault. I think, both in law and in reason, it only throws upon the company the burden of shewing that they acted with reasonable care. The cause of the accident has not been ascertained, and the pursuer has entirely failed, in my opinion, to reduce the possible causes to such as the company were bound to have prevented. It is well known that such occurrences do take place from causes which remain entirely occult. It is proved that the company's servants examined the carriages at Berwick according to their usual custom, and found nothing which appeared to be wrong. In these circumstances I cannot find that the detention arose from any cause for which the defenders were responsible, or against which reasonable care ought to have provided. It was suggested that the company should have made the history of these broken waggons more complete, and I concur in thinking that this would have been desirable. But on the evidence I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to establish that fault which was essential to support his demand.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—When it is borne in mind, on the one hand, how dependent the public are on railways for the transport throughout the kingdom of goods as well as passengers, and, on the other hand, the unavoidable accidents and impediments to which railway transport is exposed, however well and carefully conducted, the importance, as well as the delicacy of the questions involved in this case can be readily understood.

The case consists of two branches, each of which depends, to some extent, upon different considerations. There is, first, the liability of the defenders for the pursuer's claim of damages arising in October 1872; and there is, secondly, his claim of damages arising in August 1874. No dispute was ultimately maintained on the part of the defenders as to the amount of the damages sued for under either of these claims, supposing their liability to be otherwise established. But the defenders deny and dispute, on various grounds, that they are liable at all.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

1. The material facts to be kept in view in reference to the pursuer's first claim of damages, and about which there is little if any dispute, are these:—For about twelve years immediately preceding the 7th of October 1872 the pursuer had been in the practice of sending weekly on Monday afternoon by the defenders' line of railway live pigs from Granton to Newcastle for the Tuesday morning market there, and for all that time the pursuer's pigs were trucked by the defenders on the afternoon of the Mondays at Granton, and forwarded to their destination by a train which regularly left that place at 6.45 for Portobello, in time to join the eight o'clock evening meat train from Edinburgh to Newcastle, where it arrived early on the Tuesday mornings, some time before the opening of the market. On the evening of the 7th of October 1872 the pursuer, in accordance with his usual practice, sent to the station at Granton seventy-one pigs for transmission, in the usual way and by the usual train, to Newcastle for the market of the following morning. They were received by the defenders, and trucked in good time for such transmission; but they were not forwarded from Granton in due and ordinary course so as to join at Portobello the eight o'clock meat train from Edinburgh, and the consequence was they did not reach Newcastle till about noon the following day, after the morning market, or the better part of it, was over, the result being that the pursuer sustained the damage which constitutes his first claim.

The pursuer maintains that the unprecedented delay which thus occurred in the transmission of his pigs to Newcastle amounted to a failure of duty on the part of the defenders as common carriers, and a breach of the contract, implied, if not expressed, under which they were to him, or, in other words, that the delay arose from negligence or other fault on the part of the defenders, for the consequences of which they are liable. The defenders deny and dispute that any such liability can in the circumstances be held to attach to them.

In regard to the law applicable to such cases as the present there did not appear at the discussion to be any difference between the parties. The defenders acknowledged that it has been correctly stated, so far at least as the pursuer's first claim of damages is concerned, by the Lord Ordinary, its application merely, in the circumstances, being disputed.

Now, there can be no doubt that a great—so far as appears, an unprecedented—delay occurred,—a delay, in my opinion, sufficient to raise such a prima facie case of liability against the defenders as to make it necessary for them to shew that it was not caused by negligence or other fault of theirs. And as they were under no warranty, and had undertaken no absolute obligation that the pursuer's pigs should arrive at Newcastle at or before any particular time, it is quite open for them to do so; and if they can shew that they did all they could in the circumstances to forward the pursuer's pigs with due and reasonable expedition, they must stand exculpated. It cannot, however, be assumed that the defenders were under no duty or obligation at all to the pursuer to carry his pigs from Granton to Portobello in time to be forwarded from there to Newcastle by the meat train referred to; for, although it may be true that they had entered into no express or special contract to this effect, it must, I think, be held that they were, in the circumstances, bound to use all due and ordinary diligence to have that done. The case comes in this way to be reduced to the question, whether the defenders did or did not use such diligence, and have shewn that they did so; or, to put it in different words, whether the delay arose, not from any negligence or fault of theirs, but from circumstances beyond their control, or, at any rate, circumstances which afford them a reasonable and justifiable excuse. The law, as so stated, is exemplified by many of the cases cited at the discussion, and I have in particular to refer to the cases of Briddon v. the Great Northern Railway Company (28 Law Journal, Exch., p. 51), where the dispute related to delay, owing to a fall of snow, in the transmission of cattle; the case of Taylor v. the Great Northern Railway Company (Law Reports, 1 Common Pleas, p. 385), which related to the transmission of hampers of poultry for the London market; and the recent case in this Court of Macdonald and Company v. the Highland Railway Company (11 Macph. 614), which related to the transmission of perishable goods (confections) from Inverness to Strome Ferry. Although here the goods were not perishable like confections, they were live animals, which could not be allowed to starve, and were, in the knowledge of the defenders, intended for a particular market, which, if they missed through delay in their transmission, the necessary consequence would be loss and damage to the pursuer.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

The question, therefore, is whether, in the circumstances of the present case, the defenders did or did not use reasonable expedition in the transmission from Granton to Newcastle of the pursuer's pigs; and this being entirely a jury question, depending upon the impression that may be taken of the evidence, I cannot, for one, help regretting that it had not been tried by a jury.

In now, however, coming to a determination on the subject, it appears to me, as I have already said, that it lies on the defenders to shew that the unusual delay which occurred in the present instance was not caused by the negligence or fault of themselves, but was the unavoidable result of the state of their line, they doing all that, under the circumstances, they were bound to do to forward the pursuer's pigs with due and reasonable expedition. This, indeed, must necessarily be so, for they and they alone can account for the delay, it being obvious that the owner of goods, like the pursuer, who does not travel along with them, could have no means or opportunity of knowing what was the cause of the delay. He has done all that was incumbent on him by proving the usage which had existed for twelve years, and that he had, in conformity with that usage, delivered his pigs at Granton, where they were received and trucked by the defenders in ample time for transmission, in ordinary course, for next morning's market at Newcastle.

It only remains, therefore, to consider whether the defenders have shewn that they did all that was reasonably incumbent on them to forward the pursuer's pigs. I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that they have failed to do so. They have not, indeed, established by sufficient evidence the cause of the delay at all. Their case amounts, in regard to this point, to little more than a statement to the effect that, owing to the Falkirk Tryst, which took place about the same time, their traffic was so great as to create such impediments on their line, especially at Portobello, as to render it impracticable by due and reasonable exertions to forward the pursuer's pigs as usual. But it does not appear to me that there is anything like sufficient evidence to support this statement. And, especially, as the defenders have altogether failed, I think, to account for the great and unusual delay which occurred in taking the pursuer's pigs from Granton to Portobello, which appears to have been the real cause of the delay complained of, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding them liable in the first of the pursuer's claims of damages.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875. Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

In forming this opinion I have not overlooked the defenders' argument, founded on the time which the pursuer allowed to elapse after his claim arose and the raising of his action, in consequence of which they, the defenders, say they are unable to account for the delay which occurred in the transmission of the pigs on the 7th of October 1872 so satisfactorily as they might otherwise have done. But, on the other hand, I cannot overlook what was stated for the pursuer, and not denied, that in point of fact he immediately, or soon after the 7th of October, intimated his claim, and called on the defenders to make reparation for his loss, and that he never afterwards departed from it. Keeping this in mind, and that the defenders must, independently of the pursuer's demand for reparation, have known at the time that his pigs were delayed in their transmission to Newcastle so as to lose the market there, contrary to the usage which had uninterruptedly and undeviatingly existed for twelve years, I have been unable to find anything sufficient in the circumstance of the pursuer's delay in bringing his action to meet or displace the view which I have otherwise taken of this branch of the case.

2. The pursuer's other claim, while it may be held to be governed by the same general principles of law, arises in circumstances so entirely different from his first, that the determination of the one can have little material effect on the determination of the other. The second claim relates to the transmission of pigs from Granton to Newcastle in August 1874. It is not, on the part of the pursuer, said that there was any delay in the departure, in this instance, of the train with the pursuer's pigs from Granton or Portobello, or any undue delay anywhere else except at or near the Windmillhill Station, a few miles south of Berwick, where, from some undiscoverable cause, or at any rate some cause which has not been explained, an accident occurred through a portion of the train running off the line, occasioning a delay of between five and six hours, and preventing the arrival of the pursuer's pigs in sufficient time for the market next morning. Now, although none of the pursuer's pigs were injured, and although the pursuer's claim is not for any such injury, but simply for loss of market in respect of their not having been timeously brought to Newcastle, I did not understand it to be disputed that the defenders would be liable in such a claim if it were shewn that the accident at Windmillhill Station arose from their negligence or other fault. Neither did I understand it to be disputed by the defenders that the delay of between five and six hours at Windmillhill of itself raised a presumption, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, that there must have been negligence or other fault on their part in the sufficiency of the railway, or of the engines or waggons composing the train, or in the mode in which it was conducted on the occasion of the accident. But what the defenders relied upon, as I understood their argument, was, that while the precise cause of the accident, and consequent detention at the Windmillhill Station could not be ascertained it was proved that they had used all due and necessary precautions, and therefore could not be subjected in damages to the pursuer. It appears to me that in law this is a good defence. In the case of Lyon v. Lamb, 22d June 1838, 16 S. 1188, where damages were claimed by a passenger against a coach proprietor for injury sustained by the breaking down of a stage coach, it was held that the presumption is against the proprietor, and that he is bound to shew that the carriage and machinery were sufficient, and that there was no negligence; but it was also held, in the circumstances of that case, that he had satisfied this obligation. And in the English case of Readhead v. Midland Railway Company, 10th May 1869 (Law Reports, 4 Queen's Bench Cases, p. 379), the same principles of decision were recognised and given effect to by the Exchequer Chamber affirming a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. These cases, which related to the safe carriage of passengers, are authorities equally applicable in the present case, where the timeous delivery of goods is in dispute.

No. 84.

Feb. 18, 1875.
Anderson v. North British Railway Co.

There being, then, no warranty, guarantee, or insurance by the defenders—implied or express—that the pursuer's pigs should, in all circumstances, be brought to Newcastle at or before a given time, it is clear and free from doubt, I think, that they cannot be made liable in the pursuer's second claim of damages if they have sufficiently shewn that the accident at Windmillhill Station was not caused by negligence or other fault on their part. The question, therefore, is narrowed to whether this has, or has not, been shewn. Now, it appears from the proof that the usual examination was made of the waggons composing the train at Berwick shortly before the accident, and that after the accident the fullest examination had also been made without anything being found to be wrong that could account for the accident. Nor do I see that anything more was, in the circumstances, incumbent on the defenders. And, if so, it follows that they are entitled to absolvitor from the second of the pursuer's claims, unless, indeed, it could be held that the defenders must be liable because they have been unable to account for the accident, and shew what its precise cause was. It was suggested as not being quite clear whether the Lord Ordinary may not have proceeded upon some such ground of liability as this; but if he did, I must own my inability to concur with him. Nor can I hold that it is sufficient to subject the defenders in liability that possibly there was something deficient in the carriage which was broken to pieces, and that that was the cause of the accident. I cannot adopt any such ground of liability as this in the face of the proof, which shews, I think, that the defenders used all necessary and proper precautions to ensure that nothing in connection with their train was defective or wrong.

The result, according to my opinion, is, in concurrence with your Lordships, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor falls to be affirmed in regard to the pursuer's first, and recalled in regard to his second, claim of damages.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor as regards the first claim of the pursuer, and of new decern against the defenders therefor, amounting to £28 sterling, with interest at the rate of five per cent from 8th October 1872 till payment, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Alter the said interlocutor as regards the second claim of the pursuer, and assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons relative thereto, and decern: Find the pursuer entitled to one-half of his taxed expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax, and to report."

RENTON & GRAY, S.S.C.—DALMAHOY & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 85.

Feb. 19, 1875.
Young v. Brown.

JANE TAYLOR OR YOUNG, Pursuer and Appellant.—Scott Moncrieff.
THOMAS BROWN, Respondent.—Alison.

Process—Appeal—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71—A. S. 10*th March* 1870.—The above Act of Sederunt provides that in appeals from the Sheriff-court the appellant shall print and box the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, within fourteen days after the process has been received by the clerk of Court, otherwise the appeal shall be held to have been abandoned (the Court having power to repone within eight days). In an appeal where the appellant had omitted to box a print of the note of appeal along with the other papers, held that, as the mistake was merely in an innocent and formal omission to comply with a regulation as to process contained in an Act of Sederunt, the Court might (although the reponing days had expired) allow it to be rectified by lodging a print of the note of appeal.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

THIS was an appeal from the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire, under the Court of Session Act, 1868. The process and note of appeal were received by the clerk on 9th January 1875, and duly marked by him of that date. The appellant on 22d January timeously printed, boxed, and lodged with the clerk a print of the record, proof, and interlocutors, and on the following day the case was in the Single Bills, and, no objections being stated by the respondent, was sent to the roll. It was afterwards discovered that the appellant, in his print, had omitted to include the note of appeal (which was written on a separate paper, and not on the interlocutor sheet, the 66th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, permitting the appeal to be minuted either way). The appellant on 16th February 1875 printed, boxed, and afterwards lodged an appendix containing the note of appeal.

The respondent lodged a note praying that, in respect of the appellant's failure to print the note of appeal, in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870, sec. 3 (sub-sec. 1), the appeal should be either dismissed, or the clerk instructed to retransmit the process to the Sheriff-clerk, with the necessary certificate of abandonment, in terms of the 3d section (sub-sec. 5) of the Act of Sederunt.

The respondent's counsel referred to the case of Park v. Weir, reported only in the Scottish Law Reporter, vol. xii. p. 11.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very narrow and critical objection. The pursuer having lost her case in the Sheriff-court appealed to the Court of Session. The appellant had the option, under sec. 66 of the Court of Session Act of 1868, either of writing her note of appeal on the interlocutor sheet, or of lodging a separate note of appeal. She made use of the form of a separate note of appeal, which was lodged on 9th January. Now, it was the duty of the appellant (under A. S. 10th March 1878, sec. iii., sub-section 1), within fourteen days of that date, "to print and box the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, unless within eight days after the process has been received by the clerk he shall have obtained an interlocutor of the Court dispensing with printing in whole or in part." She did not take this second course, and so her duty was, on the fourteenth day after lodging her appeal, to print and box the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof. She has printed the record, interlocutors, and proof, and the case was sent to the roll on 22d January 1875. Now, it appears that this print does not include the note of appeal. If the note of appeal had been written on the interlocutor sheet this would not have been so likely to have occurred. But being on a separate paper, the agent has omitted to have it printed and boxed, and it is maintained that in consequence of this the Sheriff's judgment has become final, and that the clerk's duty is to retransmit the process to the Sheriff-court. No. 85.

Feb. 19, 1875. Young v. Brown.

According to the letter of the Act of Sederunt this is a good objection. But I confess to a reluctance to sustain so technical an objection if it is possible to get the better of it. Now, it is important to observe that the provision founded on occurs in the Act of Sederunt, and not in the statute. The regulation is made in place of the 71st section of the statute, and it is important to observe that under section 71 this objection would not have been fatal. Therefore the objection stands on a regulation of a form of process made by the Court. When we are satisfied that under an Act of Sederunt only a formal and innocent omission has been made, we may allow the thing to be rectified. It has been already rectified by the agent lodging an additional print containing the note of appeal.

I may mention that the case of Park v. Weir[1] has not been accurately reported. An appeal had been taken, and then fallen from, and the process was returned by the clerk to the Sheriff-court. The process never was before the Court, although it had been in the clerk's hands. The appellant brought a second appeal, but the Sheriff's judgment had become final.

While I am, therefore, for repelling the objection, it is impossible to absolve the appellant's agent from all blame, and I think that the appellant should be found liable in expenses.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the note for the respondent, No. 20 of process, and heard counsel for both parties, refuse the prayer of said note: Hold the omission to print, box, and lodge the note of appeal obviated by the print appendix of 16th February current, now lodged, containing the note of appeal; but find the appellant liable in the expenses of the said note, No. 20 of process, and the discussion thereon, which modify to £3, 3s., and for which decern against the appellant for payment to the respondent."

R. A. VEITCH, S.S.C.—JOHN GILL, L.A.—Agents.

MRS MARGARET INGLIS OR ADDISON AND OTHERS, Petitioners.— M'Laren. No. 86.

Feb. 23, 1875. Addison, &c.

Process—Proof—Writ—Attestation—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, sec. 39).—A person died leaving a trust-disposition bearing to be subscribed by himself and attested by two witnesses, but without a testing-clause. His representatives presented a petition under sec. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, craving a proof, and thereafter to have it declared that the deed was subscribed by the granter and witnesses. The Court allowed a proof by commission, and thereafter found and declared as craved.

THIS was a petition presented by the widow and daughters of James Anderson, engineer, Glasgow, under section 39 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.* The petition stated that Addison died in December 1ST DIVISION. B.

[1] October 15, 1874, 12 Scottish Law Reporter, p. 11.

* "No deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect, according to its

No. 86. Feb. 23, 1875. Addison, &c.

1874, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement bearing to be subscribed by himself and two witnesses; that the testing-clause was not filled up, and the precise date of signing was not known to the petitioners, also that the names of the trustees as originally written were deleted and others substituted in the testator's own handwriting.

The prayer was in these terms,—"To allow the petitioners a proof of the averments contained in this petition, and thereafter to declare that the trust-disposition and settlement above mentioned was subscribed by the said James Addison, the granter or maker thereof, and by the said George Miller and John Alexander Rankin, the witnesses by whom the said trust-disposition and settlement bears to be attested [and that the said trust-disposition and settlement is a valid deed, and entitled to effect according to its legal import;] and to find the petitioners entitled to the expenses of the present proceedings out of the funds of the trust-estate of the said James Addison; or to do otherwise in the premises," &c. The Court directed it to be amended by omitting the words in brackets.

The petitioners stated that it was doubtful upon the authorities whether the testing-clause could now be filled up after the testator's death.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The 39th section of the recent Conveyancing Act provides that no instrument subscribed by the granter, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect because of any informality of execution. The burden, however, of proving that the deed was subscribed by the granter and witnesses is laid on the party using or upholding it. The present petition has been presented for the purpose of having it declared that the trust-disposition was subscribed by the maker, and the witnesses by whom it bears to be attested, and the petitioners ask for a proof that that was the case.

The condition of the deed, apart from the difficulty about the names of the trustees, is that the testing-clause has not been filled up. Whether that case was immediately within the contemplation of the framers of the statute I do not know, but it certainly falls within the meaning of the words of the clause, provided the testing-clause cannot now be filled up.

If the position of the case had been merely that the testing-clause had not been filled up, but could still be filled up, I am not sure whether it would have fallen within the scope of the statute. But I think there is sufficient doubt whether the testing-clause could be filled up to induce us to apply the enactment. I am, therefore, for allowing a proof to be taken by commission.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having resumed consideration of legal import, because of any informality of execution; but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same; and such proof may be led in any action or proceeding in which such deed, instrument, or writing is founded on or objected to, or in a special application to the Court of Session, or to the Sheriff within whose jurisdiction the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing was subscribed by such granter or maker and witnesses."

---

[1] Hill v. Arthur, Dec. 6, 1870, 9 Macph. 223, 43 Scot. Jur. 171; Dick's Tutors v. Dick, 1798, Hume, 908; M'Pherson v. M'Pherson, Feb. 7, 1855, 17 D. 357, 27 Scot. Jur. 149.

No. 86.

Feb. 23, 1875.
Addison, &c.

the amended petition and heard counsel for the petitioners, Allow them a proof that the disposition and settlement produced and founded on in the petition was subscribed by the now deceased James Addison, mentioned in the petition as maker thereof, and by George Miller and John Alexander Rankin, also mentioned in the petition as witnesses of the subscription of the said James Addison: Grant diligence at the petitioners' instance against witnesses and havers, and grant commission for their examination to Professor Berry, Glasgow."

Professor Berry having reported the evidence,

THE COURT, on 13th March, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the amended petition, with the report of commission by Professor Berry, No. 16 of process, and heard counsel, Find and declare that the trust-disposition and settlement in the petition mentioned was subscribed by the now deceased James Addison, as the maker thereof, and by George Miller and John Alexander Rankin, as witnesses attesting the subscription of the said James Addison, and decern."

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1875.
Dow & Co. v.
Union Bank.

W. F. DOW AND COMPANY AND F. JACOBSEN, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—Brown.

THE UNION BANK OF SCOTLAND, Respondents.—Lancaster—Dundas.

Bankruptcy—19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 25, 108, &c.—In a sequestration a creditor, being a brother of the bankrupt, produced, as the only voucher of his debt, a decree in absence obtained by him against the bankrupt within sixty days of bankruptcy,—objection to his vote sustained.

Bankruptcy—Affidavit.—The Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856, sec. 25, provides that when a creditor is a corporation, an affidavit "by the secretary, manager, cashier, clerk, or other principal officer of such corporation shall be sufficient." Held that an assistant manager of a joint-stock banking company was a principal officer of the bank in the sense of the Act.

Bankruptcy—Affidavit.—In a sequestration the Sheriff allowed an addition to be made to an affidavit by one of the creditors. The addition was made by the deponent, and initialed by him and by the magistrate before whom the original deposition had been made.

Objections (1) that the addition was not part of the oath, and (2) that it was not duly authenticated, repelled.

Bankruptcy—Affidavit—Valuation of Securities.—A creditor used an arrestment within sixty days of the bankruptcy of his debtor. In his affidavit he deponed that he put no value upon it. Objection that he ought to have put a value upon it repelled, in respect that by sec. 108 the arrestment was not effectual to the creditor.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Mid-Lothian.
M.

IN the sequestration of Henry Jacobsen, merchant, Glasgow, the first deliverance in which was dated 26th December 1874, a motion for renewing personal protection to the bankrupt was carried by a majority in value of the creditors of £667 against £577.

The Union Bank, the only creditor in the minority, appealed to the Sheriff, on the ground that the real majority had been against the motion. The chief objection stated by the appellants was to the vote of Frederick Jacobsen, a creditor for £590. He was a brother of the bankrupt, and claimed upon a decree in absence obtained in the Court of Session against the bankrupt within sixty days of the sequestration. None of the grounds and warrants of the decree were produced.

No. 87.
Feb. 23, 1875.
Dow & Co. v. Union Bank.

The creditors in the majority on their side objected to the vote of the Union Bank, in respect of the terms of their affidavit. It bore to be made by John Affleck, banker in Glasgow, and one of the principal officers of the Union Bank. Originally the affidavit concluded as follows:—"Depones that no part of said debt has been paid or compensated to the said bank, and that they hold no other person than the bankrupt bound for the debt, and no security for the same.—All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God. JNO. AFFLECK, Deponent. JOSEPH A. WRIGHT, J.P." But the Sheriff allowed the following addition to be made on the margin before the words "All which is truth."—"Other than arrestment of the sum of £50 in the hands of the Royal Bank of Scotland, being sum in deposit-receipt, dated on or about 3d December 1874, in name of the said Henry Jacobsen, conform to execution of arrestment, dated 18th December 1874. Further depones, That the deponent and said bank put no value on said arrestment in security, so that it cannot be deducted from said sum of £577." The addition was initialed by the deponent and the magistrate.

Mr Affleck signed a mandate to vote in the sequestration—"Jno. Affleck, assist. manager."

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 15th January 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains said appeal: Recalls the resolution whereby protection was renewed to the bankrupt for six months, said resolution not being supported by a majority in value."

Dow and Company and F. Jacobsen, creditors, appealed to the Court of Session. They objected to the affidavit of the Union Bank (1) Mr Affleck, being assistant manager, was not the principal officer.[1] (2) The marginal addition was not made upon oath. (3) Being only initialed, it was not sufficiently authenticated.[2] (4) The bank were bound to put a value on their security.[3] (5) F. Jacobsen's claim was good. In Turnbull v. M'Naughton[4] the distinction was taken between a decree cognitionis causa tantum and a decree in absence against a debtor.

The respondents cited the cases undernoted.[5]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question decided by the Sheriff-substitute refers to the claim of Frederick Jacobsen, and as regards that question I have no hesitation in agreeing with the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute. It has been decided that a bill or other document of debt recently granted to a conjunct and confident person is not good as a voucher in a question of voting. But what the claimant founded on here was a decree of this Court. He produces the extract-decree without anything else. It appears to me that that decree is certainly

[1] 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79, sec. 25.—"When the creditor is a corporation, an oath of verity made as aforesaid by the secretary, manager, cashier, clerk, or other principal officer of such corporation, shall be sufficient." . . . Anderson v. Monteith, July 7, 1847, 9 D. 1432, 19 Scot. Jur. 634; Campbell v. Myles, May 27, 1853, 15 D. 685, 25 Scot. Jur. 413.

[2] Mackersy v. Guthrie, March 7, 1829, 7 S. 656; Miller v. Lambert, June 27, 1848, 10 D. 1419, 20 Scot. Jur. 515.

[3] Gibson v. Greig, Dec. 17, 1853, 16 D. 233, 26 Scot. Jur. 120; Woodside v. Esplin, July 15, 1847, 9 D. 1486, 19 Scot. Jur. 657; M'Ewen v. Cleugh, Dec. 7, 1842, 5 D. 273, 15 Scot. Jur. 106; Hay v. Durham, Feb. 5, 1850, 12 D. 676, 22 Scot. Jur. 242.

[4] June 27, 1850, 12 D. 1097, 22 Scot. Jur. 505.

[5] Dyce v. Paterson, Dec. 19, 1846, 9 D. 310, 19 Scot. Jur. 144; Anderson v. Guild, June 13, 1852, 14 D. 866, 24 Scot. Jur. 519.

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1875.
Dow & Co. v. Union Bank.

not a better voucher than a bill or other document of debt which bears at least the bankrupt's acknowledgment of the debt. But this decree shews nothing more than this, that a claim was made and not resisted by the bankrupt. The grounds of action are in no way indicated; and the grounds and warrants of the decree are not produced.

The only remaining question is whether the vote of the Union Bank is liable to any serious objection. Several objections have been taken, some of them of a strictly technical kind. They all arise on the face of the affidavit. It bears to have been made by "John Affleck, banker in Glasgow, and one of the principal officers of the Union Bank," and is signed by him. It is said that he is not one of the principal officers of the bank. The evidence offered of that is a mandate to vote, signed "Jno. Affleck, assist. manager," thereby shewing that there is a manager over him, so that he is not the highest officer. The question is whether that being so, he is qualified under the 25th section of the statute. It is argued that in every bank there is one principal officer, and that he is the only party who can make the affidavit. I think that is too strict a construction. Probably in every bank all the officials are in some sense under a single head. Yet there may be more than one principal officer. For example, if the cashier is the head official of a bank, surely the secretary is also a principal officer. It seems to be sufficient compliance with the statute if the deponent is in the position of one of the principal officers, and, therefore, I think this objection is not well-founded.

The next question is, whether the affidavit is to be read with or without the marginal addition. The amendment was made by the authority of the Sheriff under the 51st section of the Bankrupt Act. The object of the provision is to prevent votes being rejected on mere matters of form which can easily be set right at the time. Accordingly, the Sheriff, finding that an arrestment had been used, thought it necessary that it should be mentioned as a security, and directed Affleck to make this addition, which we find on the margin initialed by the deponent and the magistrate. It is said that this addition has not the sanction of the oath. I am of opinion that that is a bad objection. The addition is inserted into the affidavit by the deponent. I cannot doubt that that makes it part of the oath, and that the deponent intended to swear, and did swear to this addition as much as to the original affidavit. There was no necessity for a fresh oath. It is like an explanation or addition made by a witness, which, though given after a considerable interval, forms part of his deposition.

The next question is whether the addition is sufficiently authenticated. I am of opinion that it is. It is not disputed that the initials were placed there by the deponent and the magistrate. But it is said that the addition cannot be incorporated with the affidavit without full subscription. This addition, however, seems to stand in the same position as amendments on any ordinary judicial proceedings, such as are in use every day to be authenticated by initials only, and to require subscriptions would be to introduce a rule of great severity for no reasonable purpose. The cases of Mackersy v. Guthrie and Miller v. Lambert were very different. In the former the marginal addition was not authenticated at all, and in the latter it was signed by the party, but not by the magistrate. But, at all events, those were not cases under the 51st section, because they occurred before the power of amendment existed.

The only remaining question is, whether the affidavit, taken along with the marginal addition, is a good affidavit under the Act? The objection is that it does not put a value on the security which is said to have been constituted by

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1875.
Dow & Co. v. Union Bank.

the arrestment dated 18th December 1874. Now, it must be kept in view that the first deliverance in the sequestration was on 26th December. That date did not require to be stated in the affidavit, because it was necessarily present to the minds of all parties to the sequestration. That being so, when the bank say they have used an arrestment dated 18th December, it is equivalent to saying, in so many words, "we have used an arrestment, but it is of no use to us. Being transferred to the trustee under section 108, it is now his arrestment." The terms of the clause make the matter abundantly clear. "The sequestration shall, as at the date thereof, be equivalent to an arrestment in execution and decree of forthcoming, and to an executed or completed poinding; and no arrestment or poinding executed of the funds or effects of the bankrupt on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration shall be effectual; and such funds or effects, or the proceeds of such effects, if sold, shall be made forthcoming to the trustee." The expression of section 40 of the former statute, 54 Geo. III. c. 137, is somewhat different, but the meaning is the same. The older enactment provides that the arrestment shall not "give a preference to the arresting creditor," while the present enactment is that the arrestment shall not be "effectual." But that means effectual to the arresting creditor, and the only way in which it could be effectual to him is by securing him a preference. It is, notwithstanding this, an effectual arrestment in other respects; for it has created a nexus on the funds arrested, and secured that they shall be forthcoming to the trustee, while, if the arrestment had not been used, these funds might have been paid to the bankrupt prior to the sequestration, and squandered by him before the trustee's title came into existence. It is impossible, therefore, to say that this was a security which the creditor was bound to value and deduct from his debt. It was no longer a security to him. If it was of any use, it was for the benefit of the creditors. This is no new doctrine, for in the case of Allan,[1] which I referred to, it was held under the old Act that where a trustee proposed to a creditor that he should loose his arrestment, and complained to the Court because he refused to do so, the trustee had mistaken his position. As Lord Mackenzie said,—"The trustee committed a mistake in asking Allan and Sons to loose their arrestments. So far from the trustee desiring to have the arrestments loosed, I think he should have desired them to be held as standing good for the benefit of all concerned. If they were loosed, the subjects arrested might be exposed perhaps to hazard of different sorts, whereas the benefit of the diligence just accrues to the bankrupt estate if it be not loosed." That doctrine is precisely applicable; and it appears to me that the whole of the provisions for valuing securities are quite inapplicable. The object of these provisions is that the creditor should not be allowed to embrace in his claim those portions of his debt for which he is entitled to rank preferably; and secondly, that the valuation made in the affidavit may enable the trustee to take the creditor at his word, and acquire his security in exchange for the amount, with the addition of 20 per cent. But supposing this security had been valued, it could not have been assigned to the creditors or the trustee, because it was theirs already.

I, therefore, think that all the objections are unfounded, and that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment should be adhered to.

Lord Deas concurred.

---

[1] Allan v. Fyfe, Nov. 28, 1835, 14 S. 80.

No. 87.

Feb. 23, 1875.
Dow & Co. v. Union Bank.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The only point in the case which I have felt to be one of difficulty is the question whether the bank were bound to put a value on a security which they state to be of no value. That is a subtle question, and may be a nice question, and I reserve my opinion upon it. I am not satisfied that Lord Ivory's opinion in the case of Gibson v. Greig has been correctly ascertained, and I am still less satisfied that Lord Rutherfurd concurred with Lord Ivory to the extent now urged. But we have a satisfactory ground of decision in the 108th section, to which reference has been made.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

JOHN WRIGHT, W.S.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875.
Allan v. Shaw and King.

THOMAS ALLAN (Inspector of Poor of Cambusnethan), Pursuer.—Alison.
JOHN SHAW (Inspector of Poor of Kilbarchan), Defender.—J. G. Smith—Brown.
JAMES KING (Inspector of Poor of Shotts), Defender.—J. A. Crichton.

Poor—Settlement—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 76—Continuity of Residence.—A miner, who rented a room in his father-in-law's house in the parish of S, went to work in the neighbouring parish of M, at first returning to visit his wife on Saturdays, but after about two months he took a house in M, to which he removed his wife and furniture. After another month he returned to S. Held that the continuity of residence required by the 76th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act for a residential settlement had been broken.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. I.

ON 16th October 1871 Charles Hood, with his wife and children, became chargeable as a pauper in the parish of Cambusnethan. He died on 30th October 1871, and his widow and children continued to be supported by the parish of Cambusnethan. This action was raised by the parish of Cambusnethan against Kilbarchan, the parish of the pauper's birth, and against Shotts as the parish of alleged residential settlement, for repayment of £49, 17s. 8d., disbursed for the maintenance of Hood and his family.

It was admitted for Kilbarchan that Hood was born in that parish, but it was averred that he resided continuously, within the meaning of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, between May or June 1861 and October 1866 in the parish of Shotts, and thereby acquired a residential settlement in that parish for himself and family, which he retained. Shotts denied that there had been such continuous residence.

Upon the 20th October 1874 the Lord Ordinary, "in respect that the defenders admit that one or other of them is liable for the support and maintenance of the paupers sued for," allowed the defenders a proof of their averments.

The result of the proof is thus stated by the Lord Ordinary in the note to his interlocutor of 8th December 1874;—"According to the proof, Charles Hood resided and worked as a miner at Bowhousebog, in the parish of Shotts, from about the month of July 1861 to 31st December 1861. He then left that place for Garscadden, in the parish of Old Monkland, where he stayed about a fortnight, but, not finding the work at that place to suit him, he returned to Annieshill, in the parish of Shotts, and resided there until about a week before his marriage in 1862 to Mary Shields, when he removed to Bowhousebog, in the same parish, where he resided until 9th July 1863. He was married on 3d May 1862. After the marriage Charles Hood and his wife resided in a room, which he rented and furnished, in her father's house in Bowhousebog. On 9th July 1863 Charles Hood went to Rosehall, in the parish of Old Monkland, to work as a miner, and he remained at Rosehall until 2d October 1863, when he returned to Bowhousebog, where he resided at first in the room in his father-in-law's house which he formerly rented, and afterwards in houses taken by him, until 25th October 1866. He then left for Clydesdale Row in the parish of Cambusnethan, and resided there until 24th June 1867.

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875. Allan v. Shaw and King.

"The question between the parish of Kilbarchan, in which Charles Hood was born, and the parish of Shotts, in which it is averred that Charles Hood acquired a residential settlement, is, whether his residence from 9th July to 2d October 1863 in Rosehall, in the parish of Old Monkland, interrupted the continuity of Charles Hood's residence, and prevented him from acquiring a settlement by residence in the parish of Shotts. It is important, therefore, to ascertain what was the character of that residence of twelve weeks in Rosehall.

"According to the evidence of his wife, Charles Hood left Bowhousebog for Rosehall, which is nine or ten miles from Bowhousebog, to better his condition. During the whole of his residence at Rosehall he worked at his trade of a miner in the pit there. For the first three weeks or thereby he lived in lodgings at Rosehall. During that time his wife resided at Bowhousebog, in the room which he continued to retain and pay rent for in his father-in-law's house, and her husband supported her, and went to see her on the Saturdays. It is proved by Andrew Lees, the contractor under whom he was working at Rosehall, that Charles Hood's wife came to Rosehall and told him that, if he was going to work there, he was to take a house. Charles Hood accordingly took a house in the Rows, near the pit at Rosehall, and removed his furniture to that house from the room in Bowhousebog, which he then gave up, and his wife and he thereafter resided in that house at Rosehall, as sole tenants thereof, until 2d October 1863. His wife depones that he only lived in lodgings at Rosehall for about three weeks before he took a house. Andrew Lees depones that he only had the house at Rosehall for a month before he left on 2d October 1863. It does not clearly appear from the proof whether he lived in lodgings or resided in the house which he took during the other five weeks of the twelve weeks that he remained at Rosehall. Charles Hood was not under contract to work for any specific period while at Rosehall, and was not obliged to give notice before leaving. He left on a day's notice, and returned to Bowhousebog, where he and his wife again took the room in his father-in-law's house in which they had formerly resided, and thereafter resided in Bowhousebog until 25th October 1866. His wife depones that during the time she and her husband lived together in Rosehall he had nothing to do with Bowhousebog or any other place in the parish of Shotts. According to Andrew Lees' evidence, Charles Hood's reason for leaving Rosehall, and returning to Bowhousebog, was that he thought that he could make a shilling or eighteenpence more wages per day at Bowhousebog. Lees also says that Charles Hood spoke frequently about going away for a fortnight before he went, but his wife states that while staying at Rosehall he did not say anything to her about going back to Bowhousebog, although she repeatedly asked him to go back."

The Lord Ordinary, on 8th December, pronounced this interlocutor:—

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875.
Allan v. Shaw and King.

"Finds that Charles Hood, the husband of the pauper Mrs Mary Shields or Hood, and the father of the paupers Marion Hood, Mary Hood, George Hood, and Charles Hood, was born in the parish of Kilbarchan; that he became chargeable as an invalid pauper in the parish of Cambusnethan on 16th October 1871; and that he died in that parish on or about 30th October 1871: Finds that the said Charles Hood did not, at any time before he and his wife and children became objects of parochial relief, reside for five years continuously in the parish of Shotts: Finds that the settlement of the said Charles Hood was, on 16th October 1871, in the parish of Kilbarchan as the parish of his birth: Decerns against the defender, John Shaw, inspector of poor for the parish of Kilbarchan, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Assoilzies the defender, James King, inspector of poor for the parish of Shotts, from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender, John Shaw, liable in expenses to the pursuer, and also to the defender, James King: Allows accounts," &c.*

Shaw, inspector of Kilbarchan, reclaimed.

Argued for the reclaimer;—Hood's absence at Rosehall did not infer a breach of the continuity of his residence in Shotts. During the earlier period of that absence it was not doubtful that he was residing, within the meaning of the statute, in Shotts, because his house and wife were there, and he visited them on Saturdays.[1] Nor did the absence from Shotts when his wife was absent also, and the furniture removed, infer a breach

* NOTE.—(After the narrative given above)—"Such being the facts as disclosed by the proof, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that Charles Hood's residence in Rosehall, at all events during the time that he and his wife kept house there, was an industrial residence, entirely separate from his previous and subsequent residence in Bowhousebog. If, after lodging for three or thereby weeks at Rosehall, he had returned to Bowhousebog, and had never given up his residence in that place until 25th October 1866, that absence might have been regarded as a tentative proceeding on his part to see whether the work at Rosehall would suit him. But after he gave up his residence at Bowhousebog he ceased to have any connection with that place, and during the time that he and his wife had a house and resided in Rosehall, that house was his only residence or home. His absence from Bowhousebog was not accidental, and his residence in Rosehall was not incidental to or in any way connected with his former residence in Bowhousebog, but was, the Lord Ordinary thinks, entirely subversive of it. He left Bowhousebog in the hope of getting better wages at Rosehall, and he afterwards returned to Bowhousebog because he expected to get higher wages there. But for that expectation he might not have returned to Bowhousebog.

"It was maintained for the parish of Kilbarchan that Charles Hood, during the whole time of his residence at Rosehall, intended to return to Bowhousebog. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no such intention is proved. All that appears from the proof is that he spoke to Lees about returning to Bowhousebog for a fortnight before he went, and that he did not do so to his wife. But, supposing that such intention were proved, the fact is that for at least four weeks he had an industrial residence in Rosehall, and had no house in or other connection with Bowhousebog. The Lord Ordinary considers that mere intention to return to Bowhousebog, even if proved to have existed during the whole residence at Rosehall, cannot, in the circumstances of this case, affect the decision. The question here is one of fact, and not of intention.

"Such being the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of the proof, he is of opinion that Charles Hood did not, during the period between July 1865 and 25th October 1866, reside for five years continuously in the parish of Shotts, and that he did not acquire a settlement by residence therein under section 76 of the Poor-Law Amendment Act."

[1] Greig v. Miles and Simpson, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1132, 39 Scot. Jur. 617; Milne v. Ramsay, May 23, 1872, 10 Macph. 731, 44 Scot. Jur. 435.

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875. Allan v. Shaw and King.

of continuity. The pauper had not abandoned Shotts as the place of his residence; his life in Old Monkland was tentative and experimental, his intention being to return to Shotts if Old Monkland did not suit, and he did return. If it was true, as was now generally received, that the word "continuously" in the 76th section of the statute was open to construction, the intention of the pauper could not be left out of view. But there never was any intention to sever connection with Shotts, and deliberately to adopt another parish. No doubt the removal of the wife and furniture was an overt act of a decided kind, but the force of that circumstance was sufficiently displaced by the fact that the removal was the act of the wife herself, and, apart from intention, there was no absolute severance of ties with the parish of Shotts. The pauper had always his father-in-law's house to return to in a parish which he had made the main place of his residence for a number of years. Separatim, assuming entire severance from the parish of previous residence it was still an open question whether, the animus revertendi not being excluded, absence for such a short period as a month would be held to infer a breach of continuity. Longer periods of similar absence had been held as not affecting this result.[1]

Argued for Shotts;—When the character of the absence was so distinctly ascertained as here length of time was not of much moment. Here it was proved that during Hood's last month at Rosehall his connection with the parish of Shotts was completely severed. The intention of the pauper as regards his residence was not an element in the inquiry.[2]

At advising,—

Lord Neaves.—This is a case of importance to the poor-law, and has been well brought under our notice. There is undoubtedly a conflict of authority; and we have to decide between opposing decisions. The safest rule to follow seems to me to be that adopted by the Lord Ordinary. The paupers themselves are not affected by the question, nor are the parishes probably much interested, because success one day is failure on another. It is better for all parties to have a fixed rule, if it be at all a fair one. When a person residing in one parish transports himself by a plain overt act into another, and there goes on working as he did in the parish he has left, that, I think, should be held as a severance from the one parish and the adoption of the other. I think that this man, when his wife came to reside with him at Rosehall, did adopt Old Monkland as his residence in the same sense in which he had previously resided in Shotts.

One recommendation of this view is that we are thereby saved from saying how much or how little in particular cases will infer a breach of continuity. That would be a perplexing question, and we should require to adopt a sort of tariff or sliding scale. I am against establishing an arbitrary presumption in this class of cases.

---

[1] Mackenzie v. Cameron, Dec. 10, 1858, 21 D. 93, 31 Scot. Jur. 66; Hay v. Cumming, June 6, 1851, 13 D. 1057, 23 Scot. Jur. 490; see Hutchison v. Fraser, Feb. 11, 1858, 20 D. 545, 30 Scot. Jur. 294, and opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk therein.

[2] Opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Crosby v. Taylor and Greig, Oct. 21, 1869, 8 Macph. 43, 42 Scot. Jur. 9.

Reference was also made to M'Gregor v. Watson, March 7, 1860, 22 D. 965, 32 Scot. Jur. 410; Beattie v. Kirkwood and Adamson, May 30, 1861, 23 D. 915, 33 Scot. Jur. 461; Beattie v. Leighton and Mitchell, Feb. 10, 1863, 1 Macph. 434, 35 Scot. Jur. 260; Hamilton v. Kirkwood and Smith, Nov. 13, 1863, 2 Macph. 107, 36 Scot. Jur. 49; Hastings v. Hughan and Semple, Jan. 27, 1866, 8 P.-L. Mag. 331; Hewat v. Hunter, July 6, 1866, 4 Macph. 1033, 38 Scot. Jur. 525.

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875.
Allan v. Shaw and King.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I cannot resist the conclusion that the continuity of the pauper's residence in the parish of Shotts was interrupted. The question might have involved some difficulty had it been raised at the end of the first two months after he himself had removed from that parish, because during that time he had left there in his former residence his wife, and any furniture of which he may have been possessed; and moreover he appears to have returned every Saturday, and lived with his wife till the Monday. But a material change took place at the end of two months. His wife then ceased entirely to reside at Bowhousebog in the parish of Shotts, and went to live with her husband, the pauper, at Rosehall, in the parish of Old Monkland; and all his furniture was also then taken to Rosehall, where he rented a dwelling-house. In these circumstances I cannot entertain any serious doubt that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion.

I wish, however, to guard myself from being supposed to hold that personal presence in a parish is indispensable in all circumstances to the continuity of a residential settlement in it in the sense of the poor-law. That would be contrary to reason. A man who has his dwelling-house in a parish will not lose his settlement there on account of occasional incidental and temporary absence in the course of the ordinary transactions or exigencies of life. He may, for instance, go out of the parish temporarily, to see a sick relation; or he may be obliged, in obedience to the laws of his country, to be absent occasionally, for example, to attend the assizes in another parish as a juror or witness; or he may, if a seafaring man, require to be away from his house and family for longer or shorter periods of time in the prosecution of his lawful calling. These are some of many illustrations which might be given.

A good deal was said about the length of time during which a person must be absent in order to cut the continuity of residence. I am not inclined to think the duration of absence a good test. In the present case, according to the evidence, Hood, the pauper, was about a month out of the parish of Shotts with his wife and furniture. I rather think that if the period had been reduced to a week, or even less, the continuity of his residence in Shotts would have been equally broken. In short, whenever it is clear that a pauper had for some time, long or short, entirely given up his residence in a parish, it is of little importance how soon he may go back to it, for in my opinion the continuity, if once interrupted, cannot be restored. The residence, in order to establish a settlement, must begin to run de novo.

The element of intention is the only other point I have to notice. In a certain sense, and in many cases, intention cannot be disregarded. Take the case of a person leaving the parish where his residence is to visit a sick relation, or for some other temporary purpose. In such cases the intention cannot be left out of account. But in these and in all poor-law cases the intention must be gathered from the positive acts of the party. Mere intention as manifested by words only, and not carried into action, can have no effect in acquiring or losing a residential settlement.

Having regard to these considerations, I concur with Lord Neaves in opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor under review ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to the same result. The question, in cases like the present, turns upon the meaning and application of the statutory word "continuously." In order to found a residential settlement, the pauper, or the party

No. 88.

Feb. 24, 1875.
Allan v. Shaw and King.

on whom the settlement depends, must have "resided for five years continuously." The question is what break or interruption in its nature or in its extent will prevent the residence from being in the sense of the statute "continuous."

Now, speaking generally, I think continuous residence will be interrupted when the residence of the pauper in a parish has been so severed and put an end to that he no longer belongs to that parish but to a new parish. I do not think it turns so much on the mere duration of personal absence, although that may be an element. In the case of a man flitting with his family and furniture, and taking up a new residence and new employment in a different parish, there is almost as complete a severance the first day as after a lapse of time, at least a very short time indeed will do. It is like cutting a chain; it does not matter how many links are taken out,—the complete removal of one link will sever continuity as well as the removal of many, and so I rather look to the nature and character of the absence or non-residence than to its mere duration. And the change of residence is always of more importance than mere personal absence. Indeed personal absence, even for a considerable time, will not interrupt continuity of residence if the house or residence is maintained, or if the absence is only incidental to the residence. In the present case, I think there was sufficient severance from the parish of Shotts to prevent the pauper's residence in that parish from being "continuous."

It is said that Hood's residence in Old Monkland was experimental, and perhaps it was so at first. But the experiment was not to last for ever. After a period not very well fixed,—for there is a discrepancy between the evidence of the widow and of Andrew Lees,—the experiment came to an end. Hood sent for his wife and furniture, gave up his house, and ceased to pay rent in one parish, and took and occupied another house, and began to pay rent in another parish. When he did so, I think his connection with Shotts entirely ceased. It must be remembered that this is a case of a householder. Difficult cases may arise in regard to single servants or mere lodgers, who have no home of their own, and no family or furniture. Everything here points to a complete severance from the parish of Shotts. I do not think that it matters that Hood had been living with his father-in-law. Having a father-in-law in a place is not sufficient to keep up a constructive residence, but his father-in-law was merely his landlord, to whom he paid rent for an unfurnished room, which he furnished and made his own. Even if the period of absence had been shorter it would have been sufficient to break the continuity. I do not, however, altogether lay out of view the duration. The last part of Hood's residence at Rosehall, in which he had a house there, throws some light upon the former part; and I rather think that if we had had to consider whether there was a new settlement in the parish of Old Monkland, his residence there must be held to have commenced with his going there on 9th July 1863, and not merely from the date of the removal of his wife and furniture. There was in all three months absence, and looking to its character and incidents I think continuity of residence in Shotts was interrupted thereby.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur, but I think the case a very narrow one. In these poor-law cases it is very important to find some certain and intelligible rule, which can be easily followed. I do not think that the term "continuous residence" has by construction been made any clearer now than it was immediately after the passing of the Poor-Law Amendment Act. It is impossible to give a definition which shall fit all cases, or even most cases. The construction must vary according to the social condition of the country, and the particular circumstances of the case. It does not, however, follow that the practical administration of the poor-law may not be regulated by general principles sufficiently intelligible.

No. 88.
Feb. 24, 1875.
Allan v. Shaw and King.

The question is, whether the parish of Shotts is to be liberated from a burden which it would have had to bear if Hood's residence in the parish had been continuous for five years. The parish says that his absence from July to October 1863 has this effect. The question is as to the application of a statutory rule, and, I think, is about as narrow as well could be. Up to 9th July 1863 Hood lived with his father-in-law in the parish of Shotts. So far as he had any household goods they were in his father-in-law's house. He left the house to try to get work at Rosehall, in the parish of Old Monkland, but he did not mean to transfer his establishment at first. His wife objected to that arrangement, and after some weeks he took one of the colliers' houses at Rosehall, and lived there with his wife, it appears for about a month. During the last fortnight he spoke of going back to Bowhousebog, and he did go back. So far as the intention of the man is concerned it is not proved that he intended to remain at Rosehall. On the contrary, it appears pretty clearly that he had formed no such intention. But, on the other hand, his connection with the parish of Shotts was completely severed in point of fact. He left nothing behind him, and there is as little indication of an intention to return when he left as there is of an intention to remain at Rosehall. We must, I think, look to the fact, which must be our guide, and although I incline to think the shortness of the absence of more weight than it has received from your Lordships I do not differ from the judgment.

The pursuer having moved for the expenses of attending in the Inner-House, counsel for Kilbarchan opposed the motion, on the ground that the pursuer had no interest in the discussion of the reclaiming note,[1] and referred to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 20th October 1874. The Court refused the motion.

THE COURT adhered.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—A. J. DICKSON, S.S.C.—WADDELL & M'INTOSH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 89.
Feb. 24, 1875.
Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mitchell, &c.
2D DIVISION.
R.

MALCOLM MUNRO MACKENZIE AND OTHERS (Mackenzie's Trustees), First Parties.—Fraser.
MARY JANE SIMPSON MITCHELL AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—M'Laren.
SOPHIA MACKENZIE, Third Party.—J. M. Duncan.

Succession—Testament.—A testator directed his testamentary trustees to divide his whole estate equally among his sons and daughters, with the proviso that, should his only unmarried daughter's "share of the division not amount to £150 per annum," the trustees were to "invest in good and safe security as much as will realise that amount," but gave no directions as to the disposal of the capital so invested. The daughter's share of the estate was not sufficient by itself to provide £150 a-year. Held that the additional sum which it was necessary to invest for this purpose belonged to the other children, from whose shares it had been taken, subject to the life interest of the daughter.

JOHN BELL, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

[1] Greig v. Miles and Simpson, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1132.

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

WILLIAM STEPHEN AND OTHERS, Complainers.—D.-F. Clark—Brown.
WILLIAM AITON, Respondent.—Asher—Jamieson.

Property—Harbour—Statute—Private Act—Right to Beach Boats.—The fishermen of the sea-coast village of B had from time immemorial laid up their boats for the winter on certain ground belonging to the proprietor of the village, to whom they paid a rent (which from an early period was £1, 17s. 6d.), for their houses and certain other privileges, the right of laying up the boats not being specified in the agreements. In 1845 the proprietor obtained an Act of Parliament for the improvement of the harbour of the village, which authorised him to levy dues on all vessels entering the harbour,—and "on all boats laid up at B for the winter season, 5s." He subsequently charged 5s. from each fisherman on that account, the rent being diminished to that extent. The same system was for some years continued by a new proprietor who purchased the estate in 1865. In 1874 he asserted a right to exclude the fishermen. In a suspension and interdict brought against him by the fishermen, held that they were entitled to the use of the ground for laying up their boats on payment of 5s. until the proprietor provided them with another safe and suitable place, in respect that the Act, in authorising the proprietor to levy dues, had by implication imposed a corresponding obligation to provide the accommodation, for the fishermen laying up their boats.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

THIS was a suspension by William Stephen and others, fishermen, residing in Boddam, a village on the coast of Aberdeenshire, as individuals, and also as a committee elected by the fishermen of Boddam for transacting the fishing affairs of the village of Boddam, against William Aiton of Boddam. The prayer, as amended in the Inner-House, was to interdict the respondent "from troubling, molesting, or interfering in any way with the complainers and the other fishermen belonging to the village of Boddam, in laying up for the winter season, beaching, or taking their boats above high-water mark at or near the harbour of Boddam, upon the ground coloured blue and green in the plan or sketch herewith produced, . . . on payment of five shillings for each boat," in terms of schedule A appended to the Act 8 and 9 Vict., cap. xxv.

The complainers averred that prior to 1845 the fishermen of Boddam had been from time immemorial in use to beach their boats on the ground in question, and that their right to do so was expressly recognised by an Act of Parliament passed in that year for the improvement of the harbour of Boddam, and that the proprietor now refused to allow boats to be beached on the ground in question. They also averred that the ground claimed was waste or uncultivated land within the meaning of 29 Geo. II., cap. 23, sec. 2.*

They pleaded;—(1) The acts complained of being a violation of the rights possessed by the complainers at common law and enjoyed by them for immemorial time they are entitled to suspension and interdict as craved. (2) The complainers are entitled to be protected in the exercise of their right to beach their boats on the ground in question in respect of the provisions of the Act 8 and 9 Vict., c. xxv. (3) The complainers are

* "All and every person or persons employed in the said (British) fishery on the coasts of that part of Great Britain called Scotland, or on the said coasts of Orkney, Shetland, or any of the said islands, shall have and exercise the free use of all ports, harbours, shores and forelands in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, or in Orkney, Shetland, or any of the said islands, below the highest high-water mark, and for the space of a hundred yards, on any waste or uncultivated land beyond such mark, within the same, for landing their nets, casks, and other materials, utensils, and stores, and for erecting tents, huts, and stages, and for landing, pickling, curing, and drying, and re-loading their fish, without paying any foreland or other dues."

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

entitled to be protected in the exercise of said right in terms of the Act 29 Geo. II., c. 23.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) That the complainers had set forth no title to insist in the suspension. (2) That the statements were irrelevant. (3) That the ground was his exclusive property.

A proof was led. It appeared that the fishermen of Boddam had for more than forty years occupied houses on the ground of the proprietor of Boddam, and paid him a yearly rent. At first they had no leases. In 1830, by agreement between the proprietor, and the fishermen, sixty in number, the fishermen obtained a lease of twenty-one years of "the houses and yards possessed by the said fishermen respectively, together with the privilege of fishing for white fish, as presently possessed by them; and also of the scalps within the flood-mark, for laying down their mussels and other bait, and also with the privileges of roads and accesses, and of the rocks for laying down and sunning their fish, as presently enjoyed by them." The rent was to be £1, 5s. for the first ten years, and £1, 7s. 6d. for the next eleven years.

In 1838, in consideration of an extension of the lease for seven years, and that a new harbour was about to be built by the proprietor, it was agreed that the rents should be raised 10s.

In 1839 the estate was purchased by the Earl of Aberdeen, whose successor sold it in 1865 to the respondent.

In 1845 Lord Aberdeen obtained an Act (8 and 9 Vict., c. xxv.) "for improving and maintaining the harbour or port of Boddam." The 7th section provided that it should be lawful for the Earl to demand certain duties from every vessel which should enter the harbour. Among these, "For all boats laid up at Boddam for the winter season, 5s."

It appeared that after the expiration of the fishermen's lease in 1858 they continued to pay a yearly rent of £1, 17s. 6d. till 1865, when Lord Aberdeen issued the following "conditions on which houses in the village of Boddam occupied by fishers are to be held, and dues for boats using the harbour, &c. Houses and boats as under, viz.:—Each house yearly, £1, 2s. 6d.; each herring boat fishing, 5s.; each do. beached, 5s.; each white fishing boat, 5s.; each boat for light dues, 2s. 6d."

After the respondent became proprietor his factors regularly collected 5s. from each of the fishermen, for which receipts were granted as "beaching dues." In 1874 the respondent asserted a right to exclude the fishermen from beaching their boats on the ground, except with his special permission.

The fishermen had always used the ground in question for beaching their boats, and there was no other equally convenient. The respondent deponed that the ground was useful for herring-curing and ship-building, and that he intended to excavate it in order to extend the harbour.

The Lord Ordinary, on 10th December 1874, refused the suspension.*

---

* NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts) . . . . "After the note was passed and the record was closed a proof was allowed to both parties, which has now been taken at considerable length.

"The ground coloured blue and green upon the plan lies to the west or north-west of the present harbour of Boddam—the part coloured blue being separated from that coloured green by a road from the bed of the harbour to the high road leading to the village. Both pieces of ground are above high-water mark, and consist of shingle, and are well adapted for beaching boats during the winter season. Indeed, no other ground at all adapted for the purpose exists in the neighbourhood so convenient—or, indeed, at all convenient—for beaching the boats belonging to the village; and it is proved that in the present exposed condition of the harbour it is necessary for the safety of the boats during the winter to draw them up on the beach above the reach of the tide.

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—They had a right by immemorial possession to the use of the ground for beaching the boats.[1] The

"It appears from the proof that until the extension of the harbour in 1849, after the passing of the Act 8 and 9 Victoria, cap. xxv. (to be afterwards noticed) the boats were comparatively few in number, and the ground coloured green appears, for at least thirty years prior to that date, to have been regularly used, and to have been amply sufficient, for beaching all the boats in winter. After the extension of the harbour, however, Boddam became a regular herring fishing station, and the number of boats increased, and, in addition to the ground coloured blue, the ground coloured green has ever since been more or less used as beaching ground by the fishermen of the village. Of late years it seems to have been fully occupied in this way in the interval between the close of one herring fishing season and the commencement of the next, i.e., from the end of September till the following month of July. During the fishing season both pieces of ground are let by the proprietor as curing stations, and occasionally part of the blue ground is, by permission of the proprietor, used for shipbuilding.

"The ground in question is undoubtedly the property of the respondent, Mr Aiton, who is asserting and maintaining his right of property, and has intimated to the fishermen that without his permission, and without making such payment as shall be agreed upon, no person is to be allowed to beach a boat upon the said ground.

"The right of property being clearly in the respondent, the complainers must, in order to succeed in their present complaint, establish that they have by grant, prescription, or statute, acquired a right to use the ground irrespective of the respondent's permission.

"(1) The complainers do not aver that they or any of the fishermen of Boddam have obtained from the proprietor or his predecessors any written grant expressly entitling them to use the ground for beaching their boats, but they maintain that under their written titles to their houses as explained and defined by immemorial usage they have the right now claimed by them. The so-called titles are, however, merely minutes of agreement for leases between the fishermen and the successive proprietors of the estate. Only copies of these minutes are produced, but the parties have agreed to hold these as equivalent to the originals. It is necessary to explain in detail the nature of these agreements.

"The earliest agreement on which the complainers found is a minute entered into in 1830 between Robert Robertson, then the proprietor of the estate, and a large number of fishermen in the village, by which he agreed to grant to them leases of their respective houses for twenty-one years from Martinmas 1830, with the privilege of fishing for white fish, as then presently possessed by them, and also of the scalps within the flood-mark for laying down their mussels and other bait, and also with the privileges, and roads, and accesses, and of the rocks for laying down and sunning their fish as then enjoyed by them, for the annual payment of £1, 5s. per annum for the first ten years, and £1, 7s. 6d. for the last eleven years of the lease 'in name of rent or tack duty,' and in the event of the herring fishing being carried on at Boddam during the lease, the fishermen agreed to pay for each boat employed in the said fishery the one half the same rates of duties as might be payable at the time for the herring boats employed at Peterhead. The proprietor further reserved full power to use the harbour for loading and shipping all sorts of goods and merchandise during the lease,—to regulate and improve the old fishing village, and to lay off stances for building additional houses, as he should see proper, and also to build additional harbours at any places on the shore of Boddam he should think fit. At the end of the lease the roofs, doors, and windows of the houses were either to be paid for by the proprietor or removed by the fishermen. In 1832 regulations were issued by the proprietor to be observed by the fishermen who had been parties to the agreement, and these seem to have been acted upon by all concerned.

"At that time the harbour of Boddam appears to have been inconveniently harbour Act of 1845, which gave the proprietor the right to levy dues from the fishermen, imposed upon him by implication the correlative obli- No. 90. Feb. 27, 1875. Stephen v. Aiton.

[1] Home v. Young, Dec. 18, 1846, 9 D. 286, 19 Scot. Jur. 109.

situated, and unsuited to the requirements of the district. The fishermen, however—who had previously been in use during the herring season to go to Peterhead and other fishing stations—became desirous that Boddam itself should become a herring fishing station, and should accommodate the boats, not only of the local fishermen, but of strangers, during the herring season, and should also be made available for larger vessels loading and unloading goods. To secure these results a new harbour was essential. A new agreement was accordingly, in 1838, entered into between the tenants of houses and Mrs Gordon (the daughter and successor of Mr Robertson), and her husband, setting forth, inter alia, the agreement of 1830, and that the fishermen of the village had applied to the proprietors to erect a new harbour 'in order to afford a greater protection to the fishing boats, and more particularly to furnish more extended accommodation for prosecuting the herring fishery at Boddam than at present exists, it being the intention of the fishermen to pursue the said fishery at Boddam rather than at distant stations as has heretofore been practised by them, and Mrs Gordon and her husband being desirous to encourage the establishment of a herring fishery at Boddam, and to erect such a pier or breakwater as, while it would afford the protection and accommodation asked for by the fishermen in the said village, and be sufficient to accommodate other fishermen and curers who may be induced to come to Boddam to fish for herrings during the fishing season, would also accommodate vessels for the purpose of loading and unloading cargoes therein, and for the other general purposes of a harbour, have agreed to extend the said present lease to the further period of seven years.' They also agreed to lay out a sum of money in the erection of the said pier on a site and according to a plan which had been communicated to and approved of by the fishermen, and both parties homologated the agreement of 1830 and the regulations of 1832, and became bound to extend the lease for seven years from and after Martinmas 1851. Each of the fishermen became bound to pay 10s. a-year of additional rent during the currency of the original lease, i.e., to pay £1, 15s. for each of the first ten years of the original lease then unexpired, and £1, 17s. 6d. for each of the remaining eleven years of that lease, and £1, 17s. 6d. during the seven years' extension of the lease. It was also agreed that the fishermen should have right, 'during the currency of the said lease,' to use the said pier, or breakwater, and harbour, and beach enclosed thereby, as well as the old harbour of Boddam, for the herring fishing, as well as for the white fishing, as occasion might require, without any dues being chargeable for their herring boats, and other boats employed at the said fisheries of Boddam. But the proprietors were to have power to levy such rates as they might consider reasonable on all vessels and boats entering the harbour, not belonging bona fide to the fishermen resident in the said village of Boddam paying the rents hereinbefore mentioned. The proprietors reserved to themselves the full use of the harbour, power to make and alter rules and regulations for the government of the harbour, and with reference to the berthing of ships, vessels, and boats, and the full and absolute right of property in the harbour and shore, and in the rates and duties to be charged.

"In consequence of this agreement Mrs Gordon and her husband appear to have constructed a new pier, which still exists and forms part of the present harbour, and the rents stipulated which, as the foregoing narrative shews, included all necessary harbour accommodation, both for the herring and for the white fishing, continued to be paid to Mr and Mrs Gordon, and to the Earl of Aberdeen, who bought the property in 1839, down to the expiration of the extended lease in 1858, and for some years thereafter,—the rent during the last eighteen years being £1, 17s. 6d. It will be observed that the written title under which the fishermen thus held their houses and used the harbour was a mere title of tenancy which was to come to an end in 1858, and which, if continued after that date, was continued merely by tacit relocation, and could be terminated by the landlord at the expiration of any year. Even assuming, gation of giving the fishermen necessary accommodation; and the Act had been so interpreted and acted upon ever since. They contended further therefore, that the complainers could establish that for time immemorial they had beached their boats upon the ground in question they cannot merely by possession upon such a title be held to have acquired a permanent right to continue the occupation of the beach against the will of the proprietor.

No. 90. Feb. 27, 1875. Stephen v. Aiton.

"(2) The complainers, however, maintain that they have a servitude right to beach their boats there, on the principle which regulated the decision in the Eyemouth case (Home v. Young, 9 D. 286), viz., that as inhabitants of the village of Boddam they and their predecessors have by immemorial possession acquired right for the whole community to beach their boats upon the ground in question. This contention appears to me to be untenable. The principle of the Eyemouth case is not applicable to the present case at all. The village of Boddam is not a burgh of barony or a corporation of any kind. It consists merely of houses belonging to the proprietor of the estate on which they are built, and let by him to tenants. The occupancy, therefore, of these houses by the fishermen, without which they could never have had the alleged possession of the beach, having been merely temporary and under an express contract of lease with the proprietor, is very different from the title and possession founded on in the cases of Eyemouth and Dysart, and similar cases. In all of these it was held that where a burgh territory has been erected into a royal burgh or a burgh of barony, the burgh thus incorporated is capable of acquiring for the community, by and through the possession of individual burgesses and inhabitants, a right to use the territory for certain public purposes, although the feudal title thereto might still remain in the Crown or in the baron, and that the right of use so acquired may be enforced, not only by the community against encroachment by the baron or third parties, but by individual inhabitants against the magistrates of the burgh, in the event of their attempting to alienate the property, or to convert it to uses inconsistent with the enjoyment of the community. There is in the present case no corporation or community capable of acquiring such a right either directly or indirectly through the possession of the inhabitants. I am, therefore, of opinion that the first plea in law for the complainers, viz., that the acts complained of 'are a violation of the rights possessed by the complainers at common law, and enjoyed by them for immemorial time,' is not well founded. And if this view be sound it is unnecessary to decide whether the servitude claimed by the complainers is a servitude recognised by the law of Scotland, or whether the complainers are entitled to claim such a servitude on behalf of the general body of fishermen of the village of Boddam.

"(3) The complainers, however, maintain that they have right to beach their boats on the ground in question, in respect of the provisions of the Act 8 and 9 Vict., cap. xxv. They allege that by that statute 'the right of fishermen to beach their boats on the space specified in the preceding article was expressly recognised and provided for,' and also, 'that the spaces above referred to are within the limits of the harbour of Boddam, as defined by the Act.' The complainers are in error in saying that this alleged right of the fishermen is by the Act expressly recognised and provided for. No such right is referred to in the Act. The complainers' counsel, however, explained at the hearing that the following entry in the schedule of tonnage dues appended to the Act, viz.:—'III. For all boats laid up at Boddam for the winter, 5s.,' must be read with reference to the agreement of lease current at the date of the Act (1845), and to the usage then in force by which the boats were then in use and had from time immemorial been in use to be beached upon the ground coloured blue. And they contend that the proprietor (Lord Aberdeen) by obtaining the Act for the enlargement and improvement of the harbour, with power to levy the tonnage dues therein specified and particularly quoted, became bound to find ground for laying up boats in winter, that this obligation is now incumbent on the respondent as proprietor of the estate, and that the Act of Parliament thus distinctly recognises the right of the fishermen to beach their boats at or near the harbour on the ground immemorially used for that purpose, whether within the limits of the harbour or not. They

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

that, comparing the plans of the harbour with the description in the harbour Act, the ground in question was within the limits of the harbour, and therefore open to the fishermen.

The respondent argued;—Whatever rights flowed from the Act were obviously common to the whole public, yet the complainers claimed a privilege, which they alleged was peculiar to the fishermen of Boddam. The public had a right of admission to the harbour. But the ground was not within the limits of the harbour. Fishermen could not claim any permanent right to use waste ground under the Act of Geo. II. If the proprietor wanted it for other purposes, as he did in this case for herring-curing and other purposes, it was no longer waste.[1]

In the agreements between the proprietors and the fishermen in 1830 and 1838, in which the privileges guaranteed to the latter were enumerated, nothing was said about beaching.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—From time immemorial the fishermen of Boddam have been in the habit of laying up their boats during the winter on the ground in dispute. It is also say that the respondent has for some years been exacting 5s. for each boat beached expressly as beaching dues under the Act, and that he has thus interpreted the Act in their favour, and that he is bound to supply the necessary accommodation. I do not think that this is the sound construction of the statute. Although the harbour in its present state may be unfit for the protection of boats laid up therein during the winter season, it appears from the map, plan, and sections of the proposed improvements lodged in the Sheriff-clerk's office at Aberdeen, with reference to the bill which ultimately was passed by the Legislature, that a much larger and more complete work was contemplated, involving the excavation of a large quantity of rock, the extension of the then existing pier, first in an easterly direction, and then at right angles thereto in a southerly direction, and the construction of a breakwater still further south to protect the proposed entrance to the new harbour. A large open space would thus have been provided within the harbour, and under the protection of the pier and breakwater, and it was apparently with reference to the harbour thus improved and extended that the dues for laying up boats at Boddam in winter were to be charged under the schedule. There seems to be no warrant whatever, either under the enacting clauses of the Act of Parliament, or under the schedule, for holding that any right on the part of the complainers to lay up their boats in winter on the respondent's lands above high-water mark is recognised by the Legislature, and the fact that the contemplated harbour has never been fully constructed will not confer upon them any such right. Nor can the erroneous description of his charge for beaching the boats, as being dues under the Act, introduced by the respondent into some of his more recent receipts granted to the fishermen, alter the true construction of the Act.

---

"It appears that in 1865 Lord Aberdeen shortly before the sale of the property, instead of charging the fishermen (whose leases had all expired in 1858), a slump rent of £1, 17s. 6d. for their houses, and for the use of the harbour and beaching, subdivided the charges as follows, viz. :—[2]

"Some of these are no doubt harbour dues, but neither the house rent, nor the lights, nor the charge for beaching, come under that category.

"(4) The complainers maintain, however, in the last place that the ground in question is in point of fact within the limits of the harbour as defined by the Act." [His Lordship then stated his opinion that the ground in question did not fall within the limits of the harbour as described in the Act of Parliament.]

"On the whole, it appears to me that the complainers have failed to establish any of the grounds on which their suspension is laid, and that the same must therefore be refused, with expenses."

[1] Hoyle v. M'Cunn, Dec. 2, 1858, 21 D. 96, 31 Scot. Jur. 63.

[2] Supra, p. 471.

No. 90.
Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

also admitted that there is no other ground there which is available for the purpose. But it is also clear that that use was fixed by arrangement from time to time with the proprietors, and it appears that up to the time when the Earl of Aberdeen parted with the property the proprietor dealt liberally with the fishermen.

The Earl of Aberdeen was desirous to make a harbour at Boddam on certain conditions, and obtained an Act of Parliament for the purpose in 1845. After the passing of the Act the custom of beaching the boats, gratuitously, was still continued down to about 1865. After the present proprietor purchased the property, in that year, a payment of 5s. a-year was levied for each boat. Subject to that payment, the custom of beaching the boats has continued down to the present time, and the question to be tried in this process of suspension and interdict is whether the fishermen can claim the privilege of beaching the boats as matter of right.

On 8th October 1874 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :—"The Lord Ordinary having heard the agents for the parties, and having again considered the note of suspension, passes the note, and, in respect the respondent, who is now present with his agent, undertakes to give ground for safely beaching the boats at the sight of the harbour-master during the dependence of the present process, finds it unnecessary, hoc statu, to dispose of the question of interdict."

Now, it is clear that in 1845, when the harbour Act was passed, the fishermen were allowed the use of the ground in question for beaching their boats, and when the proprietor applied for the Act he must have been aware that the fishermen had a material interest in the provisions of the proposed Act. If the Act proposed had been distasteful to them, they would, no doubt, have appeared and opposed it. It was therefore the interest of the proprietor not to propose an Act which would be unsatisfactory to the fishermen. So the Act was obtained, and we find in section 7 the following provision :—"And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the said Earl and his heirs and successors to demand and receive for every vessel which shall enter within the limits of the said harbour any sum not exceeding the several rates and duties on tonnage specified in the schedule A hereunto annexed."

That section, in its terms, refers to rates and duties on tonnage; but coming to schedule A, which is referred to, we find, in the first place, payments for vessels other than herring boats; and then we have the following duties :—

For herring boats :—

For all herring boats engaged at the fishery at Boddam, for the period of their fishing season, to be paid at the commencement of the fishery, and that in lieu of all tonnage duties payable for such herring boats, . £0 5 0

For all other boats under 25 tons coming into said harbour for any purpose whatever, ... 0 0 7

And all above 25 tons to be charged the same as coasting vessels.

For all boats laid up at Boddam for the winter season, . . 0 5 0

These payments, and particularly the payment of 5s. for each boat laid up for the winter, are in lieu of tonnage duties. The question is, whether, on a fair construction of the statute, it was not one of the conditions on which the proprietor was allowed to get the Act without opposition, that the fishermen should be allowed to lay up their boats at Boddam on payment of 5s. for each boat. I am disposed to read it so, and I do not think it could fairly be read otherwise. That this is the fair construction of the Act is very much confirmed by what

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

followed upon it, for up to 1865 the boats were allowed to be laid up just as before, while the duty of 5s. was, during that period, dispensed with. That dispensation is not wonderful, considering the liberal way in which the then proprietor was in the habit of dealing with the fishermen. Farther, in 1865 Mr Aiton himself construes the Act in this way, that the fishermen are entitled to lay up their boats for a payment of 5s., and so he allowed them, till lately, to use the ground for that purpose, and exacted the 5s., and I do not see how there could be a clearer indication of what was his construction of the statute. The only thing not expressed in the schedule of the Act is the particular ground on which the boats are to be laid up, but they are to be laid up at Boddam, that is, somewhere on the estate of Boddam, and the reasonable inference is that they are to be laid up on or near the ground used for that purpose from time immemorial. If the particular ground had been specified in the Act, or if we were to hold that the provision in the Act applied specifically to the particular piece of ground, then the proprietor might not be entitled to use it for other purposes, such as a shipbuilding yard, however valuable for such purposes, which would be a great disadvantage to him. But I construe the words as meaning that the fishermen are to be allowed to lay up their boats on ground at Boddam convenient for that purpose, and so the proprietor may change the ground and give them another piece of ground instead. Nor is there anything to hinder him to make the harbour in such a way as to give them accommodation to lay up their boats within the harbour itself.

The deposition of Mr Aiton bears:—"I would not allow boats to be built there, as my intention is to excavate the ground and to increase the harbour inland, for two reasons,—because the rock dies away there, and because the further inland the harbour is made the quieter it is. The ground is convenient for shipbuilding purposes, and any shipbuilding which has taken place in my time has been on that ground. (Shewn No. 18)—The works delineated on that plan have not been all executed. . . . . Following upon the notice which I issued, four or five of the fishermen came to me. I had not made up my mind about the charge for beaching before they came. I gave them a note to Mr Barclay, the harbour-master, that they had arranged for their stances, and that he was to charge 7s. 6d. and point out the stances for them. I came to fix 7s. 6d. simply to take it out of the category of the 5s. that had been charged as harbour-dues. . . . . I was at a meeting before the Lord Ordinary in the Bill-Chamber on 8th October. At that date the whole of the boats had been beached, with the exception of those away for mussels, and I am not sure whether these had returned or not. The question between the fishermen and myself came to be whether they would pay 2s. 6d. more or not, and that question was raised solely in consequence of their 'appeal.' It struck me that if I allowed the 'appeal' to pass I should very likely be stultifying myself. Cross-examined.—I recognise no right on the part of the fishermen to beach their boats at Boddam. I am exceedingly anxious that they should do it, but I maintain my right to charge such rate as I think proper for the privilege. I do not think that I told them until after the interdict was served that I did not recognise their right of beaching. I am not aware whether my agent received a letter on the subject from Messrs Boyd. A protest was served upon me personally. I handed it over to my agent. I do not think I directed him to reply to Messrs Boyd. I am not aware that he wrote to Messrs Boyd. (Shewn letter of 16th September 1874)—I do not think that letter was written with my authority, but the views

No. 90.
Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

therein expressed are in accordance with my views on the subject. There is a statutory charge in the Act of Parliament of 5s. for laying up boats for the winter. I understand that to refer to boats laid up in the harbour. I am aware that boats could not with safety be laid up in the harbour, but had the works been carried out which are contemplated by the Act it would have been safe. At present the boats could only be beached where they are now beached, or on other ground belonging to myself or other people, of which there is plenty. . . . . I became proprietor in November 1865. So far as I am aware, the harbour works were in the same condition then in which they are now. (Q.) Has there been any proposal made to extend it? (A.) In 1870 I excavated space sufficient for twelve boats additional. (Q.) Has there been any proposal to execute the additional works as contemplated by the parliamentary plan? (A.) No, not yet."

Now, on the face of this deposition, the proprietor can hardly dispute that he must in some way or other provide ground for beaching the boats. No other place than that in dispute has yet been given, although he says he means to give it within the harbour. In that state of matters it is not necessary to go further. The proprietor must allow the fishermen to lay up their boats on the piece of ground in question until he provides other suitable accommodation. If that is a sound view it is of no moment whether or not the ground in dispute is within the limits of the harbour,—at least it is of no moment to the fishermen, although it may be an important question for the proprietor. I do not think, however, that it is necessary to decide that question just now, but I may say that I do not see how the defender's construction of the Act, as regards the bounds of the harbour, can be supported, for it does not bring within the harbour various objects mentioned in the Act as within it. But without deciding that question I think we have here enough to enable us substantially to sustain the complainers' claim.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The complainers are fishermen in the village of Boddam. The respondent is proprietor of the estate of Boddam, including the village, and the harbour to which the fishermen resort. The former proprietor of Boddam, Mr Robertson, and afterwards Mrs Robertson or Gordon, wished to encourage the fishing and to make a fishing-station at Boddam, and in 1839 the Earl of Aberdeen purchased the estate and continued to encourage the fishermen, and entered into liberal and favourable agreements with them. In 1865 the respondent, Mr Aiton, purchased the estate from Lord Aberdeen. It is, in my opinion, instructed by the proof that for many years—I think for much more than forty years—the fishermen were in the habit of beaching their boats on the piece of ground near the harbour of Boddam which is now in dispute.

At the date of the respondent's purchase in 1865 that long customary possession and exercise of the privilege of beaching their boats existed, and it was known to the respondent. The terms or dues exigible for beaching boats were 5s. each boat. That had been arranged and acted on long before the respondent's purchase, and he, knowing the fact, and well aware of the terms, continued to claim and receive from the fishermen 5s. a-boat, and to give or permit those authorised by him to give receipts to the fishermen for "dues for beaching boats, 5s." After this had been continued for some years the present dispute unfortunately arose. The respondent now denies to the fishermen the privilege hitherto recognised. His contention is, that the fishermen have no right whatever to beach their boats at Boddam.

Now, it is beyond doubt that beaching of boats is necessary to the fishermen,

No. 90.

Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

who cannot carry on their business without it; that the piece of ground in question is convenient and suitable and well adapted for beaching boats, that it is the only suitable place accessible or available at Boddam, and that the boats of the fishermen, if not beached, but left in the stormy season floating in the harbour, would probably be knocked to pieces. In this state of matters, with long-continued possession, with long and unbroken custom and practice of beaching the boats, with a purchase by the respondent in the knowledge of the claim and of the exercise of the privilege, and with the recognition of it by the respondent after his purchase by claiming and receiving the previously agreed on dues for beaching, a notice was issued by the respondent forbidding the beaching of any boats on the lands of Boddam. Payment of the customary dues of 5s. a-boat has been offered, but refused. This is not a question of the amount of fees. The right to exclude the boats, unless a new bargain is made, is maintained by the respondent. He is undoubtedly the proprietor of the ground in question, and his claim to such a right must be met. The complainers must instruct a right to use his property for the purpose of beaching their boats.

I do not think that the Eyemouth case supports the complainers' argument. Boddam is not a burgh of barony, and no rights for the benefit of the inhabitants have been acquired by magistrates or corporation.

But when the estate was sold the privilege of beaching boats at 5s. a-boat was distinctly set forth, recognised, accepted, and acted on by the proprietor and by the fishermen. Even apart from the question raised in regard to the limits of the harbour, I think the right of the respondent to stop by peremptory notice the practice of beaching boats by the fishermen on the lands of Boddam near to the harbour may be seriously doubted.

As the result—I think the natural result—of the previous possession and of the desire of the proprietor and the fishermen to improve the fishings, the Act of Parliament of 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. xxv., declares the conditions on which the rights are conferred on the grantee, and, in my opinion, it also fixes the limits of the harbour to such an extent as to shew that the piece of ground in question cannot be held as excluded as not within the bounds of the description. But though I am disposed to take this view of the description of the harbour given in the statute which authorises the construction of the harbour and the exaction of rates and dues, I do not look on that question of construction as necessary for the decision of this case.

The safer and more satisfactory ground of decision is, in my opinion, that the granting leave to the proprietor to levy dues was on the condition that he should grant the privilege of "laying up boats at Boddam for the winter season" at 5s. a-boat. He could not demand the dues without recognising the privilege, and he did demand and receive the dues. It has been suggested that "laying up" for the winter does not mean "beaching." But there is no force in that suggestion. The word was well understood. The respondent himself, or his collector, gave receipts for these sums of 5s. a-year for "beaching dues." He also admits in his deposition that he understood the charge was for beaching, and that laying up in the harbour is not safe for the boats, and that the place now in dispute is the natural and only safe place. Yet he refuses it, except on his own terms, of which he is alone to be the judge.

I think the complainers are entitled to succeed.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships that it is not necessary for the dis-

No. 90.
Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

posal of the question here raised to decide whether the ground in dispute is within the limits of the harbour, and as at present advised I shall only say that I am not satisfied that the line contended for by the respondent can be adopted consistently with the provisions of the Act of 1845. I also concur as to the grounds upon which this question of interdict should be decided, because, having regard to the position of the parties at the date of the Act of 1845, and to the possession which the fishermen at Boddam then and have since had of this ground for beaching their boats, I think that the respondent is not entitled to prevent these fishermen from continuing so to use the ground on payment of 5s. of beaching dues as heretofore, unless he is prepared to provide them with some other convenient place.

Such private Acts are to be dealt with on the footing that there is a contract between the individual who obtains the Act and the community for whose benefit as well as that of the proprietor the Act must be supposed to have been passed. The natural presumption is that unless there was some such mutual arrangement, the local community would have opposed the passing of the Act. Now, that being the principle upon which the case must, as I apprehend, be dealt with, I find in the schedule to the Act a provision that "all boats laid up at Boddam for the winter season" are to pay 5s., and this payment must, I think, be held to have reference to the laying up of boats upon the ground in question, upon which they were then in use to be beached, and not to boats laid up in harbour, as contended for by the respondent, because it appears from the evidence, that after the Act was passed the boats were not laid up for the winter in the harbour, but upon the ground in dispute, while the property belonged to Lord Aberdeen, and down to the date of the present complaint. Mr Aiton in his evidence, which seems quite candid, says, "I saw the particulars of the purchase when I got the estate. I noticed that a charge of 5s. was made for beaching boats." When the respondent therefore acquired the estate he was in the knowledge of the payment in question, and immediately after his purchase in 1865 receipts are granted by his factors to the complainers for 5s. "as beaching dues." The receipts are in the same terms down to 1873, and in 1870, when the respondent's son was collector, it appears, from a notice which he issued in that year, that beaching meant being "laid up on the lands of Boddam," thereby negativing the present contention of the respondent, that the statutory dues referred to boats laid up in harbour. There was thus, as I conceive, a complete adoption by the respondent of the custom which had existed from time immemorial of the fishermen beaching their boats on this ground, and I agree with your Lordships that the fishermen, who have all along been using this ground for beaching their boats on payment of the statutory dues are entitled to interdict in the terms proposed.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the complainers are entitled to the use of the ground in dispute for laying up or beaching their boats in the winter season on payment to the respondent of 5s. for each boat so laid up or beached, and this so long as the respondent shall not have provided other safe and suitable accommodation for that purpose, either within the limits of the works proposed to be executed or completed by him under the Act of Parliament 8 and 9 Victoria, chapter XXV., or elsewhere at Boddam; and to this extent and effect sustain the first and second pleas in law for the complainers: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge, in terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict as amended, and decern: Find the complainers entitled to expenses," &c.

No. 90.
Feb. 27, 1875.
Stephen v. Aiton.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—JOHN AULD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 91.
Feb. 28, 1875.
M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

DANIEL REID AND OTHERS (M'Leod's Trustees), Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—M'Laren.
GEORGE WILLIAM LESLIE M'LEOD, Defender.—Fraser—Moncreiff.

Succession—Mortis Causa Conveyance—Titles to Land Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 20.—Held that, under the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, a mortis causa deed, in which the testator appointed trustees, empowered them to "realise all his heritable and moveable property," and directed them as to the disposal thereof, but which contained no words of direct conveyance or gift, was sufficient to carry the testator's heritable as well as his moveable estate.

Observed that the statute puts heritage precisely in the same position as moveables, when dealt with in a testamentary writing.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

THE late Mr Gordon M'Leod of Lochbay died on 4th January 1873, leaving a deed of settlement, dated 27th October 1863, in the following terms:—"I, Gordon M'Leod of Lochbay, Isle of Skye, considering that it is expedient to provide for the proper upbringing and education of my children, in the event of my death, whilst they or any of them are under the age of twenty-one years, do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint the following persons, viz., . . . to be my trustees and executors, and the curators or guardians of my said children . . . until they respectively arrive at the said age of twenty-one years; and my wish is that my said children shall, at all events, whilst under the age of sixteen years, be brought up by and under the personal superintendence of one or other or both of my said sisters, who shall, by the allowance from the interest of their own money by the late Mr Leslie of Dunlugas (their grandfather's) trustees, and from the interest of my means and estate, be paid a suitable sum of board and for school-fees and other expenses needful." After directing payment of certain legacies, the deed proceeded,—"I hereby empower my said trustees to realise all my heritable and moveable property when they see fit, and to invest the proceeds (after paying the said legacies, as well as my lawful debts, death-bed and funeral expenses), on good heritable bonds." . . . After directions for the distribution of some articles of jewellery, the deed proceeded,—"And I empower my said trustees and executors, and the acceptors or acceptor, survivors or survivor, a majority of them residing in Scotland being always a quorum, to intromit with my means and effects in every way competent to executors, guardians, tutors, or curators, and to sue for and discharge all debts or claims due to me. The whole residue of my estate will be divided equally amongst my said children on their attaining majority, or to their representatives."

The deed contained no words of direct conveyance to the trustees, either of the testator's heritable estate, or of his moveable estate.

In 1870 Mr M'Leod acquired the estate of Glencassley, in addition to lands of which he was proprietor at the date of his settlement.

The present action was raised on 4th September 1874 by Mr M'Leod's trustees against George William Leslie M'Leod, his only son and heir, concluding that the defender should be ordained to make up titles and convey the lands of Glencassley and others to the pursuers, or otherwise that the estate should be adjudged from him.

No. 91.

Feb. 28, 1875. M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

A curator ad litem was appointed to the defender, who was in minority.

The question was, whether, under the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868,* Mr M'Leod's settlement was valid as a general disposition of his heritable estate, although it contained no words of conveyance or gift.

On the 24th December 1874 the Lord Ordinary ordained the defender to make up titles to the lands of Glencassley and others, and convey the same to the pursuers.†

* Sec. 20 of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, provides:—"From and after the commencement of this Act it shall be competent to any owner of lands to settle the succession to the same, in the event of his death, not only by conveyances de præsenti, according to the existing law and practice, but likewise by testamentary or mortis causa deeds or writings, and no testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing, purporting to convey or bequeath lands, which shall have been granted by any person alive at the commencement of this Act, or which shall be granted by any person after the commencement of this Act, shall be held to be invalid as a settlement of the lands to which such deed or writing applies, on the ground that the granter has not used, with reference to such lands, the word 'dispone' or other word or words importing a conveyance de præsenti; and where such deed or writing shall not be expressed in the terms required by the existing law or practice for the conveyance of lands, but shall contain, with reference to such lands, any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the grantor, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim and receive the same, such deed or writing, if duly executed in the manner required or permitted in the case of any testamentary writing by the law of Scotland, shall be deemed and taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands, within the meaning of the 19th section hereof, by the grantor of such deed or writing, in favour of the grantee thereof, or of the legatee of such lands, and shall be held to create, and shall create in favour of such grantee or legatee, an obligation upon the successors of the grantor of such deed or writing to make up titles in their own persons to such lands, and to convey the same to such grantee or legatee."

The Conveyancing Act, 1874, came into operation on 1st October 1874; see sec. 27.

† "NOTE.—. . . . . It will be observed, on the one hand, that the deed contains no express words of conveyance, bequeathment, or gift of the truster's heritable estate, and the same observation may be made in regard to moveable property. On the other hand, it is quite clear that the granter regarded the deed as one which would give the trustees right to his heritable property. He appoints the parties named to be trustees and executors, to be guardians of his heir-at-law, as well as of his other children; provides that the interest of his means and estate shall be applied for the maintenance and education of his children; and in express terms empowers his trustees to realise all his heritable and moveable property, and after payment, out of the proceeds, of his debts, to invest the remainder in good heritable bonds; and he directs the residue of his estate to be divided equally amongst his children, obviously including his only son and heir. It was maintained for the defender that this last clause as to residue applied only to the moveable estate, in respect of the words which immediately preceded it, which have reference to personal estate; but I am clearly of opinion that it was not the intention of the truster to limit the meaning of the word 'estate,' as used in the residuary clause, to personal estate only. While the deed thus contains no transitive verb of conveyance, it appoints trustees, empowers these trustees to realise and administer the truster's heritable property, directs the interest of his means and estate to be applied for behoof of his whole children, and directs the residue of his estate, including, in the truster's view, his heritable estate, to be divided equally among his children. There being no objection to the deed as not duly tested, the pursuers maintain that these provisions are sufficient under the statute to confer on them a right to the heritable estate, and to impose on the heir-at-law an obligation to grant them a conveyance.

No. 91.

Feb. 28, 1875.

M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The Titles to Land Act, 1868, dispensed with the use of technical words in the bequest of lands; but it was still necessary to use words expressive of gift or conveyance.[1]

"The first part of the section of the statute in question provides that, contrary to the established law previously existing, an owner of lands may settle the succession to the same, in the event of his death, not only by conveyances de præsenti, but by testamentary or mortis causa deeds or writings. It further provides that 'no testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing purporting to convey or bequeath lands . . . . shall be held to be invalid as a settlement of the lands to which such deed or writing applies, on the ground that the granter has not used, with reference to such lands, the word "dispone," or other word or words importing a conveyance de præsenti.' This second part of the clause renders the use of the technical word 'dispone' unnecessary, and may be held as practically enacting that no technical expression shall be required to make an effectual conveyance. The succeeding part of the clause, which from this point proceeds to enact affirmatively what will in future be sufficient to give right to heritable estate, is the most important in the present question, and is to be construed not merely with reference to the direct effect of the words there used, but also with reference to their effect reflectively in the interpretation of what has gone before. The provision is, that 'where such deed or writing shall not be expressed in the terms required by the existing law or practice for the conveyance of lands, but shall contain with reference to such lands any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the granter, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim and receive the same, such deed or writing . . . . shall be deemed and taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands, within the meaning of the 19th section hereof.'

"This concluding part of the clause of the statute in providing what shall be taken to be sufficient to give a right to heritable estate is evidently intended to put the law in regard to the forms necessary for the conveyance of heritage as nearly as possible on the same footing as the law regulating the forms necessary for the conveyance of moveables. In so far as express words of conveyance, gift, or bequeathment were required for an effectual mortis causa conveyance of personal estate, they shall still be necessary in regard to heritage, but if words short of this will be sufficient to give right to moveables, the same rule shall be applied, in so far as the language used by the testator admits of it, in regard to heritage.

"The general evil which the provision of the statute was intended to remedy was the failure of the law in requiring the use of a particular form of language to give effect to the will of the testator in regard to his heritable estate, where his will was clearly expressed, and the statute should be construed so as to provide as far as possible a complete remedy for that evil. In regard to the disposal or destination of personal estate, any clear expression of the testator's will or intention, without reference to any particular form of expression contained in a document sufficiently tested, was and is sufficient and effectual.—Bell's Principles, section 1862. It appears to me, on a consideration of the terms of section 20th of the statute, that its intention was to make the law the same in regard to heritable estate. If that be the purpose of the statute, it should be so construed, if the language admit of it, as to produce that effect. I am of opinion that, giving to the language its fair meaning, that is its true effect; and that if a testamentary deed or writing, although it does not contain words of direct conveyance of heritable estate, yet contains a distinct expression of the granter's will and intention by the deed to carry right to heritage, the deed will be effectual for that purpose.

"Thus, if a testator nominates and appoints certain persons to be 'trustees to [1] Pitcairn v. Pitcairn, Feb. 25, 1870, 8 Macph. 604, 42 Scot. Jur. 306; Edmond v. Edmond, Jan. 30, 1873, 11 Macph. 348, 45 Scot. Jur. 236; see opinions of the Lord President and Lord Deas in both cases.

No. 91. Counsel for the pursuers were not called upon.

Feb. 28, 1875. M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a question of importance, but even if the decision in Hardy's Trustees [1] had not been pronounced, I should not have had much difficulty.

---

administer and dispose of my whole heritable estate, subject to the following directions,' and then gives instructions as to the realisation and disposal of his whole property, or if a testator appoints certain persons to be trustees of my estates, heritable and moveable, and goes on to give powers of administration, and directions as to how his property, real and personal, is to be disposed of, as it is clear that, although the deed contains no transitive verb, or direct words of conveyance, it was the testator's will and intention, as expressed by himself, that his trustees should have right to his heritable property for the purposes of his deed, I think the deed would be effectual under the statute. It appears to me the same result would follow if a testator nominated and appointed 'A B, my son, to be heir of the whole heritable estate belonging to me at the time of my death, or to be heir to succeed to me in the whole heritable estate belonging to me at the time of my death,' whether subject to certain conditions or obligations or otherwise. Such language would be a clear expression of the testator's will and intention that his deed should give right to heritage, and would therefore, in my opinion, be equivalent to a general disposition under the statute. It is obvious that in the cases just supposed of a nomination of trustees, or trustees and executors of personal estate, or to administer personal estate, the deed would be sufficient to confer right to moveables; and as the words are sufficient to have that effect, I think it follows from the statute that where the same words plainly refer to lands they must receive the same effect in regard to heritage.

"In the course of the argument the defender pleaded that a simple nomination by a testator of an heir would not be equivalent in effect to a general disposition of heritable estate, and expressions to that effect in the opinion of the Lord President in the case of Edmond, to be immediately noticed, were founded on. The question has not yet occurred for decision, but it is quite obvious that a bare nomination of an heir, without any additional words shewing that the nomination is made expressly in order to give right to the testator's whole heritable estate, is in a very different position from such a nomination, if followed by words clearly expressive of the testator's will and intention to that effect. The nomination of an executor, or the nomination of an executor and universal legatory, have known and settled meanings in the law, as fully explained in the opinions of the learned Judges in the case of White v. Finlay, 15th November 1861, 24 D. 38. The bare nomination of an heir has no such settled meaning, for the term is sometimes used to designate the heir in mobilibus, and varies in its signification according to the relation it holds to other terms preceding and following it in the deed in which it occurs. There are thus reasons for holding that the provisions of the statute may not be sufficient to make the mere nomination of an heir equivalent in effect to a general disposition. The case is, however, different where the nomination is followed by words shewing the plain will and intention that the person nominated should succeed to heritable estate.

"It was maintained by the defender that the words 'such deed or writing,' introducing the third or concluding part of the clause to which I have specially referred, refers back to the previous words, 'deed or writing purporting to convey or bequeath lands,' and thus imports these words into that part of the clause which refers specially to what is sufficient to give right to moveable estate as a test for an effectual deed as to heritage. On this assumption it was maintained that as the deed must be one 'purporting to convey or bequeath lands,' an express word of conveyance or gift is necessary. I am disposed to think that, on a sound construction of the statute, the words referred to must be imported into the last clause, but I do not think that these words make it necessary that the deed should contain a transitive word of conveyance. To

[1] Hardy's Trustees, May 13, 1871, 9 Macph. 736, 43 Scot. Jur. 407.

No. 91.

Feb. 28, 1875.
M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

Two cases in the First Division were cited, which do not, I think, affect the present question. The first of these, Pitcairn v. Pitcairn, turned on whether the word "effects" could be construed to include lands. In the other case, Edmond v. Edmond, the question was whether a bequest of the testator's whole hold this, would, I think, practically take away the whole force of the provision of the Act, which refers to the form or terms of deeds sufficient to give a right to moveable property. But the words 'purporting to convey' cannot, I think, be construed as equivalent to meaning, or intending to use express words of conveyance, or anything more than meaning, or intending, or bearing to convey, and such meaning or intention may be clearly shewn without express words of conveyance. The word 'purport,' taken from the French pour (for) porter (to bear), does not appear to me to have the limited meaning for which the defender contends. In the view of the statute, which, for the reasons I have just stated, appears to me to be the sound one, I think it clearly follows that the deed in question gives a valid right to heritage under the statute. The powers expressly given to the trustees to deal with the heritable property, and to dispose of it as directed in the deed, plainly shew that it was the testator's will and intention to give right to heritage. The case cannot, I think, be distinguished from that which I have already considered, by way of illustration, in which the testator appoints trustees of his estate, heritable and moveable, or appoints trustees to administer and dispose of his estate, heritable and moveable, in terms of directions given.

---

"Three cases have occurred in which the Court have construed the provisions of section 20th of the statute. Two of these, which were decided by the First Division of the Court, viz., Pitcairn, 25th February 1870, 8 Macph. 604, 42 Scot. Jur. 306, and Edmond, 30th January 1873, 11 Macph. 348, 45 Scot. Jur. 236, raised only the question whether the words used by the testator covered and included heritable property. In the former of these cases the word 'effects,' and in the latter the words 'money, bonds, debets, bussness and other affects whatsoever,' were held to relate to moveable estate only. The Court were not called on to decide in either of these whether an express word of gift or conveyance was necessary. There are certain expressions in the opinions of the Lord President and Lord Deas which seem to indicate a different view of the statute from that which I have adopted. These expressions were, however, obiter, not necessary to the decision of the case, and the point now directly raised was not before the Court for decision. I have therefore not felt myself bound by the expressions referred to. If they should be regarded, as maintained by the defender, as expressing the opinion that words of direct gift or conveyance are required to give a right to heritable estate, although not required to give right to personal estate, I must with much deference say, that I do not concur in that view of the statute. It appears to me, however, that the expressions referred to do not go the length which the defender in argument maintained.

"The remaining case of Hardy's Trustees, 13th May 1871, 9 Macph. 736, 43 Scot. Jur. 407, which was decided by the Second Division of the Court, is, I think, a direct authority on the present question. The testator, in that case, had not used any direct words of conveyance, but merely appointed trustees with power to take charge of his farm, and means and moveables, and power to manage the farm, or give it up as they thought best for his family. This deed was held to give right to the lease which, as heritable property, could only be carried by a deed in such a form as would carry heritable estate. If, in addition to the farm, the testator had mentioned heritable estate generally, or particular lands belonging to him, the decision would obviously have been the same, and applied to such lands as were referred to.

"It may be noticed that in 'The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,' (37 and 38 Victoria, cap. 94), which came into operation on the 1st of October last, it is provided by section 27 that it shall not be competent to object to the validity of a deed as a conveyance of heritage on the ground that it does not contain the word 'dispone,' provided it contains any other word or words im-property was affected by a subsequent enumeration. These did not raise, and could not decide, the present question.

No. 91.

Feb. 28, 1875. M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

It has been contended that, while the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, dispensed with the necessity of technical words in a mortis causa conveyance of lands, words of direct conveyance are still necessary, and that mere intention to be gathered from the deed is not sufficient. Had the section ended with the words "No testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing . . . shall be held to be invalid as a settlement of the lands to which such deed or writing applies, on the ground that the granter has not used with reference to such lands the word 'dispone' or other word or words importing a conveyance de presenti," there might have been some ground for this contention. But the section goes on to say, "And where such deed or writing . . . shall contain, with reference to such lands, any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the grantor, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim and receive the same, such deed or writing, if duly executed, &c. shall be deemed and taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands," &c. So that the only question is whether there are here words sufficient to confer upon the executor of the grantor the right to claim these lands had they been moveable property. There can be no doubt that, although there are here no words of direct conveyance, the words employed in regard to the universitas of the estate are sufficient to indicate the intention to convey the moveable estate to the trustees, and, if that be so, then it must also be sufficient to carry the heritage.

The case of Hardy is precisely in point; there were no words of conveyance used in the deed.

The case of Connal's Trustees v. Connal[1] is not altogether an authority, but it has some analogy to the present. The case related to an English deed, the question being whether the statute of 1868 applied to the authentication as well as to the words of the conveyance. Lord Cowan said,—"My notion of the clause is, that its purpose is to confer on the owner of heritable property the same power of intimating his will and intention as to the succession to his heritable estate as he had before with regard to his moveable estate."

I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. It is perhaps fortunate that we have had an opportunity of porting a conveyance, or transference, or present intention to convey or transfer. As the words of this statute are different from those of the Act 1868, by which the present question must be determined, it does not appear to me that this enactment can be referred to with advantage in the construction of the earlier Act. It was the purpose of that Act to deal with mortis causa deeds, as distinguished from de præsenti deeds of conveyance, intended at once to take effect. It appears to me, therefore, to be proper to determine the construction of that statute with reference to its own terms only, particularly as the language of the later Act is quite different. The later statute provides that words importing a present intention to convey or transfer (even in the absence of words importing conveyance or transference) shall be sufficient. The language of the earlier Act refers rather to the intention to confer a right than the intention to convey. There may or may not be a difference in the effect of the expressions, but I do not think it necessary or proper to enter on this question in the present case."

---

[1] Connal's Trustees v. Connal, March 16, 1872, 10 Macph. 627, 44 Scot. Jur. 352.

deciding that a bequest of heritage and a bequest of moveables are placed by the statute of 1868 in precisely the same position as regards formality of conveyance. No. 91. Feb. 28, 1875. M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. The statute in question is a remedial one; and the evil intended to be remedied was that while under the former law money or other moveable estate of the largest amount and value could be transferred by mortis causa testament or will, while the smallest and most insignificant heritable estate could not be so transferred. We are bound to give the statute a liberal interpretation. But there appears to be enough in the words of the statute to enable us to arrive at the same result as the Lord Ordinary. The 20th section of the statute is the important one. After providing that certain technicalities shall no longer be necessary for the transmission of heritable property, it goes on to provide,—"And where such deed or writing," &c. What Lord Cowan said in the case of Hardy's Trustees is in substance the words of the statute,—"The same words of conveyance will now carry heritage as will suffice to carry moveables."

Now, it is not disputed that we have in the testamentary writing before us quite enough to carry moveables. And if so, it necessarily follows, according to my view of the statute, that there is enough to carry heritage also. The appointment of trustees, and the express power given them to realise all the testator's heritable and moveable property, places his intention beyond all reasonable doubt.

LORD GIFFORD.—Had I thought that there was any real difference or conflict between the two Divisions I should have desired to consult the other Division before deciding this case. But I do not think there is any real conflict. The remarks of the Lord President and Lord Deas in Pitcairn v. Pitcairn and Edmond v. Edmond, which remarks were not necessary for the decision of these cases, do not go the length which was contended for by the defender and his curator ad litem, and I think there is nothing in these cases to prevent us from deciding the present one upon its own merits.

Now, I have really no difficulty at all upon the statute. The meaning of the statute is clearly brought out in the last part of the clause, which in substance enacts that the same words in a testamentary writing which would give a beneficial right to moveables shall, if the words are used in reference to heritable estate, and if the intention of the testator be clear, give also a beneficial right to such heritage. The words of the statute are perhaps not very happy, but keeping in view that it is a remedial statute, I think that its meaning is sufficiently clear. I think it puts heritage in precisely the same position as moveables when dealt with in a testamentary writing. Looking at the deed before us, I cannot doubt that the testator intended to convey his whole property, heritable as well as moveable, to his trustees for behoof of his children, and I think this intention must receive effect.

THE COURT adhered.

J. KNOX CRAWFORD, S.S.C.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 92. REV. A. BROWNE (Minister of Beith), Petitioner.—J. M. Duncan.

Mar. 1, 1875. Browne.

TEIND COURT. Teind Clerk.

Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict., c. 71—Model Feu-Charter—Alterations rendered necessary by the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, 37 and 38 Vict., c. 94.—In a petition for authority to feu the glebe of the parish of Beith the Court approved of the following alterations, rendered necessary by the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, on the model feu-charter approved of in the Penicuick case (5 Macph., p. 1145),—(1) In respect of sec. 23, the part of the reddendo clause commencing, "and paying a duplicate . . . . singular successors" (printed at 5 Macph. 1146, lines 1 to 5), was cancelled, and the following words substituted, "and paying a duplicate of the said annual feu-duty at the term of (being nineteen years after the term from which the feu-duty begins to run), and at the term of in each nineteenth year thereafter, with a fifth part more of penalty in case of failure, and interest of each of said payments at the foresaid rate from the time the same falls due during the non-payment;" and (2) in respect of sec. 22, the clause prohibiting subinfeudation, printed at 5 Macph. 1146, lines 7 to 17, was omitted.

THE COURT approved of these alterations.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S., Agents.

No. 93. FRANCIS EDMOND AND ANOTHER (Stewart's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.
ARTHUR WELLESLEY KINNEAR (Stewart's Factor) AND OTHERS, Defenders. —Begg.
JAMES MILNE AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Moncreiff.

Mar. 2, 1875. Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart.

Presumption of Life.—In a multiplepoinding brought for the distribution of an intestate estate the interest of certain claimants depended on the question whether A B was alive in 1872. It appeared that in 1860, when A B was thirty-four years of age, he had gone to the United States and had joined the Federal Army, and had afterwards deserted, and that his friends had not heard from him since 1862. Held that neither his death nor his survivance could be presumed, and that the distribution of the portion of the fund in dispute must be postponed.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS was a multiplepoinding raised by the trustees of Miss Marjory Stewart of Carnaveron, who died in 1872, regarding the residue of her moveable estate, which she had not disposed of by her will. She had three nephews, William, Charles, and Patrick Stewart. William and Charles predeceased the testator, leaving each two children. Patrick went to the United States in 1860 when thirty-four years of age, leaving a wife and three children in Aberdeen. He wrote affectionately to his wife till February 1861. Afterwards, the civil war having broken out, he enlisted in the Federal army, but deserted in March 1862, after which, notwithstanding full inquiry, nothing was heard of him.

If he predeceased Miss Stewart, the fund in medio fell to be divided equally among her seven grandnephews and grandnieces. On the other hand, if he survived Miss Stewart, the fund fell to be divided into three parts, one-third to the issue of each of the deceased brothers, and one-third to Patrick Stewart, if still alive, or to his three children, if he had died subsequently to Miss Stewart.

As in any view each of the two families of William and Charles Stewart

No. 93.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart.

had right to two-sevenths of the fund, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor finding them entitled to four-sevenths of the fund, and, of consent, the factor loco absentis to Patrick Stewart to other two-sevenths.

The families of William and Charles Stewart each claimed one-third of the remaining seventh, on the footing that Patrick Stewart must be presumed to have been alive at the date of Miss Stewart's death. Patrick Stewart's children claimed that the trustees should retain the portion of the fund in dispute until the facts were ascertained, and pleaded—(1) It being uncertain whether the said Patrick Stewart survived or predeceased the testatrix, the fund in medio ought not to be divided on the footing of his having survived. (2) Assuming that the said Patrick Stewart predeceased the testatrix, the fund in medio would be divisible among the claimants and their cousins, as the next of kin per capita, and the claimants would be entitled to three-seventh parts of the fund. (3) In the circumstances, the claimants are entitled to have the difference between the said three-seventh parts of the fund and the third of the fund which falls to the said Patrick Stewart, in the event of his having survived, retained by the trustees or consigned in terms of the claim.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the facts admitted, and the inferences legitimately deducible from these facts, neither create a presumption nor warrant the conclusion that the truster was predeceased by her nephew, Patrick Stewart, referred to in the record, or that the said Patrick Stewart is now dead: Finds (2) that it being uncertain whether the said Patrick Stewart is alive or dead, and if dead, when he died, the claimants, Mr W. D. Stewart and Mrs Mary Amelia Ann Stewart or Scawell, children of the now deceased William Farquharson Stewart, who was also a nephew of the truster, and the claimant, Mr A. W. Kinnear, factor loco tutoris to William Charles Stewart and Ann Helen Stewart, children of the deceased Charles Stewart, another nephew of the truster, all of whom claim upon the footing that the said Patrick Stewart survived the truster, are not entitled to obtain an immediate division of the undivided seventh of the fund in medio, the right to which is the subject of competition between the said claimants and the claimants George Stewart, William Stewart, and Euphemia Campbell Stewart, children of the said Patrick Stewart: Therefore sustains the first and third pleas in law for the claimants, the said George Stewart, William Stewart, and Euphemia Campbell Stewart, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard as to the order to be pronounced for the interim preservation of the fund, reserving meantime all questions of expenses."*

---

* "NOTE.—. . . . The facts of the case, so far as already known, are set forth in the minute of admissions, No. 35 of process, and though these furnish grounds for a suspicion, they, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, neither create a presumption nor afford warrant, in the meantime, for the conclusion that Patrick Stewart predeceased the truster. . . . .

"While the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to deal at present with the fund on the footing that Patrick Stewart is dead, he is as unprepared to deal with it on the footing that he survived the truster. A decision upon the rights of the competing claimants would, it is thought, be in the meantime premature. The cardinal fact is unascertained, and conjectures or even probabilities would not be grounds for judgment. The insufficiency of the facts to warrant the presumption of death is not a reason for adjudicating either upon his right or the rights of others, on the assumption that he is now in life, or was alive when the truster died. Who are the heirs in mobilibus of the truster is a question which cannot be answered by aid merely of conjecture, or even of probability. That is a fact which must be ascertained either by proof leading directly or pre-

No. 93. Mr Kinnear, factor for Charles Stewart's children, reclaimed.

Mar. 2, 1875. Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE, were of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

D. L. SHAND, W.S.—M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 94. ROBERT PATERSON, Petitioner.—D.-F. Clark—MacLean.
GEORGE M'FARLANE and JAMES HUTTON (Liquidators of Hamilton and Paterson's Cask Company, Limited).—Guthrie Smith—Harper.

Mar. 2, 1875. Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

Partnership—Joint-Stock Company—Liability inter socios—Companies Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict., c. 89, secs. 38 and 133, sub-sec. 9.—Held, in a voluntary winding up of a company limited by shares that after all debts had been paid shareholders who had taken fully paid-up shares in partial payment of a patent sold to the company were entitled to require the liquidators to make a call upon the holders of shares not fully paid up, so as to equalise the actual payments on these shares with the nominal payments of the holders of paid-up shares.

2D DIVISION. I.

THE Hamilton and Paterson's Patent Cask Company (Limited) was incorporated, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, in May 1872, for the purpose of working certain patents held by John Hamilton and Robert Paterson, and taking over the business carried on by them. By assignation, dated September 1872, the patentees transferred their patents to the company for £1000 in cash, and 4000 one pound shares in the company, to be held as fully paid up. Messrs Hamilton and Paterson further received a sum of above £2000 in cash for their plant and stock in trade.

In the prospectus of the company it was stated:—"The capital of the company has been fixed at £20,000, in 20,000 shares of £1 each. Of these the vendors are to take 4000, fully paid up, as above-mentioned, and the remaining 16,000 are to be issued to the public; and it is not expected that more than 10s. per share will require to be called up."

The articles of association provided:—"There shall be payable the sum of 5s. per share as deposit on application; and the further sum of 5s. per share on allotment. The remaining 10s. per share shall be called up as required."

The articles of association incorporated the regulations contained in Table A in the first schedule of the Companies Act, 1862, with certain exceptions not bearing upon the present question. Among the regulations so incorporated was No. 7, which provides,—"That the directors may, if they think fit, receive from any member willing to advance the sumptively to the conclusion; and the negative, that for anything yet known Patrick Stewart cannot be held to be dead, is not equivalent to evidence that he survived the truster. The fact on which the controversy turns is consequently still in doubt, and therefore the Lord Ordinary thinks that the case upon which parties have joined issue is not ripe for decision. These, at any rate, are the views of the Lord Ordinary, and hence the interlocutor which has been pronounced.

---

"The Lord Ordinary may add, that the decisions referred to at the debate will be found collected on pp. 56-62 of the first volume of Mr M'Laren's Treatise on Wills. These, it is thought, support the first of the Lord Ordinary's findings. The second, so far as the Lord Ordinary can see, is not inconsistent with any rule or principle which they can be held to establish."

No. 94.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

same, all, or any part, of the monies due upon the shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for; and upon the monies so paid in advance, or so much thereof as from time to time exceeds the amount of the calls then made upon the shares, in respect of which such advance has been made, the company may pay interest, as the member paying such sum in advance and the directors agree upon." No. 72,—"The directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares."

Besides the vendor's 4000 shares, 14,795 ordinary £1 shares were taken up by the public, upon which 10s. per share was paid.

The company was not successful, and in 1874 it was resolved that it should be wound up voluntarily, and Messrs M'Farlane and Hutton, C.A., were appointed liquidators.

The liquidators sold the stock in trade and patents for £1115. After paying the debts, they found that there would be a surplus of about £1300, out of which they announced, by circulars issued 22d January 1875, their intention of paying a dividend to the shareholders of 2s. 3d. per pound on the amount of capital subscribed by them.

Mr Robert Paterson, who then held 830 vendors' shares, presented a petition under the 138th section of the Companies Act, 1862, against the liquidators.*

The petitioner stated,—"In order to the equitable adjustment of the rights of the contributories of the company amongst themselves, the respondents, as liquidators, were bound so to act as to equalise the losses of the whole shareholders." In their proposal for dividing the surplus "the respondents ignore the fact that the petitioner and others hold fully paid-up shares, or, in other words, have contributed 20s. for each share; while the three-fifths of the shareholders have only contributed 10s. for each share held by them, notwithstanding that they were liable to pay 20s. per share. The consequence of this procedure is, that those shareholders, including the petitioner, who possess fully paid-up shares, lose 17s. 9d. on each share held by them, while the shareholders who have only paid 10s. per share only lose 8s. 10½d. per share." He, therefore, prayed for an order upon the liquidators to make a call of 10s. per share upon all the shareholders who had not paid more than 10s. per share, and thereafter to proceed in terms of the statute with the adjustment

* The material parts of the statute bearing upon the present question are as follows:—"Sec. 38.—In the event of a company formed under this Act being wound up, every present and past member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for payment of the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories among themselves," [with certain qualifications not bearing upon the present question.]

Sec. 74.—"The term 'contributory' shall mean every person liable to contribute to the assets of a company under this Act, in the event of the same being wound up."

Sec. 133.—"The following consequences shall ensue upon the voluntary winding up of a company. . . . (Sub-sec. 9) The liquidators may at any time after the passing of the resolution for winding up the company, and before they have ascertained the sufficiency of the assets of the company, call on all or any of the contributories for the time being settled on the list of contributories to the extent of their liability to pay all or any sums they deem necessary to satisfy the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs, charges, and expenses of winding it up, and for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves. (Sub-sec. 10) The liquidators shall pay the debts of the company, and adjust the rights of the contributories among themselves."

No. 94.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

of the rights of the contributories among themselves, and for interdict against the liquidators making a dividend as proposed in their circular.

Answers were lodged for the liquidators, in which they stated, inter alia;—"The directors of the company did not resolve to call up the 10s. unpaid on the ordinary shares, and it was never even proposed by or among them to call up the money. On the contrary, the intention was that the money should be called up only if required for the prosecution of the company's business. Neither did the petitioner propose to the directors that they should make a call, nor did he request the respondents as liquidators to do so. The first and only intimation made to the respondents on the subject was by service upon them of the present petition. In the circumstances the respondents considered that the division of the surplus as proposed by them was proper and equitable, and that a call should not be made by them upon the holders of the ordinary shares."

Argued for the petitioner;—There was no dispute that the company were bound by their agreement with the patentees. The patentees must be held to be precisely in the same situation as if they had paid 20s. per share.[1] The object of the winding up was not only to provide for the payment of the debts of the company, but also to equalise the losses of the contributories.[2] It was held in the case of the Anglesea Colliery Company[3] that a holder of paid-up shares was a contributory in the sense of sec. 133, sub-sec. 9, of the Companies Act, 1862. The circumstances of that case were identical with those of the present.

Argued for the respondents;—The question was whether the liquidators were bound to make a call upon the ordinary shares for the benefit of the vendors' shares. When a common law partnership was dissolved, the assets, after payment of debts, fell to be divided among the partners in proportion to their contributions to the stock of the partnership.[4] There was nothing in the Companies Act which placed a joint stock company on a different footing as to this. The holders of the vendors' shares were not, in any sense, creditors of the company for unpaid calls upon the ordinary shares. If the company had been prosperous, it must be presumed, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, that the vendors would have got double profits on their shares, in respect that their contribution was nominally 20s. per share as against 10s. per share paid by the other shareholders. It was, therefore, fair that the measure of profit should also be the measure of loss. The footing on which the public were induced to take shares in the concern was that the ordinary shareholders were not to be called upon to pay more than 10s. per share, unless it was necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company or paying debts. There must be held to be an implied contract to this effect,[5] and to give effect to the petitioner's demand would be contrary to equity.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The present is a petition at the instance of an alleged shareholder of a company called Hamilton and Paterson's Patent Cask Company (Limited), constituted under the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867. It is directed against the liquidators of the company, and has for its object to have

[1] Pell, Nov. 30, 1869, L. R., 5 Chan. App. 11.

[2] Graham v. Western Bank, Feb. 23, 1866, 4 Macph. 484, 38 Scot. Jur. 216 (see opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk).

[3] Anglesea Colliery Co., May 7, 1866, L. R., 2 Eq. Cases, 379—aff. Aug. 4, 1866, L. R., 1 Chan. App. 555; see also Hodges' Distillery Co., Nov. 25, 1870, L. R., 6 Chan. App. 51.

[4] Bell's Principles, sec. 380.

[5] See the case of the Holyford Mining Co., Feb. 1, 1869, Irish Rep., 3 Eq. 208.

No. 94.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

the liquidators ordained to make a call on the other shareholders, in order to equalise the payments made by the petitioner in liquidation.

It is enough to state for the purposes of this advising that this company was started in the year 1872 for the purpose of working a patent, of which the petitioner was one of the patentees. The capital of the concern was £20,000, in £1 shares. The patentees transferred their patent to the company for £1000 in cash, and £4000 to be paid to that amount in shares of the company, which were to be held as paid up, and the remaining shares to the extent of £14,795 were taken up by the public, and on these, in terms of the articles of association, 10s. a-share was paid.

The concern proved a failure, and is in the course of liquidation under the statute. The debts have all been paid, the patent sold for £1115, including the casks, and there remains a sum of £1300, which the liquidators now propose to divide among the company in proportion to the sums advanced,—in other words, in the proportion of £4000 to £7397. On the other hand, it is maintained by the petitioner, that before any division of this surplus takes place the payments which have been made to account of capital which have been applied in payment of the debts must be equalised,—that is to say, that the patentees holding £4000 of the stock ought only to bear a proportion of the debt corresponding to their shares,—in other words, the proportion, not of £4000 to £7397, but the proportion of £4000 to £14,795, or about one-fourth instead of more than one-half of the whole amount.

If this be right, it is certainly a hard case for the shareholders, for while the patent was valued at £5000, it has, along with the plant and stock in trade, only produced £1115, while the only money that ever was paid into the concern was the £7397 paid by the other shareholders, who have thus in reality furnished seven-eighths of the funds out of which the debts were paid. But notwithstanding that I am very sensible of the hardship, I am of opinion that the petitioner must prevail; and I am confirmed in this opinion by the decisions in the Courts in England, which hardly leave us any alternative in this matter.

In the first place, we must assume that the patentees were holders of 4000 shares of the company, and that these shares were paid up, and it is not competent now to inquire what the value given for these shares was. That has been conclusively fixed in the cases of Pell and the Anglesea Colliery Company, which were quoted from the bar. The shareholders had full notice of the transaction in the memorandum of association, and no ground can be stated on which it can be impeached. I could have understood an argument directed to shew that the nature of the arrangement by which the company was constituted, and under which the resolution to wind up was arrived at, implied that the shareholders were not to be called on to contribute any more than 10s. per share unless the rest of the capital were required for the purposes of the business as a going concern. But that contention, and, indeed, the rest of the argument which was submitted to us, seems entirely excluded by the decision in the Anglesea Colliery Company, decided first by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, and confirmed by the Lords Justices on appeal. The facts of that case were precisely similar. The company under liquidation purchased the rights of another company, and paid for them in a certain amount of shares, the calls on which were to be held as paid up. The liquidators in that case made a call upon the other shareholders, who had only paid a certain proportion per share

No. 94.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

in order to equalise the payments, and it was held, first, that the holders of paid-up shares were contributories in the sense of the statute; secondly, that the liquidation included an equalising of the contributions among shareholders; thirdly, that there was no ground for impeaching the amount represented by the paid-up shares; and lastly, that the call had been properly made. The decision is so completely in point that it is not necessary that we should affirm all the propositions laid down by Lord Hatherley in giving his judgment. It is enough that it forms a precedent on the construction of this imperial statute which we cannot disregard. At the same time, my own opinion entirely coincides with the ground of that judgment. I cannot entertain the argument maintained in that case, and maintained here, that the holder of paid-up shares in such a concern is liable in a greater proportion of the company's debts than those who have only paid up half their calls. How the case might be adjusted as regards the division of profits while the company was a going concern is perhaps a different question. At common law, where the shares of a trading company are equal, a partner superadvancing his capital is credited with interest on the advance before the balance of profit and loss is struck; and there is a provision very much to the same effect in Table A of the first schedule annexed to the Act in question, No. 7 of which provides that "the directors may, if they think fit, receive from any member willing to advance the same all or any part of the monies due upon the shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for; and upon the monies so paid in advance, or so much thereof as from time to time exceeds the amount of the calls then made upon the shares in respect of which such advance has been made, the company may pay interest, as the member paying such sum in advance and the directors agree upon." In regard to dividends, again, it is provided by sec. 72, that "the directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares." These provisions seem entirely consistent with Lord Hatherley's views, and to negative the idea that a superadvance of capital of the nature in question creates a larger stake or interest in the concern itself, or a larger responsibility inter socios, than is enjoyed or incurred by the other shareholders. But contenting myself with indicating the impression which I have on the subject, I think it enough to say that the case of the Anglesea Colliery Company is precisely in point, and that I think we ought to follow that precedent.

Lord Neaves.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The decisions which have been pronounced in England, particularly that in the case of the Anglesea Colliery Company, under a system which cannot be regarded as peculiar to that country, leaves us no alternative. Even if we did not concur in the grounds of these decisions it would be highly inconvenient to lay down a different rule in Scotland.

This is, no doubt, a case of hardship for the ordinary shareholders. But there is no allegation of fraud or concealment, or of anything which could set aside the agreement between the patentees and the company. We have a precedent in one of the cases cited, in which the Court refused to go behind such an agreement, and allow an inquiry into the value of the property transferred to the company in consideration of the nominally paid-up shares.

The respondents have attempted to spell out a guarantee that the ordinary shareholders should not be called upon to pay more than 10s. per share, except

No. 94.

Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

on special cause. But I see no guarantee that the legal rights of parties, whatever they might be, should not take effect. The holders of paid-up shares must not be left to bear more of the burden than the others; for we must hold the patentees to be in exactly the same position as if they had paid up their shares in cash. A holder of paid-up shares is not a contributory in the sense of having to pay anything more, but he is or may be a contributory in the sense that he has paid up more than the others, and so is entitled to have a call made upon them to equalise the contributions.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have arrived at the same result without any difficulty.

There are two points which we require to keep in view. The first question is, how far a holder of fully paid-up shares is to be regarded as a contributory in the sense of the Companies Act? Proceeding upon the views which were given effect to in the Anglesea Colliery Company, in which the clauses of the statute bearing upon this matter were carefully analysed, I have no doubt that, for purposes of winding up, the petitioner is entitled to be dealt with as a contributory.

The next question is, how is the surplus, after paying all the debts of the concern, to be divided among the contributories, assuming that the petitioner is a contributory? I am satisfied of the soundness of the decision in the Anglesea Colliery Company, which, though not absolutely binding upon us as a precedent, is entitled to the greatest weight. Besides, it is evident that in the Irish case of the Holyford Mining Company the decision would have been the same had it not been for the special contract created by the articles of association in that case. We are not called upon to decide as to what might be the rights of the partners if the company were still a going concern, though it may be right to consider that matter to enable us the better to arrive at a conclusion in regard to the question before us. It is unnecessary for me to say whether all the observations reported to have fallen from the Vice-Chancellor, in deciding the Anglesea Colliery case, regarding the rights of the partners of a going concern, are correct or not. But where as here the company is no longer a going concern, but is being wound up, I am clearly of opinion, both upon principle and upon the authority of that case, that the holders of fully paid-up shares are entitled to have a call made upon the holders of shares not fully paid-up, so as to equalise the contributions upon all.

There may perhaps be room for the suggestion that the patentees in this case made so good a bargain at the establishment of the company as to render their claim to equalisation now less favourable than it might otherwise have been. But I doubt very much the relevancy of any such consideration; and, at any rate, it would not, I think, be safe to proceed upon it without having all the circumstances before us. The patents might have been worth all that was given for them, though from a change of circumstances the company has proved disastrous.

I concur in the interlocutor which your Lordship proposes. It is unnecessary to call up the whole of the partially paid-up shares. The amount of the call necessary to be made is a matter merely of calculation, and need not create any difficulty.

LORD GIFFORD.—I do not differ from the judgment proposed by your Lordships, but I have felt the case to be attended with very considerable difficulty in point of principle, and but for the decision in the case of the Anglesea Colliery Company, as confirmed by the case of the Holyford Mining Company, should have been inclined to think that the holders of shares in this Patent Cask Company, held as paid-up shares, have no claim for equalisation in a question inter socios against the holders of shares not fully paid up, but on which shares no farther call had been found necessary either for carrying on the business, or for paying the debts due by the company.

No. 94.
Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

The ground of my difficulty is this: I think that in this joint-stock company it was part of the contract that the vendors should accept the price of their patents and of the goodwill sold, or part of said price, in fully paid-up shares—that is, in shares held to be fully paid up—while other partners were only to be required to pay up such calls as were necessary for carrying on the business. I think this is equivalent to a stipulation and special contract that while the capital was distributed in shares some shareholders, for certain good and sufficient reasons, were taken bound to pay up their shares in full, while other partners were not so bound. Now, in principle, I think the effect of such a stipulation is, that the partners who are specially taken bound to contribute a larger capital than the other partners must be held to undertake a larger risk, so that if the whole paid-up capital be lost the holders of fully paid-up shares shall have no claim for equalisation against the other shareholders, but each shareholder shall lose precisely the capital which he became bound to pay in. In short, while the profits are divisible rateably per share, the bargain is that some shareholders shall pay in more on each share than others. The special contract makes the case quite different from a voluntary advance by a partner, or an advance by consent of the directors under the statute.

Suppose the case of an ordinary trading company not incorporated, and not under the statutes at all,—suppose that in the contract of copartnery it is stipulated that each partner shall be equally interested in the profit and loss, but that one or more of the partners is taken bound for some reason or other to contribute twice as much capital as the others,—of course all the partners are liable in solidum for the debts of the company; but suppose the debts all paid, and at the winding up that the whole capital has simply been lost, I have the greatest possible doubts whether the partners who, by express contract, had contributed double capital, would have any claim for equalisation inter socios. They expressly agreed to run double risk, and they must accept all consequences.

I do not think the case is different in questions inter socios with a joint stock company under the statutes. The Legislature looks with considerable suspicion on shares simply "held as paid up," for the Act of 1867 provides that they must be actually paid up in cash, unless there be an agreement in writing prior to the issue of the shares, and duly registered, that the value is to be something else than cash.[1] I presume that this requisite exists in the present case, as I have heard nothing to the contrary. The agreement of the vendors to take their price, or part thereof, in paid-up shares was an inducement to the general public to contribute, and it is somewhat difficult to see in what the inducement consisted if not in this, that the vendors had such confidence in the company that they were willing to run a greater risk than the ordinary partners.

While, however, I cannot help entertaining these diffiulties, the point seems so nearly foreclosed by the cases cited that I defer to the opinions of your Lordships.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the petition, with the answers thereto, ordain George M'Farlane and James Hutton, the liquidators, to make a call of as much per share upon all the shareholders of the company who have not paid more than 10s. per share as will, with the funds in the hands of the liquidators, be sufficient to equalise the contributions of the shareholders, and thereafter to proceed, in terms of the statute, with the adjustment of the rights of the contributories among themselves, and decern: Find the expenses of both parties payable out of the first of the funds, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report."

[1] 30 and 31 Vict., c. 131, sec. 25.

No. 94.
Mar. 2, 1875.
Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c.

JOHN WRIGHT, W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

SIR HEW CRAWFURD POLLOK, Complainer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour—Mackintosh.
GEORGE BURNS, Respondent.—D.-F Clark—M'Laren.

No. 95.
Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

Bill of Exchange—Suspension—Intoxication.—In a suspension of a charge upon a bill upon the ground that it had been obtained when the suspender was incapacitated through intoxication, held on consideration of a proof as to the suspender's state on the occasion, and his subsequent actings, and in respect that he had never challenged the bill, though frequently applied to for payment of it, until charged, six months after it had become due, that he was not entitled to suspend the charge.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. I.

ON 2d June 1874 George Burns, horse-dealer in Edinburgh, caused Sir Hew Crawfurd Pollok, of Pollok, to be charged on a bill for £110, bearing to have been granted by Sir Hew as acceptor to him. The bill was in the following terms:—

Edinr., 23th Nov. 1873.

£110 stg.

Seven days after date pay to me or my order the sum of one hundred and ten pounds stg., for value received, payable at the Bank of Scotland, Edinr.

Sir Hugh C. Pollock,
Pollock Castle,
Glasgow.

HEW CRAWFURD POLLOK.
GEO. BURNS.

3 Dec. 1873. R. M. A. P. x

Indorsed on Back.
Geo. Burns.

Sir Hew presented a note of suspension of the charge, assigning as his reasons for suspension (1) that the bill was not his writ, and (2) that, assuming the signature to be his, it was impetrated and obtained from him while he was in a state of intoxication, and was not conscious of what he was doing.

The note was passed on caution on 18th June, and thereafter a record was made up and a proof allowed to both parties.

The following narrative of the facts is taken from the averments of parties, and the evidence led.

On 13th June 1873 Sir Hew purchased from Burns a pair of cobs, for which he paid at the time, and on the same occasion a brown horse was taken by Sir Hew, as he said, on trial, with a view to an exchange for a mare of his, but, as Burns maintained, as a purchase on credit. The price of this horse was £110. The horse and the cobs were sent by

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

Burns to Pollok Castle, and on 18th August Burns wrote to Sir Hew asking for a cheque for £100 to account of the horse's price. Instead of sending a cheque Sir Hew returned the horse to Burns, at whose stables it arrived on 20th August. Burns on that day wrote Sir Hew stating that as his stables were infected he had sent the horse to a livery stable, and also enclosing a bill at three months for £110 for Sir Hew's acceptance. No notice was taken of this letter or bill, but on 25th September Sir Hew wrote Burns saying he would be in Edinburgh in October.

On Monday, 24th November, Burns and a man Forrester of the Bay Horse Inn, Edinburgh, went to Pollok Castle, as they said, by invitation. On their arrival they were entertained by Sir Hew at luncheon, and afterwards he took them a drive in a dog-cart, he driving tandem. While out on this drive they stopped at various inns and houses and had whisky. After their return dinner was served, and, eventually, they left about seven o'clock. During the time they were at Pollok Castle they stated that the bill charged on was obtained from Sir Hew, but the evidence as to where and when it was signed was very conflicting.

Burns and Forrester differed as to the time and the place, while Sir Hew denied that he ever signed it, and his servants stated that though a bill was talked about they did not see it signed, and at no time were Sir Hew and his guests left alone for more than a minute or two. It appeared that Sir Hew was under a promise to his agent not to grant bills, and that on the morning after Burns's visit he told one of his servants that there had been an attempt made to get him to sign a bill, but that he had not done so.

The evidence as to Sir Hew's state on the occasion was also conflicting, Burns and Forrester saying that he was sober at the time they arrived, and at no time during their visit was he much affected by drink, while Sir Hew maintained that as he had been drinking heavily for some days before, and also on the morning of their arrival, he was quite stupified with drink, and was not in a fit state to understand what he was doing, or to attend to business. Sir Hew's servants corroborated his statements as to the previous drinking, but none of them could be brought to say that he was absolutely incapable at any time during Burns's stay. Sir Hew admitted that he recollected helping Burns on with his great-coat when he was going away. There was no clear evidence as to the amount of drink consumed, but it appeared Sir Hew drank spirits and water during and after dinner.

On his return to Edinburgh, Burns lodged the bill with the Bank of Scotland for collection, and intimation of this fact was duly made to Sir Hew by the cashier on 29th November. On 5th December the protesting of the bill was also intimated by the bank, and on 25th January 1874 Burns wrote threatening to put Sir Hew's name in the black list if he did not retire the bill. On 18th February Burns again wrote in similar terms, and on 11th March the secretary of the bank also wrote requesting payment of the bill, charges, and interest. Burns again wrote on 12th March, but Sir Hew took no notice of any of these communications. There was evidence, however, of his having been in Edinburgh about January or February 1874, and having met Burns in the Bay Horse Inn, where, according to Burns, Forrester, and another witness, the subject of the bill was introduced, and Sir Hew undertook to retire it, but subsequently explained that owing to the absence of his agent in London he had been unable to get money for the purpose. Sir Hew denied that he had ever admitted liability for the bill, or intended to pay it. When examined, however, he declined to swear that the signature was not his

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

although he stated that he believed it not to be his. No evidence as to his handwriting and usual signature was adduced by him.

The Lord Ordinary, on 19th December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the reasons of suspension, suspends the letters and charge simpliciter, and decerns: Finds the respondent liable in expenses, of which allows an account to be given in," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The present case is a suspension of a charge upon a bill for £110, dated 23d November 1873, drawn by the respondent, George Burns, horse-dealer in Edinburgh, upon and bearing to be accepted by the complainer, Sir Hew Crawfurd Pollok. The reasons of suspension are, that the complainer did not sign the bill, or, if he did sign it, that it was impetrated and obtained by the respondent, and a person of the name of Thomas Forrester, of the Bay Horse Inn, Rose Street, Edinburgh, while the complainer was intoxicated, and not only incapable of understanding or transacting business, but unconscious of what he was doing. Both of these reasons of suspension are denied by the respondent, who avers that on 13th June 1873 the complainer purchased from him a pair of cobs, for which he then paid £120; and that he also then purchased from him, on credit, at the same time, a brown horse, at the price of £110. The complainer, on the other hand, avers that while he purchased and paid for the two cobs, he did not purchase the brown horse, but received that horse on trial, with the view, if he found him to suit, of arranging an exchange of the horse for a mare which he had on grass at Pollok, and that for this purpose the respondent was to come to Pollok Castle. The complainer further avers that the brown horse was found unmanageable and unsuitable, and that on the respondent, instead of coming to Pollok Castle for the above-mentioned purpose, writing him on the 18th August 1873 demanding payment for the horse on the footing of the same having been sold to him, he returned it, as unsuitable, to the respondent's stable, where it was delivered on 21st August. The respondent denies these statements, and avers that he went with Thomas Forrester on 24th November 1873 to Pollok Castle, on the invitation of the complainer, given some time before the date of the bill; that he and Forrester lunched and dined there, and were driven by the complainer round the country between lunch and dinner, and that on referring to the debt the complainer, as it was not then convenient to pay in money, at once and unhesitatingly accepted the bill now charged on, after returning from the drive, and before dinner, which bill the respondent then and there wrote out for the complainer's acceptance.

"1. On the first question, whether the acceptance 'Hew Crawfurd Pollok' on the bill charged on is not the subscription of the complainer, the Lord Ordinary finds for the respondent. Although that subscription differs from, it is on the whole not unlike the complainer's usual subscription, and such difference may be accounted for by the state of intoxication in which the complainer undoubtedly was on the day when the bill is said to have been signed by him. The Lord Ordinary does not believe that the whole bill was written out and signed by the respondent as drawer, and that the complainer's subscription was obtained at the same time. The evidence of the complainer's witnesses, and also the appearance of the bill, exclude, in his opinion, the possibility of all that having been then done. Neither does he consider that the complainer's signature was obtained before dinner, as averred by the respondent. The only time that his signature could have been obtained to the bill stamp was, he thinks, when Jenner, the servant who waited during dinner, and was present after dinner, and until the respondent and Forrester left, went out of the room for a minute or so to get a jug of water, and that was some time after dinner, and very shortly before the respondent and Forrester left. The complainer will not swear that it is not his signature. He depones that he does not believe it to be his signature, but the grounds of that opinion are its difference from his ordinary signature, and that he has no recollection of signing or of having signed it; but that want of recollection may be accounted for by the extreme state of intoxica-

No. 95. Burns reclaimed.

Mar. 8, 1875. Pollok v. Burns.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is an unusual one, and we have heard it very fully discussed. It is also a very painful one, because no one can approve of tion in which he was at the time above mentioned. Further, there is no witness adduced by him to prove that it is not his signature.

"2. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the case stands in a different position as regards the question whether the bill was accepted by the complainer when he was so much intoxicated as to be wholly incapable of understanding business.

"In order to arrive at a proper conclusion upon this question it is necessary to attend to the proceedings of the 24th of November, and to the state in which the complainer was at various periods during these proceedings.

"It is proved that the complainer had been drinking to excess on the night previous to 24th November, and that on that day he had taken so much drink before the respondent and Forrester arrived at Pollok Castle as to be in a stupid state. It is also proved that he had more drink, including spirits, when these persons lunched with him; and that during the drive after lunch they called at a private house and at two public houses, at each of which he drank whisky. After lunch he was more intoxicated than he was when the respondent and Forrester arrived. On returning from the drive he was also more intoxicated than he was after lunch, and was so far gone that he had to be lifted from the dog-cart and helped upstairs by the witness James Kerr, then overseer at Pollok, being unable to go upstairs unassisted. James Kerr depones that he was then getting unable to walk, or to do anything, and that he was nearly dead drunk, and not in a fit state to do business. William Kerr, the coachman who accompanied the parties during the drive, depones that they were all pretty drunk when they returned to Pollok Castle, and that during the drive Forrester fell off the dog-cart from drink, and that the complainer nearly fell, and was only saved by catching hold of the dog-cart lamp, which he broke. The witness, David Jenner, states that the complainer and the respondent and Forrester had a good deal of drink during and after dinner—the complainer drinking whisky and water; that during dinner the complainer was not in a fit state to do business, and was not speaking coherently; that after dinner, when he left the room for a minute or so to get a jug of water, which was half an hour after dinner, the complainer was drunk, and that he is quite sure that the complainer was not then in a fit state to understand business. Thomas Yule, the gamekeeper, who was sent for by the complainer, and saw him during dinner, says that the complainer was then speaking incoherently; that he could not understand what the complainer meant; that the complainer did not know what he was doing, and was not in a fit state to transact business, and that he was exceedingly drunk. Immediately after the respondent and Forrester left the complainer went to bed, from which he was roused in about half an hour by James Kerr, to meet his agent, Mr Lamond, who had come from Edinburgh on business. James Kerr says that the complainer was not then sensible, and not fit to transact business. Mr Lamond also depones that the complainer was then very drunk, talking incoherently, and not understanding him or following what he said. The complainer also, who gave his evidence, the Lord Ordinary thought, in a straightforward way, depones that he was drunk, that he has no recollection whatever of signing the bill, and that he believes he did not sign it; and it is proved by James Kerr, the overseer, that on the following morning the complainer did not recollect of seeing Mr Lamond, and told him that the respondent and Forrester wanted to get a bill signed, and that he had not done it.

"Such being the state of the complainer on the 24th of November, the next question is as to the time on that day when his signature was obtained to the bill. The respondent depones that after lunch, and before starting for the drive, he asked the complainer to pay his account, and that the complainer answered—'I will settle with you when we come back from our drive.' The respondent also depones that there was nothing said about the horse. The the actings on either side. Burns has charged Sir Hew Pollok on a bill of £110, said to have been granted by him at seven days' date on 23d November 1873. No. 95. Mar. 3, 1875. Pollok v. Burns.

complainer, on the other hand, depones that he was then asked several times to grant a bill for the price of the horse, and that he answered that he did not wish the horse, that it was returned, and that he would not pay for it. In this the complainer is corroborated by his friend John Pollok, who depones that both the respondent and Forrester pressed the complainer over and over again to sign a bill, which he refused to do, and that the complainer did not say that he would see about respondent's account after the drive. David Jenner also states that before they went out to drive he heard them disputing about the complainer's liability for the horse; that the respondent and Forrester wanted the complainer to sign a bill for the horse, and that the complainer refused, and said he would have nothing to do with the horse. Jenner also states that the complainer did not say he would settle or arrange with them after they came back from the drive. The respondent depones that after returning from the drive, and before dinner, the complainer at once agreed, on being asked, to sign the bill, requested it to be drawn at seven days after date, instead of three, four, or five months which he was offered, and that he then signed the bill at the dinner table before dinner, without making any objection to do so. Forrester states that the bill was signed before dinner in the room off the dining-room. But David Jenner depones that the respondent and Forrester asked the complainer several times to sign the bill both before, during, and after dinner, and that the complainer always refused to do so. Margaret M'Lellan, who was present during the first part of the dinner, states that the respondent asked the complainer several times to sign the bill, and that he always refused. David Jenner further states that it is his belief that Sir Hew did not sign a bill after dinner, and that he was in attendance during the whole time of dinner until the respondent and Forrester went away, but he admits that he was out of the room for a jug of water, that he only required to go down a few steps for it, and that he was not out of the room for more than a minute or so. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that up to this time the bill had not been signed, and that it was during the time that Jenner was absent that the complainer's signature was obtained. The bill must, he thinks, have then been signed blank, because Jenner was not out of the room a sufficient time for the respondent to write out and address the bill, and subscribe it as drawer. The body of the bill must, the Lord Ordinary thinks, have been written out at a subsequent date, and it bears internal evidence that this was the case, the complainer's acceptance being written close to the body of the bill, and above the subscription of the drawer. The Lord Ordinary observes that the amount of the bill in figures at the top was originally written £100, and that it has been afterwards altered to £110, being the amount for which the bill has been written out. The respondent gave no explanation of this; and it may be noticed, that the respondent had some time previously sent for the complainer's acceptance a bill for £100, which the complainer did not accept, but sent to his agent.

"After careful consideration of the proof the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the complainer's signature was obtained after dinner, and very shortly before the respondent and Forrester left Pollok Castle, when the complainer was in such a state of complete intoxication as not to know what he was doing, and to be incapable of understanding business.

"The respondent avers that the complainer purchased a brown horse from him on 13th June 1873, and that the bill was granted for the price of this horse. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this alleged purchase has not been proved. The respondent and Forrester depone that the horse was not taken on trial, but bought. But the complainer denies this, and depones that he only took the horse on trial, with a view, if the horse were found to suit, of his subsequent purchase, and the purchase at the same time by the respondent of the mare which the complainer then had on grass at Pollok Castle. The complainer's evidence on this point is corroborated by that of his coachman, William Kerr, and also by that of James Kerr, the overseer, who states that

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

The bill is produced. It is anything but a distinct document. The sum apparently in the figures has been altered. It bears date on a Sunday, if I do not mistake, and the acceptor's name is placed above the drawer's. But, notwithstanding, it may be a good enough document of debt. The bill bears to have been granted in November 1873, but nothing was done for four or five months. Intimation had been sent by the Bank of Scotland, where the bill had been lodged for collection, to Sir Hew, but no notice was taken of the intimation, and at last the charge is given out of which this suspension has arisen. The defence is twofold. The first defence is that the bill is a forgery, and that the signature of Sir Hew Pollok, adhibited thereto, is not genuine. But that defence seems untenable. Sir Hew says he does not believe it to be his signature, but there is no other proof. No persons are adduced who knew Sir Hew's handwriting to say the subscription is not his, and we have specimens here, after considering which I am satisfied that it is the handwriting of Sir Hew Pollok, although not a favorable specimen. I think the case is reduced to the second plea, and that is, that if the bill was signed by Sir Hew Pollok, it was signed while he was in a state of incapacity through intoxication. Now, that is not a favourable plea under any circumstances. Where that plea is taken regarding a party deceased the circumstances are different, but where the person himself comes forward to say that he does not know what he signed because he was drunk, there are things very important which in the ordinary transactions of life should not be lost sight of. It is certain that some transaction took place between the parties regarding the horse in question. Sir Hew says the transaction was a barter for another horse. Burns alleges that it was not; that he did not even give a trial of the horse; and that it was an out-and-out sale. I do not think it is proved that it was an out-and-out sale. Neither do I think there is any proof of exchange. It appears to me that the proof comes to this:—That the horse was taken on trial with a view to sale, and I am also of opinion that having kept the horse for the period for which he did keep it, Sir Hew Pollok, if that question had been tried, could hardly have maintained with success that he had not bought the horse. It seems that a bill was sent to him for signature for the price of the horse somewhere in August, the sale having taken place in June. On receiving that bill he did not sign it, but sent the horse back. The when the horse and cobs arrived at Pollok Castle the complainer told him that he had bought the two cobs, but that the horse had come on trial. The sending by the respondent of the bill for £100 above mentioned is not favourable to his contention that the horse was sold to the complainer for £110. The Lord Ordinary attaches much greater importance to the evidence of these witnesses, and to the whole evidence for the complainer, than to the evidence for the respondent. He cannot believe the evidence of the respondent and Forrester with reference to the occurrences on 24th November, when the complainer's signature was obtained. The evidence given by the respondent differs from that given by Forrester on various important particulars, and their evidence is clearly disproved on essential points by the complainer's witnesses. The respondent and Forrester, and their acquaintance Henderson, who then frequented the Bay Horse Inn, gave evidence to the effect that the complainer stated to them in or about January 1874 that he had come to town to settle the bill, and that on going to his agent for the money he failed to get it, in consequence of his agent being out of town. The complainer denies having made any such statement, and the Lord Ordinary believes him. The respondent and his two witnesses do not agree in their account of what then took place; and, having regard to the position which the complainer had then taken with reference to the horse, he thinks it very improbable that he did what these witnesses state."

---

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

horse was received by Burns, who repudiated it, and said that his own stables were in a state of infection, and he sent the horse to other stables to remain at livery at the expense of Sir Hew. He did nothing else until November of the same year. It may be doubted whether Burns was entitled to take that ground. He was entitled to say "That is your horse, and whether it is with me or with another I am not responsible." At the same time, he knew that Sir Hew repudiated that view, and I think he was hardly dealing very liberally with his employer when he allowed this long bill to run up without taking steps to have the difference settled. I must say that the means he took to recover payment of the price of the horse were very unwarrantable. He could not get Sir Hew to answer his applications, and so he and Forrester went to Pollok Castle. He says he was invited, but it does not appear that he was so. But they went and they dined with Sir Hew, and I think the evidence comes to this, that on various occasions during that day they tried to get Sir Hew to speak about business, and particularly to sign a bill for £110, they having brought a blank stamp with them. It is a remarkable circumstance that the question of sale or no sale was never brought up that day by the parties, although Burns knew that Sir Hew repudiated the sale. During dinner, they say, they got the signature to the bill. The view of Sir Hew represented to us as regards the transactions of that day is very nearly the truth. That he was exceedingly drunk at any time he could have signed the bill I think is proved, and also that Burns and Forrester did not act as they ought to have done when they knew that the matter was in controversy, in obtaining or even accepting the bill from Sir Hew under such circumstances. I cannot approve of their conduct, and I think it is anything but a creditable proceeding. If a challenge of the document had been made at once, as soon as Sir Hew found that he had signed it, I do not think the transaction could have been supported. But that is not the position in which the case stands, and it is in that respect that it raises a very important general principle. Where the plea of intoxication is taken by the person who says he was intoxicated and incapable when he did the act which he wishes to repudiate, he is bound, the moment his sober senses return and he knows what he has done, to take his ground at once. That is essential. In this case Sir Hew was made aware that a bill was lying at the Bank of Scotland for £110 in December. He was perfectly aware that the persons who visited him on the 24th wanted a bill for that amount. The case is that he refused over and over again to grant it. He stated to his servant next morning that he had been asked to sign a bill, and he said (I do not think very confidently) that he had not done it. That shews that he had recollection enough to know that it was in discussion, and then he got the intimation that a bill of his was lying at the bank. He could not have failed to know that the bill at the Bank of Scotland was the bill they wanted him to sign. He also had a discussion about the bill in Edinburgh a considerable time afterwards. He does not say that he ever indicated for a moment on that occasion that the bill was signed by him when he was drunk, and that was never said at all until this charge was given. It seems impossible to admit the plea of incapacity through intoxication, stated for the first time at an interval of six months. I think the actings of Sir Hew Pollok necessarily amount to a confession that the bill was obtained when he was not unconscious, that he knew what he was doing. Whether he was induced by the fumes of the wine he had taken to do a favourable act to Burns which he would not otherwise have done is not the question, and I assume, from the fact that he never stated the plea until the judicial demand was made, that he was conscious that he was not incapacitated, and that he knew what he had done. In that view I am constrained to differ from the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be altered, and that we must hold this to be a good charge.

No. 95.
Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur. I think this a very important case, though not very pleasant or creditable to either party. An important branch of the law is involved.

The first reason set forth for the suspender is that the bill was not signed by him. But that cannot be sustained in the circumstances. No doubt a bill is not a probative instrument in the usual sense. But although it is privileged, the party who denies his signature to a bill must prove that the signature is not his. Here Sir Hew Pollok will not swear that this is not his signature. Apart from that, his whole conduct in regard to this bill is such as to foreclose him from making out this first point.

The next reason of suspension is, that the bill is invalid, in respect it was executed when Sir Hew was intoxicated. I confess that I am inclined to hold such a plea as that can only be sustained in a case of total intoxication and incapacity, and not of mere facility through drink. It is important that the drinking which is said to have led to this intoxication cannot be held to have been induced with a view to obtaining this bill when Sir Hew was drunk. This is not the case of a simpleton who was usually sober being seduced into drunkenness. Sir Hew would drink with any one, and needed no pressure or persuasion.

Any question of this nature is very delicate, but it becomes particularly so when it arises in the case of a man who comes into Court averring of himself that he is an habitual drunkard. Such a man can easily pretend to be worse than he is.

I am prepared to give a drunk man a certain protection, but not a privilege. He is not a ward of the law to be tenderly watched over, he is a delinquent and must be regarded as such, and must be watched carefully. His case in support of such a plea as we have here depends upon his own evidence, and no one can contradict him.

An habitual drunkard, whenever he comes to his lucid interval and recollects or is informed of what he has done during his drunkenness, ought at once to set matters right. It is his duty to see to the bottom of the matter as soon as he becomes compos mentis.

Sir Hew Pollok is in a wholly different case from an innocent person who is charged on a document which he knows nothing of. When a man who states that he is an habitual drunkard is told of a document of debt which he may have granted when he was drunk, he is bound to make inquiry and to find out the truth. The bill might have been endorsed for value any day, and the granter was bound to have put matters right if he meant to challenge it.

Sir Hew Pollok here admits that he spoke in the morning of having been pressed to sign a bill, so whenever he heard of the bill afterwards he was bound to set things right, and reveal his own fault in the matter. The bill was not mentioned to him once only; letter after letter was written to him, and the very date of the bill supplied. He came to Edinburgh too, but never moved in the matter of this bill.

For an habitual drunkard to plead privilege in respect of his own infirmity

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

and vice is not to be countenanced. I think, therefore, that Sir Hew is precluded by his own actings from pleading his intoxication as a defence against a charge upon this bill, and I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordship.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and upon very much the same grounds.

The record discloses two reasons of suspension,—the only two which were relied upon,—1st, That the bill in question is not Sir Hew Pollok's writ, or, in other words, that it is a forgery; and, 2dly, That it was granted when the complainer was so intoxicated as not to know what he was doing. The Lord Ordinary ought, I think, to have in his interlocutor expressly repelled the first of these reasons, for in the note to his judgment he states his opinion, I think rightly, to the effect that the bill is the writ of the complainer and not a forgery.

The second reason of suspension is the important one, and it is undoubtedly attended with considerable difficulty, so much so, indeed, that were it not for the considerations immediately to be noticed by me, I would have been disinclined to differ in regard to it from the Lord Ordinary,—the more especially as he has had an opportunity, which I have not had, of seeing and hearing the witnesses. But I concur with your Lordships in thinking that in connection with the evidence touching Sir Hew Pollok's condition when he subscribed the bill his conduct and actings in relation to it afterwards are of the greatest importance. There are not only letters written to him by Burns, but also by Burns's bankers, with whom the bill had been deposited for collection. Sir Hew, however, although he duly received these letters, does not answer them to the effect of denying his liability. He did not write that he knew nothing of the bill and did not intend to pay it. On the contrary, he came to Edinburgh and saw Mr Burns. But when in Edinburgh he did not act like a man on whom a forgery had been committed or who had been swindled when drunk. On the contrary, his conduct, according to the only view I can take of the evidence, was that of a man who knew he was liable, and meant to satisfy his liability by paying the bill which he had granted. I do not think, therefore, that he can now be assoilzied on any of the grounds stated by him.

LORD GIFFORD.—After very full and anxious consideration I am inclined to concur in the proposed judgment in this important and painful case.

Two questions arise,—(1) Does this bill bear the signature of Sir Hew Pollok? He states upon record that it does not, and if it does not then it is a forgery, and there would be an end of the case. I am of opinion that the signature is genuine, and that it was adhibited at the meeting at Pollok Castle, about which we have so much evidence. It is quite clear that the bill was asked at that meeting. Indeed, Mr Burns and his friend went for the very purpose of procuring the bill from Sir Hew, and I think it is proved on the evidence that they did succeed in obtaining it, although the circumstances in which they did so are very far from being free from suspicion. Upon the parole evidence of the parties at Pollok Castle I think that the genuineness of the signature is proved. Even Sir Hew Pollok himself does not venture to deny absolutely that the signature may be his. Then the evidence as to handwriting is unsatisfactory. I do not attach much importance to the absence of the evidence of experts, for such evidence is more of the nature of argument than of proof. All they can do is merely to point out resemblances or differences in the disputed signature

No. 95.

Mar. 3, 1875.
Pollok v. Burns.

as compared with genuine specimens of handwriting. They afford valuable assistance to the Court, just as counsel do, but this Court must itself judge comparatione literarum. But then there is a total want of the testimony of persons conversant with Sir Hew's writing, and this kind of evidence is always valuable, and might easily have been had. For example, Sir Hew's bankers or agents, who are familiar with his handwriting, might have been expected to speak to the disputed signature. But not one of them is brought.

For myself, I have carefully compared this signature with genuine signatures in process, and I find it, at first glance, very dissimilar from them, so much so that he must be a very venturesome forger who would try to pass this as Sir Hew's signature. But on looking more closely resemblances appear all the more striking that they are not immediately obvious, and on the whole, I think the signature was really affixed by Sir Hew.

(2) The second and only other question is, whether this signature was obtained when Sir Hew was in a state of incapacity arising from intoxication. In such a case the whole circumstances must be looked at, the question really being a pure jury question.

I am inclined to agree with Lord Neaves that total incapacity from intoxication must be proved in order to support such a plea as this, not mere facility through drink. What is necessary is, that when the document was signed the granter was not capable of understanding what he was doing, and did not know the meaning or the nature of the obligation he incurred by his signature. Therefore we must inquire what was the nature of the debt which was claimed from Sir Hew, and what were the circumstances in which the bill for that alleged debt was taken. Keeping this in view, a great deal of the difficulty of the case is removed. The bill is for the price of a horse, and the question of Sir Hew's liability for that price was not a new subject with him at all. Frequent letters had been written to him on the subject, and Burns in one asks him for a cheque for the price. It is clear that Sir Hew knew to what that letter referred, because after getting it he returned the horse. But he also knew that the demand was insisted in notwithstanding the return of the horse. He knew that Mr Burns wanted payment for the horse, and when Mr Burns came to him in November Sir Hew quite understood what he wished him to do. The whole history of the proceedings of that day are important. Burns goes to Pollok Castle. He lunches and drinks, and dines and drinks with Sir Hew, and finally obtains this bill in the circumstances proved. Now, certainly, on the part of Burns, all this is not very creditable, but still, the question is, did Sir Hew know what he was about? Sir Hew was capable of driving, of acting as host sitting at table entertaining his guests, of asking for drink and pressing them to drink. It lies on Sir Hew to shew the total incapacity on which he founds, and I think he has failed in making it out.

But I go more on the fact that next morning he recollected that he had signed or might have signed a bill, and still he did nothing. Nor did he do anything even after the bank letter came stating that they held the bill for collection. He should then have repudiated it, and if he had done so this case might have had a very different aspect. Whenever the document was brought home to his consciousness he was bound to repudiate it at once, if he intended ever to challenge it.

There is to my mind a trace of sufficient recollection all through, and I therefore hold him barred from now challenging this bill. This is not the case of a man taking advantage of another's intoxication to induce him to enter into a new bargain, nor is it a case of inducing a usually temperate man to drink with a view to deceiving him. No. 95. Mar. 3, 1875. Pollok v. Burns.

I therefore agree that this suspension should be refused.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of: Repel the reasons of suspension: Find the letters and charge orderly proceeded, and decern," &c.

J. A. CAMPBELL & LAMOND, C.S.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

FLETCHER NORTON MENZIES AND OTHERS, First Parties.—D.-F. Clark—Thomson.
MRS CATHERINE MENZIES OR MURRAY AND HUSBAND, Second Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Darling.
MRS EMILY NIEL MURRAY OR BAIRD AND OTHERS, Third Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Darling.

No. 96. Mar. 5, 1875. Menzies v. Murray.

Husband and Wife—Marriage-Contract Provision—Trust.—By antenuptial contract of marriage a wife conveyed all her property to trustees for payment of the revenue to the spouses in liferent, and of the fee to the children of the marriage, whom failing, to herself or any person nominated by her, whom failing, to her heirs, executors, and assignees, excluding the jus mariti. When the wife was sixty-five years of age, she, with consent of her husband and of the children of the marriage, all of whom had attained majority, and had offered to renounce their rights, called on the trustees to denude of the trust-estate in her favour. Held (1) that the trust-conveyance by the wife had been intended to secure her liferent as a provision in the event of her surviving her husband; and (2) that it was in its nature irrevocable by the wife, although not expressly declared to be so.

1ST DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. B.

BY antenuptial contract of marriage in 1845 between Captain J. H. Murray and Miss Catherine Menzies, Captain Murray, "in contemplation of the marriage" (which followed), "and in consideration of his liferent interest in the trust-conveyance," by Miss Menzies, "hereinafter written," conveyed to himself and Miss Menzies, in conjunct fee and liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and to the children of the marriage in fee, reserving to himself a power of division and a limited power of settlement in the event of his having children by a second marriage, all his property, acquisita et acquirenda, which liferent provision, partially restricted in the event of her contracting a second marriage, Miss Menzies accepted in full of all legal claims,—"For which causes, and on the other part," Miss Menzies conveyed to F. N. Menzies and others, as her trustees and executors, all her property then belonging to her, or which should belong to her at the time of her death, particularly a sum of £5000 contained in a bond to which she had right, for the following purposes:—First, For payment of the revenue to the spouses and the survivor of them, Captain Murray's liferent to be restricted to one-half in the event of his contracting a second marriage during the existence of a child of this marriage; "and secondly, for payment and transference of the fee of the whole of said trust-funds and effects generally and particularly before conveyed to the child or children of the said intended marriage, but always with and under the special reservations and declarations after-written; whom failing, to the said Catherine Menzies, for her own sole and individual use and behoof, or to and for the use and behoof of any person or persons to be nominated and appointed under and in virtue of any will or letter of instructions she

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

may hereafter leave; whom failing, to her own nearest and lawful heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever; hereby expressly excluding from said fee the jus mariti of the said Jack Henry Murray, her intended husband, and declaring that no part of said trust-funds and effects shall be subject to his administration or affectable by his debts or deeds."

The trustees were bound to invest the trust-funds as Miss Menzies might direct "without the consent or concurrence" of Captain Murray,—the investments always to be "made in conformity to and for the special trust-purposes above-written;" reserving to Miss Menzies the power of division, and a limited power of settlement, in the event of her having issue by a second marriage. It was provided that the provisions in favour of children should be in full satisfaction to them of all that they could claim by their parents' death. In 1847 the trust-funds were invested in the purchase of the house and lands of Croftinloan in Perthshire.

There were three children of the marriage, Mrs Baird, and two others.

The trustees (first parties), Captain and Mrs Murray (second parties), and the children (third parties), presented this special case.

They stated that Mrs Murray was sixty-five years of age, and that the children had all attained majority.

"Mrs Murray has made a requisition upon the parties of the first part, as acting trustees foresaid, to the effect that her son and youngest child, Jack George Murray, having come of age, the trustees should make over to her, the said Mrs Murray, the property of Croftinloan (which constitutes the whole trust-estate under their management), and bring the trust to an end on receiving a renunciation by the children of their whole rights under the said marriage-contract, and a discharge to the said trustees of all their actings and intromissions from Mrs Murray herself and her husband, and from her son and her daughters, with consent of the married daughter's husband, Mr Baird. The parties hereto of the third part concur in said requisition.

"It is maintained on the part of Mrs Murray and her husband and children that the right to the fee of the property has vested in the parties hereto of the third part, as the sole children of the marriage between Captain and Mrs Jack Henry Murray; that in respect of Mrs Murray's age there is no prospect of other children being born of the marriage; and that her children as fiars, and herself and her husband as liferenters of the property, are entitled to bring the trust to an end, and to call upon the trustees to denude of the trust-estate in manner above-mentioned.

"It is, on the other hand, maintained for the trustees, the parties of the first part, that they are not entitled to denude of the estate—at all events during the subsistence of the marriage; that it cannot be known until the dissolution of the marriage who the fiars of the property may be; and that the trust, in so far as Mrs Murray's life interests are concerned, was created for the purpose of protecting these interests during the subsistence of the marriage, and is to that extent irrevocable; and that they are not bound and are not entitled or in safety to convey the property to her during the subsistence of the marriage."

This question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court,—"Whether the marriage-contract trustees, the parties hereto of the first part, are bound or entitled to denude of the trust-estate in favour of Mrs Murray, on the joint requisition of the whole parties hereto of the second and third part, and on obtaining a full discharge of all their trust actings and intromissions from these parties?"

Argued for the first parties;—The general rule that a trust may be brought to an end with the concurrence of all the parties interested suffered an exception in the case of a marriage-contract provision for a wife. In the case of Hope,[1] the only parties interested were the husband and wife, and there was no doubt that if they had been strangers to each other they could have terminated the trust. Although the money there came from the wife's father, while here it was her own, the principle was the same, that it was protected as being a provision for her, possibly during the marriage, certainly if she survive her husband.

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875. Menzies v. Murray.

In the case of Ramsay[2] the Court held that, in the circumstances, the money was not a proper marriage-contract provision, not that it was less protected because it belonged to the wife, and had not been settled by another person.

The case of Torry Anderson[3] was also a fortiori of the present. Although in this case there was not an express clause of irrevocability, the trust, being for the benefit not only of the wife but of her issue, was equivalent.

It was also maintained for the first parties that the fee of the trust-estate had not vested in the children, but the decision did not turn on that point.

Argued for the second and third parties;—As all parties interested, both liferenters and fiars, concurred in desiring it, the trustees were bound to denude.[4] In the case of Torry Anderson, the minority of the Judges held that the parties could not tie up their hands; and the majority in that case, and also the Judges in the case of Pringle, proceeded to a great extent on the clause barring revocation. In the case of Hope there was an onerous contract not only between the parties, but their parents also, and the latter, who were the settlers of the fund, were not parties to the release. The case of Ramsay was the converse. There the issue was whether the parents were the stipulating parties. It was unsuccessfully argued that they were.

The case was appointed to be argued before seven Judges.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The assumption on which the advising in this case proceeds is, as I understand, that the fee or beneficial interest of Mrs Murray's property, conveyed by the antenuptial contract of marriage, is now fully vested in the parties of the third part to this case, and is effectually represented by them. On that assumption the devolution over to Mrs Murray herself, under the destination in the settlement, has failed. The husband, Captain Murray, is entitled, along with his wife, to the liferent of his wife's property during the subsistence of the marriage, the survivor of the spouses being entitled to the liferent after its dissolution. The spouses and the children have agreed to terminate the trust as regards the wife's property, and to convey it to Mrs Murray in fee, and the question is whether, in these circumstances, the trustees are bound or entitled to comply with that request.

No question of revocation arises here in any proper sense of that term. The proposal to the trustees is founded on the assumption that all the interests created by the marriage-settlement have, by this agreement, been secured and provided for, either by actual fulfilment, or by valid and competent renunciation.

[1] Hope, March 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 699, 42 Scot. Jur. 362.

[2] Ramsay v. Ramsay, Nov. 24, 1871, 10 Macph. 120, 44 Scot. Jur. 77.

[3] Anderson v. Buchanan, June 2, 1837, 15 S. 1073, 9 Scot. Jur. 509; Pringle v. Anderson, July 3, 1868, 6 Macph. 982, 40 Scot. Jur. 563.

[4] Pretty v. Newbigging, March 2, 1854, 16 D. 667, 24 Scot. Jur. 338; Foulis v. Foulis, Feb. 3, 1857, 19 D. 362, 29 Scot. Jur. 166; Scheniman v. Wilson, June 25, 1828, 6 S. 1019.

No. 96.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

If that be so, the proposal is reasonable, and we must therefore consider, in the first place, whether there are any interests provided for by the marriage-contract which are not secured, and, secondly, if there be, whether these have been validly renounced and extinguished. If all the interests involved in the marriage-contract have been sufficiently satisfied, I should not think that there was any such sanctity in the machinery of a trust as to lead the Court to maintain it to the annoyance, and perhaps the injury, of those for whose benefit alone it was originally constituted. In one respect the present case differs from all the cases cited as precedents. In most former cases the children of the marriage had failed, and the trust only subsisted as regarded the fee for the heirs or disponees of the wife. In this case, on the assumption I have already mentioned, the main purpose of the marriage-contract has been fulfilled, and the heirs of the marriage, being of age to act, are vested in the beneficial interest provided for them, and now propose to dispose of it. The husband's life interest in the proceeds of the property is secured by the contract itself, and nothing remains which can be said to be unsatisfied but the wife's contingent liferent in the event of her survivance of her husband. She has now arrived at the age of sixty-five, and in mere money value the amount involved cannot be considerable. There has been no offer or undertaking, however, to provide for it, and we must now determine whether that interest was intended to be secured by the marriage-contract, and, if so, whether, during the subsistence of the marriage, the wife can validly discharge it.

This is a question of very considerable importance. It is true that the amount, if valued by an actuary, might be inconsiderable. But the right and interest arise precisely in the circumstances in which such a provision comes to be of the greatest value. In ordinary cases a provision to the wife in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee can never be anything but a right of liferent while the hope of children remains. It is only in cases in which that hope is past that such a question as this can arise; but a provision which secures to the wife in her declining years the benefit of a competency cannot be regarded as a trivial matter, however short may be the period for which, according to the calculations of an actuary, she is likely to enjoy it.

The first question, therefore, is, whether, under this marriage-contract, the limitation of the wife's right to a liferent was simply a restriction for the benefit of the heirs of the marriage, or whether the interposed trust was intended to preserve the fee of the property from which the liferent was drawn, against any inducements that might arise during the marriage to part with it. This is a question to be solved on the construction of the marriage-settlement itself, and on the intention of the parties to it as expressed in that instrument. The mere fact of the provisions being contained in an antenuptial contract is not necessarily conclusive of this matter. In the authorities referred to instances were quoted in both directions. In the cases, for instance, of Torry Anderson and of Pringle, the clause which was contained in the marriage-settlements, which were the subject of construction in both cases, by which the intending spouses mutually contracted not to revoke, was held by the Court not so much to bar revocation as to indicate the intention of the contracting parties to provide for the protection of the wife. On the other hand, in the recent case of Ramsay's Trustees, in the First Division, it was held, on the terms of that deed, and I assume rightly held, that in so far as regarded the part of the property to which the judgment applied, the trust was one for administration only,—that the property was entirely under the control of the wife, and was not intended to form part of the matrimonial settlement.

Mar. 5, 1875. Menzies v. Murray.

In considering to which of these two classes the present provision belongs I have found no ground for thinking that it was intended for restriction merely, and not for protection. The circumstances of the present case, of course, were not within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was executed; but it is difficult to say that when a wife is secured in the contingent liferent of property worth no more than £8000 (or that amount in money), it was intended to leave her exposed to the hazard of the whole being spent by her husband during the marriage. The contingency was one against which it was plainly prudent to provide, and, in my opinion, the contract did provide against it.

The second branch of the inquiry is that which has most importance and interest. It is whether, assuming that it was intended by this contract to protect the wife's contingent interest, it is now in her power, there being no interests involved but her own, to renounce that right to the effect of extinguishing the trust, and acquiring the absolute right to her own property. The demand is certainly made in the most favourable circumstances in which it could have come to be considered, and possibly it might be greatly for the advantage of the wife and the family that the arrangement should be made. Nor am I at all insensible to the great authority which has been adduced in support of the affirmative of the proposition. The case of Torry Anderson was very keenly contested, but notwithstanding the fact that it may possibly be shewn by an analysis of the opinions that a majority of the Judges in that case mainly rested their decision on the clause prohibiting revocation, I am of opinion, after careful study of it, that the judgment did involve a general principle, to which I think in this case still greater breadth and firmness ought to be given. I am of opinion that, stante matrimonio, a wife has no power to alienate or diminish the rights secured to her by such a trust under an antenuptial contract of marriage, unless such power is conferred by the contract itself. I assume that the interests are intended to be protected by the contract, and that the machinery provided is sufficient for the purpose. But if they are, I think that during the marriage the wife has no control over them. The case of Pringle was a very strong illustration of this principle, and a very hard one, for there there was no hope of children, yet the wife could not use any portion of the fee of her own property to liberate her husband from inconvenient claims. It is true that there was in that contract also a clause by which the spouses undertook not to revoke. But Lord Cowan's very clear opinion shews that he looked upon the case of Torry Anderson as establishing the general principle to which, I think, we ought now to give effect,—that rights intended to be secured to a wife by her antenuptial marriage-contract, and vested in trust for that purpose, cannot be abandoned or renounced by her while the marriage subsists. What she may do on the dissolution of the marriage is an entirely different matter. She is then a free agent. But the element which rules while the marriage subsists is, that she is not considered a free agent in matters in which her husband has, or may have, an adverse interest.

No doubt this rule may operate hardly in many cases, but in its general operation I believe it is the soundest and most salutary we can adopt. It would be hard to say that the relations of a bride, who brings her husband a considerable fortune, should have no power by any instrument a conveyancer could frame to place her means of future subsistence beyond the reach of matrimonial impor-

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

tunity. By deciding the reverse I believe we shall solve this important question in the way most consonant with sound principle and social expediency.

LORD DEAS.—I am of opinion that, by the law of Scotland, provision may be made in favour of the wife, in an antenuptial contract of marriage, which cannot be evacuated during the marriage. More particularly, I am of opinion that it is competent thereby to provide to the wife, in the event of her being the survivor, either in the way of liferent or annuity, and either out of the husband's estate or out of her own estate, or out of the estate of some friend or relative who becomes a party to the contract, a life income of the benefit of which it shall not be in her power to deprive herself by any gratuitous deed, although consented to by her husband, executed during the subsistence of the marriage. If this be so, it follows that she will be equally disabled from gratuitously discharging the fund or estate which is burdened with that income, or the trust by which her right to it is protected and secured, as from discharging her eventual right to the income itself.

I do not think it is material from whose means or estate the income flows, provided only it is clearly a marriage-contract provision, the eventual right to which vests absolutely in the wife so soon as the contract is signed and the marriage celebrated. If the provision be made or reserved from the wife's own estate, that appears to me to be rather a fortiori than otherwise in favour of its indefeasibility, because the object and effect of the law is not to lay a restraint on the wife to her prejudice, but to throw around her a protection for her benefit, and it would be very anomalous if that protection did not extend to what came from herself. Being thus of the nature of a protection against marital influence on the one hand and self-sacrifice on the other, it extends no further and lasts no longer than is necessary for the accomplishment of its purpose. Accordingly, the subsistence of the marriage does not incapacitate the wife from disposing of the fee, if it belongs to her, of the liferented fund by mortis causa deed, nor does the origin and nature of the provision prevent her, after the marriage has been dissolved by the predecease of the husband, from dealing, either onerously or gratuitously, with the income at her pleasure.

If the marriage-contract declares the provision to be irrevocable that may certainly afford a clear indication that when entering into the contract the parties meant it to be a proper marriage-contract provision. But if, from the nature of the provision itself, it be clearly a marriage-contract provision, I do not think a declaration of irrevocability necessary. The marriage is irrevocable, and that which is so vital to the contract as the wife's means of livelihood after she has no longer the husband to provide for her, must necessarily be assumed to be in like manner irrevocable, if nothing appears to the contrary.

Nor could a clause of irrevocability prevent the parties from altering or evacuating the provision or the stipulated security for the provision, unless the law itself interposed for the protection of the wife. The only formidable plea in favour of the power to alter or evacuate,—and it is undoubtedly a plea requiring great consideration,—is that, where you have all parties interested concurring, they may do what they like with the fund. But if that were a good plea, it would be equally applicable where there was a clause of irrevocability as where there was not. An express clause of irrevocability could no more stand in the way than a clearly implied irrevocability. The triumphant observation in either case would be who can hinder them?

No. 95.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

It is the law which interposes equally in both cases by a wise and equitable protection, not unknown in other relations of society,—as, for instance, in the case of persons under age, weak and facile individuals, persons who have voluntarily interdicted themselves, and so on,—and this upon a principle which, in order to prevent gross wrong and injustice, it is peculiarly necessary to apply to stipulations made by or on behalf of a lady when about to surrender her liberty, and to some extent her will,—to merge her wishes and her interests in those of her husband,—to change her very character, and to be, in short, no longer mistress of herself in the sense in which she was so when these stipulations were made.

It may be fairly conceded that, as a general rule, all parties interested may do what they like with their own, and that this principle of protection to the wife by antenuptial contract is exceptional, just as the principle of protection to other parties in circumstances such as I have alluded to is exceptional. It may further be conceded that there may be stipulations in a marriage-contract in favour of a wife which are not properly marriage-contract provisions, and consequently do not fall within this principle of protection. A wife is, certainly, not deprived of all power of dealing, either gratuitously or onerously, with her separate means and estate, in favour of her husband, as well as in favour of other parties, by the mere fact of her means and estate being placed under trust by an antenuptial contract. For instance, the whole fortune of the wife may have been placed under trust simply with a view to the probability of there being issue of the marriage, but if there shall be no issue the wife may dispose of her fortune at her pleasure. In such a case, if there be no exclusion of the jus mariti, and the trust subsists for administration merely, I see nothing to prevent the wife, with the husband's consent, from de præsenti revoking or evacuating the trust. It is just from the fact that the wife's disqualification to deal with her separate rights and estate is not universal that the delicacy of such questions as the present arises. Hence also the inexpediency of any attempt to define the limits of this protection, or to specify the particular circumstances in which it will or will not be applicable.

The present is a case to which I think the protection very clearly applicable. By antenuptial contract, dated in January 1845, the husband, Captain Murray, in contemplation of the marriage which followed, and in consideration of the liferent interest thereinafter conferred on him in his wife's estate, conveyed to himself and her, in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and to the child or children of the marriage in fee, subject to certain reservations and powers which need not be here noticed, the whole means and estate then belonging to or which should belong to him at his death.

On the other hand, the wife conveyed to her brothers Sir Robert Menzies (who has resigned the trust), and Fletcher Norton Menzies, Esq. and to Patrick Keir, Esq., who are parties to this case, and the survivors and survivor of them, as her trustees and executors, for the ends and purposes therein specified, the whole means and estate then belonging or which should belong to her at her death, and particularly a sum of £5000 to which she is stated to have had right in terms of an obligation granted by certain parties to her father and mother (the precise nature of which is not explained in the case, and does not seem to require to be so for the purposes of the question now alone to be decided), as also her claims under a bond of provision executed by her father in July 1823, which claims are stated in the case to have made up the trust-funds, including the £5000, to £8953, as in the year 1857. The first purpose of this trust is declared to be for payment of the annual rent or revenue arising therefrom to the husband

No. 96.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

If that be so, the proposal is reasonable, and we must therefore consider, in the first place, whether there are any interests provided for by the marriage-contract which are not secured, and, secondly, if there be, whether these have been validly renounced and extinguished. If all the interests involved in the marriage-contract have been sufficiently satisfied, I should not think that there was any such sanctity in the machinery of a trust as to lead the Court to maintain it to the annoyance, and perhaps the injury, of those for whose benefit alone it was originally constituted. In one respect the present case differs from all the cases cited as precedents. In most former cases the children of the marriage had failed, and the trust only subsisted as regarded the fee for the heirs or disponees of the wife. In this case, on the assumption I have already mentioned, the main purpose of the marriage-contract has been fulfilled, and the heirs of the marriage, being of age to act, are vested in the beneficial interest provided for them, and now propose to dispose of it. The husband's life interest in the proceeds of the property is secured by the contract itself, and nothing remains which can be said to be unsatisfied but the wife's contingent liferent in the event of her survivance of her husband. She has now arrived at the age of sixty-five, and in mere money value the amount involved cannot be considerable. There has been no offer or undertaking, however, to provide for it, and we must now determine whether that interest was intended to be secured by the marriage-contract, and, if so, whether, during the subsistence of the marriage, the wife can validly discharge it.

This is a question of very considerable importance. It is true that the amount, if valued by an actuary, might be inconsiderable. But the right and interest arise precisely in the circumstances in which such a provision comes to be of the greatest value. In ordinary cases a provision to the wife in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee can never be anything but a right of liferent while the hope of children remains. It is only in cases in which that hope is past that such a question as this can arise; but a provision which secures to the wife in her declining years the benefit of a competency cannot be regarded as a trivial matter, however short may be the period for which, according to the calculations of an actuary, she is likely to enjoy it.

The first question, therefore, is, whether, under this marriage-contract, the limitation of the wife's right to a liferent was simply a restriction for the benefit of the heirs of the marriage, or whether the interposed trust was intended to preserve the fee of the property from which the liferent was drawn, against any inducements that might arise during the marriage to part with it. This is a question to be solved on the construction of the marriage-settlement itself, and on the intention of the parties to it as expressed in that instrument. The mere fact of the provisions being contained in an antenuptial contract is not necessarily conclusive of this matter. In the authorities referred to instances were quoted in both directions. In the cases, for instance, of Torry Anderson and of Pringle, the clause which was contained in the marriage-settlements, which were the subject of construction in both cases, by which the intending spouses mutually contracted not to revoke, was held by the Court not so much to bar revocation as to indicate the intention of the contracting parties to provide for the protection of the wife. On the other hand, in the recent case of Ramsay's Trustees, in the First Division, it was held, on the terms of that deed, and I assume rightly held, that in so far as regarded the part of the property to which the judgment applied, the trust was one for administration only,—that the property was entirely under the control of the wife, and was not intended to form part of the matrimonial settlement.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

In considering to which of these two classes the present provision belongs I have found no ground for thinking that it was intended for restriction merely, and not for protection. The circumstances of the present case, of course, were not within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was executed; but it is difficult to say that when a wife is secured in the contingent liferent of property worth no more than £8000 (or that amount in money), it was intended to leave her exposed to the hazard of the whole being spent by her husband during the marriage. The contingency was one against which it was plainly prudent to provide, and, in my opinion, the contract did provide against it.

The second branch of the inquiry is that which has most importance and interest. It is whether, assuming that it was intended by this contract to protect the wife's contingent interest, it is now in her power, there being no interests involved but her own, to renounce that right to the effect of extinguishing the trust, and acquiring the absolute right to her own property. The demand is certainly made in the most favourable circumstances in which it could have come to be considered, and possibly it might be greatly for the advantage of the wife and the family that the arrangement should be made. Nor am I at all insensible to the great authority which has been adduced in support of the affirmative of the proposition. The case of Torry Anderson was very keenly contested, but notwithstanding the fact that it may possibly be shewn by an analysis of the opinions that a majority of the Judges in that case mainly rested their decision on the clause prohibiting revocation, I am of opinion, after careful study of it, that the judgment did involve a general principle, to which I think in this case still greater breadth and firmness ought to be given. I am of opinion that, stante matrimonio, a wife has no power to alienate or diminish the rights secured to her by such a trust under an antenuptial contract of marriage, unless such power is conferred by the contract itself. I assume that the interests are intended to be protected by the contract, and that the machinery provided is sufficient for the purpose. But if they are, I think that during the marriage the wife has no control over them. The case of Pringle was a very strong illustration of this principle, and a very hard one, for there there was no hope of children, yet the wife could not use any portion of the fee of her own property to liberate her husband from inconvenient claims. It is true that there was in that contract also a clause by which the spouses undertook not to revoke. But Lord Cowan's very clear opinion shews that he looked upon the case of Torry Anderson as establishing the general principle to which, I think, we ought now to give effect,—that rights intended to be secured to a wife by her antenuptial marriage-contract, and vested in trust for that purpose, cannot be abandoned or renounced by her while the marriage subsists. What she may do on the dissolution of the marriage is an entirely different matter. She is then a free agent. But the element which rules while the marriage subsists is, that she is not considered a free agent in matters in which her husband has, or may have, an adverse interest.

No doubt this rule may operate hardly in many cases, but in its general operation I believe it is the soundest and most salutary we can adopt. It would be hard to say that the relations of a bride, who brings her husband a considerable fortune, should have no power by any instrument a conveyancer could frame to place her means of future subsistence beyond the reach of matrimonial impor-

No. 96.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

tunity. By deciding the reverse I believe we shall solve this important question in the way most consonant with sound principle and social expediency.

LORD DEAS.—I am of opinion that, by the law of Scotland, provision may be made in favour of the wife, in an antenuptial contract of marriage, which cannot be evacuated during the marriage. More particularly, I am of opinion that it is competent thereby to provide to the wife, in the event of her being the survivor, either in the way of liferent or annuity, and either out of the husband's estate or out of her own estate, or out of the estate of some friend or relative who becomes a party to the contract, a life income of the benefit of which it shall not be in her power to deprive herself by any gratuitous deed, although consented to by her husband, executed during the subsistence of the marriage. If this be so, it follows that she will be equally disabled from gratuitously discharging the fund or estate which is burdened with that income, or the trust by which her right to it is protected and secured, as from discharging her eventual right to the income itself.

I do not think it is material from whose means or estate the income flows, provided only it is clearly a marriage-contract provision, the eventual right to which vests absolutely in the wife so soon as the contract is signed and the marriage celebrated. If the provision be made or reserved from the wife's own estate, that appears to me to be rather a fortiori than otherwise in favour of its indefeasibility, because the object and effect of the law is not to lay a restraint on the wife to her prejudice, but to throw around her a protection for her benefit, and it would be very anomalous if that protection did not extend to what came from herself. Being thus of the nature of a protection against marital influence on the one hand and self-sacrifice on the other, it extends no further and lasts no longer than is necessary for the accomplishment of its purpose. Accordingly, the subsistence of the marriage does not incapacitate the wife from disposing of the fee, if it belongs to her, of the liferented fund by mortis causa deed, nor does the origin and nature of the provision prevent her, after the marriage has been dissolved by the predecease of the husband, from dealing, either onerously or gratuitously, with the income at her pleasure.

If the marriage-contract declares the provision to be irrevocable that may certainly afford a clear indication that when entering into the contract the parties meant it to be a proper marriage-contract provision. But if, from the nature of the provision itself, it be clearly a marriage-contract provision, I do not think a declaration of irrevocability necessary. The marriage is irrevocable, and that which is so vital to the contract as the wife's means of livelihood after she has no longer the husband to provide for her, must necessarily be assumed to be in like manner irrevocable, if nothing appears to the contrary.

Nor could a clause of irrevocability prevent the parties from altering or evacuating the provision or the stipulated security for the provision, unless the law itself interposed for the protection of the wife. The only formidable plea in favour of the power to alter or evacuate,—and it is undoubtedly a plea requiring great consideration,—is that, where you have all parties interested concurring, they may do what they like with the fund. But if that were a good plea, it would be equally applicable where there was a clause of irrevocability as where there was not. An express clause of irrevocability could no more stand in the way than a clearly implied irrevocability. The triumphant observation in either case would be who can hinder them?

No. 95.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

It is the law which interposes equally in both cases by a wise and equitable protection, not unknown in other relations of society,—as, for instance, in the case of persons under age, weak and facile individuals, persons who have voluntarily interdicted themselves, and so on,—and this upon a principle which, in order to prevent gross wrong and injustice, it is peculiarly necessary to apply to stipulations made by or on behalf of a lady when about to surrender her liberty, and to some extent her will,—to merge her wishes and her interests in those of her husband,—to change her very character, and to be, in short, no longer mistress of herself in the sense in which she was so when these stipulations were made.

It may be fairly conceded that, as a general rule, all parties interested may do what they like with their own, and that this principle of protection to the wife by antenuptial contract is exceptional, just as the principle of protection to other parties in circumstances such as I have alluded to is exceptional. It may further be conceded that there may be stipulations in a marriage-contract in favour of a wife which are not properly marriage-contract provisions, and consequently do not fall within this principle of protection. A wife is, certainly, not deprived of all power of dealing, either gratuitously or onerously, with her separate means and estate, in favour of her husband, as well as in favour of other parties, by the mere fact of her means and estate being placed under trust by an antenuptial contract. For instance, the whole fortune of the wife may have been placed under trust simply with a view to the probability of there being issue of the marriage, but if there shall be no issue the wife may dispose of her fortune at her pleasure. In such a case, if there be no exclusion of the jus mariti, and the trust subsists for administration merely, I see nothing to prevent the wife, with the husband's consent, from de præsenti revoking or evacuating the trust. It is just from the fact that the wife's disqualification to deal with her separate rights and estate is not universal that the delicacy of such questions as the present arises. Hence also the inexpediency of any attempt to define the limits of this protection, or to specify the particular circumstances in which it will or will not be applicable.

The present is a case to which I think the protection very clearly applicable. By antenuptial contract, dated in January 1845, the husband, Captain Murray, in contemplation of the marriage which followed, and in consideration of the liferent interest thereinafter conferred on him in his wife's estate, conveyed to himself and her, in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and to the child or children of the marriage in fee, subject to certain reservations and powers which need not be here noticed, the whole means and estate then belonging to or which should belong to him at his death.

On the other hand, the wife conveyed to her brothers Sir Robert Menzies (who has resigned the trust), and Fletcher Norton Menzies, Esq. and to Patrick Keir, Esq., who are parties to this case, and the survivors and survivor of them, as her trustees and executors, for the ends and purposes therein specified, the whole means and estate then belonging or which should belong to her at her death, and particularly a sum of £5000 to which she is stated to have had right in terms of an obligation granted by certain parties to her father and mother (the precise nature of which is not explained in the case, and does not seem to require to be so for the purposes of the question now alone to be decided), as also her claims under a bond of provision executed by her father in July 1823, which claims are stated in the case to have made up the trust-funds, including the £5000, to £8953, as in the year 1857. The first purpose of this trust is declared to be for payment of the annual rent or revenue arising therefrom to the husband and wife and survivor of them, subject to a certain eventual restriction of the husband's liferent, which it is likewise unnecessary to notice. The second purpose of the trust is for ultimate payment and transference to the children of the fee, whom failing, to the wife or her mortis causa nominees, "whom failing," so the deed proceeds, "to her own nearest and lawful heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever, hereby expressly excluding from said fee the jus mariti of the said Henry Jack Murray, her intended husband, and declaring that no part of said trust-funds and effects shall be subject to his administration or affectable by his debts or deeds." The contract contains a clause to the effect that action and execution, if necessary, should pass upon it in favour of the wife, at the instance of any one of the trustees. The only further stipulation contained in the contract which it is necessary to notice is a stipulation that the trustees should be bound, when required by the wife, and without the consent of the husband, to call up the trust-funds and lay them out in the purchase of lands, or in such other way and manner as she might direct, either during the marriage or after its dissolution, "declaring always that the reinvestments by the said trustees shall be made in conformity to and for the special trust-purposes above written." In accordance with this stipulation the trust-funds, amounting, as already mentioned, to £8953, were, upon the wife's requisition, invested in 1857 in the purchase of the house and lands of Croftinloan in Perthshire, and that investment has not hitherto been disturbed.

No. 95.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

It is stated in the case that Mrs Murray is now sixty-five years of age, that the only children of the marriage are two daughters and a son, who have all attained majority, that Mrs Murray has made a requisition on the trustees to make over to her the property of Croftinloan, which constitutes the whole trust-estate, "and bring the trust to an end on receiving a renunciation by the children of their whole rights under the said contract of marriage, and a discharge to the said trustees of all their actings and intromissions from herself and her husband, and from her son and her daughters, with consent of the married daughter's husband, Mr Baird." These parties all concur in the requisition. But the trustees decline to comply with that requisition on two grounds, either of which, if sustained, is sufficient,—1st, That Mrs Murray cannot competently divest herself of the protection of her eventual liferent interest stipulated by the marriage-contract; and 2d, that the beneficial fee of the capital liferented does not vest under the contract till Mrs Murray's death, or, at all events, not till the dissolution of the marriage, so that the necessary consent of the fiars to what is now proposed cannot be obtained.

The second of these objections is, to a great extent, special, as all questions of vesting generally are; and if that had been the only question in the case I think it probable that we should not have called in the aid of your Lordships, without consulting upon it further than we thought it necessary to do. I have formed no opinion upon that second objection, because assuming, for the sake of argument, but for the sake of argument alone, that it might have been got over, I am of opinion that, applying to the case in hand the law I have stated in the outset, the first objection is of itself fatal to the demand now made.

It may be that none of the cases in the books are quite the same with this case. But they are important, nevertheless, as affirming the principle of protection to the wife for her marriage-contract provisions, as a principle not unknown to our law, leaving only a question as to the applicability of that principle to the case before us.

The case first in date which falls to be noticed—although by no means the most apposite—is that of Torry Anderson, 2d June 1837 (15 S. 1073). There was in that case an exclusion somewhat unusual, and certainly invidious, of the husband from all right and interest, not merely in the fee, but in the annual income and administration of the wife's extensive heritable estates during the subsistence of the marriage, and of his courtesy in the event of his survivance. It is perhaps not surprising that some of the Judges should have thought the light afforded by the clause of irrevocability necessary to shew that the parties really intended such invidious stipulations to be irrevocable. But however that may be, the judgment in the case is important as recognising the existence in our law of the principle of protection in favour of a wife for her marriage-contract provisions, although leaving, as I have said, a question under what circumstances that principle falls to be applied. If there had been no such principle the protection could not have been given, whether with or without the clause of irrevocability. An unmarried woman could undoubtedly have revoked a trust-deed which she had declared to be irrevocable, and the effect of the judgment therefore necessarily was to displace the able arguments of the minority, who disputed the existence of any such principle.

The principle was again affirmed—at the distance of thirty years—by an unanimous judgment of the Second Division in the case of Pringle v. Anderson, 3d July 1868 (6 Macph. 982). Here, again, the estates of the wife were large, and there was a similar invidious exclusion of the husband from all pecuniary and administrative rights and interests in these estates during the subsistence of the marriage. True, there was the same declaration of irrevocability. But, of course, the remark applicable to the one case is equally applicable to the other,—that the judgment affirms the existence, in the law of Scotland, of a principle of protection peculiar to the case of a wife for her marriage-contract provisions, although I admit that neither of these two judgments can be said to affirm that the principle will extend to provisions which are not expressly declared irrevocable.

The next case, however—that of Hope v. Hope, 15th March 1870 (8 Macph. 699)—does decide that the element of an express clause of irrevocability is not essential to the application of the principle of protection, although undoubtedly a different element was involved in that case which does not occur here, namely, that the husband's father became jointly and severally bound with him for the wife's eventual annuity, in security of which the trust conveyance was afterwards granted, which the spouses were found not entitled to evacuate. But the clear import of the case of Hope is that irrevocability may be inferred where there is no express clause of irrevocability; and if in that case it was inferred from the nature of the provision, coupled with the joint and several obligation of the husband's father, it would be a narrow distinction to hold that the absence of that joint and several obligation would have been fatal to the inference that the provision was intended to be irrevocable.

As regards the case of Ramsay, 24th November 1871, (10 Macph. 120), I shall only say that I do not regard the judgment of the majority (from which I dissented), as intended to interfere with the principle of protection applicable to a wife's marriage-contract provisions. The Lord President, without whom there would not have been a majority, construed the contract as importing that the £5000 (which was not sought to be interfered with) was a marriage-contract provision,—that the other sums were intended to be placed at the wife's disposal

No. 95.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

absolutely, "both during the subsistence of the marriage and after its dissolution," that the interposition of the parents in the contract was intended to make the wife's position in this respect more clear and satisfactory, and that the fee of the £5000 being provided to the children and the eventual liferent of one-half of the balance to the husband, sufficiently accounted "for the constitution of the trust, without resorting to the speculation that it was constituted to make the exclusion of the jus mariti effectual." On these grounds his Lordship came to the conclusion that as the £5000 remained secured to the children, and the husband had renounced his liferent of the balance, the wife might dispose of the other funds at her pleasure. His Lordship, however, added,—"But in coming to this conclusion, I desire to say that I do not think that this is any precedent for holding that a lady who has marriage-contract provisions settled on her under antenuptial contract has power to renounce or give them away, because I do not look upon the trust-settlement of the residue of Mrs Ramsay's property, in this case, as part of the marriage-contract provisions at all."

If I could have construed the contract in the case of Ramsay as his Lordship did I should probably have come to the same conclusion. But it appeared to me—for reasons I need not resume—that the construction of the contract was all the other way; and, in particular, that the terms in which the parents became parties to the contract and dealt with the large sums practically at their disposal was favourable to the inference that the amount was intended to form a marriage-contract provision, or, as I see I expressed it in my opinion, "that the object was to preserve this sum as a provision for the lady in case of her surviving her husband." The material observation to be made on the case of Ramsay, therefore, is that nothing adverse to the doctrine now proposed to be affirmed can be held to have been there decided.

I observe one passage in my opinion in that case which, to prevent misconception, it may be as well to explain. In saying that had the contract been simply between the spouses themselves I should have been disposed to come to the same conclusion with their Lordships, I was following up what I had just said—that a destination, failing issue of the marriage, to the heirs, or heirs and assignees, of the lady, was in effect no destination at all, and could not have restrained her free action, although occurring in a contract which created a trust. I did not however mean to say that if in such a contract there was an exclusion of the jus mariti the trust could be revoked at the will of the spouses. My opinion upon that point was and is the other way.

Having thus three well considered cases—Torry Anderson, Pringle, and Hope—decided at intervals during the last forty years, each of which, whatever may be said of it otherwise, affirmed that the principle of protection to a wife for her marriage-contract provisions is not unknown to our law, it would, I think, be very unfortunate if any doubt could now be supposed to rest upon the existence and soundness of that principle. It appears to me that it is founded in nature—that the admirable subjugation of the will of the one sex to the pleasure of the other for the mutual benefit of both calls for it in return on the ground of humanity; and that, if not already universally received, it can only be a question of time its being recognised, in some form or other, and with whatever modifications, in the law and practice of every civilised country.

In the present case the income reserved by the wife for her eventual widowhood is what, to a person in her position, must be regarded as the very moderate income to be derived from a capital under £9000, the husband being entitled to the enjoyment of that income during the marriage. It is proposed to revoke and withdraw the trust constituted for securing to her that eventual income. I think it must be conceded that, if the principle of protection to a wife for her marriage-contract provisions is to receive effect at all, it must be given effect to in such a case as this; and I am therefore of opinion that the question put to us must be answered in the negative.

No. 95.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur with the opinions which have been delivered. The question is, whether it is in the power of the Court, on the consent of all parties interested, to dispense with the clause of a marriage-contract, the effect of which is to place beyond the reach of interference by herself or any other person a certain portion of the wife's fortune reserved for her liferent use. I am willing to assume that every obstacle to the consideration of this question, in a pure form, is out of the way, although we have never yet decided that there is any limit of age after which the possibility of the birth of children may be left out of account.

I think if we were to decide this question in favour of the demand made, the effect might be to imperil generally the security of such provisions. The proposal of these beneficiaries is, in my opinion, not competent, but is forbidden by the law.

The cases bearing on the subject are but few, and in some of them there was the peculiarity that the provision was declared in the contract to be irrevocable. These cases, however, shew this, at least, that it is competent to restrain the free agency of the wife by the terms of the marriage-contract. The clause of irrevocability never could be effectual if the law looked upon the wife after marriage as a free person, because no person in ordinary circumstances can restrain himself by a deed declared to be irrevocable if it does not confer a jus quæsitum on other parties. In such contracts the clause is held to be irrevocable, because the law looks upon the condition of a married woman as one requiring protection, even from her own acts. In contemplation of marriage, while still free, she enters into a solemn marriage-contract, which is framed with the object of protecting her rights. The question is, whether, while under coverture, exposed it may be to the importunity of her husband, or still more powerfully influenced by her desire to please him, she is not by the law itself prevented from relaxing in favour of her natural guardian, for such he now is, those restraints which were intended for her protection against him. It is, I think, part of the policy of the law that a married woman should be prevented from doing so, that she should be protected as if her will and mind were in abeyance. That doctrine, I apprehend, is clearly to be gathered even from those cases where the clause of irrevocability entered into the grounds of judgment, and there is no adverse case.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of opinion that the question put in this special case ought to be answered in the negative. It appears to me that the trustees, acting under the antenuptial contract of marriage between Captain and Mrs Murray, are not bound, and are not entitled, to denude of the trust-estate in favour of Mrs Murray, even although Captain and Mrs Murray and the whole children of the marriage concur in requiring them to do so, and although all parties offer to renounce all their respective rights in favour of Mrs Murray, and tender to the trustees a full and complete discharge of the trust itself, and of all their actings under it.

No. 95.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

I do not dispute the general proposition that if all the parties who are or who may be interested in a trust, or in the purposes for which it has been created, concur in desiring to terminate the trust and to distribute the trust-funds, they are entitled to do so, provided the parties are all sui juris and in a position effectually to bind themselves, and also provided that there is no possibility of any other party coming into existence or coming forward who may have an interest in the trust. A trust can only subsist for behoof of beneficiaries, and if every possible beneficiary is capable of consenting, and actually consents, to its extinction, there is no reason why the trust should not come to an end.

It is essential, however, before terminating and extinguishing a trust, to make perfectly sure either that its purposes are completely fulfilled, or, if this is not so, then that every possible beneficiary, not only concurs in its extinction, but is in such circumstances and in such a position as to be capable of so concurring.

In the present case there might be questions whether all the possible children of the marriage are now in existence, and also, whether a possible contingent fee may not yet vest in the grandchildren of the marriage. It is not necessary, however, to decide these questions (indeed, I understand we are wished to assume them in favour of the second and third parties), for there is another ground which appears quite sufficient for the decision of the case, and to this the argument has been confined. It is this, that Mrs Murray, although a party to the present case, is not entitled, even with the consent of her husband and of all her children, to put an end to the trust so as to deprive herself,—I do not say of her provisions under the marriage-contract,—but of the security which the marriage-contract trust gives, that these provisions will be available at the dissolution of the marriage. This security I think she is not entitled to renounce stante matrimonio, and therefore the trust must continue to subsist.

By the antenuptial contract of marriage the wife, Mrs Murray, conveyed to the marriage-contract trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, belonging or that may belong to her at the time of her death. The purpose of this trust was the administration of the wife's separate estate and the payment of the liferent thereof to Mr and Mrs Murray and the survivor of them, and for payment of the fee of said estate to the children of the marriage. Captain Murray's jus mariti over the fee is excluded, but not over the liferent arising during the subsistence of the marriage. The effect of these provisions is to secure Mrs Murray, in the event of her surviving her husband, in the free liferent of her separate estate, and this provision, along with a contingent liferent in any estate her husband might leave, form Mrs Murray's jointure or rights secured by the marriage-contract. So far as the husband's estate is concerned there is no trust, and the husband is placed under no restraint whatever, and so the wife has no security for this part of her eventual liferent; but so far as regards the wife's estate a trust is interposed, the husband's right over the fee being excluded, and thus a security is given, and a very valuable security, that to this extent at least the wife's jointure shall be effectual.

Now, I am of opinion, that, according to the sound construction of this antenuptial marriage-contract, the bride intended to stipulate, and did stipulate, that at all events the liferent of her own estate should be absolutely secured to her in case of her viduity, and to make her security complete she placed her estate out of her own hands and power, and out of her intended husband's hands and

No. 95.

Mar. 5, 1875. Menzies v. Murray.

power, into the hands and under the administration of marriage-contract trustees. I am clearly of opinion that it was competent for her to do so, and having done so, I think it also clear that she has no power during marriage—no matter with what consents—to deprive herself of the security for which she so carefully stipulated before the marriage was entered into.

It seems to me that the very condition of the marriage was that the wife's contingent liferent should be put absolutely beyond the power of both the spouses, so that there should be no risk of the wife being persuaded, either by the love or through the fear of her husband to give up her provision. I cannot doubt the lawfulness of this arrangement, and I cannot doubt that this was its true nature.

If the marriage-contract in the present case had contained a clause that the trust, so far as the wife was concerned, should be irrevocable, then, applying the principle fixed in Torry Anderson's case, effect would be given to this declaration; but I think the same result must follow wherever it can be shewn from the deed that this was the true intention of the parties. It is only in this view that a clause of irrevocability is of any importance, for it is plain that if no interests forbid, a clause of irrevocability may be itself revoked by the parties who made it. A deed in its nature revocable can never cease to be so by a clause of irrevocability if there is no interest to secure thereby.

A wife after marriage is not in the same position as the bride was before marriage, and so long as the coverture subsists she will never be in the free condition which she enjoyed before marriage. There is the strongest expediency in a rule which shall enable a woman before coverture to stipulate that during her coverture she shall not be asked to do, and shall not have power to do, certain acts which may prejudicially affect her interests. I think this is a lawful stipulation, and that it was really made in the present case. The whole cases which have been referred to seem to me to be in entire accordance with the principle upon which I rest my opinion. Any seeming inconsistency in the judgments disappears when the true construction of the particular deeds is attended to. Thus, in the case of Ramsay v. Ramsay's Trustees, 24th November 1871, the ground of the judgment was not that a wife could not secure her marriage-contract provisions by means of an irrevocable trust, but that, according to the sound construction of the marriage-contract in that special case, she did not do so except to the extent of £5000. The other cases founded on are all in favour of the irrevocable nature of a marriage-contract trust,—that is, that it is irrevocable during marriage; and I do not think any sound distinction can be taken between the cases where the wife's provisions, secured by antenuptial contract, flow from her parents or from strangers, and those in which her provisions come from the husband or from the wife herself.

If I am right in the view which I have taken of the wife's interest under the present marriage-contract it follows that the question put must, on this ground alone, be answered in the negative.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent when the case was advised, but the Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that he concurred in the judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find and declare, in answer to the question in the said case, that the marriage-contract trustees, parties of the first part, are not bound nor entitled, under the circumstances stated in the case, to denude of the trust-estate in favour of Mrs Murray, one of the parties of the second part, and decern."

No. 95.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Menzies v. Murray.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—J. S. DARLING, W.S.—Agents.

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

GEORGE DUNCAN HUNTER, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. P. B. Robertson.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF KELSO, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Darling.

School—School Board, Powers of—Schoolmaster, Tenure of Office and Emoluments—The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 55.—A parochial school was divided into two departments—(1) A grammar school, in which the principal teacher or rector taught classical and modern languages and mathematics; and (2) an elementary school taught by an assistant.

In 1874 the school board of the parish resolved to unite the schools, and restricted the teaching of the higher branches previously taught in the grammar school to one hour daily.

In an action brought by the rector or schoolmaster, who had been appointed in 1858, for reduction of this resolution, and for damages, held that the school board were entitled to make this change, but without prejudice to any claim which the schoolmaster might afterwards be able to establish on the ground of diminished emoluments arising from the proceedings complained of.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Young.
B.

THE parish school of Kelso, about the year 1780, was divided into two departments, known as the grammar school and the English school. The parish schoolmaster was specially charged with teaching the grammar school, in which Latin and Greek, modern languages, and mathematics were taught. The English school, in which elementary education was given, was taught by an assistant teacher. This system of teaching was continued down to 1858, when a vacancy occurred in the office of parish schoolmaster. The heritors then inserted an advertisement in the newspapers for a rector to the grammar school of Kelso. The advertisement bore,—"Besides the Latin, Greek, French, and German languages, the rector must be qualified to instruct his pupils in Grecian and Roman antiquities, and in ancient and modern geography, and mathematics."

The heritors furnished the following particulars to intending applicants:—"Grammar School of Kelso.—The rector is the parochial schoolmaster of the parish of Kelso, and will draw the maximum salary of £34. . . . The fees authorised by the heritors at their meeting upon 15th September 1855 were according to the following scale:—Latin, per quarter, 7s. 6d.," &c.

Mr Hunter, who was at that time rector of the Dumbarton Academy, having applied for the appointment, the heritors, by a minute, dated 15th October 1858, appointed him to the office of rector of Kelso grammar school, "with right to all the emoluments appertaining thereto, as enjoyed by Dr Fergusson, from and after the term of Martinmas next, when he shall open school and charge the same fees as were paid to Dr Fergusson, as specified in the minute of meeting of heritors held on the 15th September 1855; and further, it is conditioned that in the event of a vacancy occurring by the death or resignation of Mr John Simpson, the teacher in the English parochial school, during the incumbency of the said George Duncan Hunter, he shall, in the option of the then electors, be obliged to take the sole charge of that schoolroom also, and to find a suitable assistant to teach the elementary branches at present taught there, for which he, the rector, shall be entitled to the salary belonging thereto, and to the usual school-fees, and in token of his acceptance Mr George Duncan Hunter is appointed to subscribe this minute along with the presses."

In 1861 Mr Simpson, the assistant teacher of the English school, agreed to retire. The heritors came to an arrangement with Mr Hunter,—"2d, That Mr Hunter shall, on such retirement, enter into the management of the English school, and shall teach the children who attend it the several branches hitherto taught in said school, and that at the same fees as have been charged by Mr Simpson, or at such fees as may from time to time be fixed by the heritors and minister, in terms of the powers committed to them. 3d, that for the successful conducting of said school Mr Hunter shall be obliged to have at all times an efficient assistant therein, and shall himself daily teach in it for one hour at least and oversee the details, so that the education of the children may be carefully attended to, and the whole management carried on in a proper and satisfactory manner."

These arrangements continued down to 1874, when the Kelso School Board, in whom, under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the schools had become vested, came to a resolution introducing certain changes in the arrangements and fees as after-mentioned.

Mr Hunter then raised the present action against the school board. He alleged,—(Cond. 6) "In 1873 or 1874 the defenders, in whom, under the 'Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' the said schools had become vested, formed the design of abolishing the grammar school department of the school. On January 7, 1874, they, on the motion of Mr James Brunton, seconded by the Reverend Henry Renton, adopted the following resolution:—'That all children receiving instruction in the several standards within the public school be taught together after the close of the present session.' Thereafter a committee or sub-commitee was appointed to make arrangements for the future management and conduct of the school, which committee submitted to the defenders a report recommending, inter alia—'(1) That the staff should consist of the principal teacher, one certificated male assistant, and one uncertificated female teacher;' and (2) That in carrying out the resolution of the board already referred to (being the foresaid resolution of 7th January 1874), the whole school should, without distinction, be arranged according to the standards in six classes only (exclusive of infants), and so taught together, according to their advancement, all subjects embraced within the standards (art. 28), Scotch code 1874, including the additional subjects under art. 19, C, and English literature and language (4 schd.), which are to be taught to the classes receiving instruction in the three highest standards.' The report also recommended that the classes receiving instruction in standards IV. V. and VI. should be taught by the pursuer. In none of these standards is included or permitted to be taught any of the higher branches of learning, as Latin, Greek, French, German, or mathematics; and only one hour, viz. from 12 to 1 daily, was to be allowed for instructing in these special branches such pupils as might desire to receive such instruction." (Cond. 7) "The defenders, on 2d September 1874, on the motion of Mr Charles Robson, the chairman, adopted the said report, and resolved accordingly. The defenders, in September 1874, caused public intimation to be made that the fees for instruction in the Kelso public school, in the session then about to commence, would be—For reading, writing, arithmetic, and all the subjects embraced within the standards, including the specific subject of English literature and language, 3s 6d. per quarter; for one extra specific subject, Latin, French, Greek, or mathematics, if such be taken, 5s.; for each additional specific subject taken, 2s. 6d. The pursuer was directed to conform to these resolutions, and the scheme therein appointed, and he, under protest against the legality of the defenders' actings, and pending the discussion thereof, agreed to comply with these instructions when the school was opened on 21st September 1874." (Cond. 8) "The effect of the changes thus made is to abolish Kelso grammar school, of which the pursuer was appointed rector as aforesaid. The public school of Kelso is now entirely devoted to elementary teaching; it is not now resorted to by the same class of pupils as attended Kelso grammar school, and paid the high fees above-mentioned for instruction in the higher branches of learning; and the higher course of study, and the scholastic arrangements, being now entirely different, it is certain that this defection will be permanent. The alteration in the subjects taught, and in the scale of fees, deprives the pursuer of a large part of the emoluments on the faith of which he accepted his appointment. Further, the pursuer suffers greatly in social and professional status from the said changes, and the position and duties now imposed upon him are essentially different from those which he undertook in 1858."

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875. Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

The conclusions of the summons were for reduction of the minutes of the heritors, "in so far as they relate to the teaching together all children receiving instruction within the said public school of Kelso, and restrict the time to be occupied in teaching Latin, Greek, modern languages, and mathematics to one hour daily, and diminish the school fees in use to be charged by the pursuer prior to the passing of the 'Education (Scotland) Act, 1872;'" and for declarator, "that the defenders are not entitled to order or insist that the whole children receiving instruction within the said public school of Kelso shall be taught together, and to abolish the grammar school of Kelso as a department of the parochial school of Kelso taught as heretofore separately from the other or English department of the said public school, or to lower the school fees heretofore payable to the pursuer: Or otherwise, that the defenders are not entitled to order or insist that the whole children receiving instruction within the said public school of Kelso shall be taught together, and to abolish the grammar school of Kelso as a department of the parochial school of Kelso taught as heretofore separately from the other or English department of the said public school, or to lower the school fees heretofore payable to the pursuer, without making due compensation to the pursuer: And that the pursuer has right to the whole salary, fees, and emoluments arising from the said grammar school of Kelso which he enjoyed at the date of the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and to all salary, fees, and emoluments, and to all the rights and privileges conferred upon him in virtue of his appointment as rector of the said grammar school of Kelso, and schoolmaster of the parochial school of Kelso, by the heritors and minister of the said parish of Kelso." There was also a conclusion for damages.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The proceedings complained of being illegal, and ultra vires of the defenders, the pursuer is entitled to have them reduced. (2) In any event, the pursuer has right during his incumbency to the whole salary, fees, and emoluments which he enjoyed at the date of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. (3) It was not within the power of the defenders so to alter the constitution of the said school as to diminish the emoluments of the pursuer, and to injure him in his status and patrimonial interest. (4) At least such alterations could only competently be made, the rights of the pursuer being preserved entire or due compensation being given to him.[1]

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, or any of them. (3) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the proceedings complained of were taken by the defenders in virtue of the powers, obligations, and duties vested in and incumbent upon them in terms of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. No. 96.

[1] See Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 55.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and remits," &c.* Mar. 5, 1875. Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

* "OPINION.—The pursuer is the schoolmaster and the defenders are the school board of the parish of Kelso. The pursuer complains of two resolutions of the board, of date 7th January 1874 and 2d September 1874 respectively, and asks that they shall be reduced as illegal and ultra vires of the board, 'in so far as they relate to the teaching together all children receiving instruction within the said public school (formerly the parish school) of Kelso, and restrict the time to be occupied in teaching Latin, Greek, modern languages, and mathematics, to one hour daily, and diminish the school fees in use to be charged by the pursuer prior to the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.' There are also declaratory conclusions resting generally on the same grounds as the reductive conclusions, and finally a conclusion for damages. It appears that so long ago as 1780 (the precise date is immaterial) the managers of this parish school saw fit to divide it into two departments,—one (the higher) being devoted to Latin, Greek, and French, with which the parish schoolmaster was specially charged; and the other (the elementary) being devoted to the usual elementary teaching with which an assistant teacher appointed by the parish schoolmaster, subject to the approbation of the managers, was specially charged, but with the reasonable proviso that the parish schoolmaster should have the superintendence of the whole school. This system of separation was, with some modification of details, which need not be specially noticed, continued till the school board in the present year made the change now complained of. It subsisted when the pursuer was appointed in 1858, at which time also the school fees stood fixed by the proper authority, according to the scale set forth in condescendence 3, which subsisted till altered by the school board this year. The questions for decision are—(1st) Whether, in changing this system of separation and lowering the scale of fees, the school board acted illegally, and in excess of their powers; and (2d) whether, assuming the proceedings to be in themselves within the powers of the school board, they were, nevertheless, in violation of the pursuer's legal rights, as the existing schoolmaster appointed prior to the recent Act. Both questions are distinctly raised by the pleas on record, but as the pursuer's counsel at the debate did not maintain the affirmative of the first, but of the second only—on which he exclusively rested his case in argument—I might perhaps have passed the first without further remark. But I am inclined to think it is expedient that I should express my opinion upon it irrespective of concession, as a clear view of it will be conducive to a right apprehension of the second question, on which the case, as it was argued, turns. Parish schools (and it is unnecessary to advert to any other) are now under the management of school boards, the old management by heritors and ministers being displaced, and all jurisdiction and authority of presbyteries with respect to them being abolished. The Act of 1872, by which this change was accomplished, does not specify the particulars or details involved in the notion of school management, which would have been an idle thing, had it been possible. The management of a school by a board of managers is a simple and familiar notion, and everything which it comprehends is, by the Act, devolved upon the school board of each parish with respect to the parish school. Further, the management of the board is not subjected to the supervision or control of any superior authority. The schools are indeed subject to inspection by Government inspectors, but this is only with reference to the distribution of the annual Parliamentary grant by the proper department of the Government, and as the most available means of ascertaining that the conditions prescribed by the department are observed by each school sharing in it. The Government inspectors are not the officers of the school boards on the one hand, nor are the boards subject to any control by them on the other, except only through the indirect operation of giving or withholding the Parliamentary grant in relief of the rates according to their reports

No. 96. The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,—

Mar. 5, 1875. Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

LORD DEAS.—In this case it appears that Mr Hunter, who had been classical teacher in the Dumbarton Academy, was in October 1858 appointed rector of with reference to the fulfilment in each school of the conditions for the time in force for its distribution. The Government inspection extends equally to schools under private management which claim participation in the grant, and has the same indirect operation on their management. The only instance that occurs to me at this moment of a power on the part of school boards to require any duty to be performed by a Government inspector is to be found in section 60 of the Act, and if there is any other it is of the same character, as being specially and exceptionally enacted, the scheme of the statute being that the Government takes no concern with the management of any schools, but only informs itself, through its inspectors, that all schools (whether public or private) sharing in the grant comply with the conditions on which it is given. This, indeed, is the whole (though no doubt powerful) operation of the code, which affects school management not otherwise than this, that, subject to the limitations of section 67 of the Act, any school may obtain a share of the Parliamentary grant if the managers shall comply with the conditions therein prescribed, and otherwise not. It will be observed, on reference to the Act, that all the powers and duties of the Board of Education stand on specific enactments, and that they chiefly regard the division and conjunction of parishes, the election of school boards, making suggestions to the Government for the distribution of the grant in Scotland, the institution of new public schools to supply deficiencies in the means of education in particular parishes and districts, and do not with respect to management subject the school boards to any interference or control. Some special powers and duties are conferred or imposed on them —as, for example, by the conscience clause—but none, so far as my memory serves, enabling them to supersede or control a school board in the management of its schools. Clauses 34 and 36 are instructive illustrations of the nature of the functions and powers of the Board of Education. By the former, they are enabled to test the accuracy and completeness of the returns relating to the means of education already provided by existing schools, whether public or private. This was necessary to enable them to determine what amount of public school accommodation ought to be provided in the several parishes or districts. By the latter they are enabled to insist that every school established under the Act shall be efficiently maintained, and to prevent any school board from practically frustrating the statutory determination respecting the requirements of its district by the expedient of simple neglect or discontinuance. I have adverted to this topic of the supremacy of the school boards in the matter of school management, although no controversy is here directly raised upon it, because I think it is important to proceed to the consideration of the actual dispute with an accurate and clear view of the position of school boards in this matter. That position, in my opinion, is that with regard to everything implied in the notion of school 'management' they are supreme, and responsible only to their constituents, like other representative and popularly elected bodies. It is almost unnecessary to express, what so clearly goes without expression, that they will not be permitted to transgress the law of the land, or to violate the legal rights of others. This, indeed, is a condition of all management and conduct, even the management which every one has of his own household and private affairs. The resolutions complained of are, on the face of them, acts of school management and nothing else, and as such were, according to the views which I have expressed, within the power of the school board, unless they shall appear to involve a transgression of some public law or a violation of some legal right. And, first, Do the resolutions involve any violation of public law? It was not maintained that they do, and it is indeed very clear that they do not. The policy or expediency, with reference to the efficiency of the school and the educational requirements of the parish, of the change thereby directed to be made in the conduct of the school, is a question on which there may be difference of

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

the Kelso grammar school, and that until recently the duties exacted from him were the duties usually performed by a rector,—teaching the higher branches of education along with reading, writing, and arithmetic, in which he had the aid of an assistant teacher. The school board have recently made alterations in opinion. But it is a question for the determination of the school board as a board of management elected by the whole ratepaying population of the parish, and they having determined it, this Court has no authority to interfere with their judgment. Such interference would imply a power and therefore a duty on the part of this Court to assume a supervising or controlling power with respect to the management of all the public schools in the country, than which nothing could be more at variance with the Act of Parliament, which conferred the management on the people at large through the medium of boards popularly elected at short intervals, without a suggestion of any supervision or control by this Court. Second, Do the resolutions violate any legal right on the part of the pursuer? On this question (as on the last) I lay aside in the meantime the matter of fees, which, as depending on a distinct clause of the Act of Parliament, I shall consider separately. In regard to the other matters embraced by the resolutions, the pursuer's case is that he is thereby prejudiced with respect to his 'tenure of office' as 'by law, contract, or usage secured' to him at the passing of the Act of 1872, contrary to his rights under section 55 of the Act. He refers to the manner in which the school was conducted at the date of his appointment, maintains that the terms of his appointment implied a contract for the continuance of the arrangements then subsisting, and contends that this constituted 'tenure of office' in the sense in which that expression is used in section 55 of the Act. I cannot assent to this argument. I think it clear that the expression 'tenure of office,' as used in section 55, means simply duration of office, or the time for which it is held by law, contract, or usage. The pursuer's counsel referred to the meaning attached to the word 'tenure' as used in the feudal law, but I cannot admit the analogy. To say that a parish schoolmaster holds office by the 'tenure' of teaching Latin and Greek in a separate class-room during so many hours a-day would be an unfamiliar, not to say a strange and unnatural use of language. A parish schoolmaster held or had 'tenure' of his office ad vitam aut culpam, but a change in the mode of conducting the school, or in the branches taught—whether by reduction or addition—made by the managers of the school (the minister and heritors) in the due course of management, was certainly not objectionable as a change of his 'tenure' of office. It was, on the contrary, implied in the appointment of every parish schoolmaster that he should submit and conform himself to the lawful management of the managers, and I should greatly doubt whether an express contract, whereby the managers bound themselves to make no change of management, however expedient or even necessary in the interests of the parish, would have been lawful or binding. A public body is not entitled so to tie itself by contract as that it shall be incapable of duly performing its public duty. But there is here no express contract, and the pursuer's case is therefore this—that the conduct and management of the school, as subsisting at the time of his appointment, must continue during his tenure of office, unless he shall consent to a change. I think the proposition is unreasonable and untenable, for it would paralyse the action of the managing body; and certainly no such intention is expressed or implied by the language of section 55 of the statute. It is not unnatural that the pursuer should feel hurt by the action of the new managing body in confining him more than formerly to the primary and proper purposes of an elementary school supported by parish rates, and withdrawing him to a corresponding extent from the adjuncts of the higher branches. It was always considered a valuable feature of the parish schools of Scotland that, while instituted and maintained for the purpose of providing elementary instruction, their teachers were competent to give, and, compatibly with the other and more primary duties of the schools, found leisure to give, higher instruction to those (always a small percentage of the children) who desired and were able to receive

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

the arrangements for teaching, the result of which will be that the higher branches will either not be taught at all, or will be superseded, to a great extent, by the elementary branches. Mr Hunter very naturally objects to the change, and he seeks to reduce the minutes of the board by which the change is made. The

---

it, and this feature will no doubt be preserved under the new management. But the system pursued in the Kelso school was at least open to serious question, for according to it the parochial schoolmaster was altogether withdrawn from the elementary school, and his whole time and labour devoted to teaching, in a separate building, the higher branches to 'boys intended for professional life' (Condescendence 1), and 'pupils drawn from a different social class' than were the children attending the elementary school (Condescendence 4). The statutory managers of the school having, with their knowledge of the locality, and of all the circumstances necessary to form an intelligent judgment, determined that it is in the interest of the education under their charge to change the system, and to put the school on the same footing with board schools in general, I cannot presume to form an opinion that they have acted injudiciously. The general arguments on the one side and the other are obvious and trite enough, but to apply them to the particular case, and to strike the balance with a due regard to all the circumstances proper to be considered, is a task for which I am personally unqualified and judicially incompetent. I assume, as I think I am bound to do, that the proper authority has rightly judged of a matter which may be delicate and difficult, but is undoubtedly, in my opinion, within their province and duty to determine. And assuming this, I have no difficulty in holding that the feelings of the schoolmaster, though the furthest in the world from being reprehensible, cannot be allowed to prevail over the deliberate judgment of the board. The school board will no doubt consult, and properly attach high importance to the opinion of the teacher with reference to any contemplated change of school arrangements. But when his professional feelings appear to be in conflict with what the board regard as the true interest of the parish, it is not unreasonable that his opinion should be regarded with less confidence than it usually commands. With respect to the school fees, the pursuer's case is that the board have, by reducing the scale of 1855, which was in observance when he was appointed, prejudiced him in his emoluments, as secured to him by law or contract, contrary to section 55 of the Act. But (1st) I am not of opinion that the contract, express or implied, with the pursuer on his appointment, imported an obligation on the part of the heritors and minister to continue either the teaching or the fees on the then existing basis during his tenure of office, for such an obligation would have been in effect a renunciation for themselves and their successors of a great part of the management of the school committed to them by statute. (2d) By section 53 of the Act of 1872 the school board is directed to fix the school fees, which are ordered to be paid to the treasurer of the board. I do not know, and it is probably still uncertain, whether the revenue of the school will be increased or diminished by the reduction of the scale. If the result shall be an increase (whether by the greater gross amount of the fees themselves or by a larger share of grant earned), there will be money enough to make good the pursuer's 'emoluments,' whatever meaning shall be attached to the term, and if it shall be a decrease, the deficiency must be made good by rates under the provisions of the Act. In neither case can the pursuer complain of the reduction as a violation of his right, which is only that his 'emoluments,' as secured to him by law or contract at the date of the Act, shall not be prejudiced. I have already expressed my opinion that the continuance of the scale of fees of 1855 was not secured to him by law or contract; but assuming this opinion to be erroneous, the result would only be that his emoluments are, for the purpose of being made good to him by the board out of the school fund, to be estimated on that footing as at the passing of the Act. For I think it is impossible to maintain that section 55 overpowers section 53 to the effect of disabling the school board from fixing the school fees during the tenure of office of a teacher appointed before the Act, and entitles such teacher directly to draw

No. 96.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

effect certainly will be to lower the intellectual character of his duties below what his standing and acquirements fit him to perform. But although there may be hardship in that I am of opinion that the Education Act authorises the school board to make the change, and that is all I think it necessary to say in delivering my opinion.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The action before us is at the instance of Mr Hunter, teacher of the parochial school of Kelso, who was appointed in 1858 by the heritors and minister. The conclusion of the action is for reduction of two resolutions of the school board of Kelso, acting under provisions of the statute of 1872, and for damages to the extent of £5000. The resolutions are alleged to have been illegal, and ultra vires of the school board, and the damages are claimed in respect of wrong done by such unlawful resolutions.

If the resolutions complained of,—the terms of which I need not again repeat,—were not illegal and ultra vires, then the pursuer has no right to claim reparation as for a wrong, and the conclusion for damages cannot be sustained. If his emoluments as teacher shall be ascertained to have been injuriously affected by the resolutions of the board there may arise a question in regard to compensation. No such question is, however, now before us. This action is for reduction, and for damages in respect of wrong done, and injury incurred, up to the date of action. The first resolution complained of was in January 1874, the second resolution was on 2d September 1874. The resolutions were acted on in the subsequent part of September 1874, the school being opened on the 21st September 1874. This action was raised on the 12th of October 1874. The pursuer claims £5000 for loss and damage suffered by him up to the date of the action, that is, between the beginning of September and the 12th of October—a large sum, and a short period. The claim is not put on the record, and it cannot now be fairly represented as a claim for compensation for loss of emoluments under the statute. The recognition of a right to compensation for loss of emoluments assumes the validity of the act of the board. But this action is for reduction of the act of the board as illegal and ultra vires, "null and void, and of no avail," and for damages in respect of such unlawful act. If the pursuer has a good claim to compensation we have no desire to prejudice it, and no decision in this action can operate to his prejudice in regard to such a claim. The most important elements in the consideration of such a claim for compensation do not yet exist. We are not informed, and I, at least, have no idea, what effect the resolutions complained of will have on the amount of school fees—whether the amount of fees will be increased or diminished by the change effected. The fact whether there is any loss to be compensated has not been ascertained.

On the question raised and argued on the construction of the 55th section of the fees according to the scale which was in observance at the passing of the Act. This view would of course also imply that the branches to be taught, and the time to be given to them respectively, should also be unchangeable during the teacher's tenure of office. Such a sacrifice of all other interests to those (real or supposed) of the teacher would be unreasonable, and I find nothing in the Act to countenance it. Therefore, without deciding in this case what claims the pursuer may have against the board under sec. 55, I have no doubt whatever that the board acted within their powers, and without violating any legal right of his, when they reduced the school fees. The conclusion for damages, which rests on the erroneous, as I think, assumption that the school board have done the pursuer an injury, I must of course hold to be untenable."

---

No. 96.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

the Act of 1872 I confess I have not felt any difficulty. Reading that section along with the other sections of the statute, I agree entirely in the construction adopted and explained by Lord Young. I have no doubt of the power of the school board under the Act to do all that they have done here, and no doubt of the lawfulness of what they have done. It appears to me impossible to construe the words "tenure of office" in the 55th section as conferring on the teacher of a parochial school, appointed previous to the Act of 1872, a right to insist on maintaining without change the same arrangements in the conduct and management of the school, the nature and extent of the education, and the amount of fees exacted, as subsisted at the date of his appointment. By no fair construction of the words "tenure of office" can the claim on the part of the teacher of a power to control the management, and to defeat and defy the school board, be supported. The powers of direction and management given to the school board under the Act of 1872 are necessarily wide, and the use of these powers for the introduction of elementary education is the very thing intended. The main object of that statute was to secure, to as large an extent as possible, useful elementary education. It was not indeed intended to extinguish or supersede the higher education in all schools under the statute. Provision is made for maintaining, in certain places, and under certain circumstances, that higher education. But a wide discretion is necessarily left to the school board. That discretion may sometimes be difficult to exercise. It may sometimes, in our opinion, be erroneously exercised, that is, we might be disposed to exercise it otherwise; but, if it is exercised honestly and regularly in promoting the objects of the statute, that exercise cannot be held to be illegal and ultra vires and wrongous, so as to subject the board to damages. On this point also I agree in the views expressed by Lord Young. The statute provides protection to teachers appointed prior to the Act against prejudice caused by the provisions of the Act in respect of "tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance." In regard to the tenure of office, as I understand the words, the protection is that such previously appointed teacher shall not be liable to dismissal at pleasure, but shall be only liable to dismissal, under section 60th, for fault, or for ascertained inefficiency and unfitness. The protection in regard to emoluments, if "secured or enjoyed by law, contract, or usage," is by providing compensation; and the protection in regard to retiring allowance is given in the second sub-section of the 60th clause. But, apart from a question of compensation, which is not now raised, and cannot now be determined, there is no provision to meet such a case as that now put, of damage said to have been caused by the introduction of elementary education, and the limiting of the higher education in an ordinary parish school. The result of my consideration of the provision of the statute is, that unless the resolutions complained of were contrary to law, and beyond the power of the school board, there is no ground for the claim of damages. Accordingly, the Solicitor-General found it necessary for his argument to maintain that the question here involved is really the question of power,—of the power of the school board to introduce elementary education to the effect of limiting to some extent the amount of the higher education as given at the date of the teacher's appointment. It was even maintained that the board were bound to take the education up just as it stood at the date of the teacher's appointment, and to continue it without a change. This argument does not commend itself to my mind. There is nothing in the statute to support it, and on general principles I think it is not sound. The heritors and minister were not, in my opinion, entitled to

No. 97.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Hunter v. Kelso School Board.

bind their successors to abide, without alteration, by the arrangements which they had chosen to make with the master. There was no contract with the pursuer in 1858 in regard to the mode of conducting or distributing the teaching of the higher or of the elementary education in the school which a Court of law can hold as now binding on the present school board, or as precluding the school board from taking the steps here complained of, or as subjecting the school board to a claim of damages at the instance of the teacher.

The change effected by the introduction of elementary education was, in my opinion, within the power of the school board, and was according to the true meaning of the provisions of the statute, and was especially in accordance with the aim and spirit of the statute. To maintain that the school board was bound to continue the whole arrangements for management and teaching of the school, as existing at the date of the teacher's appointment many years ago, and was not entitled to introduce elementary education into such a school, appears to me quite extravagant. The introduction and maintenance of elementary education is one of the primary purposes of the Act of 1872. There may be cases in which, having regard to the special circumstances of the parish or district, a greater or a less proportion of the higher education may be deemed right and expedient. It may even be that in this parish of Kelso there may be reasons why the higher education, which had been previously given, ought not to have been so seriously diminished, but might well have been continued to a greater extent than has been done. But that is a question, not of power, but of discretion. With the discretion or expediency of the resolutions we have not the whole materials for decision, and are not entitled to interfere, even though we may have some sympathy with the teacher. It is only if the act of the board was illegal, ultra vires, and wrongous, that damages are claimed or can be claimed by the teacher.

I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of this action, but without prejudice to any claim which the pursuer may have for compensation in respect of ascertained loss of emoluments.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD DEAS intimated that the Lord President, who was absent from the advising, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note, but without prejudice to any claim which the pursuer may be able hereafter to establish on the ground of diminished emoluments arising from the proceedings here complained of: Find the pursuer liable in additional expenses, and remit," &c.

DAVID HUNTER, S.S.C.—J STORMONTH DARLING, W.S.—Agents.

No. 98.

JAMES S. ROUGH, Pursuer.—Rhind.
PETER MOIR AND SON AND PATRICK BIRNIE, Defenders.—Mair.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

Sale—Warranty—Statute 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60 (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856), sec. 5.—A horse, which was sold by auction, was described in the auctioneer's catalogue, by the seller's instructions, as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness." In an action for the price, after a

No. 98.
Mar. 5. 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

proof, which was held to establish that the horse was not fit to be so driven, and that the seller was aware of its unfitness, held that the seller was not entitled to recover, in respect (1) of the implied warrandice at common law (the first branch of sec. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act not being applicable, as the seller was not without knowledge of the defect); and (2) of the implied warrandice under the second branch of sec. 5 of the Act, the mare having been sold as fit for a particular purpose.

1st Division. Ld. Mackenzie. B.

Messrs Peter Moir and Son sold at their auction mart in Edinburgh, on 8th July 1874, a bay mare, on the order of James S. Rough, innkeeper, Slamannan. The mare was described, by the owner's instructions, in the catalogue of the sale as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness." She was sold under the conditions contained in certain printed rules and regulations on which Messrs Moir and Son conducted their sales by auction. By these rules and regulations it is provided that a purchaser who objects to the purchase of any lot "must intimate such objection and return the lot on or before the second day after the sale, otherwise the lot shall be deemed to be as it was represented at the sale, and no objection thereafter received." It is also provided by these rules that "the seller shall be entitled to receive the purchase-money on the third day after the sale, provided no objection has been stated, and that Mr Moir has then received the price." The mare was returned within two days by the purchaser, Patrick Birnie, as not being conform to the representation in the catalogue.

The present action was brought by Rough for £36, 15s., the price of the mare, against Patrick Birnie, horse-dealer, the purchaser, and Moir and Son, the auctioneers, to whom he had paid the price.

The defenders stated that "the pursuer falsely and fraudulently represented that the mare in question had 'been driven regularly in double and single harness,' and it was in consequence so described in Messrs Moir and Sons catalogue of horses for sale. At the time the mare was consigned to Moir and Son the pursuer knew that it had not been driven regularly in single harness, and that it could not be so driven. The defender, Birnie, immediately after the sale of the mare to him had her tried by his breaksman, and he found that she would not go in single harness at all, and the mare was accordingly returned to Messrs Moir and Son as being disconform to the representation and description in the catalogue. The price of the mare was afterwards accounted for by Moir and Son to the defender Birnie in settling up their transactions. Intimation was made to the pursuer on the 10th July 1874 by the defenders, Moir and Son, that the mare had been returned to them, and after standing at livery at their stables for five weeks at a cost of about £6, it was, with the consent of the pursuer and the defender Birnie (saving the rights and pleas of both parties), sold by public auction on 26th August 1874 for £33, 12s."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having falsely and fraudulently represented the mare in question as one "driven regularly in double and single harness," and the same having been found to be disconform to this representation, the defender Birnie was entitled to return the same.

The Lord Ordinary allowed both parties a proof of their averments, the result of which was to establish that the mare had never been properly broken to harness, and could not be driven with safety either in double or single harness, and that the pursuer had sold her in the full knowledge of these facts. The import of the proof will appear more fully from the opinion of Lord Deas.

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Reserves right to the pursuer to receive payment from the defenders, Messrs Peter Moir and Son, of the net proceeds received by the re-sale of the horse, which took place on 26th August 1874, with consent of parties, saving their rights and pleas in this process: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

No. 98.

Mar. 5, 1875. Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The words printed in the auctioneer's catalogue, as descriptive of the mare, did not amount to a warranty. They were but a statement of a past fact, not a warranty of future condition or behaviour. As such, there was nothing in the proof inconsistent with their truth.[1]

The defenders argued that the representation made on the pursuer's instructions in the published catalogue of the sale amounted to an express warranty.[2] If this was not the case, and it must be treated as a representation merely, then it was a false representation, and the seller at the time of making it knew it was false, and sold the mare, knowing that the same was defective or of bad quality. The effect must be held equivalent to that of an express warranty.†

LORD DEAS.—This action is brought at the instance of James Rough, innkeeper, Slamannan, against Peter Moir and Son, auctioneers, and Patrick Birnie, horse-dealer, for £36, 15s., as the price of a mare sold to Birnie at Peter Moir and Son's auction mart on 8th July 1874.

The mare had been entered in the sale catalogue, by Rough's instructions, as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness." It was a condition of the sale that lots objected to must be returned on or before the second day after the sale. Birnie returned the mare within the time limited, as not answering the above description; and Messrs Moir, being satisfied that such was the fact, received her back, and intimated the objection to Rough, the seller, who refused to acknowledge its validity, but agreed with Messrs Moir and Birnie

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . The question raised for decision is, whether the defenders are liable in payment of the price which the mare fetched at the sale of 8th July 1874.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the statement in the catalogue that the mare 'had been driven regularly in double and single harness' was a warranty. It formed part of the contract of sale. It was an essential element in that contract, and the defender Birnie bought the mare on the faith thereof. (Scott v. Steel, 9th Dec. 1857, 20 D. 253.) The Lord Ordinary is also of opinion that there is implied in such a warranty that the mare was free from such bad habits as prevented her from being driven regularly in harness. In short, that she ordinarily had been steady in harness.

"The question then is, had the mare been driven regularly in double and single harness? After careful consideration of the proof the Lord Ordinary considers that this question must be answered in the negative. . . . ."

[1] Young v. Giffen, Dec. 4, 1858, 21 D. 87, 31 Scot. Jur. 60; Hardie v. Austin, May 25, 1870, 8 Macph. 798, 42 Scot. Jur. 450.

[2] Scott v. Steel, Dec. 9, 1857, 20 D. 253, 30 Scot. Jur. 129; Oliphant's Law of Horses, 3d ed. p. 113.

† The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 5, enacts,—"Where goods shall, after the passing of this Act, be sold, the seller, if at the time of the sale he was without knowledge that the same were defective or of bad quality, shall not be held to have warranted their quality or sufficiency, but the goods, with all faults, shall be at the risk of the purchaser, unless the seller shall have given an express warranty of the quality or sufficiency of such goods, or unless the goods have been expressly sold for a specified and particular purpose, in which case the seller shall be considered, without such warranty, to warrant that the same are fit for such purpose."

No. 98.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

to the mare being sold in the meantime, which was done at a reduced price, and then he (Rough) brought this action against these other parties, as being, one or other of them, liable to him for the full price.

When tried immediately after the sale it was found, according to the evidence of the defenders' witnesses, that the mare would not go quietly either in double or single harness, and that, on the contrary, she could not be driven in either way consistently with safety.

Dickson, who appears to have had great experience both as groom and driver, tried her in both ways, by Birnie's instructions, the day after the sale, accompanied by Pearce, one of Birnie's grooms. Dickson depones that both in single and double harness, so soon as the mare was not led by the head, she plunged, reared, and rebelled, and would not go. In single harness she got upon the street foot-pavement, and upon the foot-path in the country, and tried to crush the machine against the wall, and in double harness she behaved still worse, and tried to jib (that is, to run back), but could not, as the other horse was too strong for her,—that they saw she was dangerous to them, herself, and the passers by, and the opinion he (Dickson) formed was that "she was an old hand at bad behaviour, and could not have been regularly driven either in single or double harness." The groom who accompanied Dickson depones substantially to the same effect.

Henry M'Donald, who was at the time in the employment of Messrs Moir and Son, says:—"I was ordered to put the mare in harness to try her myself, which I did both in double and single harness. The utmost care was taken in harnessing her on both occasions. In single harness Mr Moir got into the gig beside me. He was going to Leith on business. She stopped half-way down Leith Walk, and ran us both on the pavement. Mr Moir jumped out, and pulled her off the pavement, else I do not know what might have happened with her. I then took her down to Constitution Street, where Mr Moir had to make a call to transact some business. The time he was in she pulled me on to the pavement again. I had to pull her up, else I would have been against the railings on the off side. When Mr Moir came out he said to go up the Easter Road, which we did. There was a carriage coming down there, and she wheeled there, and nearly got into the carriage." . . . . "From her performance on that occasion I formed an opinion that she had never been a properly broken mare, and that she had never been driven in single harness, and that she would not go quietly. She was not a safe mare to drive. I tried her in double harness. We tried her alongside the steady old horse we used in the breaking business. She ran all on one side. Her mouth was hard on the one side, and soft on the other. From what I saw of her in double harness it is my opinion that she had not been driven regularly in double harness previously. . . . . If she had been a horse that had been driven regularly in single harness there would have been no difficulty in driving her. . . . . I formed the opinion that she was a very bad broke mare, and was quite satisfied she had not been driven regularly."

Then we have, amongst other witnesses, Mr Moir himself, who says,—"I saw her put into double harness by M'Donald, a previous witness. He is an experienced and skilled breaksman. I did not go along with him in double harness. When she was put into single harness I accompanied him. We went down to Leith with her. She behaved awkwardly. She would not draw right. She got on the pavement in the middle of Leith Walk, and very nearly capsized the vehicle, and I had to get out and take her by the head. I led her off the pavement. We drove on then through Constitution Street to Quality Street, Leith. I made a call, leaving M'Donald with the mare outside. When I was in she had run on the pavement again. I went out and took her by the head, and got her off the pavement. We then drove back to Edinburgh by the Easter Road. She behaved very dangerously indeed. She nearly ran into a carriage there, and I had to get out and lead her on. (Q.) From the trial which you made of her upon that occasion in single harness what opinion did you form of her? (A.) I formed a very bad opinion. I thought she was a very dangerous animal, and not to be trusted into anyone's care. I am satisfied from the trial made that she had not been driven regularly in single harness. I came to be satisfied of that, because she went so very unsteadily. She pulled all to one side, and would neither trot nor canter. She did not go straightforward like a horse that had been regularly driven. She went like an untrained horse that had never been in harness before. In consequence of this I was quite satisfied that she did not come up to the representation in the catalogue. The fact was immediately intimated to Mr Rough." It is obvious to remark that if Mr Moir had not had good grounds for the opinion he formed of the mare he was not likely to have taken her back, and subjected himself in whatever might be the consequences to Rough, his employer.

The evidence for the pursuer appears to me, as it did to the Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses, to be less reliable than the evidence for the defenders. With reference, however, to the law of the case—of which afterwards—there are two questions of fact to be distinguished from each other:—1st, Had the mare, prior to the sale, "been driven regularly in double and single harness"? 2d, What was the pursuer's state of knowledge on that subject?

As regards the first of these questions, the earliest account we have of the mare is from the witness Dolan, who bought her at Armagh Fair in Ireland on 5th February, and sold her to O'Neil on 19th March. Consequently he had her in his possession six weeks. Dolan at first says he drove the mare during that time both in single and double harness, but on the cross-examination he does not positively affirm that she was out more than once in double harness, when he drove her at a funeral (which generally goes at a walking pace); and, in answer to the question, how often he had driven her himself, all he says is, he cannot tell. "I have driven her more than once in single harness. She behaved well." No doubt, he says, he believes she was driven regularly the most of the time she was about his place, but none of the persons in his employment at Bothwell (which is not a remote locality) are brought to speak to their driving the mare, or to corroborate his account of her behaviour.

O'Neil had not the mare more than three hours in his possession, and speaks only to her being driven in single harness two hundred yards and back (it is not said at what pace) on a level road, on the occasion when he re-sold her to Rough. It is probable enough that the mare had not betrayed her faults during that short experiment.

From 19th March to 8th July, when the mare was sold at Moir and Son's auction, she belonged to the pursuer. The pursuer says she was left with the witness Findlay for some days, and that he then had her himself at Slamannan for about a fortnight. During that time, he says, he drove her two or three times himself, and she went quite steadily. He specifies an instance of driving her to Glasgow, on 30th March, along with Mr Fraser, but he says Fraser is believed to have left the country, and consequently he is not a witness. The pursuer also says that his groom drove her at other times, but he cannot tell where the groom is now, and, as the Lord Ordinary remarks, it does not appear that he made any effort to find him. The pursuer represents the mare, while in his possession, as having been driven in single harness only. The only corroboration of his evidence as to the driving and behaviour of the mare, while in his own custody, is the testimony of his servant girl Martha Quin, who says she saw the mare leaving the door three or four times, and observed nothing wrong in her starting, and did not hear any complaints. One would think better corroboration than this might easily have been got, if the pursuer's statements were accurate.

No. 98.
Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

What subsequently took place is not of a confirmatory nature. On 14th April the mare was sent to Fraser's stables in Glasgow, where she stood at livery till 2d June at 17s. 6d. a week. The pursuer says the object of this was that the witness Findlay might attend her as a veterinary surgeon for what is called "speedy cut," produced by the one foot coming against the other leg. This period of seven weeks is consequently a blank as to the behaviour of the mare. At the end of that time she was sent to Findlay's stables, where she remained for five weeks—that is, till 8th July—when she was sent by train to Messrs Moir's repository to be sold by auction. The "speedy cut" was cured in the course of the first week (Findlay, p. 22, C), and the question is important, why did she remain at livery with Findlay for four weeks thereafter? Findlay's account of the charge he made for her supplies the answer to that question. He was attempting to break the mare to go in harness. His account contains a slump charge for £7, 15s. for keeping and breaking-in the mare. She was taken out during the four weeks ten or twelve times in all—always by himself, and always in the break (p. 24, B C, and 25, F). Findlay's groom (William Boyd) says he saw her start and return, and saw nothing wrong, but he never drove her. Findlay refuses to admit that the mare was sent to him to be broken, but he shuffles as to the whole matter in a way which discredits his testimony, and the truth shines through, with sufficient clearness, that the driving of the mare while in his custody was simply an attempting to break her, and in which he was by no means successful.

Coupling all this with the evidence of the defenders' witnesses, I come to the conclusion that, prior to the sale on 8th July 1874, the mare had not "been driven regularly in double and single harness" in the only sense in which purchasers could be reasonably expected to understand those words in Messrs Moir and Son's sale catalogue. It is a remarkable confirmation of this, if such were required, that the pursuer did not venture to adduce Miller, the last purchaser of the mare, as a witness to her character, although reminded, through his counsel, by the Lord Ordinary, that this would naturally be expected if Miller could give favourable testimony.

Assuming then that, in point of fact, the mare had not "been driven regularly in double and single harness," the remaining fact to be inquired into is, what was the state of the pursuer's knowledge on that subject?

Now, this can only be gathered from the real evidence of facts and circumstances. We cannot see otherwise into the pursuer's mind. Was the state of his knowlege such as to warrant the representation in the catalogue that the mare had "been driven regularly in double and single harness?" I humbly think not. Making all due allowance for the assurances said to have been given to the pursuer by Dolan, with the usual reliability of a horse-dealer declining to give a guarantee, and which the pursuer, no doubt, knew how to appreciate, the fact remains that the pursuer saw enough of her to lead him to place her for five weeks, at considerable expense, in the hands of a breaker, and then to send her to be disposed of by public auction.

No. 98.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

This might have been all well enough if the pursuer had made no representation of her qualities or habits. But did his state of knowledge entitle him to represent her as having been driven regularly in double and single harness? Can he be held to have been without knowledge that this was inconsistent with her actual history during the period immediately preceding the sale? I think these questions must be answered in the negative; and if so, the case comes within the class of cases in which the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, sec. 5) does not require an express guarantee, and the common law of Scotland holds a seller not entitled to enforce payment of the price. The pursuer was not without knowledge that, as compared with the representation in the catalogue, the mare was defective. Her training for double and single harness was there represented as having been successful. He knew that it had not been successful, otherwise he would not have been at the expense of sending her to a breaker to get her so trained. In other words, he knew that she had not been driven regularly in double and single harness after having been properly broken, which was obviously the meaning in which the representation was calculated and intended to be understood. That I take to be a sale which the law holds to have been made on a false representation, known to be false, in a matter in essentialibus of the contract.

Another view, which I consider also well founded (although opening up somewhat of a different discussion), is that the mare was expressly sold "for a specified and particular purpose," and so comes within a subsequent clause of the same section of the Act to that just referred to. The representation, it is true, was in the past tense. But what was the object of making it, except to convey to a purchaser that what the mare had regularly done hitherto she was fit to continue to do? In other words, that she was fit for the purpose of being driven in double and single harness. The sale being by public auction, and the seller himself not appearing on the scene, so as to be talked to by an intending purchaser, who wanted an animal fit to be driven in double and single harness, what could the latter proceed upon except the deliberate written representation, which, I think, the words naturally imported, that this was a mare fit for the particular purpose for which, it is not disputed, the purchase was made. The pursuer placed, and left the matter upon that footing, and the purchaser was entitled so to act upon it.

With the exception of the paragraph, in which the Lord Ordinary says he is of opinion that the statement in the catalogue was a warranty, the whole of his note is an able and accurate analysis of the evidence, directly supporting both and each of the above two grounds of judgment, although it were to be held that there was not "an express guarantee" in the sense in which these words are used in the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. This last is a nice, and, in the particular circumstances of a written representation at a public sale, a somewhat novel question, into which I do not think it necessary to enter, because either of the two grounds I have assigned is sufficient to entitle the defenders to absolvitor, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to accordingly.

No. 98.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Most cases of the kind are attended with difficulty, and this is not an exception. There are conflicting interests, and there is a conflict of evidence. The Lord Ordinary had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses, and had the opportunity of estimating more accurately than we can do the weight and credit due to their testimony.

There are two views of the case, which have both been argued. In the first place, I am, after some hesitation and difficulty, disposed to hold that, having regard to the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, the description proved and admitted to have been given of this mare in the sale catalogue as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness," does amount to an express warranty of the fact so stated, and of the quality and sufficiency of the mare in so far as within that statement. Of the words there is no doubt. Of the meaning there is no doubt. Of the importance of the statement, seeing the mare was thus sold as fit for harness, and of the importance of the fact that the purchase was made on the faith of the truth of that statement, there is no doubt. The defender, the purchaser, founds on these words as express warranty—as an assured description, and as a statement inducing him to purchase. There is no attempt to infer or imply warranty. This is not, and cannot be, a case of implied warranty. The words are published and are sufficient. The recent case of Robeson v. Waugh[1] was different, but it was not on facts like those in the present case. Warranty had in that case not been given, nay, I think it had been refused. A statement made after the refusal to warrant, and made in place of warranty, was viewed as not a warranty. But here the description of the mare in very plain language was given and published in order to attract purchasers, and the purchase was induced by that description, and was made on the faith of that description. That, I think, was an assured description, of the nature of a warranty, not a general warranty of soundness, but a warranty, special and express, that she had "been driven regularly in double and single harness." The description was meant to induce purchase on the footing of fitness for harness, and was so understood; and the purchase made on that footing. Then, I have no doubt, that, on being well and judiciously tried by most competent persons very soon after the sale, this mare was found to be quite unfit for harness,—unsafe and unsuitable, unmanageable, and even dangerous. It is proved, as matter of opinion, by four or five witnesses of skill and experience perfectly competent to judge, that she could not have been "driven regularly in harness." The testimony of the pursuer's witnesses adduced in opposition to those of the defender has been carefully considered by me. The result is, that I come to the conclusion that the description in the catalogue,—the statement to attract purchasers,—was not according to the truth. I cannot believe that this mare had "been driven regularly in double and single harness." The witnesses for the purchaser negative that altogether, and the witnesses for the seller have not by any means proved it to my satisfaction.

If the driving spoken of as taking place in Glasgow was in the course of breaking the mare, that driving was not within the fair and honest meaning of the words "driven regularly in double and single harness." That is not what was proclaimed by the description given. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that she was sent to Findlay's to be broken; and that is very probable—the more so that there is a charge for breaking in Findlay's account. But whether that was [1] Oct. 30, 1874, supra, p. 63.

No. 98.

Mar. 5, 1875.
Rough v. Moir and Son, et al.

the case or not, no such regular driving in double and single harness as was stated in the description has been proved as to support the description given of the mare. She certainly did not answer the description.

On the other view of the case, and treating the description in the catalogue not as a warranty but as a representation of fact with a view to a sale, I agree with Lord Deas. Looking to all the proof, I am compelled to the conclusion that the pursuer did not and could not really believe that the description in the catalogue was according to the truth. That she was driven by a breaker, or in the course of breaking, does not satisfy the description. That is not what was meant to be proclaimed in the catalogue as an inducement to purchase. What was so stated was misleading, contrary to the fact, and inducing the contract.

LORD MURE.—The question whether this mare was sold under a warranty is one which presents considerable difficulty and nicety. Undoubtedly the mare was sold by auction on the representation contained in the catalogue, that she had "been driven regularly in double and single harness." But it is very clearly proved that she was unfit to go safely in either. And one question here raised is, whether that representation amounts to an express warranty in the sense of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act.

The inclination of my mind is to hold that it amounts to a representation merely, but to a representation of such a nature as may be held to entitle a purchaser to reject an article, in respect of the alternative in the latter part of the 5th section of the Act relative to goods sold for a specified purpose, and that whether the seller was in bona fide or not in making the representation.

The 5th section provides that when "goods have been expressly sold for a specified and particular purpose, the seller shall be considered, without such warranty, to warrant that the same are fit for such purpose." Now, dealing with the matter under this branch of the section I should be inclined to hold that a horse advertised, as here, in an auction catalogue as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness," and sold upon that representation, is expressly sold for a specified and particular purpose; and if bought for that purpose, and found on trial to be unfit, that the seller cannot recover the price, or must refund it if paid. In the present case it is proved that the mare in question was bought with a view to harness; and if the above is a correct construction of the alternative clause of the statute, as bearing upon the evidence in this case, the defenders, in respect of that provision, are, I think, entitled to prevail.

But taking the case apart from the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, and dealing with it according to the ordinary rules of law applicable to representations, I agree with your Lordships that it is proved that the mare was sold upon a representation which was not in point of fact true; and that the pursuer cannot, in the circumstances disclosed in evidence, be held to have been in bona fide in making it, and is not, therefore, entitled to recover against the defenders.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find," &c.

FERGUSON & JUNNER, W.S.—ROBERT MENZIES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

and of tailzie, in any future time, to alter the order of succession, nor to sell, alienate, or dispone any of the said lands and others, either irredeemably or under reversion, or to contract debt in manner therein specified; (2), a clause irritating and resolving the right of any of the heirs of entail who should commit treason, or other crime by which the estates might be forfeited; and (3), clauses irritant and resolutive applicable to the prohibitory clauses in the said charter, and providing that the person next in succession might obtain a declarator of his right as heir-male of provision, ordaining superiors to infeft him in said lands, or have himself declared and retoured heir to the person last vest and seized before the contravention. By the said charter of novodamus it is also provided and declared that should the said James Lord Drummond, or his foresaids, be guilty of treason or other crime inferring forfeiture, the right thereby granted so far as it concerned the contravener should cease ipso facto, and be void and null, and the lands and others therein contained belong to the next person and his heirs-male, who should succeed immediately after the contravener and the descendants of his body. . . . Upon this charter infeftment followed in favour of James Lord Drummond, the institute in the entail, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour dated the 12th and recorded the 17th September 1688."*

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said lands and estate of Perth being held under royal and parliamentary titles prescribing and limiting the course of succession thereto, and the pursuer being the nearest heir of provision in terms thereof, he is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The royal charters, investitures, and Acts of Parliament founded on, or one or more of them, constitute an effectual taillie at common law, and the pursuer, as nearest heir of taillie and provision under the destinations thereof, is entitled to decree declaring his right to the lands and estates thereby conveyed. (3) The deeds founded on at all events effectually prohibit the alteration of the succession, and are binding and obligatory inter hæredes; and Baron Perth was not entitled to use the title made up by him under the Restoration Act otherwise than for supporting his radical title to the estate under the taillie destination foresaid, and the titles made up by him, in so far as in fee-simple and inconsistent with the said taillie destination, are null and reducible at the pursuer's instance. (4) By the terms of the royal charter of 1687 all right of escheat competent to the Crown in relation to the said estates was effectually limited to the liferent interests of the heir actually attainted, and the heirs-male of his body, and such limitation was and is binding in a question with the Crown and its assigns, in respect of the consent of the Crown to the conditions of said charter. (5) In respect of the foresaid limitation, when the Chancellor's son was attainted in 1715, the interests thereby forfeited were limited to the interests of himself and the heirs-male of his body, and the said heirs-male of his body having failed, the pursuer, as his heir-male whomsoever, is entitled to succeed to the said estates. (6) The pursuer, as heir-male duly served of Baron Perth, Baron Perth's father, the Chancellor, his son, and grandson, all as condescended on, has, under one or other of these titles, the character of heir-male of taillie or of provision entitled to succeed to the said lands and estate, and has thus a right and interest to reduce all titles which are adverse to his right. (7) Under the

* In his condescendence in the former action the pursuer did not found upon the charter of 24th September 1679, nor the Act of Parliament of 6th September 1681. The crown charter of 17th November 1687 was only mentioned narrativé as a step in the progress of titles, the procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687 (which was not recorded in the Register of Tailzies) being founded on as the deed constituting the entail.

Act 7 Anne, cap. 21, as interpreted by judicial decisions, the interests of heirs-substitute of entail are not affected by the forfeiture of the heir in possession, upon conviction or attainder, provided the entail is conceived in such a form as to be binding on the Crown. (8) The foresaid taillied destination being constituted by charters under the royal sign manual, and ratified by Act of Parliament, was binding on the Crown as well as inter hæredes, and therefore nothing was forfeited to the Crown by the attainder of Lord John Drummond except his life-interest as an heir-male of entail in the said lands and estate. (9) Baron Perth having died without male issue, any right or interest which he may have possessed to or in the said lands and estates terminated at his death. (23) The grounds of action and pleas in law maintained in the present action are different in substance from those disposed of by the judgments referred to in the defender's fourth plea, and the conclusions of the action are not res judicatæ.

The defenders pleaded;—The defenders are not bound to satisfy the production, and they ought to be assoilzied, or the action should be dismissed, because, ... (4) it is res judicata that the pursuer has no title to sue or to call for production of the writs sought to be reduced, in respect—1, of the action and decree set forth in articles 1 and 2 of the defenders' statement;[1] and, 2, in respect of the action and decree set forth in the remaining articles of that statement.[2] They also substantially repeated their pleas in the former action.

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d December 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, by judgment of this Court in the action of reduction and declarator raised in 1868, at the instance of the present pursuer against the present defenders, and affirmed by the House of Lords, it stands decided, and is res judicata between these parties, that the lands and estates claimed by the pursuer in the present action were taken out of the hæreditas jacens of James Drummond (designed third Duke of Perth) by means of the attainder of John Drummond, apparent heir to the said James Drummond, and that the same became vested in the Crown, and formed the subject of enactments under the statutes 20 Geo. II., c. 41, 25 Geo. II., c. 41, and 24 Geo. III., c. 57; and that these statutes confer no right on the pursuer in reference to the said lands and estates: Finds that the pursuer has not libelled or condescended on any right or title to the said lands and estates entitling him, consistently with the said judgment, to insist in the conclusions of the present action: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

---

[1] Lundin v. The King's Advocate, Dec. 13, 1750, M. 9605.

[2] Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees, supra, p. 538.

* "OPINION.—It is admitted, and is clear, that the pursuer by this action again claims the same estates which he claimed unsuccessfully by his action of 1868, directed against the same defenders. The questions now raised are therefore—1st, whether the present action is rested on grounds which were not put forward or adjudicated upon in the prior action; and 2d, whether the grounds of action now relied on, in so far as they may be regarded as new, can be otherwise dealt with than those formerly urged—having regard, of course, to the principles established by the former decision considered as a precedent.

"In the former action the pursuer sued only in the capacity of heir-male general to James third Duke of Perth. He now sues in the further capacities of heir-male in general to—1st, James first Duke and Lord Chancellor of Scotland; 2d, James second Duke and eldest son of the first Duke; 3d, James Drummond of Lundin; and 4th, Baron Perth in the peerage of Great Britain. It does not, however, follow that the present action differs so materially from the former as even to avoid the plea of res judicata, and still less to escape the application of the former decision as a precedent.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

and of tailzie, in any future time, to alter the order of succession, nor to sell, alienate, or dispone any of the said lands and others, either irredeemably or under reversion, or to contract debt in manner therein specified; (2), a clause irritating and resolving the right of any of the heirs of entail who should commit treason, or other crime by which the estates might be forfeited; and (3), clauses irritant and resolutive applicable to the prohibitory clauses in the said charter, and providing that the person next in succession might obtain a declarator of his right as heir-male of provision, ordaining superiors to infeft him in said lands, or have himself declared and retoured heir to the person last vest and seized before the contravention. By the said charter of novodamus it is also provided and declared that should the said James Lord Drummond, or his foresaids, be guilty of treason or other crime inferring forfeiture, the right thereby granted so far as it concerned the contravener should cease ipso facto, and be void and null, and the lands and others therein contained belong to the next person and his heirs-male, who should succeed immediately after the contravener and the descendants of his body. . . . Upon this charter infeftment followed in favour of James Lord Drummond, the institute in the entail, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour dated the 12th and recorded the 17th September 1688."*

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said lands and estate of Perth being held under royal and parliamentary titles prescribing and limiting the course of succession thereto, and the pursuer being the nearest heir of provision in terms thereof, he is entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) The royal charters, investitures, and Acts of Parliament founded on, or one or more of them, constitute an effectual taillie at common law, and the pursuer, as nearest heir of taillie and provision under the destinations thereof, is entitled to decree declaring his right to the lands and estates thereby conveyed. (3) The deeds founded on at all events effectually prohibit the alteration of the succession, and are binding and obligatory inter hæredes; and Baron Perth was not entitled to use the title made up by him under the Restoration Act otherwise than for supporting his radical title to the estate under the taillie destination foresaid, and the titles made up by him, in so far as in fee-simple and inconsistent with the said taillie destination, are null and reducible at the pursuer's instance. (4) By the terms of the royal charter of 1687 all right of escheat competent to the Crown in relation to the said estates was effectually limited to the liferent interests of the heir actually attainted, and the heirs-male of his body, and such limitation was and is binding in a question with the Crown and its assigns, in respect of the consent of the Crown to the conditions of said charter. (5) In respect of the foresaid limitation, when the Chancellor's son was attainted in 1715, the interests thereby forfeited were limited to the interests of himself and the heirs-male of his body, and the said heirs-male of his body having failed, the pursuer, as his heir-male whomsoever, is entitled to succeed to the said estates. (6) The pursuer, as heir-male duly served of Baron Perth, Baron Perth's father, the Chancellor, his son, and grandson, all as condescended on, has, under one or other of these titles, the character of heir-male of taillie or of provision entitled to succeed to the said lands and estate, and has thus a right and interest to reduce all titles which are adverse to his right. (7) Under the

* In his condescendence in the former action the pursuer did not found upon the charter of 24th September 1679, nor the Act of Parliament of 6th September 1681. The crown charter of 17th November 1687 was only mentioned narrativé as a step in the progress of titles, the procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687 (which was not recorded in the Register of Tailzies) being founded on as the deed constituting the entail.

Act 7 Anne, cap. 21, as interpreted by judicial decisions, the interests of heirs-substitute of entail are not affected by the forfeiture of the heir in possession, upon conviction or attainder, provided the entail is conceived in such a form as to be binding on the Crown. (8) The foresaid taillied destination being constituted by charters under the royal sign manual, and ratified by Act of Parliament, was binding on the Crown as well as inter hæredes, and therefore nothing was forfeited to the Crown by the attainder of Lord John Drummond except his life-interest as an heir-male of entail in the said lands and estate. (9) Baron Perth having died without male issue, any right or interest which he may have possessed to or in the said lands and estates terminated at his death. (23) The grounds of action and pleas in law maintained in the present action are different in substance from those disposed of by the judgments referred to in the defender's fourth plea, and the conclusions of the action are not res judicatæ.

The defenders pleaded;—The defenders are not bound to satisfy the production, and they ought to be assoilzied, or the action should be dismissed, because, ... (4) it is res judicata that the pursuer has no title to sue or to call for production of the writs sought to be reduced, in respect—1, of the action and decree set forth in articles 1 and 2 of the defenders' statement;[1] and, 2, in respect of the action and decree set forth in the remaining articles of that statement.[2] They also substantially repeated their pleas in the former action.

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d December 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that, by judgment of this Court in the action of reduction and declarator raised in 1868, at the instance of the present pursuer against the present defenders, and affirmed by the House of Lords, it stands decided, and is res judicata between these parties, that the lands and estates claimed by the pursuer in the present action were taken out of the hæreditas jacens of James Drummond (designed third Duke of Perth) by means of the attainder of John Drummond, apparent heir to the said James Drummond, and that the same became vested in the Crown, and formed the subject of enactments under the statutes 20 Geo. II., c. 41, 25 Geo. II., c. 41, and 24 Geo. III., c. 57; and that these statutes confer no right on the pursuer in reference to the said lands and estates: Finds that the pursuer has not libelled or condescended on any right or title to the said lands and estates entitling him, consistently with the said judgment, to insist in the conclusions of the present action: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

---

[1] Lundin v. The King's Advocate, Dec. 13, 1750, M. 9605.

[2] Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees, supra, p. 538.

* "OPINION.—It is admitted, and is clear, that the pursuer by this action again claims the same estates which he claimed unsuccessfully by his action of 1868, directed against the same defenders. The questions now raised are therefore—1st, whether the present action is rested on grounds which were not put forward or adjudicated upon in the prior action; and 2d, whether the grounds of action now relied on, in so far as they may be regarded as new, can be otherwise dealt with than those formerly urged—having regard, of course, to the principles established by the former decision considered as a precedent.

"In the former action the pursuer sued only in the capacity of heir-male general to James third Duke of Perth. He now sues in the further capacities of heir-male in general to—1st, James first Duke and Lord Chancellor of Scotland; 2d, James second Duke and eldest son of the first Duke; 3d, James Drummond of Lundin; and 4th, Baron Perth in the peerage of Great Britain. It does not, however, follow that the present action differs so materially from the former as even to avoid the plea of res judicata, and still less to escape the application of the former decision as a precedent.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

The pursuer reclaimed. The points raised in the argument sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Judges.

"While suing as heir-male general of James third Duke, the pursuer necessarily not only admitted but contended that the estates were vested in him at his death in 1746. In the present record he founds upon his services recently expede as heir-male general of the Chancellor and his son (first and second Dukes), apparently with a view to the statement (or rather plea in law) at the end of condescendence 25 (repeated in the 5th plea in law)—that 'when his (James third Duke's) father was attainted in 1715, the estates and honours passed from him and the heirs-male of his body to his heirs-male whomsoever, in terms of the charter of 1687.' But this plea (which is, in my opinion, otherwise bad on grounds which I need not now enter on) altogether overlooks the fact which the pursuer himself sets forth—that the party attainted in 1715 (the son of the Chancellor) had in 1713 conveyed the estates to his son, afterward James third Duke, and that they consequently escaped forfeiture altogether, and passed to his son, whose claim to them was sustained accordingly. In the pursuer's appeal case in the former action (p. 44), it is said to have been so decided by this Court on 13th August 1719, and by the House of Lords affirming the judgment on 22d March 1720. The pursuer's services to the Chancellor and his son (an attainted traitor), are therefore manifestly worthless.

"In the former action the pursuer conclusively established his contention that James third Duke died in 1746 well infeft in the estates. In the present action he has again, in my opinion, conclusively established this proposition, although he seems now to think that he may take some advantage by disputing it. The infeftment is recorded of date 16th October 1713 (cond. 14.) The purpose of the service and charter expede in 1731 after the judgments affirming his right to the estates, notwithstanding the attainder of his father in 1715, is not apparent, and need not be inquired into, as his right could not thereby be weakened. It is admitted that he possessed the estates till his death in 1746.

"Accordingly, by the interlocutor of 22d January 1869, in the former action, it was in substance and effect found that James third Duke died well infeft in the estates—for this is necessarily implied in the finding that they were taken out of his hæreditas jacens and vested in the Crown by the attainder of his brother and heir John Drummond. I should think this not the less res judicata because the pursuer admitted and contended for it, and was at pains to establish it. But it is unnecessary, in my view, to dwell on this—for, res judicata apart, the matter is clear, and must have the same effect now as formerly.

"With respect to the pursuer's services as heir-male general to the late Baron Perth and his father, I can discover no virtue in them, and the pursuer's counsel did not attempt to point out any. Neither of these persons had any right to the estates except under the Restoration Act, and cannot be held to have had any other right consistently with what has been decided between the pursuer and defenders, viz., that the fee-simple of the estates was vested in the Crown by the attainder of John Drummond in 1746. Again, it is matter of decision as between the parties that the purpose and effect of the Restoration Act was to give the estates in fee-simple, unaffected by the limitations of any entail. This, indeed, was one of the principal subjects of controversy and judgment in the former action. I am clearly of opinion that it is res judicata, and, if it were not, I could not hesitate to decide according to the former judgment as authoritative precedent. These services are, therefore, in my opinion, plainly worthless.

"The view on which the pursuer chiefly relies in order to distinguish the case from the last, so far as I can make it out, is to this effect—that by no founding on the charters of 1588 and 1679, and the Act of 6th September 1695 (8 Thomp. 259), which he formerly omitted to do, he can now maintain with more effect the argument that, for all the purposes of the law of forfeiture and attainder, the estates in question are to be regarded precisely as if the tailzie

At advising,— No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

LORD NEAVES.—In this case we have had the advantage of a very able argudestination had been prescribed by a deed made and registered under the Act of 1685.

"But the argument itself was maintained in the former case, and I cannot deny the effect of res judicata to the judgment following on it, because the pursuer might, by referring to certain deeds and a certain statute, have made it stronger. But indeed the pursuer need not, so far as I can judge, reproach himself or his advisers for any failure in this respect, for the entail derives no additional strength from the charters and Act in question. An entail by crown charter is of no more validity or power than any other entail in the same terms, and besides, the entail of 1687 was by crown charter. The charter of 1679 is exceptionally loose, and was very short-lived as an entail, for the most material and striking feature of it is that the fourth Earl (though a liferenter in form) is thereby empowered to deal with the estates at his pleasure as a fee-simple proprietor. In truth, he prescribed the terms of the charter, which proceeded on his procuratory as vassal and proprietor. This is the charter which was ratified by Parliament in 1681. With regard to this ratification, I have only to observe that it had and could have no other effect than to validate the deed, and place it beyond question by the Estates of Parliament as a deed dealing with Crown lands, or lands of which the Crown was superior. Such Acts were common at that period, but were never supposed to affect the construction or legal effect according to its terms of any deed so ratified, considered as a valid deed.

"The fourth Earl exercised the absolute freedom which he had under the charter of 1679 by making the entail of 1687, and this entail accordingly was (I think properly) referred to in the former action as the first or leading entail which governed the succession at the date of the forfeiture. It is not to be doubted that this matter was well considered in the former case, when it was determined (as it must have been) that the pursuer could take no advantage by founding on the prior charters, or on the Act of 1681. Indeed, when a man with unlimited power of disposal, which the fourth Earl unquestionably had, exercises his power by making an entail in the apt and common manner of executing a procuratory of resignation, and taking a charter from his superior in the terms he desires, it seems very clear that no additional virtue can be given to such entail by reference to prior charters. It is a complete new investiture, and must govern the succession until it is altered. If there were anything in the pursuer's argument regarding the effect of the Act of 1681, it would render very clear and certain the fourth Earl's power to make the entail of 1687, for his power by the charter of 1679 to sell, alienate, and dispose of the estates at pleasure, is thereby ratified by Parliament. But, in truth, his power is clear on the prior titles.

"The pursuer particularly founded on the clause in the charter of 1679, which immediately precedes the reddendo, whereby alienations without consent of the superior are prohibited under the penalty of forfeiture of the feu. This is a common though superfluous clause in charters from the Crown and other superiors of lands held ward, as those in question were. It is merely an expression of the casualty or forfeiture of 'recognition' which the law, while ward subsisted, implied and attached to every feu in wardholding, although not expressed. The clause plainly cannot affect the validity of an entail or the law of forfeiture for treason. That it is a clause of mere style, frequently though not invariably used, is clear enough in this case, from the fact that it follows a clause giving absolute power of disposal to the fourth Earl. I have already noticed and dwelt upon the circumstance that he exercised the power by making the entail of 1687, necessarily with the superior's consent, for it was made by procuratory of resignation followed by charter from the superior. In no view, therefore, can the clause in question, which only prohibits alienations without the superior's consent, avail the pursuer. It can hardly be maintained

No. 99. ment, and the whole matter is now before us with a fulness which leaves nothing to be desired. The case is one of great importance patrimonially, and it has re-that the casualty of recognition, or a clause in a crown charter prohibiting alienation of ward lands, without the consent of the Crown as superior, was pleadable against the Crown to the effect of preventing forfeiture by the vassal's treason.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

"Lastly, the pursuer relies, and founds a plea in law (the 4th) on the clause in the charter of 1687, which determines the right of an heir in possession on committing treason or other crime inferring forfeiture, and passes the estate to the next heir-male entitled to succeed after the contravener and the descendants of his body. The first remark, of course, is, that this argument, if there is anything in it, ought to have been stated in the former action, where it had exactly the same pertinency which it has here as an argument to support the proposition, which was urged before as distinctly as it is now, that John Drummond (or any other attainted heir) forfeited only for himself and his issue. The fact that it never occurred to anybody between 1747 and 1874, and escaped the vigilance of the pursuer's counsel in the former action, if indeed they did not deliberately reject it as not worth stating, is unfavourable, but not of course conclusive on the merits of this new argument, if it may still be brought forward. My opinion, however, is very clearly against it. The terms of a clause in a crown charter of resignation following on a procuratory executed by a proprietor having absolute power of disposal, cannot, in my opinion, control or affect the public law of treason, or limit the penalty attaching to that crime.

"The case, in the view which I take of it, derives any importance it has from the mere magnitude of the pursuer's claim, and none whatever from any difficulty or legal interest attending it. The only arguable points in the pursuer's favour were very fully discussed and deliberately decided against him in the former action. Those now brought forward as making a new case are all of them such as might have been brought forward in the former action, and no doubt would have been had they then been thought worthy of serious consideration. It is impossible to represent the present claim as a new one, or otherwise than as a restatement of the old one, with more or less of variety in the arguments, or mode of putting them, in support of it. Now, as formerly, the pursuer claims as the heir of the investiture subsisting in 1746 when John Drummond was attainted. Now, as formerly, his media concludendi, by whatever arguments or references supported, are, first, that the succession under that investiture was disturbed by the forfeiture of the traitor only with respect to the traitor himself and his issue, and, second, that at all events this succession was, by the Restoration Act, restored as a tailzied succession, and has never since been validly altered. These are the media which the former judgment disposes of in terms, and I should find it impossible, consistently with that judgment, to entertain an action claiming the same estates on the same media, even if I thought that they were now supported by stronger arguments, and a more enlarged or skilful reference to deeds or documents.

"A multiplication of services cannot avail the pursuer, for were he served heir-male in general to every member of the Drummond family that ever lived and died, he would be no nearer the estates, while it stands decided between him and the defenders that the fee-simple was vested in the Crown by the forfeiture of John Drummond in 1746, and that under the Restoration Act the fee-simple was by the Crown conferred on the late Baron Perth; and as this decision cannot be reversed or disregarded, it must for ever stand as an irremovable and insurmountable obstacle to a claim by the pursuer as heir of any investiture before the Restoration.

"I shall endeavour so to frame the interlocutor as to express distinctly what I hold to be res judicata, while I decide (what cannot of course be involved in the former judgment) that the pursuer has not in this case relevantly alleged any right or title to the estates entitling him to insist in the present action consistently with the judgment standing against him."

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

ceived from us all the attention in our power. The aspect which it has now assumed is, substantially, whether the plea of res judicata is available to the defenders.

By the law of Scotland—whether equitable or not I do not say, it is difficult to see how it could be otherwise—there is a distinction between the position of a pursuer and that of a defender. The pursuer who attacks a party in his rights has his option to raise his action in the first instance upon any ground he pleases out of several that may be competent to him, and if he fails in that he can resort to another and different ground, because as against a pursuer the plea of competent and omitted can never be maintained. A defender, on the other hand, is bound, for his own protection, to state all his defences, and if he omits anything, and judgment has gone against him, he has lost his opportunity: that judgment must take effect, although he may have had a relevant, competent, and well-founded plea, which he has not chosen or has omitted to state. Competent and omitted is not a plea that can be stated against a pursuer, because the judgment in favour of a defender is not an absolute affirmation of his rights, but is merely negative of the grounds put forward by the pursuer, and it cannot extend beyond those grounds. A pursuer may thus maintain his rights on different grounds, one after another, until he has exhausted the whole that he can adduce. But it is not a new argument that will entitle a pursuer to bring a second action when he has failed in his first, or a new authority in support of his argument. The privilege is given to a pursuer, when he has brought his action upon one category or head, to resort to any other head or category of law that is not identical with or involved in the other which has been disposed of. For instance, the fact that a reduction ex capite lecti has been brought unsuccessfully is of no avail against a reduction on the ground of force and fear, or want of due attestation.

The Lord Ordinary has proceeded mainly on the ground that the present action is entirely met by the plea of res judicata, although his interlocutor is framed so as to admit of some other views. If that were quite clear there would be an end to the case. I am not, however, satisfied that this action is founded precisely upon the same grounds as the former one. I think there is a difference in the grounds, of such materiality as to entitle the pursuer to be heard upon the new and different grounds. It is a totally different question whether the new ground is a well-founded one. But it is no reason for excluding, upon the plea of res judicata, a new ground, because it may be bad. It is to be disposed of not in respect of the former decision, but in respect of its own sufficiency or insufficiency.

The object of the pursuer in the former action was, if possible, to confine the forfeiture that followed on the family of Drummond to the person attainted, and with that view there were circumstances stated and pleas urged that deserved consideration. The same result is now sought to be arrived at, but to a material extent upon different media. This is illustrated by one point of the case which was urged, and to which I think it would be difficult to say that res judicata applies.

In the former action this was the state of the record,—(Cond. 3) "On 11th October 1687 James fourth Earl of Perth, who was at the time Chancellor of Scotland, executed a deed of strict entail, duly fenced by prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, whereby, under a reservation of his own liferent, he disponed his lands and estates of Perth, as therein particularly described, to and in favour of his eldest son, Lord James Drummond, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to his other heirs-male whatsoever, whom all failing, to his own heirs and assignees whomsoever." (Cond. 4) "Under this entail a regular feudal title was completed by a crown charter of resignation and novodamus of the said lands and estate in favour of the said James Lord Drummond, and the series of heirs mentioned in the said deed of entail, and subject to the fetters thereof, which crown charter is dated 17th November (in the record September) 1687, written to the Privy Seal and registered the 11th and sealed the 13th July 1688. Upon the said crown charter infeftment followed in favour of James Lord Drummond, the institute in the entail, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour dated the 12th and recorded the 17th September 1688." Now, this was an explicit statement that the limitation of heirs in these deeds rested upon the first deed mentioned, which is described as a deed of strict entail executed by the Chancellor of Scotland; and reference is made to the subsequent taking of the charter as a mere form, though an essential form, of feudalising the entail. Upon that view it was urged that the forfeiture which ultimately took place could not go beyond the rebel actually attainted, or at least beyond himself and his descendants. Reference was made to the Act 1690, cap. 33, as introducing a privilege in favour of heirs of entail, whereby forfeiture was not to go beyond the person that was attainted; but the answer made to that, and held to be conclusive, was that by the very words of the Act it was an essential condition that the entail, of which the benefit was thus to be given to heirs-substitute, should be recorded in the register of entails, in terms of the Act of 1685. And then, what this Court and the House of Lords did was this—they held that in order to get the benefit of that Act, the recording being necessary, it was the duty of the pursuer to set forth that the entail was recorded; and not having done so,—for a very good reason, because it was not recorded,—he could not claim the benefit of that Act. That was held to be a matter not requiring probation of the negative on the part of the defenders, but requiring averment and probation on the part of the pursuer, and there was neither.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

Now, I do not think that the present case is quite rested on the same ground, for there is a studious desire, legitimately put forward, to try the question on another ground, by overlooking, or, at least, not founding on the Chancellor's own deed of 11th October 1687 as the deed of entail. In the former action the Chancellor's deed was founded upon as the entail, and according to the statement there made it would require to have been recorded, because it was a deed made by a subject entailing his land, and so fell under the operation of the Act 1685. But in the 11th article of the present condescendence, although reference is made to the procuratory of resignation, the deed founded upon as constituting the destination of the lands is the charter that followed on that procuratory, dated 17th November 1687; and that is not treated as a mere feudalising of the entail by the Chancellor himself, but as a deed flowing from the Crown, and standing independent. It has been argued, and one of the pleas in law states distinctly and clearly, that this deed—a royal, or in part a royal and in part a Parliamentary, entail—does not fall under the Entail Act at all, but is a grant by the Crown requiring no registration, nor anything but the mere issuing of it, and which, by the voluntary and spontaneous limitation of the rights of the Sovereign in the event of forfeiture, excludes the Sovereign from availing himself at any subsequent period of any forfeiture beyond the interests of the heir of entail involved in the Rebellion and his descendants. The argument is this,—Apart from the subject entailing his lands, and merely getting the Crown to feudalise the right, here is the Sovereign himself giving out these lands in favour of heirs-male, and at the same time conferring upon the successive heirs-substitute the benefit that arises from a clause of forfeiture in the event of rebellion. The rebellion constitutes a forfeiture of the estate, but is to operate in favour of the next heir; and it is assumed that the Sovereign had the power so to qualify his rights, and having done so spontaneously, was precluded, upon the subsequent rebellion that took place, from taking away from the substitutes the right that had thus been conferred upon them by the terms of the charter.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

This is a plea that would be well worthy of consideration, if it were well-founded in point of conveyancing. It is quite intelligible that the Crown should be able to confer a right or dignity which the subject could not demand. In the case of a peerage, which is a precedence or rank created entirely by the Sovereign, I can conceive that a title so limited and destined might only be forfeited to the rebel, and go to the next heir in the destination,—though I am not so well versed in peerage law as to be able to dogmatise on the subject. Lands, however, are in our practice very seldom given out, in the first instance, by the Sovereign. Society is too far advanced for that often happening. When lands come to be once in the person of a subject, no entail, in my opinion, can be completed of these lands except with the consent or at the instigation of the subject who holds them in fee-simple. The Sovereign might arbitrarily refuse to confirm a progress of that kind, but no Sovereign of this country would do that. We have not here the case of lands given out for the first time, which might give rise to a nice question, whether it was or was not within the constitutional rights of one Sovereign to limit the rights of other Sovereigns, his successors, and in this way to protect an estate from ever coming to the Crown under forfeiture so long as there was an heir of investiture or entail to take it up. We have not that here, because, although the pursuer in the present action ignores the procuratory of resignation, which he held as the deed of entail in the former action, and now proceeds upon the crown charter of November 1687, he does not get there an original grant by the Crown, because the lands had been already given out. There was a grant of novodamus too, which is also a writ by progress. Under such a deed, I take it, that, if the previous proprietor either asks or obtains a charter of resignation, or any other deed that imposes fetters upon the lands, that deed must be held to be an entail by a subject and not by the Crown, the Crown consenting merely as superior, the dominium utile having already been separated from the dominium directum.

Thus, while I think that the plea of the procuratory being no deed of entail by the subject, and of the deed of entail having originated with the Crown, is a new plea, yet I do not think, when we come to examine the titles, that it is a well-founded plea, because I think the true view of the titles is that which was taken by the pursuer and his counsel in the former action—viz., that the entail was contained in the procuratory of resignation, and that what followed from the Crown was a mere feudalising of that entail. These titles enable us to see that now by changing his ground of action the pursuer gets rid of the plea of res judicata, but the new ground is not supported by correct notions of feudal right and conveyancing, and therefore cannot be sustained upon its own merits. That is the general view I take of the case in its present aspect. There are other points of diversity of pleadings in the two cases of the same kind, but this is the best illustration of the change of ground which I think there is. While there is a change of ground, it is a change that does the pursuer no good, because it is not stable in itself as a hypothesis for the rest of his argument, and because the true state of the case upon its merits was that which was libelled in the former action, and which has been adjudicated upon, and decided against him.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

The result is that I am under the necessity of holding that this action cannot be sustained, not entirely upon the ground of res judicata, but upon the ground that any medium concludendi now set forth which was not included in the other action is in itself inapplicable to the facts of the case as disclosed by what we have before us. We have in the former action and in this quite enough evidence before us to shew that the charter of resignation and novodamus was just the echo of the terms in which the subject resigned the lands into the Sovereign's hands. I do not see anything coming from the Sovereign that was not prayed for and accepted by the subject. It comes, therefore, to be an entail by a subject, no doubt ratified and confirmed feudally by the Sovereign, but still an entail by a subject, which comes under the Scotch Act of Parliament of 1685, and is therefore subject to the limitations that are contained in the Act, and which are kept up by the Act of 1690, whereby it is made a condition of the privilege of heirs of entail that the entail should be recorded. There is no room for arguing that this can be got rid of on any ground of common law.

I propose, therefore, that the form of our interlocutor should be, that in so far as this action sets out any media concludendi that are not identical with those formerly decided, they are irrelevant and insufficient to support the action, and that, in other respects, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD ORMIDALE.—As this case not only involves interests of great magnitude but also raises some questions of law of considerable importance, I think it right to state for myself the reasons which have chiefly influenced me in forming my judgment.

The Lord Ordinary has, by his interlocutor under review, in effect held that the pursuer is not entitled to insist in the present action, in respect that the grounds upon which he founds have either been already decided to be invalid and insufficient in the former action at his instance against the same defenders, and in reference to the same claims, or, in so far as it can be said that these grounds are new or different from those disposed of, adversely to him, in the former action, they are also invalid and insufficient to support his alleged right and title in the present.

It is essential, therefore, to discriminate between what was decided in the former action and must now be held to be res judicata, and what may be fairly considered to be new or different grounds, on which the pursuer founds as entitling him to sue and insist in the present action. This does not appear to me to be a matter of much difficulty. And, as the most convenient mode of making the discrimination, I propose to deal, in their order, with the grounds of action which I understand the pursuer now puts forward as new, and, having done so, all else in the case may be taken either as res judicata in the former suit, or of no materiality.

The nature and effect of res judicata has been so fully, and, to my mind, so satisfactorily explained by my learned brother who has just delivered his opinion, as to leave it unnecessary for me to enter on that subject. I shall proceed at once, therefore, to notice the various points relied on by the pursuer as new in the present action.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

The first point the pursuer endeavoured to make as not covered and precluded by the plea of res judicata had relation to the royal charter of 24th September 1679 referred to in article 9, and the Act of Ratification thereof, referred to in article 10 of his condescendence. It is quite true, as was urged by the pursuer, that the royal charter and Act of Ratification so referred to were not founded on by him in the former action, and therefore must be taken as new matter in the present. But although the royal charter and relative Act of Ratification are thus brought forward for the first time as a ground of action, it does not follow that they afford any material aid to the pursuer in the present, any more than they could have done in the former action, if they had been there founded on. I have had some difficulty, indeed, in understanding to what effect the charter of 1679 and relative Act of Ratification are now appealed to by the pursuer. That they are founded on by him in the present, and were not founded on in the former action, is true, and I am not sure that in reality any more can well be said about them. The Act of Ratification does not extend beyond the charter, or give it any further scope or effect than it had in itself. And although the charter emanates from the Sovereign, and bears to be in favour of James Earl of Perth, in liferent, whom failing to James Lord Drummond, his eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body to be lawfully begotten, in fee, whom failing to return to the said James Earl of Perth, and his heirs-male and assignees whomsoever, this destination is not fenced, as in an entail, by prohibitory, irritant, or resolutive clauses. On the contrary it is provided, as stated by the pursuer in the 9th article of his condescendence, that it should be in the power of the said James Earl of Perth, without the consent of his son, James Lord Drummond, to sell, alienate, and dispone the estates, or part thereof, irredeemably or under reversion, as he saw proper. Keeping this in view, and also that the said James Earl of Perth did soon thereafter, in virtue of the power he undoubtedly possessed, reconstitute, as set out in the 11th article of the pursuer's condescendence, the title to his estates, and create a new investiture of them, I fail to see how the charter of 1679 can now be of any avail to the pursuer.

But supposing that the charter of 1679 could be treated as an entail according to the law of Scotland prior to the passing of the Act of 1685, cap. 22, as seemed to be argued for the pursuer in the earlier part of the discussion, and supposing also that it had not been evacuated and put an end to by the new investiture which afterwards followed, it would still be exposed to the fatal objection of never having been recorded in the Register of Tailzies in conformity with the statute 1685, cap. 22. It was suggested, however, that that Act did not apply to an entail made prior to the Act; but unfortunately for the pursuer the contrary has long since been settled to be the law in the cases, among others, of Philp v. The Earl of Rothes, 14th December 1758, affirmed on appeal, Mor. 15,609, and Lord Kinnaird v. Hunter (where infeftment had followed upon the entail), 26th November 1771, also affirmed on appeal.

Nor do I see how the clause in the charter of 1679 to the effect of forbidding James Earl of Perth and his son from selling the estates in whole or in part to any person or persons without the consent of the King or his successors under the sanction of forfeiture affords the pursuer any assistance. That clause is, I think, very well described by the Lord Ordinary as in reality merely an expression of the casualty of recognition applicable to wardholdings while they existed, but it cannot affect either the validity of an entail or the law of forfeiture for treason. No question of any such forfeiture has been raised in this case; and I do not understand how it could possibly be raised in the face of the new investiture, to be afterwards noticed, consented to and approved of by the Sovereign.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

I must, for these reasons, own my inability to understand how the charter of 1679 and relative Act of Ratification made such a settlement of the estates in question as to be of the slightest effect in the present controversy. I was not, therefore, surprised to find that the charter of 1679 came ultimately in the discussion to be, as I thought, in a great measure, if not wholly, laid aside, to make room for the argument rested on the charter of 1687. And this leads me to a consideration of the second, and, as it appears to me, the chief of what the pursuer represented as his new grounds of action.

The charter of 17th November 1687 is one of resignation and novodamus, proceeding upon a procuratory of resignation in favorem, by James fourth Earl of Perth, of 11th October preceding, containing the requisite clauses of a strict entail. Both the charter and the procuratory are referred to and founded on by the pursuer in the 11th article of his condescendence in the present action, and they were also referred to and founded on by him in the former action. So far, therefore, they do not introduce any new feature into the discussion. But although this is so, it was argued for the pursuer that, as these instruments are founded on in the present action to a different effect and for a different purpose now than formerly, the judgment in the former suit cannot, so far as they are concerned, be res judicata in regard to them in the present. Although I think the soundness of this view might well be questioned, I am willing to take it that the pleas now advanced by the pursuer as founded on the charter of 1687 are not covered or precluded by the judgment in the former suit, and to deal with them on this footing.

In the former suit the pursuer referred to and founded on the procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687 as the deed by which James, the fourth Earl of Perth, entailed the estates in question, and under which they were subsequently held when forfeited after the Rebellion of 1745. In the present suit, however, the pursuer, very inconsistently as it appears to me, refers to and founds, not on the procuratory, but on the charter of resignation and novodamus which followed on it, as the true deed of entail, and in this way he seeks to escape from the effect of the plea of res judicata. But supposing that the plea of res judicata is not to be held to apply, the question remains whether the pursuer has so improved his position by founding on the charter, and not the procuratory of 1687, as the deed of entail, as to be entitled to sue and maintain the present, although not the former action. There are various reasons which satisfy me that this question must be answered in the negative.

(1) The procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687, a deed which was executed by James, the fourth Earl of Perth, himself, must, I think, be held to be in reality the deed of entail, and not the charter of 17th November 1687, which followed upon it, for the purpose of feudalising the title. It was so represented by all parties—the pursuer as well as the defenders—in the former action, and the judgment of this Court, affirmed as it was by the House of Lords, proceeded on that footing. Nor can there be any doubt that it is quite a usual and competent mode of entailing estates to do so by procuratory of resignation.

(2) But supposing the charter of 1687, and not the procuratory, were held to

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth
v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

be the entail, it would be exposed to the same objection which was fatal to the procuratory in the former action, viz., that it has never been recorded in the Register of Tailzies, in terms of the statute 1685, cap. 22. That this is a fatal barrier to the pursuer prevailing, whether the procuratory of 11th October or the consequent charter of 17th November is to be taken as the deed of entail, I apprehend to be free from doubt. It was so decided in the former action in reference to the procuratory, which both parties there represented to be the entail, and although it may be open to the pursuer to maintain that the point is not res judicata in reference to the charter which he now says is the deed of entail, the principle of decision must be equally applicable, unless, indeed, the pursuer be right in maintaining, as I understood him to do, that an entail constituted by charter granted by the Sovereign does not require to be recorded in the Register of Tailzies. The pursuer argued that the leading words of the statute 1685, cap. 22, to the effect "that it shall be lawful to his Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates," shew that it is only deeds executed by subjects which require to be recorded in the Register of Tailzies. But I cannot concur in this construction of the statute, and no authority was cited in support of it. I think it unsound, for two reasons,—1st, The words of the statute merely make it lawful to his Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates, but it nowhere prescribes that this can be done only by a deed which has been executed, that is subscribed, by a subject, and not by a deed, such as a charter, emanating from the Crown. The provision in the statute as to the recording of entails is quite general, to the effect of requiring "the original entail to be produced before the Lords of Session judicially, who are hereby ordained to interpone their authority thereto, and that a record be made in a particular register book to be kept for that effect, wherein shall be recorded the names of the maker of the entail and of the heirs of entail, and the general designations of the lordships and baronies, and the provisions and conditions contained in the tailzie, with the foresaid irritant and resolutive clauses subjoined thereto, to remain in the said register ad perpetuam rei memoriam." It appears to me that this clause of the statute, while it very plainly denotes that in the present case it was the procuratory as the "original entail," and not the charter which followed on it, which required to be entered in the register, does not either expressly or impliedly exempt a royal charter, if it is to be taken as an entail, from the necessity of being recorded in the Register of Tailzies. Besides, the entail in this case, although held as embodied in a charter emanating from the Crown, must, I think, be treated as an entail made not by the Sovereign but by a subject, for it was undoubtedly applied for and accepted by James, the fourth Earl of Perth, as his writ and to serve his purposes. The procuratory on which it proceeded was executed by the Earl, and it was a procuratory of resignation in favorem and not one ad remanentiam. It was the warrant of the charter, and contained the names of the maker of the entail and of the heirs of tailzie, the description of the lordships and baronies desired to be entailed, as also the provisions and conditions of the entail. Neither could the charter of resignation have been granted without being preceded by the procuratory as its warrant. In these circumstances, and supposing the charter is to be dealt with as the entail, I think it must be held to be in truth and substance an entail made by a subject, viz., James, the fourth Earl of Perth. In every view, therefore, that can be taken of this matter, the non-recording of the charter in the Register of Tailzies constitutes, in my opinion, a fatal barrier to the pursuer's title to insist in the present, as it did to his title

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

to insist in the former action, where the procuratory, and not the charter, was put forward and founded on by him as the entail.

(3) If, then, the non-recording of the charter of 1687 is fatal to it, viewed as the deed of entail, it may be unnecessary to notice the argument of the pursuer on the clause which it contains, to the effect, as I understood, that the right of the heir in possession should determine and cease on committing treason or any other crime by which the estates might be forfeited, and should pass in that case to the next heir-male who is entitled to succeed after the contravener and the descendants of his body. The pursuer argued that, in accordance with this clause, the forfeiture in 1746 must be limited to the contravener as the heir in possession at the time, and that the right to the estates now belongs to him in virtue of his services condescended on. It appears to me that this reasoning is plainly untenable, and may be satisfactorily met with more than one answer. The charter, while it contains all the necessary prohibitions and irritant and resolutive clauses as against the heirs of entail, following the institute Lord Drummond, expressly leaves him quite unfettered to dispone and contract debt as he saw proper. Accordingly, availing himself of this liberty, he in 1713 executed a disposition of the estates in favour of his son James, reserving his own liferent, and in the disposition so executed by him, which has been produced, and is referred to in article 7 of the condescendence, all the restrictions and fetters contained in the charter of 1687, including the clause as to forfeiture for treason, were entirely omitted. So again, in 1731, James, the third Duke of Perth, who was then in right and possession of the estates, expede a crown charter of resignation and novodamus, which has been also produced, and is referred to in article 10 of the condescendence, in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, his other heirs and assignees whomsoever. In this charter, on which infeftment duly followed, just as in the disposition of 1713, all the restrictive and fettering clauses, including the clause as to forfeiture for treason, were omitted.

Such was the state of the titles when the estates were forfeited to the Crown after the Rebellion of 1745, and I think it clear that they were then held in fee-simple. And if so, not only the forfeiture of the estates must have been complete, but also the vesting of them in and restoration of them by the Crown, in virtue of the statutes to that effect, must be held to be free from any well founded objection.

Besides his pleas which have now been adverted to, founded on the crown charters of 1679 and 1687, the pursuer also seemed to think that the various services on which he has for the first time condescended in the present action afford him some aid which he had not the benefit of in the former. I cannot think so. It is, indeed, too plain to require argument or illustration that if the fee-simple of the estates came to be vested in the Crown by the forfeiture of John Drummond in 1746, as I think they did, none of the services to which the pursuer refers can be of the slightest use to him, for the obvious reason that all claim by him as heir of any and every investiture existing prior to the forfeiture has been entirely and for ever cut off. If I am right in this it also follows that any plea the pursuer could raise,—and supposing it to be a new one,—on the saving clause of the Restoration Act, as referred to by him in the 34th article of his condescendence, would be clearly of no avail to him.

Having now adverted to all the pursuer's pleas or grounds of action which, as I understood the argument, were advanced for him as new or different from his

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

pleas or grounds of action in the former suit, it is unnecessary to do more than repeat what I stated at the outset, that all else must be taken either as res judicata or of no materiality. But it may be well, at the same time, to keep in view that it is not indispensable for the defenders, in resisting as they are doing the call upon them to satisfy the production in this case, to establish that the pursuer's pleas or grounds of action are res judicata, or that they have a title to exclude. By the Court of Session Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36, sec. 7) it is provided "that where in a reduction the defender is to object to the title of the pursuer, or to plead an exclusive title, or to state any other objection against satisfying the production, he shall, in the first instance, lodge defences confined to these points." It is a perfectly good preliminary defence, therefore, that the grounds and pleas upon which the pursuer relies are res judicata, or, in so far as they are not so, that they are in themselves irrelevant and insufficient to support the alleged right and title. In my opinion they are partly res judicata, and, in so far as not so, they are irrelevant and insufficient. By the judgment of this Court in the former action, which was affirmed in the House of Lords without alteration or variance, it was expressly found that "the lands and estates claimed by the pursuer, and all rights connected therewith, were taken out of the hæreditas jacens of James Drummond (designed third Duke of Perth), to whom the pursuer has served heir, by means of the attainder of John Drummond, apparent heir of the said James Drummond, and that the same became vested in the Crown." And by that judgment it was also found that "the said estates formed the subject of enactments under the statutes 20 Geo. II. cap. 41, 25 Geo. II. cap. 41, and 24 Geo. III. cap. 57, set forth in the summons, but that these statutes confer no right on the pursuer in reference to these lands and estates." That judgment in the previous action must, I think, be held to interpose a formidable barrier to the success of the pursuer in the present action, a barrier which anything of the nature of new matter advanced by him is, for the reasons already stated, quite insufficient to overcome.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against is substantially well founded, and that it ought to be adhered to, with such addition or variance as may be thought right in the adjustment of the terms of the interlocutor which will now fall to be pronounced.

LORD GIFFORD.—After the fullest and most anxious consideration which I have been able to give I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, that the action must be dismissed, although the grounds on which I have reached that conclusion are in some respects not identical with those on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded.

The pursuer, the Earl of Perth, and who is beyond all question in the full possession and enjoyment of all the ancient dignities of the earldom of Perth, has brought this action for the purpose of vindicating his right to and recovering the whole lands and estates of the earldom of Perth, and of the regality of Drummond, situated in the counties of Perth and Forfar, and now in the possession of the defenders, as trustees of the now deceased Right Honourable Clementina Sarah Drummond Lady Willoughby de Eresby.

The first conclusion of the action is a conclusion for declarator that the pursuer, under certain writs, charters, and Acts of Parliament, is now entitled to the said whole estates as the nearest heir-male of tailzie and provision thereto now living, that he is in a position to make up titles thereto, and that the defenders are bound to give up to the pursuer possession and enjoyment of the whole estates. But in order to reach this conclusion, and as a preliminary thereto, it is necessary for the pursuer to cut down, reduce, and set aside a variety of titles made up in favour of the defenders and their predecessors and authors, in virtue of which titles the estates are at present held and possessed by the defenders. The titles of the defenders must be reduced and set aside before the right of the pursuer can be admitted and declared.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

To effect this purpose,—that is, to set aside the existing titles in favour of the defenders,—the summons contains appropriate reductive conclusions, which, although not placed first in order in the summons, yet fall first to be considered, for unless the defenders' titles be cleared away they will exclude for ever the pursuer's alleged right to the lands and estates.

The form of an action of reduction is this,—that the pursuer calls upon the defenders to exhibit and produce the writs, charters, and titles which the pursuer seeks to set aside in order that these challenged titles may be examined by the Court, and in order that upon their production, or if the defenders fail to produce them, they may be cut down, set aside, and declared null and void. In the present case the writs called for, in the first place, commence with a retour in favour of the late Honourable Clementina Sarah Drummond (Lady Willoughby de Eresby) as heir of James Drummond, Baron Perth, her father, dated 19th October 1807, and they end with a notarial instrument in favour of her trustees, dated 3d March 1865. Under these deeds the defenders, Lady Willoughby de Eresby's trustees, stand at present vested in the whole estates. There is also a farther reductive conclusion seeking to set aside, "if necessary," a great variety of writs, charters, sasines, and decrees, beginning with a decree of the Lords of Council and Session, dated 8th March 1785, and ending with the titles in favour of the defenders. It is upon these reductive conclusions that the parties have joined issue and made up the present record upon what is called the preliminary question, whether the defenders are or are not bound to produce the writs called for, or as it is said technically, "to satisfy the production." The defenders maintain that they cannot be called upon to satisfy the production, that is, to produce the writs which the pursuer seeks to set aside, and they demand that the action shall be at once dismissed without entering farther upon its merits.

In actions of reduction objections to satisfy the production and to produce the writs called for generally resolve themselves into two, first, that the pursuer has no title to sue,—that is, that he has no right and no interest to cut down the deeds called for; or second, that the defenders have a sufficient title to exclude the pursuer,—that is, that the defenders possess upon separate grounds or titles not sought to be reduced, and which are sufficient to exclude the pursuer, even supposing all the writs called for to be set aside. In the present case although the defenders state ten separate pleas in law they all resolve into one or other of the above grounds of defence, either that the pursuer has no title to sue, or that the defenders have sufficient separate titles to exclude him. The defenders maintain, in addition, that it is res judicata, that the defenders are not bound to produce the writs called for, this having been decided both in this Court and in the House of Lords in a previous action at the pursuer's instance against the defenders.

The question as to the title of the pursuer to insist in the reduction, and the other question of the sufficiency of the defenders' unchallenged title to exclude

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

the pursuer, are very much mixed up in the present case, and it is difficult to consider these questions apart. In the former action also between the same parties, both as decided in this Court and in the House of Lords, the two questions, that is the two objections to satisfying the production, were considered together, and I do not think it would serve any good purpose to attempt in the present case sharply to distinguish between them. The question may be taken quite generally, is the pursuer, either by reason of his own position, or by reason of the unchallenged and undisputed rights and titles of the defenders, entitled to call for exhibition and production of the deeds he now seeks to reduce? If the pursuer is entitled to such production the deeds must be laid upon the table of the Court, which will then proceed to consider the question of their validity. If the pursuer is not entitled to production of the writs complained of then the action will be dismissed, and the effect of dismissal will be, not to affirm the validity of the writs challenged, for they have not been seen nor considered at all, but merely to affirm that the pursuer has no right or interest to challenge them. This form of process in actions of reduction may appear a little cumbrous and circuitous, and it very often is so, but it is a completely established form, and can only be altered by an Act of the Legislature. In the present case the true merits of the question between the parties are sufficiently raised on this preliminary record without production of the writings called for. I think there are sufficient materials in process and in the admissions on record to enable the Court, without seeing any of the writs called for (none of which of course have been produced), to decide whether the pursuer has any right to challenge the defenders' titles, or whether he is not barred from attempting to set aside any or all of these titles.

In the whole circumstances and on an examination of the ancient writs and titles founded on, and of the public statutes 20 Geo. II. cap. 41, 25 Geo. II. cap. 41, and 24 Geo. III. cap. 57, I am of opinion that the pursuer is in law entirely barred from challenging or attempting to set aside any of the deeds for which he calls, and therefore that the present action should be dismissed in the same way as the pursuer's former action was dismissed by the judgments of 22d January 1869 and 19th June 1871.

The question of res judicata falls naturally first to be considered, for if the points now in dispute have been already determined by the judgments of this Court and of the House of Lords these judgments are binding, and there is no necessity and no room for going farther or for entering upon the merits at all. I do not think, however, that it is possible or safe to rest the decision of the present case solely or exclusively upon the judgments pronounced in the former case in 1869 and 1871. To support the plea of res judicata three separate elements must concur. First, the parties to the two litigations must be the same or substantially the same; the parties to the second action, if not the same as those to the first, must be bound as their representatives or otherwise. If the new parties do not represent the former litigants there will be no res judicata, and the first judgment will be merely an authority, which may be more or less binding on the Court, but which will not be binding upon the parties. The second requisite to support a plea of res judicata is, that the subject-matter of the two litigations must be the same. A dispute about one subject or estate will not found the plea of res judicata in a question as to another or a different estate. Now, these two first requisites concur in the case before us,—the parties are the same, the Earl of Perth on the one hand, and Lady Willoughby De Eresby's trustees on the other hand,—and the subject-matter of the two actions is the same, the estates of the earldom of Perth.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

But the third requisite necessary to support a plea of res judicata is, that the question decided, the real point or points in controversy between the parties, shall be the same, for if a pursuer brings an action or claim upon one ground and is defeated, this will not prevent him from making the same claim upon a new, separate, and different ground. The rule is sometimes expressed by saying that the media concludendi in the two actions must be the same,—that is, if the pursuer brings forward new grounds of action he will not be barred or stopped by a decision against him, pronounced in an action laid upon other and different grounds.

In the present case, I think the pursuer has succeeded in shewing that his present action is to some extent and in several particulars of more or less importance, founded upon grounds different from those maintained and decided upon in the former action. New questions are raised, and new pleas are maintained, which, so far as appears, were not urged by the pursuer, and were not decided upon by the Judges in the former case, either in this Court or in the House of Lords. In short, it appears to me that in several respects the questions now raised by the pursuer are new questions, which were not raised and were not adjudicated upon in the former action, and to this extent I am of opinion that the present action is not excluded by the plea of res judicata. It may be true that some of the points now relied upon by the pursuer might have been raised and urged under his former action, but I think this is not enough to create against the pursuer the technical plea of res judicata. The pleas were not, in point of fact, stated or argued. They were competent, but omitted, and although "competent and omitted" will bar a defender in general from reducing a decree against him, and stating a new defence, it will not bar a pursuer from bringing a new action upon a new and different ground.

While, however, I cannot sustain the plea of res judicata to the effect of at once and wholly dismissing the present action, still I think that the plea is well founded in so far as in the present action the pursuer repeats and states over again pleas which were actually urged and disposed of in the former litigation, and this even although the pursuer may allege that he is prepared to support these old pleas by a better or a different argument than that stated for him in the former litigation.

Applying these principles, I think the Court is not entitled at once to dismiss the present action on the ground of res judicata, but that while bound by the former decision, in reference to all questions really decided, it must take up and consider upon their merits all new questions and all new pleas which were not stated and not decided upon in 1869 and 1871.

In the following observations I shall confine myself to the pleas relied upon by the pursuer in so far as they are different from those disposed of in the former action. In other respects, that is, in so far as the pursuer's pleas are merely repeated or are substantially the same as formerly, the plea of res judicata is conclusive against the pursuer. Of course I need not say that in both actions it is the preliminary defences alone which are in question, for in neither action has the production been satisfied or the challenged writs produced to the Court. Accordingly, as none of the writs called for and sought to be set aside have been exhibited by the defenders, the present judgment must proceed upon the assumption that all these writs are invalid. In considering a preliminary defence in an action of reduction this is the condition of the argument, and the defenders must shew, independently of any of the writs challenged, either that the pursuer has no title to make the challenge, or that he is excluded by other and unchallenged deeds. My opinion, therefore, is founded, and necessarily so, upon deeds and writings about which there is no dispute. I lay entirely out of view the whole writings which the pursuer seeks to reduce, which are in all twenty-eight in number. All these I assume to be bad and invalid.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

Shortly stated, and in its essence, the pursuer's case is this, that the Perth estates are now, and have been, at least since 1679, held under conditions of strict entail—that the entail, which is constituted by a variety of writs and charters, is still in force, and cannot be defeated by the acts of any of the individual successive heirs of entail—that all acts in contravention of the entail are void and null, and that the pursuer is now the nearest and lawful heir of entail entitled as such to succeed to the estates and to vindicate them against all others whomsoever. This is the pursuer's whole case, and I purposely state it in the most general terms possible.

If the estate is not entailed, or not validly entailed, or if any of the essential requisites to a valid and strict entail are awanting, then the acts of alienation, or of forfeiture of successive heirs in possession will be effectual, and the pursuer's right will be excluded. For example, if the late Baron Perth, the first and last Baron Perth, the father of the late Lady Willoughby de Eresby, was not heir of entail under a strict entail, but if he was fee-simple proprietor and entitled to convey the estates as such at pleasure, then he could and did defeat the mere spes successionis of remoter heirs-male. If the tailzie was at an end, then Baron Perth's heir was his only daughter, the late Lady Willoughby de Eresby. The pursuer is not Baron Perth's heir in general, and so has no right to reduce or set aside Lady Willoughby de Eresby's title to the estates, or to call for and set aside Baron Perth's trust-deed and settlement, and relative deed of instructions. In short, if the pursuer is not heir of entail under the unchallenged investitures, there is an end of his case, and he cannot challenge the alienations which have been made either by Baron Perth or by previous heirs who successively possessed and enjoyed the lands.

The real question, therefore, is, were the lands held under the fetters of a strict and valid entail, indefeasible by the successive heirs of tailzie and provision; and the important and the final point of time at which this question is to be decided is at the death of Baron Perth on 2d July 1800. Admittedly Baron Perth was the heir entitled to possess and enjoy the lands, and the pursuer does not maintain that Baron Perth was a wrongous possessor, but merely that he possessed under a strict entail and was not entitled to defeat the order of succession. It is important to observe that the pursuer does not call for and does not challenge any of the writs or titles of the lands prior to those made up in the person of the late Baron Perth.

In the aspect of the case which I am now taking, therefore, the whole question is, was the late Baron Perth at the time of his death in 1800 fee-simple proprietor of the estates, or was he merely heir in possession under a strict and indefeasible entail, and this question in its turn depends upon the nature and effect of the deeds on which the pursuer founds as constituting a strict and valid entail.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

What, then, are the deeds upon which the pursuer relies as constituting as at Baron Perth's death in 1800 a strict and indefeasible entail?

In the pursuer's first action the deed chiefly relied upon as constituting the entail was the procuratory of resignation or deed of entail by James fourth Earl of Perth and Chancellor of Scotland, dated 11th October 1687, upon which deed a title was completed by charter of novodamus from the Crown, and instrument of sasine following thereon, but it was finally decided in the House of Lords, among many other points, that this deed of entail, never having been recorded, was ineffectual, and did not prevent the estate from being forfeited absolutely, that is, the fee of the estate from passing to the Crown upon the attainder of the heir of entail in possession at the time, even although such heir had not made up his title to the lands. This judgment, of course, is final and binding upon the pursuer as res judicata, and I understood that this is not disputed by the pursuer. The pursuer can no longer found upon the deed of entail of 11th October 1687.

But the pursuer now betakes himself to various other deeds upon which he relies as separately or jointly constituting a strict entail, under which the pursuer claims to be heir of tailzie. The earliest deed now relied upon is the crown charter in favour of James fourth Earl of Perth, Chancellor of Scotland, dated 24th September 1679, and an ingenious plea was urged that this deed constituted a strict entail, and, being dated prior to the entail statute of 1685, it is said that it did not require to be recorded in the Register of Tailzies. I am of opinion that this plea in both its branches is ill-founded. First, the charter of 24th September 1679 is in no sense a deed of strict entail. It contains, no doubt, a destination, but it does not contain any of the prohibitions or any of the clauses, irritant and resolutive, which are essential to constitute an entail, whether dated before or after the Act 1685. The only clause which gives the deed the least semblance of an entail is the prohibition against alienation without the consent of the Crown. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this is a mere expression in somewhat broader terms than would be inferred at common law of the casualty of recognition which obtained in all wardholdings, and was not in the least intended to secure a tailzied order of succession. Besides, it is merely a clause for the benefit of the Crown, and which would have no effect if the Crown consented to the alienation. If such consent was given the clause could not have been pleaded upon by any of the substitute heirs, and the clause could not be pleaded against the Crown as defeating an alienation or a forfeiture in favour of the Crown itself. Second, even if the charter of 1679 were a strict entail, which it is not, it would still require to be registered, for the Act of 1685 applies both by its reason and by its words to entails executed before as well as after its date.

It is also to be observed that this charter of 1679 does not direct its prohibition against the Chancellor of Scotland, the first grantee therein. On the contrary, it expressly gives the Chancellor the fullest power to sell and alienate the estates at pleasure, without the consent of any of the heirs of the destination, and this power the Chancellor exercised by the deed of entail and procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687, already referred to, and which formed the chief subject of discussion in the pursuer's first action. It is vain to go back to the title of 1679, for it was entirely displaced and superseded by the title of 1687.

The pursuer next resorts to the charter of novodamus dated 17th November

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

1687, being the charter which followed upon and in virtue of the deed of entail and procuratory of resignation of 11th October 1687. The pursuer's argument here is that the crown charter of novodamus is itself a crown entail, requiring no recording, and standing by virtue of the Crown's authority alone, independent altogether of the Act of 1685, or, stated more generally, that wherever the Crown grants a charter of novodamus embodying a tailzied destination with the usual clauses of a strict entail, such clauses being inserted at the request of the owner, and in terms of a procuratory of resignation, then such crown charter, the pursuer pleads, forms per se a deed of strict entail, and does not require to be recorded. The provisions of the Act 1685, it is said, do not apply to such a charter.

It humbly appears to me that there is no foundation whatever for this contention. The charter of resignation and novodamus is a mere charter by progress. Its sole warrant is the procuratory of resignation which prescribes its terms. The Crown, like any other superior, will insert in a charter by progress any conditions which the owner pleases, not affecting the superior's rights. An entail is never the act of the superior, but the act of the vassal or proprietor, who alone has right, if he chooses, to entail the lands in accordance with law. The clause of novodamus does not in the least alter the nature of the deed, but is merely inserted to meet the case of lost title-deeds or of doubts as to the validity of the title, and to form the foundation for a new and prescriptive right. I have never heard it suggested till now that a superior, whether a subject superior or the Crown, can create an entail by conditions in a charter independently of the Act 1685. On this point also I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary, that no crown charter, proceeding upon a procuratory of resignation, and whether containing a clause of novodamus or not, can ever create an entail, or affect in any way the Crown's rights, or alter the general law of treason.

It is proper to notice here, that on 28th August 1713 James Lord Drummond, the Chancellor's son, and the institute under the procuratory of 11th October 1687, and under the charter of novodamus of 17th November 1687, conveyed the estates in favour of his son James Master of Drummond, then an infant, and on this deed the Master of Drummond was duly infeft. Now, by the procuratory of resignation, as well as by the charter of novodamus, James Lord Drummond had full power to alienate or dispone the estates in fee-simple, and free from all the fetters of an entail, and the deed of 1713 contains none of the prohibitions or fetters necessary in an entail. It contains a simple destination, but it made the infant Master of Drummond absolute proprietor of the estates. It created, in short, a new investiture.

The object of this deed of 1713 was, of course, to save the forfeiture of the estates in case the granter James Lord Drummond should be attainted,—an event no doubt regarded as possible or probable. The expected attainder actually took place in 1715, but the device to save the estates was effectual, for although the estates were seized by Exchequer upon the attainder of Lord Drummond they were thereupon claimed by the infant Master of Drummond, and his claim was ultimately in 1718 sustained, and so the forfeiture of the estates was prevented, but it was only prevented by the absolute deed of alienation of 1713, which was upheld as a valid and effectual title fully vesting the estates in the Master of Drummond. It was held that James Lord Drummond, the granter of the deed of 1713, was absolute proprietor of the lands, and that he had effectually and completely divested himself before his treason and attainder.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

Here, again, I think it is conclusive that there was a new investiture created by the deed and sasine of 1713, and I am of opinion that this deed of 1713 was not and cannot be read as a deed of entail, or as a deed propelling an entailed succession. It contains none of the necessary clauses and never has been recorded as an entail, but it supersedes the former investitures and really puts an end to the pursuer's pleas. This deed of 1713 has been produced by the defenders.

The Master of Drummond, who thus got the estates unaffected by his father's attainder, afterwards assumed the title of third Duke of Perth, and completed a separate and independent title to the estates by service to his grandfather, the Chancellor, and by crown charter of confirmation and resignation dated 12th February 1731, upon which infeftment duly followed. Now, it appears to me that this also was a fee-simple title, not constituting in any sense a strict entail and imposing no prohibition or restriction against alienation, but leaving James, styled third Duke of Perth, the absolute and unfettered proprietor of the lands, having full power to alienate and dispose thereof at pleasure. So stood the title when the Rebellion of 1745 occurred. James third Duke of Perth then stood absolute and fee-simple proprietor, unfettered and unrestricted, although there was a simple destination in favour of heirs-male.

This James third Duke of Perth and his brother John both took part in the Rebellion of 1745, but both escaped in the French frigate "Mars" in 1746. They were both included in the Act of Attainder which followed the Rebellion of 1745, which, however, contained a proviso and condition that they might surrender before 12th July 1746, and if they did so the attainder should not take effect. James third Duke of Perth died at sea on 11th May 1746, but as this was before the day of surrender he was held not to be attainted. He died without issue, his heir-apparent being his brother John, and the attainder took effect upon John, who called himself fourth Duke of Perth. He became attainted on 12th July 1746, when the time for surrender expired.

On John's attainder the question arose, Had the fee of the Perth estates become forfeited to the Crown, they being held by John, the traitor, in apparency? The estates were seized by Exchequer, and the question as to their forfeiture was tried apparently twice over, first, whether they were forfeited by the treason of James third Duke, who stood infeft, and this was negatived; and then again, whether they were forfeited by the attainder of John, styled fourth Duke, who held them only in apparency.

This last question was ultimately decided in favour of the Crown, first, by the Court of Session on 1st December 1750, and then by a judgment of the House of Lords on 30th April 1751. The final judgment was that the whole estates had fallen to the Crown on the attainder of John, styled fourth Duke of Perth, although he was merely heir-apparent and had never made up any title thereto. This judgment is not challenged by the present pursuer.

Here, again, it humbly appears to me there is a fatal bar in the way of the pursuer's present claim, for if the pursuer is right in his present contention the estates must have been held under strict entail in 1745, and the attainder of John, styled fourth Duke of Perth, could only have forfeited his life interest therein. But the decision was otherwise, and although possibly the pursuer's present pleas may not have been urged in 1746, it is difficult to see how a final judgment pronounced a century and a quarter ago, and acted upon ever since, can now be got rid of.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

But this is not all. The attainders consequent upon the Rebellion of 1745 were followed by the Act 20 Geo. II. cap. 41, commonly called the Vesting Act. This statute vested the whole lands and estates of all the attainted persons in his Majesty, "without any office or inquisition thereof," "and without any declarator or forfeiture to be obtained." Power was given to the Barons of Exchequer to inquire into the estates, and to levy the rents thereof for behoof of his Majesty, and lists of the attainted persons were to be transmitted to the King's Remembrancer. This was followed in 1752 by the Act 25 Geo. II. cap. 41, commonly called the Annexing Act, which annexed certain forfeited estates to the Crown, and among other estates specially enumerated are "the lands and other premises which became forfeited to his Majesty by the attainder of" . . "John Drummond, taking upon himself the style or title of Lord John Drummond, brother to James Drummond, taking on himself the title of Duke of Perth." The whole of the lands were annexed inalienably to the Crown, provision was made for creditors, and royal commissioners were appointed for the management of the estates for behoof of the Crown. This appears to be a statutory recognition of the absolute forfeiture of the Perth estates, and accordingly these estates were possessed by the royal commissioners down to 1785. I cannot see how it is possible for the pursuer now to go back and challenge any of these proceedings, or the statutes and warrants on which they were founded.

In 1784, however, the Restoration Act passed, 24 Geo. III. cap. 57. It is entitled, "Act to enable his Majesty to grant to the heirs of the former proprietors upon certain terms and conditions the forfeited estates in Scotland which were put under the management of a Board of Trustees by an Act passed in the 25th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Second." The provisions of this statute are exceedingly important, and it deals expressly with the Perth estates. Clause 10 of the statute provides,—"And whereas the estate of Perth, which became forfeited by the attainder of John Drummond, taking upon himself the style or title of Lord John Drummond, brother to James Drummond, taking on himself the style or title of Duke of Perth, stood devised before the forfeiture to heirs-male: And whereas the said John Drummond died without leaving issue lawful of his body, and it is not yet ascertained who is his nearest collateral heir-male, be it enacted by the authority aforesaid that it shall and may be lawful to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, to give, grant, and dispone to the heirs-male * of the said John Drummond who would have been entitled to succeed by the investitures of the said estate had it not been forfeited, and to the heirs and assigns of such heir-male, all and every the lands," &c. (being the whole estates of Perth) "which became forfeited as aforesaid," subject to a charge of £52,547, 1s. $6\frac{3}{4}$d. to be paid into Exchequer.

Of course the pursuer does not and cannot challenge this statute, and I think it is impossible to read it without seeing that it recognises and proceeds upon the fact that the fee of the whole estates had been absolutely forfeited to, vested in, and annexed to the Crown. The contention that the estates had been held under strict entail is thus negatived, for in that case nothing but the liferent of the traitor would have been forfeited, and that of the heirs of his body, leaving remoter heirs unaffected. The statute also gives to the Crown power to dispone the estates, that is, the fee of the estates, "to the heirs-male of the said

* The defenders averred that in the rolls of Parliament this word stands in the singular, "heir-male."

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

John Drummond," and to the "heirs and assigns of such heir-male." This clearly implies, or rather enacts, that the estates shall be restored, not under the form of a strict entail, but under the form of a simple destination, which will leave the grantee at liberty to dispose of them at pleasure. A direction to give to the heirs-male and "to the heirs and assigns of such heir-male," plainly means a fee-simple, and not a strictly tailzied destination. I am aware of the dispute as to the alleged erasures on the parchment roll of this Act of Parliament, but I do not think anything turns upon these erasures, for I think it plain that the first grantee under the statute would be entitled to receive the grant, with a destination to his heirs and assigns, or, at all events,—and this would be enough for the present question,—would be entitled to the grant free of prohibitions and fetters, and so would have full power to alienate and dispone at pleasure.

Accordingly this was the reading which the statute received at the time. For immediately on its passing, "Captain James Drummond" obtained, after an ex parte proof, decree of declarator from the Court of Session that he was heir-male of Lord John Drummond the traitor, and that he was entitled to receive a grant of the estates. Having got this decree, he obtained from the Crown a fee-simple grant to the whole estates in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees. In virtue of this title "Captain James Drummond" (afterwards first Baron Perth) obtained possession of the estates. The late Lady Willoughby de Eresby was his daughter and undoubted heir-at-law. She took the estates, not only as Baron Perth's heir under his investiture, but as his disponee under his trust-deed and deed of instructions.

It is true that the title made up by Baron Perth under the Act of Restoration of 1784 is included in the writs now challenged by the pursuer, and therefore this formal title cannot be founded on by the defenders as an objection to satisfying the production. There would require to be at least a partial production, but if I am right in the reading of the statute of restoration itself, that statute forms a sufficient defence, for it authorises the absolute fee of the estate, then wholly and absolutely vested in the Crown, to be given out and restored to the heir-male of the traitor, and "the heirs and assigns of such heir-male." I think the meaning would be the same though the words of the Act were to be read "to the heirs and assigns of such heirs-male;" and separately, I think that the grant under the statute must be a grant in fee-simple,—that is, a grant with power to alienate, and without the restrictions and fetters of a strict entail.

Such being the view which I take of the titles of the Perth estates and of the admitted facts in the history of the family, it follows that the judgment pronounced in the former action and affirmed in the House of Lords must be repeated in the present action. The new grounds of action, and the new pleas which the pursuer has brought forward in the present action, make no difference in the result. All the pursuer's new pleas appear to me to be equally ill-founded as the pleas on which he formerly relied, and as the pursuer is bound, and as this Court is bound by the judgment in the former action, so far as it goes, I think the pursuer's new pleas must now be repelled, and the former judgment substantially repeated. The terms of the former judgment affirmed in the House of Lords were,—(His Lordship here quoted the interlocutor given supra, p. 538.)

I think that the judgment must now in substance be repeated, but the mode of expression of the judgment may require to be varied. For example, the reference to the pursuer's service seems inapplicable, for the pursuer now founds upon a variety of services, not only to the third Duke of Perth, but to the

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Earl of Perth
v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

Chancellor, the Chancellor's son, and to Baron Perth and his father. It appears to me that none of these services are of any avail to the pursuer, for this simple reason, that nothing has been left in the hæreditas jacens of any of the parties which could be taken up by the services. I incline to think also that there should be a finding that the pursuer's title is excluded by the writs, titles, and statutes founded on by the defenders.

I may summarise the grounds on which I rest my opinion thus,—(1) I hold the former judgment as res judicata against the pursuer in reference to the whole pleas formerly insisted in. (2) I think the pursuer has failed to shew that there ever was any valid and effectual strict entail of the Perth estates, or, at all events, that he has failed to shew that there was any valid and subsisting entail in 1746, when John Drummond was attainted. (3) On the contrary, I think the defenders have shewn that the estates were held in fee-simple, that is, on a simple destination, and with full powers of alienation, all along, or at least downwards from 1679. I think the charter of that year was an unfettered title, and it stands decided that the entail of 1687 was ineffectual, because not recorded. I think the charter of novodamus following could not make an entail. The disposition and sasine of 1713 was a new and unfettered investiture. So was the charter and sasine of 1731, upon which the estates were held when forfeited. (4) The decision of the House of Lords in 1751,[1] and the statutes of George II. and George III., are conclusive that the absolute fee of the estate was forfeited to and vested in the Crown, and the last of these statutes is conclusive that the estates were to be given back, not under the limitations of strict entail, but to the heir-male of the traitor as unlimited and unrestricted fiar. On his own shewing, therefore, the pursuer has no title to call for or set aside the writs which he seeks to reduce, but he is entirely excluded by the unchallenged writs, titles, and statutes founded on by the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This very important case has received that consideration which its merits deserve, and I shall content myself with stating very shortly the grounds on which I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

This is essentially an action of reduction,—at least the pursuer cannot arrive at the result aimed at until he sets aside the standing investitures of the estates which he claims, which are now in the persons of his antagonists. The plea which is raised against the reduction is that the pursuer has no title to sue. The defenders say,—"On your own shewing you have no title to make the demand for production." Upon this and this only the discussion has turned. It was in the power of the defenders to say,—"Supposing that on your own shewing you had a title, we have a better, and one which will exclude yours, however good that might have been, standing by itself." If the defenders had chosen to take that plea, and produced the title on which they founded it, we should then have been obliged to see whether, assuming the pursuer's title otherwise well founded, the title to exclude must prevail. But in this case we have not arrived at that point.

The first question—the only question decided in the former case, and the only question that has been raised here—is, whether the pursuer has set out a sufficient title to support his call for the production of the writs, for that is the first stage in an action of reduction. The first plea which is raised against the action is the plea of res judicata. On that point I agree entirely with your Lordships. Lord Neaves has stated very fully the legal principles applicable to the plea of res judicata, and I shall not repeat them. The former case was decided upon one specific ground, and that was, that by the attainder and the annexation to the Crown following upon the rebellion of John Drummond in 1746, the fee of the estate had been fully vested in the Crown, and that, therefore, any prior destination was wholly evacuated. That was the ground of the judgment, and it necessarily cuts away any title which the pursuer had to insist in the action. The object of the present action is to try that question over again, whether that attainder did or did not forfeit the whole estate. It was maintained in the former action that the estates were entailed under the procuratory of resignation of 1687, and that, therefore, the provision of the Act of Queen Anne,[1] introducing the equitable remedy of the English law of settlement into the Scotch law of entail and forfeiture, ought to take effect. That plea was repelled, because the entail was admittedly not recorded.

[1] Drummond of Logie Almond v. Lord Advocate, April 30, 1751, 1 Paton, 503.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

The real question is, whether, in this action, that objection has been sufficiently obviated,—in other words, whether, at the time of the attainder, there was or was not subsisting a protected destination. I am of opinion that the grounds upon which that is maintained are not the grounds which were maintained in the former action. In that action the procuratory of resignation of 1687 was founded on as being in itself the entail which was said to be subsisting at the date of the attainder. But it is now pleaded, first, that the charter of 1679, which was not founded on in the former action, constituted a valid entail; and, secondly, that at all events the royal charter of 1687, apart altogether from the procuratory, apart from any warrant, constituted a royal grant, which was sufficient to protect the right of the substitutes in the destination against the treason of the heir in possession. Now, although there is much force in what Lord Gifford has said, as to the subsequent stages through which these estates have passed, I should rather decline to enter into any question on these topics, because manifestly these proceed upon the plea of title to exclude, and these titles to exclude,—the effect of the Acts of Parliament, the effect of the investitures of 1713 and 1731, indeed the effect of Baron Perth's title itself, might depend on whether either of those charters constituted a strict entail. I can see great difficulty in the way of the pursuer, even if he overcame the obstruction which is now placed in his path. But I am not prepared to decide what the effect would be if he is right in his present contention, which alone has been argued to us. I confine my opinion entirely to the question, whether, under either of those investitures, there was a destination which protected the heirs-substitute at the date of the forfeiture in 1746.

Upon the charter of 1679 I am very clearly of opinion that there is nothing there that can be construed into a protection of the destination. On the contrary, I think that the whole complexion of that deed is opposed to that construction. The clause in regard to the prohibition to sell without the consent of the Crown manifestly could not have that effect on any principles of conveyancing. It merely expresses the old feudal casualty of recognition. And, therefore, putting that aside, the only other question is, whether the charter of 1687, as apart from the procuratory, did or did not constitute a right in the heirs-substitute to be protected against the treason of the heir in possession.

[1] 7 Anne, c. 21.

No. 99.

Mar. 9, 1875. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees.

I cannot deal with that question as being without a good deal of novelty and importance. If this had been an original crown grant, in which the Crown undertook to its vassal and the substitutes in a destination therein inserted, that when any heir in possession committed treason, so far as the Crown was concerned, the next heir-substitute not descended of his body should succeed, I am not prepared to say what the effect of such a clause might be. It could not interfere with public law, but it might raise the equitable principle embodied in the Act of Queen Anne, in so far as the right of the Crown was concerned, and in so far as the Crown had a right to confer the privilege. But I am clearly of opinion that there is no such case here, because the charter of 1687 was not and was not intended to be an original royal grant. It was a charter by progress essentially, and the clause in regard to forfeiture was not a clause flowing from the Crown, as a gift conferred by the Crown's prerogative, but a provision by the vassal applying for a renewal of his investiture, that if the heir in possession should commit treason he might be divested under the powers of the entail before an Act of attainder could take effect upon him. I think that its being a charter of novodamus makes no difference. Lord Gifford has rightly explained that part of our law, that a charter of this kind, proceeding upon a procuratory of resignation for new infeftment, in terms of that procuratory, does not become an original grant, but is still a title by progress, although there may be introduced into the crown charter of resignation a clause of novodamus; and that being the state of the matter, we need not consider what the effect would be upon the subsequent proceedings if there had been an original grant in those terms. I can well understand that if there had been, a strong argument might have been made on the title of 1713 and the title of 1731, and upon the Act of Attainder itself. The nature of the plea is not so much that the charter constituted an entail under the statute as against creditors, but rather that it conferred on the heirs-substitute a privilege which at least was available against the Crown, as each fell under the principle, if not the letter, of the Act of Queen Anne. But, as I have said, there are not materials here to raise it.

These are the grounds on which I concur in the judgment which your Lordships have proposed.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the media concludendi on which the present summons proceeds, in so far as the same bear or are maintained to be different from those on which the former action between the parties to the present process was founded, are not relevant or sufficient to support the pursuer's title to call for production of the writs specified in the summons: Quoad ultra adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Find the pursuer liable in additional expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report, and decern."

T. J. GORDON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

JOHN WALLACE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
THOMAS THORNTON (Clerk to the Commissioners of Police of the Burgh of Dundee), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Johnstone—Asher.

Property—Road—Public Right of Way.—In an action brought for declarator of freedom from public right of way by the proprietor of the solum of a through-going close in a town it was proved that the close had been originally

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

formed by the proprietor on his own ground for the use of his tenants, and that a door had been placed at one end of it; it was also proved that the close had been used as a thoroughfare by the public for the prescriptive period, but that frequently, and particularly at night, the door had been locked by the proprietor so as to exclude strangers. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand, diss. Lords Ormidale and Gifford) that the acts of possession on the part of the proprietor in shutting up the passage were sufficient to prevent the public from acquiring a right of way.

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Lord Shand.

IN 1874 John Wallace, iron merchant, Dundee, was proprietor of the southern portion of a tenement of land, with the houses erected thereon, which extended from the Murraygate on the south to the Meadowside on the north.

This tenement of land measured about three hundred feet from south to north, and had a frontage of about thirty feet both to the Murraygate and to the Meadowside. It was described in a disposition and assignation by Alexander Simmers in favour of William Butchart, dated 13th December 1790, as "All and Haill that tenement of land, back houses, and garden, which sometime belonged to Alexander Watson, of Wallace Craigie, sometime Provost of Dundee, afterwards by progress to John Thom, merchant there, afterwards to Margaret Thom, his daughter, as heir cognost and infeft therein to him, and disponed by her to me, lying in the burgh of Dundee, on the north side of the Murraygate thereof, betwixt the lands sometime of Mr James Fiethie, now of , on the west; the lands sometime of Alexander Bower and Samuel Chanler, now of , on the east; the common meadows on the north; and the said street on the south parts."

At the date of the disposition to Butchart a house stood upon the Murraygate end of the ground facing that street, and having in its lower story next the west gable a narrow pend giving access to the back ground and houses built thereon. The back ground was partly built upon, and partly garden, stretching to the Meadowside, which in 1790, and for many years thereafter, was a common green belonging to the town.

About 1820, the precise date being unknown, Butchart built a tenement of houses on the Meadowside end of his ground similar to that already existing facing the Murraygate, and having a corresponding pend in the west end of the lower story to give access to the back ground and to the Murraygate. The passage which was thus formed along the west side of Butchart's ground from the Murraygate to the Meadowside assumed the appearance of an ordinary through-going close, being covered over at the two ends where it ran under the houses facing the Murraygate and Meadowside, but open to the sky for the rest of the distance where it gave access to a range of back tenements, which in course of time came to occupy the whole remaining portion of Butchart's ground up to its eastern boundary.

The close came to be known as Butchart's Close, and when a street was formed alongside Meadowside, and certain important public buildings, such as the Exchange, were erected on the Meadows, it came to be used to a considerable extent by the public as a passage from the Murraygate to Meadowside.

When Butchart erected his tenement of houses facing Meadowside in or about 1820 he inserted a door in the Meadowside entrance to the close, which gave him, and subsequently his daughter, Mrs M'Leish, who succeeded him in the property, the means of closing the entry at pleasure.

The tenements built on the adjoining property to the west, belonging

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

to James Feithie, afterwards to Daniel Macintosh, did not enter from Butchart's Close, though many of them had windows looking into it. They had, however, no servitude of light, excepting at one place about the middle of the close, where, for a distance of thirty-two feet, Butchart had in 1838 granted a bond of servitude in favour of Macintosh's houses over the ground occupied by the close.

Mr Wallace being desirous of closing up the Murraygate end of the close brought this declarator of freedom from right of way.

The Police Commissioners of Dundee entered appearance to defend the action on behalf of the public, and pleaded;—(2) The close in question being one of the public thoroughfares of the burgh of Dundee, under the charge of, and paved, upheld, cleansed, and lighted at the public expense by the Police Commissioners of the burgh, the pursuer has no right to close it up, or to build or otherwise encroach upon it. (3) The said close having existed and been used by the public, and treated as a public thoroughfare, and known only in that character for a period of upwards of forty years, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The import of the evidence fully appears from the opinions delivered by the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary, on 6th November 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that for forty years and upwards prior to the raising of the present action there has existed a public right of way for foot-passengers through the close or passage known as Butchart's Close in Dundee, between Murraygate and Meadowside of Dundee: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable to the defenders in expenses," &c.*

---

* "OPINION.—The issue which this case practically raises is, whether there exists a public right of way through the close or passage known as Butchart's Close, in Dundee." (His Lordship then gave a description of the locality.)

"Such being the nature of the locality, it is proved beyond question, and I do not think it is even disputed by the counsel for the pursuer, that there has been a very extensive use of the passage as a thoroughfare by the public. The proof shews that for sixty years that use has gone on, and it does not appear that permission was asked by any of the witnesses to use the passage. The defenders' witnesses, from various different ranks of life, all say they regarded the use as a matter of right. I think the evidence shews that the use has been for more than the prescriptive period of forty years, that it has been an open use, and that the parties regarded it as a use of right. It has increased as time went on, growing as the population increased with the necessity and convenience of the neighbourhood. The use for the earlier part of the prescriptive period appears to have been mainly for three purposes,—in the first place, as an access to the public green used for bleaching purposes by the inhabitants in Murraygate, and indeed generally by the inhabitants of Dundee, many of whom used the passage for going and coming to the green with clothes. That particular use went on till about 1825, or perhaps a little later, when an Act of Parliament providing for a substitute green was passed. Another important use was in connection with the market held once a week at Meadowside for a considerable time after the green had ceased to be used for bleaching,—some of the witnesses say until about fifteen years ago. In addition, two important schools in Meadowside were attended by numerous boys, a large number of whom used this passage in going to and coming from school, and the people in the neighbourhood of the two districts I have mentioned—workmen and others going to and from their work—also made use of it. Latterly the use of it is proved to have largely increased, owing to the buildings to which I have already alluded having been erected. It has been used by the inhabitants generally,—by merchants and others going to and from their houses, and to and from the Post Office and other public buildings,—and has continued to be used by the boys attending the High

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.

Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

The pursuer reclaimed. After hearing argument, the Court ordered the case to be reheard before seven Judges.

School, which has come to be a substitute for the other schools in that locality. The witnesses, who are pretty numerous, speak, as usual in such cases, not merely to their personal use of the passage, but to having observed it to be used by a number of others at the same time. Some of them speak to hundreds in a day, and others to rarely being in the close without meeting three or four others using it as they were doing. The use so proved is therefore not that of a few straggling individuals, but practically of a considerable number of the public, a large number on market days, of workmen at meal hours and in the mornings and evenings, and men of business at different periods of the day, but more frequently in the beginning of the business day, and towards the close of it. In addition, it is proved that the passage has been lighted, cleaned, and paved at the public expense for upwards of forty years. I do not attach much weight to the evidence in regard to the lighting and cleaning of the close, as proving it to have been a public passage, for it appears to have been a common practice in Dundee to expend public money, not merely on thoroughfares, but on closed places or closes, which could not be made really useful by the public. But I think it a very important feature in the case that since the passing of the General Police Act of 1850, as well as earlier, the paving of the close has been in the hands of the Commissioners of Police. It appears that in 1867, the pavement being then in a very bad condition, the Police Commissioners having had complaints as to its state, had the whole or the greater part of it entirely renewed, and that the work lasted for some days; and it is worthy of observation as a circumstance shewing the extent of the use of the passage, that the traffic at the time of the repairs was so great as to cause the workmen considerable inconvenience. Ever since 1867 the pavement has been upheld by the Commissioners, and in 1873 there was another special repair. It is further proved by Mr Hean, formerly a commissioner of police, that for many years before 1867 the paving of the close had been in the hands of the Commissioners, who had done what was necessary. It is further proved that since the passing of the Act of 1850, a drain was put in at the public expense, for the purpose of draining the close. These facts are important, and are all consistent with the existence of this public right. The fact of their paving the close is an acknowledgment by the Police Commissioners, on account of the use by the public, of responsibility to keep the passage in proper order, and the fact that the proprietor allowed the Commissioners to execute the necessary operations over a period of time, amounted to a recognition that the obligation lay upon them, and was only consistent with its being a public passage. It is an extremely important feature in this case as distinguished from others that have occurred, that the use has been so extensive and so open as I have described,—because used as the passage has been by so many people, and at all hours of the day, there was the clearest notice to the proprietor that the public were acquiring a right over the ground. He could not fail to be fully aware of the use that was being made, and if that were allowed without very distinct objection I think it must be held that a tacit consent was given to the acquisition of a right by the public. All the more when the paving and repairing of the passage was undertaken and executed with at least the tacit consent of the proprietor, at the expense of, and by the public authorities. In such a case it appears to me that the evidence of interruption (which is the case made upon the pursuer's behalf), must be clear, and shew a distinct intention, notwithstanding the extensive use, to prevent that public enjoyment of the right which alone would interrupt its acquisition,—not an impediment so trifling as practically to attract little if any notice, but a formal distinct interruption to give clear notice to the public that the use of the passage was given as matter of temporary accommodation, and not to be founded on as a right. The case is very different from one in which the public have made a comparatively slight use of a road, as in country districts, and where the opportunities of the proprietor seeing the use made are comparatively few. In such a case slight interruption might be Argued for the pursuer;—Butchart's Close was a private close formed for the purpose of giving his tenants access from the Murraygate and

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.

Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

sufficient; but where, as here, there is an open, continuous, frequent use by the public in large numbers, I think something very distinct in the way of interruption would be required to prevent the acquisition of a right.

"Now, the interruption which is relied upon in this case is the use of a door, and afterwards, for a short time, of a gate at the Meadowside or north end of the passage; and if it were shewn that the door had been used as a bar to the thoroughfare with such frequency, or for such periods, although at intervals, as to give distinct notice to the public that their use, as matter of right, was questioned and interrupted, it would be enough as an answer to the claim. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that such interruption, or impediment, I should rather say, as has been proved to have been thrown in the way of the public, is not sufficient to prevent the acquisition of a right. I think it has been proved that the door was part of the presently existing building, which is said to have been put up somewhere about forty years ago, but it is also clear that it was only used from time to time, and at intervals. From 1858 or 1860 down to the raising of this action there is no evidence that the door was ever used or shut. There is no doubt some evidence about the use of the iron gate for a short period about 1871, but with that exception eleven or thirteen years elapsed during which this passage was completely open without impediment or obstruction of any kind, and during the whole of that time a constant and increasing use of the passage day and night by hundreds of people took place. If that had been the state of matters all along there could have been no question between the parties, but the pursuer founds upon the use of the door as an interruption for the period from about 1832 to, I think, 1858. The most important witnesses on this subject are Mrs Fyall, a daughter of Mrs M'Leish, a predecessor of the pursuer in his property, Joseph Westwood, and the Misses Baxter. Mrs Fyall, who is quite distinct that the door was never used for the period from between 1858 and 1860 till about 1871, states that for about twenty-five years before 1858 it was used; but I think the substance of her evidence—and no one had better opportunities of knowing about it, for she was living in the close almost the whole of the time—comes to this, that during the day the door was generally open,—I think but rarely closed,—and when closed, closed only for short intervals. During the night it was certainly more frequently closed; but even the closing at night was not a constant practice extending over the whole time. Joseph Westwood speaks of the period of four years from 1832 to 1836, and, substantially, his evidence comes to the same thing. According to his statement the door was shut a good deal during the night, and he very often found it so in the morning; but, on the other hand, it was open during the day. No doubt the pursuer says it was open during the day for the convenience of the people who lived in the close. That certainly is a reason why it must have been open almost at all times during the day; but if it be proved that contemporaneously with the use of it by persons living in the close the public were allowed to come and go as they pleased, the fact that the tenants were using it at the same time will not detract from the public use. Then the two Misses Baxter speak to eleven years of the same period that Mrs Fyall spoke to. They were the only persons besides Mrs M'Leish who had a key to the door, and they speak very little of the closing of the door during the day, and to the time of its being shut being short, but to more frequent closing during the night. During part of the time they say there was even a regular practice of shutting the door at night; but I think, taking the evidence as a whole, it substantially comes to what I have stated, that there was not a constant, but yet a frequent, practice of shutting the door at night, and an occasional practice of shutting it during the day for short intervals.

"The question is, what is the effect of the interruption by the closing of the door in the way I have now explained? And, in considering that, I think it is important to look at the purpose for which the door was shut on both occasions, that is, by day and by night. If it were meant plainly as an interruption to

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

Meadowside to the range of back buildings built on his own ground. That it was looked upon as a private close in 1838 was clear from the

the use of the passage as a thoroughfare, and if the act of shutting the door was plainly calculated to convey that impression to those who were using the passage, then it would be a strong element in the way of interruption; but I do not think that the evidence shews that to have been really the intention with which the door was closed, or that, in point of fact, its being closed to the extent to which this occurred, formed any such distinct interruption to the use of the passage by the public as would amount to notice to them that their right to go there and use it as a thoroughfare was disputed, In regard to the shutting of the door during the day, the evidence of Mrs Fyall, as well as of a number of other witnesses, goes to shew that the door would have been constantly open but for the circumstance that a great many children congregated in the neighbourhood, and during the hours when they were not at school were in the habit of making the passage a sort of playground, that Mrs M'Leish, who is the person who seems alone to have shut the door during the day, was a good deal annoyed by this, and that her purpose in closing it was not to prevent the use of the passage as a thoroughfare by the public but really to put a stop to the annoyance she experienced from the children. Again, I think the closing of the door at night is to be explained on the footing that something else was intended than interrupting the use of this as a public passage. Mrs Fyall says, in speaking of its being locked at night,—'It was partly for the orra creatures who would have come about it that she wished to have it locked, and partly, I suppose, because it was a private close.' This evidence is corroborated by that of other witnesses. It appears that this close was infested by a class of people who hung about it at night, and were a nuisance to the people living there. This is plainly the idea which Mrs Fyall expresses, and which is expressed also by other witnesses; and so little does she seem to think of the question of public right that when she speaks on that question she adds, 'and partly, I suppose, because it was a private close.' I can scarcely think this is the language she would have used if she had thought that her mother's state of mind—which she must have known—was a determination to vindicate private property as against a public thoroughfare; that her mother had the intention of refusing the public the use of it, so as to preserve her own private right. As regards Mrs M'Leish herself, it occurs to me that if she had had it in her mind to do what the pursuer proposes in this action,—I mean, to build over this close,—we should have had a very distinct interruption on her part. The circumstance that she did not distinctly interrupt the use by the public shews that at all events she had not building in view, and if not, it is a circumstance in the case tending to support the inference, that she was not resolved to prevent the acquisition by the public of a right to use this passage. The closing of a gate, even in a public place of this kind, is countenanced by the provisions of the Police Acts themselves, for there are provisions that where it is desirable to shut up public thoroughfares of this kind the police authorities have the power of doing so. This shews that there is really a recognised necessity even with public places of this kind for closing them from time to time, although that should practically interfere with the use of them for a time as thoroughfares. There is, I think, scarcely any evidence of anyone being turned back in the use of this close except boys, and the turning back of boys is to be accounted for in the way I have stated. It is quite true, as Mr Robertson observed, that some who saw the gate shut occasionally turned and did not go up to it, and so far that is in favour of interruption. The only question is, whether the degree of that interruption is such as would prevent the acquisition of this right? It is a jury question, whether the amount of interruption has been such as to have prevented a peaceable use, and to have been notice to the public that their right was disputed, and on the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that the interruption was not sufficient. With regard to the gate which was put up in 1871, I do not think it has a material bearing on the case. It was used, I think, almost entirely at night, and certainly not till evening. It was explained by one witness that he could not get to the post-office at

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

terms of the bond of servitude granted by Butchart in favour of Macintosh's adjoining tenement on the west, and which would have been unnecessary had the close been a public close. The tenants in Butchart's houses in the close were very numerous, and it would have been impossible entirely to exclude the public without, at the same time, causing extreme inconvenience to the tenants. But the public were only allowed the use of the close by tolerance. The actings of Butchart and his successors in controlling the public use by closing the door on the Meadowside end of the close was an unequivocal act of possession, which, unchallenged as it was, rendered it impossible for the public to acquire a right of way.

Argued for the defenders;—The case resolved itself into a comparison of the evidence of the amount of possession with that of the amount of interruption. Where there was such continuous use by the public as was proved in the present case any interruption required to be open and distinct. Here to all appearance the close was a public close; no notice of its alleged private nature was given. The public were admitted freely whenever they wanted. The only interruption founded on was the occasional closing of a door to prevent annoyance from boys, and to prevent disreputable characters harbouring in the close at night. Such was not a sufficient interruption of the public right of way, which was, at the same time, acknowledged by the proprietor himself in allowing the close to be cleansed and lighted, and even paved, by the defenders, at the public expense.

---

nine o'clock, but during the day it is not proved that the iron gate was ever shut. I do not attach any great importance to the shutting of it by night, for the reason I have already stated, but even that ceased after a short time.

"The Portobello case of Cargill[1] was founded on by the defenders as an authority conclusive in their favour, but I cannot say I regard that case as decisive of the present, although I think it an authority to some extent in favour of what is contended for. The particular distinction between it and the present case is, that the person who sued was not proprietor of the ground which was the subject of the action. He had a bounding title, and the lane was not his at all. It was not a right he could properly vindicate, and Lord Curriehill rests the first part of his judgment very much upon that ground. At the same time I think the judgments of the Lord President and Lord Deas in that case—apart from the question of title, on which they did not rest their opinions—proceed upon this, that from the date when the Police Act came into operation in 1850, and for years afterwards, the lane was confessedly within the jurisdiction of the magistrates of Portobello, who had been allowed to light, cleanse, and pave it, and to treat it otherwise as subject to their control. If it had not been for the peculiarity that the lighting and cleansing was not in practice limited to public thoroughfares in Dundee, but was extended to property obviously private, I think that the case would have been a direct authority. The acquiescence of the proprietor in allowing the magistrates, from 1850 to 1873, to light, cleanse, pave, and treat this passage as a public street, on the principle adopted in the case of Cargill, would have brought the passage under the operation of those Acts, and made it a public street, apart altogether from the long usage there had been before, but the only element of that kind which I have here—certainly a very important one—is that of the paving of the street. I cannot say I should regard that circumstance alone as bringing this case plainly within the operation of the Act, but it is of great importance as an element of evidence on the question, whether the actual use by the public was not that of a public right of way; and on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the defenders must succeed in the action. I shall therefore find that for forty years and upwards there has existed a public right of way, and in respect of that I shall assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, with expenses."

[1] Cargill v. Magistrates of Portobello, Dec. 11, 1863, 2 Macph. 244, 36 Scot. Jur. 126.

No. 100. At advising,—

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

LORD DEAS.—The pursuer in this case is proprietor of certain subjects in Dundee, which are described in the disposition in favour of his author, William Butchart, dated 13th December 1790, as "All and Haill that tenement of land, back houses, and garden, which sometime belonged to Alexander Watson," "lying in the burgh of Dundee, on the north side of the Murraygate thereof, betwixt the lands sometime of Mr James Fiethie, now of on the west, the lands sometime of Alexander Bower and Samuel Chanler, now of on the east, the common meadows on the north, and the said street on the south parts."

The defenders allege that a lane or close, called Butchart's Close, leading through the pursuer's property from the Murraygate on the south to what is now called Meadowside, or Meadowside Street, on the north, has been used by the public as a public close or street for foot-passengers for the period of the long prescription, and consequently that a right of public foot-road exists over it, which the pursuer is not entitled to obstruct or interfere with.

The proof and productions do not furnish us with a precise description of the subjects through which the close runs, without the aid of verbal explanations, for which I was much indebted to the Dean of Faculty on the one hand and the Solicitor-General on the other, and which made that description quite intelligible. I do not say that these verbal explanations were essential to judgment, but they removed a certain vagueness which, to my mind at least, was unsatisfactory. Taking the benefit of them, I understand the nature of the pursuer's subjects to be this:—The length of the ground comprehended in the disposition, just quoted, of 1790, between the Murraygate and Meadowside is about 300 feet, and its breadth between the houses fronting Murraygate and backwards is from 30 to 35 feet. The ground seems to run from the Murraygate towards Meadowside in somewhat of a north-easterly direction, but which is described in the titles as "north," and to call it so is sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes.

The state of the subjects up to a date not quite ascertained, somewhere between 1818 and 1822,—probably about 1820,—was this:—At the Murraygate end the pursuer's author, Butchart, had a house, still extant, the second story of which filled the whole space betwixt the house which had belonged to Fiethie on the west, and the house which had belonged to Alexander Bower and Samuel Chanler on the east. But, in the lower story of Butchart's house, a space of about four feet in breadth had been left next the gable wall (understood to be mutual) of what I shall call for brevity Fiethie's house, for a passage northward to Butchart's garden (mentioned in the disposition of 1790) and to his back houses (also mentioned in that disposition), situated on the east side of the passage, and occupied by his tenants, consisting, according to the defender's witness, Peter Gillan, of about fifteen families.

Sometime between 1818 and 1822 Butchart erected a tenement on his garden, or on that part of it which abutted on Meadowside, and in doing so he so far followed the fashion of the house at the Murraygate end of his property as to leave a covered passage through the lower story, whereby the occupants of his new tenement had direct ingress and egress to and from Meadowside, and his other tenants in the close, as well as himself, had the means of passing in and out either at the Murraygate or Meadowside end of his property as they thought proper. An uncovered portion of Butchart's ground was thus left between the old tenement and the new, and in 1822 Butchart, on the occasion of building a stable on part of that ground, entered into a transaction with Daniel Macintosh, who had acquired Fiethie's subjects immediately on the west, whereby, on payment by Macintosh of £65, Butchart bound himself to keep his stable 8 feet 9 inches distant from the west wall of Macintosh's house for preservation of Macintosh's lights, and not to raise the side walls of the stable, which were to be 32 feet in length, above the height of 15 feet 9 inches from the ground, nor to raise the roof of the stable more than 8½ feet higher than the side walls. This transaction was embodied in a deed of servitude executed on 2d August 1822, and the stable then in course of erection was completed accordingly.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

Butchart's house fronting Murraygate was stated at the bar to have no direct entrance from the street. The new tenement erected by Butchart at the other end of the close had a door entering from the close to the upper portions of the building, and a door entering to the ground flat direct from Meadowside Street. With the exception of this last mentioned door all the doors of the pursuer's subjects enter from the close. The whole subjects on the east side of the close belonged to Butchart, and now belong to the pursuer. All the occupants of these subjects had and have thus to enter through one or other of the two covered passages in order to get to the premises occupied by them. On the other hand, although the proprietor of the subjects stretching along and forming the pursuer's western boundary has extended his back buildings to within a few feet of Meadowside (as we see from the Ordnance plan), covering nearly all of what was his garden, he has no door or entrance from Butchart's Close, but enters by doors from a through-going close situated on the other—that is the western—side of his subjects, although he may possibly have also a door or doors direct from Murraygate or Meadowside,—a fact left unexplained, and which is not material. Two material facts, however, become clear from this minute description of the subjects,—1st, That the close or passage in dispute is essential for the occupants of the pursuer's subjects; and 2d, That no use of that close or passage is or can be made by adjoining proprietors on either side unless it be as members of the public, and accordingly we find that no right to enter the pursuer's close is asserted by any one whatever in any other capacity.

It is now necessary to notice that, in erecting his tenement at the Meadowside end of his ground, Butchart made preparation for a door there, by inserting in the wall an iron hook in the usual manner for a crook and band hinged door, which was accordingly forthwith put on, having a lock and key, or rather keys, for the use of himself and his tenants. It is proved "that the stone work is of the same date as the building, and has been constructed for a door." Butchart, at the same time, formed a recess in the wall, so that the door when opened back might not, to any extent, obstruct the narrow passage through the archway, or what we familiarly call the "pend." This fact may account for some of the witnesses, who no doubt passed through the close, saying they did not see the door, which is stated to have been much of the same colour with and scarcely distinguishable from the wall.

At the time when the door was put on there were, with the exception of a public school or schools, no houses on Meadowside, which was then a public green. It was not till 1825 that the magistrates and council obtained an Act of Parliament authorising the green to be built upon, on condition of a public bleaching green being provided elsewhere. This condition was ultimately complied with, and in course of years Meadowside has come to be covered with buildings, leaving only the breadth of a street, now called Meadowside Street, running at right angles across the end of what had been the gardens of Butchart and the other Murraygate proprietors, and parallel to Murraygate Street. Of course a door upon the close was not necessary to enable Butchart's tenants to get into their houses, nor could it be intended to obstruct their entrance, and as there was nobody else to be kept out except the public, it follows that the object of the door must have been to keep out the public and prevent their passing through. The portion of the public most likely at that time to have taken advantage of the opening were the scholars, spoken of in the proof, for there were then no buildings on Meadowside, with the exception of a public school or schools, and most probably it was the existence of the schools, coupled with the opportunity of connecting the door with the new building and securing it in the wall, which led to the door being put on at that end of the close in place of the Murraygate end, where no door was necessary so long as there was no through-going close.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

The door thus put on by Butchart continued in its place for nearly fifty years. Butchart died on or about 1832, and was succeeded by his daughter, Mrs M'Leish, who died in March 1862. There can be no doubt that the door was still there at Mrs M'Leish's death. She left a son, John M'Leish, who came home from Australia in 1867. His sister, Mrs Fyall, who then occupied the house in which her mother had died, says the door was still there at that time, and the witness Roy says the same thing. Mrs Fyall further says her brother John M'Leish replaced the door by an iron gate after he returned home. The witness Allan Macdonald says the iron gate was put up in May 1871, and whether this date be correct or not the cross-examination suggests no doubt of its being so. Some of the witnesses think there was an interval of three or four years between the removal of the door, as having become useless from age, and the substitution of the iron gate. The door may, however, have been dilapidated and standing back in the recess, scarcely observable during that time; but the precise dates, either of taking off the wooden door or putting on the iron gate, are not material. All or nearly all the witnesses are agreed that the door was there within the last ten or twelve years, and that an iron gate put on by John M'Leish was still there after his death, thus bringing us down to within a very short period of the commencement of this litigation.

Next, as to the use made of the door and iron gate. It admits of no doubt at all that during the whole period of Mrs M'Leish's life the door was frequently kept locked during the night, and by no means unfrequently during the day, and this practice, although latterly not so well observed, continued to some extent after Mrs M'Leish's death, with reference both to the door and the gate successively, down nearly to the present time. Neither does it admit of any doubt, 1st, That the object of this practice was to exclude the public, and 2d, That the effect of it was to exclude the public upon all the occasions when the door or gate was locked.

The locking of the door and gate implies, of course, that the proprietor kept a key or keys, and it appears that keys were also furnished to some of the tenants. The locking of the door in Mrs M'Leish's time is very specially spoken to by her daughter, Mrs Fyall, who was born in the close, forty-six years ago, and lived there till within the last three years. She says,—"My father died a long time before my mother. I think I was about fourteen years of age when he died. He was terrible pointed about having the door locked. I can't say that the door was kept much locked during the day. In fact we did not like to lock it during the day for the tenants, but it was usually locked at night, —the hour of locking varied. I think some of the tenants at last got keys for themselves. I have often seen people coming into the close from the Murraygate, and having to turn back because the door was shut." She adds, on the cross-examination,—"I have heard my mother saying that it was a private close, and that she had a right to lock it."

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

The witnesses next in importance to Mrs Fyall, as to the locking of the door, are two sisters, Jane and Elizabeth Baxter, who lived in the close for eleven years, viz., from 1835 to 1846, and had the best possible means of knowledge. Jane Baxter says,—"When I lived in Butchart's Close there was a door at the top of the close. It was very often locked, both at night and during the day. (Q.) Was it more frequently locked during the night than during the day? (A.) Much about it. I can scarcely say. I knew in the evening that it was locked by my father being out and our having to watch for him coming in, and having to open the door to him with a key. My father was Mrs M'Leish's tenant, and had a key as her tenant. We got the key from Mrs M'Leish." In answer to the cross-question,—"During how many years do you think you had a key?" she says, "Perhaps the most of them, but I cannot tell exactly when we got it. We gave up the key when we left."

In like manner Elizabeth Baxter says,—"We had a key to the gate at the top of the close, and had often to open it at night to let my father in, and to lock it again afterwards. I have found the gate locked during the day, and opened it when it was locked." Then she speaks to the only occasion on which she remembers precisely what it was which led her to open the door during the day, viz., to let in a "certain gentleman" who beckoned to her at the window, and which fact obviously remained on her memory because he was a certain and not an uncertain gentleman. In answer to the Court she says there was no particular time of the day or night for locking the door,—"just when the landlady thought proper. She had it at her own will." "(Q.) How often in the course of the winter had you to come down and unlock the gate to let your father in? (A.) Once or twice a week, I think, but I cannot be certain."

The evidence of these three witnesses, Mrs Fyall and the two Misses Baxter, is supplemented and amply corroborated by numerous other witnesses, if corroboration were deemed necessary. I shall briefly refer to some of them, because it is the locking the door from time to time which gives its chief importance to the existence of the door. Taking them in the order of the proof, we have in the outset the defender's witness, Mrs Watson, whose evidence is valuable because she is a leading witness for the defenders. Mrs Watson says, —"When I knew the place first Mrs M'Leish had a door at the top of the close, on the left hand side going up from Murraygate, which closed up the entry when the landlady pleased. That door was there a long time before 1822. I cannot say how long. At that time any person used the close who could win through it, but when it was shut they could not, and had to turn back again. I have seen the schoolboys turned when they came, and the door shut long before 1840. I don't remember of anybody being turned for many a day. After I went to Butchart's Close I saw people turned many a time. I have seen Mrs M'Leish shut the door,—that was Mr M'Leish's wife. I never saw an iron gate, but I believe one was put on after the wooden door was away." On the cross-examination Mrs Watson says Mrs M'Leish had the property from the time her father died till she died herself. "(Q.) Did she lock the gate whenever she chose all the time? (A.) Whenever she got in a passion with boys running about the close she locked it till it pleased her to open it. (Q.) When she locked it did it stop everybody from going up and down the close? (A.) Yes." Being asked how long Mrs M'Leish would keep the door shut at a time the witness says,—"If any of her tenants were going in she would come and open it and lock it again. That was during the daytime. (Q.) Can you tell me if she locked the door every night, or all night? (A.) No, she just locked it when she pleased. (Q.) Have you often seen people coming in, finding the door locked, and going back to Murraygate again? (A.) I have seen that. (Q.) All over the thirty years she had the place? (A.) Yes. I was not living in the close before she got the property, and do not know so much about what her father did."

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

This evidence, coming from defenders' witness, is so conclusive as to Mrs M'Leish's practice that it is hardly necessary to refer to any of the pursuer's witnesses on that point. It is fair, however, to Mrs M'Leish to mention that the same witness, viz., Mary Martin, who speaks most strongly of that lady's passionate manner, in coming out in "a great pergand" as the witness calls it, and putting away "schoolboys and the like," being asked on behalf of the defenders, by way of insinuation, whether Mrs M'Leish was "eccentric, queer!" she answers, "No, she was just ill-natured if she saw anybody go into her close. She was a fine, well-living woman." The same witness had just before said that the door "was sometimes kept locked all the day when I was young, and sometimes it was open." John Cooper, whose age is fifty-eight, says he often went up Butchart's Close prior to 1848 to get to Meadowside. "I remember of there being a door at the top of the close. I often found it shut and locked. I was a boy when I first found it shut and locked. This was during the daytime. I never considered I had a right to go up that close on account of the door being there. (Q.) Were you sometimes turned back? (A.) Always, when the door was locked. (Q.) Did anybody ever turn you back? (A.) Yes; Mrs M'Leish used to turn us back. I have gone through the close to get to my work in the morning, and been turned back. Afterwards I made a point of noticing whether the door was shut or open before I entered the close at the Murraygate end." The witness afterwards says he is certain that Mrs M'Leish turned him back a dozen times when he was a boy, but he did not give her the chance when he became a man, as he went only early in the morning, and he could see from the Murraygate end whether the door was shut, and if it was, he did not go in. He also says that he has seen the door locked during the day, more for the boys, he supposes, than for others. James Cunningham, whose age is fifty-two, and who lived at the foot of Butchart's Close from 1840 till 1865, speaks to the door being locked against the scholars when he was a boy. He says the boys very frequently annoyed Mrs M'Leish. "She often came downstairs and locked it with a key, and would not open it, perhaps, till the following morning. I have seen that happen." James Westwood, whose age is sixty-three, says that from 1832 to 1836 he wrought to a cabinet-maker in Butchart's Close, and had occasion to be there every day. "I remember the door at the upper end of it. That door was always shut and locked in the morning when I came to my work. During the daytime the door was sometimes shut, but more frequently open." In the cross-examination he says,—"We left at seven o'clock in the evening, and I have seen it locked at that time. In the winter time it was locked about twilight." Being asked whether he had gone five or six times and found it locked, he answers,—"I have gone twenty times and found it locked. That was about six o'clock in the morning, both in summer and winter." Being asked how often he had put his hand on it and found it locked, he says,—"I cannot exactly say—several times." Mrs Kelt, whose age is forty-eight, says that prior to 1840, when she was at school, the door "was sometimes shut during the day," but when it was open she and the other girls used to steal up to avoid the old lady, who turned them back, and had sometimes drenched her with water. On cross-examination the witness says,—"I found it locked dozens of times,"—that it was generally shut about ten o'clock in the morning, but not always,—that she cannot tell how often she herself put her hand on it and found it locked. "(Q.) Did you do it ten times? (A.) Oftener, I believe." Alexander Wilson, who was born in 1825, and has lived since then in the immediate neighbourhood of the close, says his recollection goes back about forty years, when he was at Hamilton's school. He speaks to the door being pretty often locked when he came out of school. He also says,—"I have found the door locked at night," and he speaks to an occasion, within the last eighteen or twenty years, when a young man, chased by the police, was caught inside the door, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, in consequence of the door being shut, the impression made on the witness by what he saw at the time obviously being that the door was locked as well as shut. Allan Macdonald speaks to the locking of the iron gate subsequent to May 1871, and Thomas Kinnear speaks to the close having been within his beat as a police-constable for about six weeks in July and August 1860, and having found the door locked on two different nights during the six weeks." The last witness I shall refer to on this point is John Martin, who was born in 1822 or 1823, and remembers the close as long as he can remember anything. He says,—"I used to play about the close forty-four years ago, and for thirty-five years or so I used to go up and down it frequently,"—the door at the Meadowside end "had a lock upon it. I used often to find it locked down to the time old Mrs M'Leish died, and to the best of my opinion I would say it was pretty steadily kept locked during her lifetime." He further says that, when he was a boy, he believes he found it locked at every hour of the day, and that he can further speak to having found it locked on various occasions after he became a lad. He adds,—"I went to be an apprentice slater when I was about sixteen years of age, and during my five years' apprenticeship I used to pass the door five or six times perhaps in a forenoon, and I repeatedly found it locked."

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

It is impossible to say that there is not here a formidable body of evidence of substantial interruptions extending, at intervals, over the whole period from the erection of Butchart's new tenement almost to the present time, coeval with the extensive use which the public have undoubtedly had during the same period of the close or passage in dispute. But, before I consider the effect of these two elements in combination, it is important to observe that the period to be taken into account, in considering whether the defenders have proved their case, is exclusively the period between the erection of that new tenement and the date of raising the present action. There is no evidence whatever of the exercise of a right of public road through the pursuer's property anterior to the erection of that tenement. The only witness who seems, at first sight, to carry the evidence of a through-going passage farther back, is the old man John Arkley, who says he has known the close since 1809, but who also says the door,—obviously meaning the door in question,—existed before he first began to go about the close, so that his knowledge of the door and of the Meadowside end of the close are coeval with each other, and it is quite clear that he neither speaks nor means to speak of any opening at that end of the close before the door was put on, which it certainly was not for some ten years after 1809. It has been suggested, however, that proof of public use during the last forty years may presume prior public use for time immemorial. But that would be a total misapplication of a principle which applies only in circumstances quite different from what we have here. Suppose a road has been shut up for the last thirty-five or thirty-eight years, but proof is adduced that for time beyond the reach of human memory, before the commencement of these years, the road had been unequivocally used as a public road, the law presumes the usage to have gone back for the prescriptive period of forty years, although human memory does not extend so far. But that principle has no application whatever to the present case, where the pursuer's evidence commences at a date quite within human memory,—namely, a date between 1818 and 1822,—probably, as I have said, about 1820, and not a single witness says that at that date there was any prior usage, either immemorial or otherwise, in the case. This of itself is conclusive,—for in the absence of all proof of immemorial usage the presumption applicable to the period prior to the date spoken to is a presumption in favour of the proprietor, who is not called upon to adduce evidence to disprove the immemorial existence of a burden which is not even pretended to have been immemorial, for it is rather remarkable that the defenders' third plea in law is based entirely on the usage as a thoroughfare for forty years and upwards, while in their fifth statement of facts this forty years' usage is carefully distinguished from the usage of cleansing and lighting (founded on in the 2d plea), which last mentioned usage is said to have been immemorial.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

But even if the presumption were not in favour of freedom, as it clearly is here, there would be no incompetency in a case like this, and, indeed, there is no incompetency in any case, in ascertaining, if you can, at what period a path or passage first came to exist and to be used by the public, and by whom and for what purpose that path had been called into existence. Our law of prescription does not limit the ascertainment of facts like these to the last forty years, and it would be most unfortunate if it did, for there can be no question that the state of facts (if ascertained), at and prior to the commencement of the forty years, does and ought very deeply to affect the complexion of all that has followed within the forty years, and the weight of the onus incumbent on the parties respectively, in a question of public road. If the proprietor can prove by parole testimony that at a date, however remote, within human memory, or if he can prove by a writing, however ancient, that he formed a particular road or path at his own expense and for his own purposes through his own ground, where no road or path previously existed, and that the path has always been and continues to be used by him for the purposes for which he made it, nobody can doubt that these facts raise a very different question and infer a very different onus on the parties respectively from what would be incumbent on them if the law were to prevent the proprietor from proving any such facts, unless they had occurred within the last forty years.

I think it impossible to read the proof in the present case, and to take into account the real evidence deducible from what the defenders have not attempted to prove, as well as from what has been proved, without being impressed with the conviction that there had been no use of the close by the public as a thorough-

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

fare before Butchart built his new tenement upon his garden,—that he then opened up the passage at his own expense for a purpose useful, and, indeed, essential to the beneficial enjoyment of his property,—that he and his successors have used the passage for that purpose ever since,—and that so long as the state of the property is not changed it is essential to their own enjoyment of it that they should continue to use the passage in a way which necessarily leaves it accessible to a considerable portion of the public. To insist upon all the members of the fifteen families who live in the close going out and in by keys only, and locking the door behind them, and all their friends, visitors, and customers getting in by ringing bells, which the inmates must answer, and passing out with an attendant to lock the door after them, would be obviously impracticable; and to have sentinels constantly on the watch to inquire into the whereabouts of every one who enters when the door is not locked, and turn back intruders who do not allege some errand in the close, would plainly be equally impracticable; so that to sustain the claim of the defenders upon the proof led by them would be very like condemning every proprietor who forms a throughgoing close to have the burden of a public road imposed upon him whether he will or not.

A public road through a garden, as Lord Neaves, I think, observed during the discussion, is not very usual. The fruit and the vegetables would be apt to disappear. If there had been such a road through Butchart's garden, before he built his new tenement upon it, there could have been no difficulty in adducing proof of the fact, and it is inconceivable that the defenders would not have attempted to do so. It is equally inconceivable that when Butchart put on a door and locked it in the face of the public nobody should have objected to the existing footroad, if there was an existing footroad, being thus obstructed; and that, on the contrary, at the fiat of a feeble old lady, for more than forty years thereafter, nobody whom she forbade to pass should have insisted on getting through, but everybody she desired to turn should have immediately turned, and gone back. I think the inference is irresistible that there had been no previous public use of a passage through the garden, even if the presumption to that effect in favour of the proprietor were not of itself sufficient, which I think it is.

The strength of the pursuer's position as proprietor of the solum, and the extent of the onus thereby thrown upon the defenders seem to me to have been somewhat overlooked by the Lord Ordinary, and hence alone, I think, has arisen any room for difference of opinion as to the result. The existence of the footroad claimed is not alluded to in the pursuer's title-deeds, either as a boundary or in any other way. The pursuer's boundary on the west is there stated to be the subjects formerly belonging to Fiethie. The law in no case presumes the existence of a public road across the private property of an individual. The onus of proving that burden rests on the party or parties alleging it. If not established by writing it must be established by proof of its uninterrupted exercise as matter of right for at least forty years. That is essential to the constitution of the right. If the interruptions have been successfully resisted by the public,—if the individuals challenged have uniformly or generally disregarded the challenge, and gone on in the face of it,—if the barriers, from time to time erected against them, have been destroyed as often as they were put up, and the proprietor has taken no legal steps to protect himself against such masterful proceedings, he may very well be held to have acquiesced in the public claim at the lapse of the prescriptive period. But here the assertion of

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

that his knowledge of the door and of the Meadowside end of the close are coeval with each other, and it is quite clear that he neither speaks nor means to speak of any opening at that end of the close before the door was put on, which it certainly was not for some ten years after 1809. It has been suggested, however, that proof of public use during the last forty years may presume prior public use for time immemorial. But that would be a total misapplication of a principle which applies only in circumstances quite different from what we have here. Suppose a road has been shut up for the last thirty-five or thirty-eight years, but proof is adduced that for time beyond the reach of human memory, before the commencement of these years, the road had been unequivocally used as a public road, the law presumes the usage to have gone back for the prescriptive period of forty years, although human memory does not extend so far. But that principle has no application whatever to the present case, where the pursuer's evidence commences at a date quite within human memory,—namely, a date between 1818 and 1822,—probably, as I have said, about 1820, and not a single witness says that at that date there was any prior usage, either immemorial or otherwise, in the case. This of itself is conclusive,—for in the absence of all proof of immemorial usage the presumption applicable to the period prior to the date spoken to is a presumption in favour of the proprietor, who is not called upon to adduce evidence to disprove the immemorial existence of a burden which is not even pretended to have been immemorial, for it is rather remarkable that the defenders' third plea in law is based entirely on the usage as a thoroughfare for forty years and upwards, while in their fifth statement of facts this forty years' usage is carefully distinguished from the usage of cleansing and lighting (founded on in the 2d plea), which last mentioned usage is said to have been immemorial.

But even if the presumption were not in favour of freedom, as it clearly is here, there would be no incompetency in a case like this, and, indeed, there is no incompetency in any case, in ascertaining, if you can, at what period a path or passage first came to exist and to be used by the public, and by whom and for what purpose that path had been called into existence. Our law of prescription does not limit the ascertainment of facts like these to the last forty years, and it would be most unfortunate if it did, for there can be no question that the state of facts (if ascertained), at and prior to the commencement of the forty years, does and ought very deeply to affect the complexion of all that has followed within the forty years, and the weight of the onus incumbent on the parties respectively, in a question of public road. If the proprietor can prove by parole testimony that at a date, however remote, within human memory, or if he can prove by a writing, however ancient, that he formed a particular road or path at his own expense and for his own purposes through his own ground, where no road or path previously existed, and that the path has always been and continues to be used by him for the purposes for which he made it, nobody can doubt that these facts raise a very different question and infer a very different onus on the parties respectively from what would be incumbent on them if the law were to prevent the proprietor from proving any such facts, unless they had occurred within the last forty years.

I think it impossible to read the proof in the present case, and to take into account the real evidence deducible from what the defenders have not attempted to prove, as well as from what has been proved, without being impressed with the conviction that there had been no use of the close by the public as a thoroughfare before Butchart built his new tenement upon his garden,—that he then opened up the passage at his own expense for a purpose useful, and, indeed, essential to the beneficial enjoyment of his property,—that he and his successors have used the passage for that purpose ever since,—and that so long as the state of the property is not changed it is essential to their own enjoyment of it that they should continue to use the passage in a way which necessarily leaves it accessible to a considerable portion of the public. To insist upon all the members of the fifteen families who live in the close going out and in by keys only, and locking the door behind them, and all their friends, visitors, and customers getting in by ringing bells, which the inmates must answer, and passing out with an attendant to lock the door after them, would be obviously impracticable; and to have sentinels constantly on the watch to inquire into the whereabouts of every one who enters when the door is not locked, and turn back intruders who do not allege some errand in the close, would plainly be equally impracticable; so that to sustain the claim of the defenders upon the proof led by them would be very like condemning every proprietor who forms a throughgoing close to have the burden of a public road imposed upon him whether he will or not.

A public road through a garden, as Lord Neaves, I think, observed during the discussion, is not very usual. The fruit and the vegetables would be apt to disappear. If there had been such a road through Butchart's garden, before he built his new tenement upon it, there could have been no difficulty in adducing proof of the fact, and it is inconceivable that the defenders would not have attempted to do so. It is equally inconceivable that when Butchart put on a door and locked it in the face of the public nobody should have objected to the existing footroad, if there was an existing footroad, being thus obstructed; and that, on the contrary, at the fiat of a feeble old lady, for more than forty years thereafter, nobody whom she forbade to pass should have insisted on getting through, but everybody she desired to turn should have immediately turned, and gone back. I think the inference is irresistible that there had been no previous public use of a passage through the garden, even if the presumption to that effect in favour of the proprietor were not of itself sufficient, which I think it is.

The strength of the pursuer's position as proprietor of the solum, and the extent of the onus thereby thrown upon the defenders seem to me to have been somewhat overlooked by the Lord Ordinary, and hence alone, I think, has arisen any room for difference of opinion as to the result. The existence of the footroad claimed is not alluded to in the pursuer's title-deeds, either as a boundary or in any other way. The pursuer's boundary on the west is there stated to be the subjects formerly belonging to Fiethie. The law in no case presumes the existence of a public road across the private property of an individual. The onus of proving that burden rests on the party or parties alleging it. If not established by writing it must be established by proof of its uninterrupted exercise as matter of right for at least forty years. That is essential to the constitution of the right. If the interruptions have been successfully resisted by the public,—if the individuals challenged have uniformly or generally disregarded the challenge, and gone on in the face of it,—if the barriers, from time to time erected against them, have been destroyed as often as they were put up, and the proprietor has taken no legal steps to protect himself against such masterful proceedings, he may very well be held to have acquiesced in the public claim at the lapse of the prescriptive period. But here the assertion of right is all on the side of the proprietor, and the acquiescence is all on the side of the public. The right of the proprietor was asserted, from first to last, by the existence of the door, locked at pleasure by night and by day, as suited himself or herself, without regard to what did or did not suit the public. That state of matters was acquiesced in by the public. Every man, woman, and child who were challenged acquiesced in the challenge, and only returned when they saw an opportunity afforded by the door standing unlocked to suit the proprietor's own exigencies and nobody on the outlook to interfere. The onus incumbent on the pursuers, to prove uninterrupted exercise of the right claimed by them for the prescriptive period, fails, even on the face of their own evidence, as we have seen from the deposition of Mrs Watson, which applies to the whole period from the putting up of the door prior to 1822 to the death of Mrs M'Leish in 1862. Day and night, during all that time, according to Mrs Watson, Mrs M'Leish exercised her pleasure over the door, and consequently over the passage, and nobody resisted. Even, however, if the onus incumbent on the defenders could be held to have been to any extent shifted by their proof, the references I have made to the proof for the pursuer would leave no doubt upon my mind that the constitution of the alleged public right has not been established.

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

If this would be the fair and legal result of the evidence apart from what is founded upon the lighting and cleansing of the close—the paving of it by the commissioners in 1867—and the occasional repairs vaguely alleged to have been previously made upon it,—I do not suppose I need detain your Lordships by remarking upon the comparative unimportance of these circumstances in a question like the present. We have more than once had occasion to lay it down that the question, what is to be held to be a street, or a public street, in the sense of a Police Act, may be, and generally is, quite different from the question, what is to be held a public street or a public footpath in a question like the present; and if the Lord Ordinary had not thought my opinion in the case of Cargill to be somewhat favourable to the view he takes on that point, I should, certainly, have thought it to be pretty clearly the other way. It is necessary that closes, whether they be thoroughfares or cul de sacs, into which the public are in use to enter, should be made safe and wholesome for the public, by being lighted and cleaned, so long as they are accessible to and used by the public, however the rights either of property or servitude may stand; and it is not incumbent on the commissioners to enter into litigation with individuals upon these points, before they can exercise their jurisdiction over such places and expend public money upon them for the safety and comfort of the public. I should have so construed the Police Statutes applicable to Dundee, even if it had not been proved to demonstration, as it is, that in practice the commissioners themselves have so construed these statutes. As to the slight repairs occasionally made on the solum of the close (proved to have been very dirty at the best), and the ultimate paving of it in 1867, these might be found, in the end, more economical methods of keeping the close clean and wholesome than constant and unsuccessful sweeping of a rough and irregular surface. The proprietor had no interest to object to such beneficial operations, but the reverse; and in no view can they be regarded as material elements in the present question.

In arriving at a conclusion hostile to the contention of the public it is consolatory to reflect that, although thieves and prostitutes, who are proved to have taken the benefit of the close since there ceased to be "a fine well-living woman," like Mrs M'Leish, to exclude them, the respectable portion of the public will lose little by the pursuer's object being carried out, of substituting for the close "commercial buildings and warehouses." Some of the defender's keenest witnesses for the vindication of public rights tell us that the close in question and other closes in Murraygate Street, which lead through to Meadowside, are situated between Panmure Street on the one hand and Meadow Entry on the other, both unexceptionable cart and carriage streets, leading direct from Murraygate to Meadowside—that the distance between these two streets, measuring along the Murraygate, is from 50 to 60 yards, and that the difference in time by taking either of them instead of the close is two or three minutes.

My opinion is that the interlocutor complained of should be recalled, and decree pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

LORD NEAVES and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The question in this case is, whether Butchart's Close in the town of Dundee is or is not a public thoroughfare between two streets of that town—the Murraygate on the one hand, and Meadowside on the other.

The pursuer, who has some property in the close, has brought the present action to have it declared that it is not a public thoroughfare, and that the public have no right to use it. The defender, Mr Thornton, clerk to and as representing the Dundee Police Commissioners, resists the action, on the ground that the close is a public thoroughfare, and as such has been used by the public for fifty years and upwards prior to the institution of the action.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the parties a proof, and as it appeared from title-deeds produced that the solum of the close belonged, to a certain extent, to the pursuer, he appointed the defender to lead in the proof. On ultimately advising the case, along with the proof, the Lord Ordinary found the defence established, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action. The pursuer has reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and the Court has now to determine whether it ought to be affirmed or altered.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is, on the grounds stated by him, well-founded, and that it ought to be adhered to.

That the close in question has for more than fifty years prior to the institution of the present action been greatly used by all classes of the inhabitants of Dundee seems to me to be indisputable on the proof. It may, indeed, well be doubted, having regard to the evidence of many of the witnesses, and especially that of Peter Gillan, William Hean, and Peter Arkley, whether it ought not to be held, on the principles given effect to in the case of Harvie v. Rodgers and Others, 3 Wilson and Shaw, p. 251, and many subsequent cases, that as the right to the use of the close in question has been shewn to have existed beyond the memory of man, it lies upon the pursuer to make out that he had, by interruptions acquiesced in, put an end to that right. It has been said, no doubt, that there were gardens at one time behind the houses in the close, which must have effectually prevented a thoroughfare from the Murraygate to Meadowside; but none of the witnesses speak to any such gardens except James M'Laren, and he merely speaks inferentially from indications on an old plan. It is true that the witness John Cooper says that he remembers a green at the back of the Murraygate houses, but he adds that the close "came down by the side of the green." I cannot see, therefore, that the pursuer's point, founded upon the assumption that there were pieces of garden ground behind the Murraygate houses which prevented the close extending to Meadowside, has been at all made out.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

Dealing, however, with the case as the Lord Ordinary appears to have done, on the footing that it lay upon the defenders to shew that for the prescriptive period before the institution of the present action the close has been used as a public thoroughfare, I am unable to resist the conviction that they have succeeded in doing so. It is said, however, by the pursuer, that the use of the close has been had, not in the exercise or assertion of right by the public, but by the tolerance merely of the pursuer and his predecessors; and in support of this contention the pursuer mainly relies upon the circumstance that for the greater part of the period embraced by the proof there was a gate kept frequently shut, and occasionally locked, at the Meadowside end of the close, which had the necessary effect of so obstructing or interrupting the alleged use of the close by the public as to prevent them acquiring by prescription the right they claim to it as a public thoroughfare. But I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the alleged obstruction was not in the circumstances sufficient. Many of the witnesses who have known and frequented the close for more than forty years do not appear to have ever seen the gate; and, with very few and unimportant exceptions, none of them say that they were by that or any other obstruction prevented from using the close whenever they required to do so. Besides, the object of having occasionally a shut or locked gate on the close seems to have been to prevent, not the legitimate use of it as a public thoroughfare, but the resort to it in the daytime of school-boys for the purpose of mischief or noisy diversion, and during the night of loose and improper characters.

In short, it appears to me that while it has been proved that Butchart's close has for forty years and upwards prior to the institution of the present action been used by the inhabitants and others frequenting the town of Dundee as a public thoroughfare whenever they required it, there has, on the other hand, been no obstruction to such use proved on the part of the pursuer sufficient to prevent the acquisition by prescriptive possession of the right claimed by the defenders. And in support of this view I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the paving and repairing of the close, since at least 1850, by the public authorities, and at the public expense, is a fact of much importance—a fact, indeed, which the pursuer has not attempted to get over or explain. It is not to be supposed that the public authorities should, out of the public rates, have paved and kept up a private close; nor can the pursuer, in the face of that fact, be permitted now, except on the clearest grounds, to maintain that the public are not entitled to the use of the close.

For these reasons, generally stated, and without entering into a minute examination of the voluminous proof in the case, which can only be properly judged of by a perusal of it as a whole, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to. The case is essentially a jury one, and therefore the verdict of the Lord Ordinary, who, as a jury, saw and heard the witnesses (an advantage which this Court has not had) ought not, I think, in the circumstances, to be interfered with.

Lord Mure concurred in the opinion of Lord Deas.

Lord Gifford.—I have found this case to be attended with great delicacy and difficulty, and, notwithstanding the very full discussion and the full consideration it has received, although I have formed an opinion I cannot say that I entertain it with much confidence.

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

On the whole, however, I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary, and although, looking to the opinions which the majority of your Lordships have expressed, I must needs feel greater diffidence than ever in the conclusion at which I had arrived, still, as I remain of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right, I think it my duty to the parties to express, very shortly, the grounds on which my opinion rests.

I concur generally in the views and reasonings of the Lord Ordinary, and in this case, as indeed in all cases of fact where the Lord Ordinary has had the advantage of himself seeing and hearing the witnesses—of observing their demeanour and judging of their intelligence—I attach very great weight to the impression which the evidence as a whole has made upon the Judge who took the evidence, and who is in a better position in many respects than a Court of review can ever be.

The question in the present case is really a jury question. Such cases are almost always tried by juries, unless some special reason can be given for a contrary course, and although when Lord Ordinary I never refused, when both parties concurred in requesting me, to accept the functions of a jury, still I cannot help regretting that the present case was not tried by jury in the ordinary way. I think a jury would have been a very appropriate tribunal for such a question.

As it is, however, the Court must dispose of the case upon the evidence just as a jury would have done, for the nature of the question is the same whatever be the form of trial, and in such cases I think it is of advantage to keep steadily in view what would have been the issue sent to a jury.

According to modern style the issue in the present case would have been "Whether for forty years, or for time immemorial, there has existed a right of way for foot-passengers through Butchart's close, Dundee, between the Murraygate and Meadowside of Dundee." This is the issue which the Court must try —a pure question of fact to be decided upon the evidence alone,—although it is quite true that the evidence must be viewed according to certain legal principles which the presiding Judge would have laid down to the jury if the case had been sent for jury trial.

Now, taking first the evidence for the defenders, the Police Commissioners of Dundee, I think it is quite clear that they have abundantly proved, by every kind of evidence and by witnesses of all classes and ranks, that the public of Dundee have for a period far exceeding forty years used Butchart's Close as a public foot-passage between Meadowside and Murraygate. For a very large number of persons it forms the shortest road, and although the saving in time by the use of Butchart's close is not very great, there being other accesses between Murraygate and Meadowside, still time is valuable in Dundee, and there can be no doubt whatever that Butchart's close was used by a large number of persons as their nearest and most convenient way. Almost all the witnesses for the Police Commissioners also prove that the public use of the close was absolutely unchallenged and uninterrupted. The public were never stopped or challenged in their free use of the close as a footpath and thoroughfare, and although one or two of the defenders' witnesses speak to the locked gate upon which the pursuer's, Mr Wallace's, case exclusively turns, I think it must be admitted that, looking to the evidence led by the Police Commissioners alone, they have abundantly proved their case. The difficulty really arises upon the evidence adduced by Mr Wallace in reference to the alleged locked gate by which he says the privacy of the close was preserved. I will return to this immediately as raising the only question in the case. In the meantime I think it of importance to keep clearly in view the effect of the proof of public general and uninterrupted use of the close.

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

It is impossible to say when the public use of the close as an open thoroughfare originally began. There is in the present case rather a scarcity of old witnesses,—a scarcity not properly accounted for. The oldest witnesses, I mean the witnesses who speak to the use of the close at the remotest period, are John Arkley, 79; Alexander Tawse, 86; James Reid 74. Arkley speaks to the close since 1809—Tawse since 1825, and Reid for fifty-four years, that is, since 1820. All say that there was public passage since they knew the close—Arkley speaking from 1809, when he was fourteen years of age. It is said that the back tenement, being the tenement next Meadowside, was built about the year 1820 or shortly before, but this nowhere distinctly appears, the only trace being that in the bond of servitude, dated August 1822, the tenement at Meadowside is said to have been then lately erected. But the expression "lately" will cover a great many years, and, as I read the evidence, I think none of the witnesses distinctly remember or describe the state of matters before the Meadowside tenement was built. There is no evidence either one way or another as to the state of possession before the Meadowside tenement was built and when the ground was used as a garden, and although the word "garden" occurs in the disposition of 1790 that may be a much older description applicable to a former state of matters. We have not the original grant, and no title older than 1790. If there was no road before the erection of the Meadowside tenement, and if that tenement was originally built about 1820, it is very strange that Mr Wallace has adduced no evidence to this effect, and should have left us without any trace of the commencement of the passage.

In this state of the evidence it is impossible to say whether, before the Meadowside tenement was built, there was or was not the same passage up by the side of the garden and into Meadowside as there was after the Meadowside tenement was erected. There was always occasion to go to the meadows for bleaching and other purposes, and no witness has been brought who can remember a time when there was not access through Butchart's Close. I do not think Mr Wallace is entitled to assume, as was done by his counsel, that the use of the passage only began after the erection of the Meadowside tenement. On the contrary, I think this is a case to which the ordinary rule applies, that possession and right of way having been proved as far back as the memory of the oldest witnesses extends, the use is presumed to have been precisely the same previous to the memory of these oldest witnesses. This was the rule laid down both in this Court and in the House of Lords in the well-known case of Harvie v. Rodgers, 8th July 1828, 3 W. and S. 251. In the present case, possession being proved up to 1809, and there being no evidence prior to that date, the possession must be held to stretch backwards as far as is necessary for the establishment of the right. In Harvie v. Rodgers only thirty-four years' possession was proved prior to interruption, but there being no contrary proof regarding prior possession, the uninterrupted possession was held to have been established for at least forty years.

Assuming, then, as I think I may, that the evidence relied on by the commissioners, taken by itself, is amply sufficient to warrant a verdict in their favour, I proceed to the only difficulty in the case, which is, whether the evidence of interruption by means of a locked gate, upon which evidence the defender in

No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

the issue relies, is sufficient to negative and overcome the case of the Police Commissioners. I think the Lord Ordinary quite rightly treats the question as an interruption of the right claimed by the public. He says, it "must be shewn that the door or gate had been used as a bar to the thoroughfare with such frequency or for such periods, although at intervals, as to give distinct notice to the public that their use as a matter of right was questioned and interrupted." I think this is the real question at issue,—Did the locked gate relied upon by Mr Wallace really form a substantial and actual interruption of the right and use had and enjoyed by the public? If it did, so that uninterrupted use for forty years cannot be affirmed, then the verdict must be for the pursuer, Mr Wallace. If, however, the gate was so used as not to form or create an interruption of the public use, then the verdict must be for the commissioners of police.

I do not intend to examine the evidence in detail, for I am only anxious to explain the principle upon which I have come, though I admit not without hesitation, to the same conclusion as that reached by Lord Ormidale and by the Lord Ordinary.

Now, it appears to me that in order to prevent the public from acquiring a right of way or passage, the interruption or stoppage of the use must be open, effectual, and distinct, so as clearly to notify to those who claim the right that it is disputed and disallowed. I think it must be such as to put the public necessarily to the choice either to submit to be deprived of the use of the road, or to vindicate their right via facti, or in a court of law.

In the present case I do not think that the locked gate was used to stop the traffic in the close in such a manner as to certiorate the public that their right of way was disputed. The use by the public was open and notorious—the gate was never used to stop the public traffic. It will not be enough to allow the traffic to flow unchallenged all day, and then merely to shut the close now and then at night, when no one requires to use it. If the public claim and are allowed free passage, it will not do merely to stop children who are annoying the residents by playing in the close. Effectually to interrupt a public use it is the public that must be stopped and not children, for although it may be true that, if there be a right of way at all, children have as much right as adults, still children have not the same means or power to vindicate their rights, and their submitting to exclusion will not affect or bind the public.

Acting as a juryman, therefore, I take the same view of the alleged interruptions that the Lord Ordinary has done. I think they are not sufficient to prevent a verdict that for more than forty years the public have had the uninterrupted use of the right of way,

I am also much moved by the evidence that the paving of the close and the upholding of the roadway in repair has been in the hands of the commissioners of police. It is true that the complete paving of the close was only in 1867, but it seems sufficiently established that for many years before the whole repairs were undertaken and carried out by the police authorities at the expense of the public. Since 1850 the close has also been drained at the public cost and as a public place. Facts like these give a colour and a character to the use of the road as a passage which greatly strengthens the case of the commissioners.

While, however, I am not able to concur in the judgment now to be pronounced by the Court, I have great satisfaction in the very full and careful

No. 100.
Mar. 9, 1875.
Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

discussion and consideration which the case has received. I quite understand and appreciate the view which the majority of your Lordships have taken, and I admit the force of the considerations by which it is supported. In a question of considerable local importance and interest I think the parties and the public of Dundee have every reason to be satisfied that the case has been most carefully, fairly, and fully tried.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—As this case belongs to the Second Division, I may shortly explain the grounds on which I entirely concur in the result arrived at in the opinion of Lord Deas. It is said that this case raises a pure question of fact. If it were so, I should be slow to differ from the Lord Ordinary, who took the proof, and saw the witnesses. But, like every case of this kind, the question of public right of way depends as much on the quality of the facts, and the legal effect of them, as on the facts themselves. On these, excepting on some isolated details, there is truly no room for doubt. That since these buildings were erected, the passage so left along the property of Butchart has been largely used as a thoroughfare by the public of Dundee must be conceded. It is equally certain that the property over which the right of way is claimed was the private property of Butchart when the building was commenced, and I think there is no evidence that there was any use of that ground as a passage, or that any existed there before that time. It was formed for the convenience of the proprietor and his expected tenants, and it seems established that at that time a door-way was constructed at the Meadowside end, on which a door capable of being locked has been maintained, with short intervals, ever since, and has been under the control of the proprietor. The important elements in the proof are, first, that the ground was originally cultivated ground, of which Butchart was the proprietor; and, second, that in the exercise of this right of property this door was, if not continuously, at least frequently and systematically, locked by the proprietor,—at night for the most part, and sometimes during the day. That this was the state of possession during the greater part of the prescriptive period admits of little doubt.

The real question on which the case turns is the legal effect of those facts. The Lord Ordinary, and my brothers who have just spoken, regard these acts of the proprietor in the light of an interruption of some supposed right in the public. I cannot so regard them. They were acts of possession by the proprietor, and as long as they continued there was and could be no use of this passage as in the exercise of a public right of way. Thus prescription never began to run, and there was no right in any one which could be interrupted by the proprietor. I have no idea that when a proprietor permits the public to use his ground as a passage during one part of each day, he is bound to explain to the public why he excludes them during the other part of it. It is enough that it suits his views to admit them during the day, and to exclude them during the night. Nor is it difficult to understand the motives of convenience which might lead to that result. Herein I think rests the fallacy of the opposite reasoning. Until possession was wholly relinquished by the proprietor the passage never was possessed by the public in virtue of a public right.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In conformity with the opinions of a majority of the seven Judges, recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons against the defender, Thomas Thornton, solicitor in Dundee, as clerk to and as representing the commissioners of police of the burgh of Dundee: Find the said defender liable in expenses," &c. No. 100.

Mar. 9, 1875. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee.

LINDSAY, PATERSON, & HALL, W.S.—LEBURN, HENDERSON, & WILSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN ALLAN AND ANOTHER, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Brown. No. 101.
JAMES GILCHRIST, Defender.—Balfour—Moncreiff.

Mar. 10, 1875. Allan v. Gilchrist.

Sale—Reparation.—A father and son raised an action of damages for breach of a contract of sale. They averred that the defender had verbally agreed to purchase the stock in trade and good-will of a baking business carried on by the father at a price to be fixed by valuation, and the property of the shop, belonging to the son, at the price of £450. That in consequence of this verbal contract the father had dismissed his apprentices, and made arrangements for retiring from business, and that by the defender refusing to implement the contract the pursuers had suffered loss. Held (1) that, in so far as the contract related to the sale of heritage, it could not be proved by parole, even to the effect of sustaining a claim of damages for non-implement; and (2) on a consideration of the record, that there was no relevant averment of a contract for the sale of the goodwill of the business and moveables apart from the heritage.

Observations (per Lord Deas) on cases of Walker v. Milne, June 10, 1823, 2 S. 379, N. E. 338; Bell v. Bell, July 9, 1841, 3 D. 1201, 13 Scot. Jur. 628; Heddle v. Baikie, Jan. 14, 1846, 8 D. 376, 18 Scot. Jur. 170.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THIS was an action by John Allan, solicitor in Banff, and his father, Alexander Allan, baker there, against James Gilchrist, baker there. The conclusions were that the defender ought to be ordained, "in implement of a contract entered into between the pursuers and the defender, on or about the 10th day of November 1874, whereby the pursuer, the said John Allan, sold to the defender the heritable subjects in the Seatown of Banff, more particularly referred to and described in the condescendence; and the pursuer, the said Alexander Allan, sold to the defender the good-will, stock in trade, and other effects of the business carried on by him as a baker, confectioner, and grocer in Banff, in a portion of said subjects,—to make payment to the pursuer, the said John Allan, of the sum of £450, being the agreed-on price of the said heritable subjects, ... and to make payment to the pursuer, the said Alexander Allan, of such a sum as shall be fixed by valuators mutually chosen . . . as the price or value of the said good-will, stock in trade, and other effects belonging to the said Alexander Allan; . . . or otherwise, . . . to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £500, in such proportions as shall be fixed in the course of the process to follow hereon, according to their respective rights and interests in the premises."

The pursuers averred that John Allan was proprietor of a dwelling-house, shop, and bakehouse in Banff, which Alexander Allan occupied, and in which he had carried on the business of a baker for thirty years; and that in October 1874 John Allan, on behalf of himself and his father, advertised the business and premises for sale as follows:—"The stock in trade and good-will of the baking and confectionery business carried on for upwards of thirty years by Mr Alexander Allan, at Nos. 5 and 6 North Castle Street, Banff, will be disposed of by private bargain. The business premises, with or without the dwelling-house, will be let on lease, or the whole premises sold, as offerers prefer. Apply to Mr Allan, or John Allan, solicitor, Banff.—Banff, 19th Oct. 1874." (Cond. 4) "Immediately on the advertisement appearing the defender put himself into communication with both pursuers. In the course of their communings the pursuer, the said John Allan, explained to the defender that he would

No. 101.
Mar. 10, 1875.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

under no circumstances accept him as a tenant, and that he would only transact with him on the footing of his proposing to acquire the property of the subjects and the good-will of the business. This the defender stated to be his sole intention and desire." That, on 10th November 1874, the defender came to John Allan's office. "Some conversation took place between the defender and the said John Allan as to the terms and conditions of sale, and the said John Allan finally agreed to sell, and did sell to the defender the said heritable subjects, including the grates and gas-fittings therein, at £450, being the amount of Mr Booker's valuation. The said John Allan, also on behalf of his father, the said Alexander Allan, and with his authority and instructions, sold to the defender the good-will, stock in trade, and other effects of the business as a baker, confectioner, and grocer, carried on by the said Alexander Allan, including the whole shelving, counters, and fittings in the shop and bakehouse, and business tools, on condition that the price of the said good-will, stock in trade, shelving, counters, fittings, business tools, and other effects, should be fixed by valuation afterwards to be made, and that the entry should be immediate, or as soon as arrangements for the valuation could be made."

It was not stated that any valuation was ever made.

In art. 11 the pursuers stated that they stopped negotiations with other parties, who contemplated purchasing the subjects and the business, and that Alexander Allan had intimated to his customers his retirement from business, and solicited their patronage for the defender, that he had discharged his apprentices, and made other arrangements for giving up business.

On 23d November John Allan received a letter from the defender's solicitor stating that, "with reference to the communings which he has had with you as to taking up your father's business in the Seatown, he has come to the conclusion that it will be his wise course to refrain from taking it up in the meantime."

In art. 16 the pursuer, Alexander Allan, stated that he had suffered serious loss in having to resume business, through loss of customers and otherwise.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender was bound to implement the contract of sale. (2) He was barred from resiling by rei interventus. (3) At least the pursuers were entitled to damages.

The defender denied that the pursuers gave an accurate account of the verbal contract, and further pleaded;—(3) The action cannot be maintained, or at least it cannot be maintained in so far as it relates to the heritable subjects libelled, in respect that no written agreement for the purchase and sale of the said subjects was ever entered into between the pursuers, or either of them, and the defender. (4) In respect that no such written agreement was entered into, the defender was entitled to resile from the verbal arrangement relative to the heritage entered into between him and the pursuer, John Allan, as above set forth.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th January 1875, allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Damages could not be sought for breach of a contract of which implement could not be enforced. The pursuers, by withdrawing the conclusions for implement, admitted that they could not enforce implement of the verbal bargain regarding the

* A minute for the pursuers was lodged in the Outer-House, restricting the conclusions to those for damages. It was lodged on 28th January, but both parties stated in the Inner-House that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor proceeded on the footing that the conclusions had been restricted to damages, and that a minute to that effect was to be put in.

No. 101.

Mar. 10, 1875.

Allan v. Gilchrist.

heritage; and the bargain regarding the good-will of the business, and the fittings, &c., was dependent on and inseparably bound up with that regarding the house and shop.

The pursuers argued;—There were cases, and this was one, in which a party was entitled to damages for the loss caused by breach of a contract, even though implement of the contract might not be enforceable.[1]

At advising on 5th March 1875,—

LORD DEAS.—This action is instituted by John Allan, solicitor, Banff, and Alexander Allan, baker, his father, against James Gilchrist. The summons sets forth that on or about 10th November 1874 John Allan sold to the defender the heritable subjects mentioned in the summons for the price of £450; and farther, that about the same time the father, or the son authorised by him, sold to the defender the good-will, stock in trade, and other effects connected with the business which the father was carrying on as a baker in those heritable subjects, together with the fittings, business tools, &c. The price of the good-will and fittings, &c., was not fixed, but was to be afterwards fixed by valuation. Nothing moveable was to be included in the price of the heritable subjects except the gas-fittings.

On 27th January last the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor,—"Having heard counsel for the parties, allows them a proof of their respective averments, so far as not admitted." The first question is, whether it is competent to allow a proof prout de jure of a sale of an heritable subject. I take it to be quite clear that such a proof is altogether incompetent. To instruct a bargain about heritage there must be a probative writ, or the oath of the party. That has been repeatedly decided. It was so held, for instance, in Walker v. Flint, 20th Feb. 1863, 1 Macph. 417. That was a judgment of the Second Division. It was a case of verbal lease for three years, said to have been followed by rei interventus. The previous case of Gowans' Trustees v. Carstairs, 18th July 1862 (24 D. 1382), in this Division, was to the same effect. In both of these cases there were full opinions delivered, and the law was laid down that a verbal bargain regarding heritage can only be proved by oath of party, although, when so proved, there may be proof by parole of rei interventus. In the present case there is no offer of a reference to oath; but the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof at large, which is quite contrary to all the authorities. I therefore think that we cannot adhere to that interlocutor.

It appears, however, that the pursuer has, by a minute, abandoned his conclusions for implement. The minute is said to have been lodged in the Outer-House. It bears to have been lodged the day after the interlocutor under review had been pronounced. That interlocutor makes no reference to any minute or partial abandonment, but the minute being now before us, the question arises, whether, the conclusions for implement having been abandoned, the pursuer's averments may be competently proved by parole, with a view to damages.

I am of opinion that there is no averment in this record relevant to infer a claim of damages.

It seems a tolerably clear proposition that there can, in no proper sense, be a claim for damages for breach of contract unless it be legally proved that there

[1] Walker v. Milne, June 10, 1823, 2 S. 379 (N. E. 338); Bell v. Bell, July 9, 1841, 3 D. 1201, 13 Scot. Jur. 628; Heddle v. Baikie, Jan. 14, 1846, 8 D. 376, 18 Scot. Jur. 170.

No. 101.

Mar. 10, 1876.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

was a contract. If the contract be legally proved the party is entitled to specific implement, and if his opponent has either made a contract which he had not the power to make, or has subsequently deprived himself of the power to implement it, he will be liable in damages for breach of that contract. But a claim of damages where it is not proved that there ever was a contract must rest upon some other ground than breach of contract.

Accordingly it will be found that, in the only two cases which can be represented as countenancing such a claim, viz., Walker v. Milne, and Heddle v. Baikie, possession of the subjects had followed, and what was recognised was really not a claim of damages for breach of contract, but a claim for reimbursement of substantial loss occasioned to the one party by the representations and inducements recklessly and unwarrantably held out to him by the other party.

In the first of these cases, Walker v. Milne, 10th June 1823, 2 S. 338 (2d edit.), the subscribers to Lord Melville's monument had agreed, by certain improbative writings, to erect the monument on Sir Patrick Walker's lands of Coates, then in the course of being feued for streets of houses, which are now there. The subscribers took possession of the site, broke up the ground and performed various operations upon it, whereby Sir Patrick was induced to alter the drains and levels of the streets he was forming, and to change his feuing plans. Thereafter the subscribers changed their minds and erected the monument where it now stands, in St Andrew Square. The Lord Ordinary (Meadowbank), in respect of the improbative nature of the writings, assoilzied the defenders from the conclusion for implement, and also from the alternative conclusion for damages. The Court altered so far as to find "that the pursuer is entitled to indemnification for any actual loss and damage he may have sustained, and for the expenses incurred in consequence of the alteration of the site of the monument," and (as appears from the subsequent reports, 3 S. p. 82 and 333) remitted to the Lord Ordinary to receive a specific condescendence of the actual loss; but the relevancy of the items of that alleged loss does not appear ever to have been settled or the case brought to any judicial conclusion.

The second case mentioned—Heddle v. Baikie, 14th January 1846, 8 D. 376—was still more special in its circumstances. These are very imperfectly stated in the brief report just cited, which is calculated to mislead. A previous branch of the litigation is reported under date 16th January 1841 (3 D. 370), but that also leaves imperfect the history of the disputes and litigation, which lasted for upwards of fourteen years, the particulars of which I have fully ascertained from the session papers, and, as the point of law is important, I shall summarise them here.

Heddle's predecessors had been the tenants of the farm of Rinnibister under a succession of leases from the predecessors of Baikie for upwards of half a century prior to Martinmas 1825, when, the farm being advertised to be let, Heddle, whose father (then an old man) was the outgoing tenant, applied for a nineteen years' lease, which he alleged was agreed to, and accordingly he,—that is, Heddle the younger,—was allowed to assume and keep possession for six or seven years, during which he expended money in repairing and building houses on the farm, taking in waste land, and otherwise improving the subjects. At the lapse of that time decree of removing was obtained against him before the Sheriff, in consequence of his having admitted, on a reference to his oath, that he had intimated his intention to leave the farm because a written lease had been refused to him. After this decree had been

No. 101.
Mar. 10, 1875.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

extracted and a charge given Heddle presented a suspension and interdict, and raised a reduction of the decree, coupled with a declarator of his right to a lease and to reimbursement and damages. A record was closed in the suspension and interdict on 13th January 1835, and in the reduction on 15th February 1840, and on the 25th of this last month the two actions were conjoined. In the meantime, under warrants of the Sheriff, dated 12th November 1832 and 28th February 1833, Heddle and his family had been ejected and the farm let to and taken possession of by a new tenant. In January 1840, Heddle having by this time been out of possession for seven years, lodged a minute in the reduction and declarator, abandoned the conclusion for specific implement (which had become impracticable), but reserved the other conclusions of the summons and his right to bring an action for damages. On 16th January 1841 the Court (altering an interlocutor of Lord Murray, Ordinary) found it proved, by Heddle's oath under the reference in the Sheriff-court, that he had given the alleged intimation of his intention to leave the farm in consequence of being refused a written lease, and, on this ground, repelled the reasons of suspension (except as to the inferior Court expenses), and in the reduction and declarator they sustained the defences and assoilzied Baikie with modified expenses, which were afterwards taxed at £180, under deduction of £4, 16s. 11d. of Sheriff-court expenses. The House of Lords however, upon an appeal for Heddle in forma pauperis, reversed (March 9, 1843, 15 Scot. Jur. 559) the interlocutor which had thus been pronounced in the conjoined actions, ordered that Heddle should have his expenses in these actions, and remitted to this Court to proceed accordingly. This judgment was applied on 23d May 1843, and decree for expenses in the conjoined actions was thereafter given in Heddle's favour.

It was after all this that Heddle raised the new action in which the Court, on 14th January 1846, repelled the objections to the two first issues printed in the report of that date, including the objection of res judicata, which was the main one urged and discussed. But the position of Heddle when he obtained these issues was obviously very peculiar. After having been seven or eight years in possession as tenant he had been ejected under a decree and warrants which, at the lapse of ten years after the ejection, were set aside, as wrongous and illegal. According to the judgment of the House of Lords, Heddle ought never to have been removed from the farm. If he had been still in possession he might, at the worst, have referred the alleged agreement for a lease to Baikie's oath, and, if the oath was affirmative, he might then have proved the rei interventus by parole. Baikie's illegal and oppressive proceedings had, long before this time rendered any attempt of this kind useless, and it would have been most inequitable to have held that Heddle was thereby deprived of all redress. But it is material to observe that even the first issue granted in these circumstances was based on Heddle's "having entered as tenant into the lands and farm" at Martinmas 1825, and that the damage alleged to have resulted from the wrongful failure to grant a lease in his favour was not damage for breach of contract, but damage sustained after possession had been ceded to him, and while the illegal and oppressive proceedings just detailed were going on.

Then, as to the second issue, it affords a still better example of a relevant claim of damages, not for breach of an unproved contract, but for actual loss sustained in consequence of the unjustifiable representations and inducements made and held out by the one party to the other, contrary to all good faith.

The issue in Heddle's case was in these terms:— "Whether the said defenders induced the pursuer to enter into the possession and management of the said farm and to execute various meliorations and repairs, and to expend various sums thereon in improving and labouring the same, on the understanding that he was to receive from the defender a lease of the same for the period of nineteen years; and whether the defender is indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the sum of £380, as per schedule annexed, or any part thereof, as the amount of said meliorations and expenditure."

No. 101. Mar. 10, 1875. Allan v. Gilchrist.

That is obviously very different from an issue, which I am humbly of opinion could not be granted, whether the defender had verbally agreed to grant a lease (or, as the case might be, to grant a disposition) in favour of the pursuer, and, in breach of that agreement, had refused to grant such lease (or disposition) to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer.

There can, I think, in no correct sense, be an action of damages for breach of an agreement or contract where there is no legal evidence of such agreement or contract, and it is in order to make it clear that neither of the two cases I have cited are authorities for a contrary doctrine that I have gone into them, and particularly into the case of Heddle v. Baikie, so fully as I have done.

Even when the action is based upon the subsequent conduct of the one party in misleading the other to expend his money on illusory grounds, we have no instance of the claim being entertained for general damage, as distinguished from actual and specific loss, which was what the claim embodied in the first issue in Heddle v. Baikie involved.

The case of Bell v. Bell, 9th July 1841, 3 D. 1201, rested on a different and clearer principle than either of the two cases just mentioned, viz., that no man is entitled, mala fide, to enrich himself at the expense of another. The pursuer in that case had been induced, by the defender's promise to convey to him a certain piece of ground, to build a house on the ground at the cost of £270. The defender thereafter gratuitously conveyed the ground, with the house upon it, to a member of his own family, who raised an action of removing and ejection against the pursuer. The pursuer raised an action, not for damages for breach of bargain, but for payment of the £270, and the action was held relevant, on the footing that the defender had mala fide or fraudulently induced the pursuer to build. Here, again, the pursuer had been put in possession of the subject, and the sum claimed was not damages generally, but the specific sum expended. Any fraudulent inducement to expend the money would, equally with the promise of a conveyance, have supported the claim. In the case now before us, it is most important to observe that no possession is alleged. No specific sums of expenditure or even of loss are condescended on by the pursuer. He says there was a loan of £250 heritably secured over the property, and in order to the loan being continued he, being himself a law-agent, had prepared a discharge of the bond with a view to a new bond being granted by the defender. But he does not specify the expense of that discharge, nor explain why a new bond should have been thought necessary in place of allowing the existing bond to continue to affect the subjects. Neither does he explain why he did not first prepare the disposition (which he admits he was to do without charging for it) and get it executed, instead of prematurely preparing a discharge of the bond, which never became available. This claim can in no view give relevancy to the only conclusion which now remains in the action, and everything else set forth in support of that conclusion is still more obviously vague, general, and irrelevant.

But while I am of the opinion I have expressed as regards the heritable

No. 101.
Mar. 10, 1875.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

subjects, and the pecuniary conclusions connected with these subjects, I have to observe that the alleged bargain as to the moveable subjects, if it can be separately dealt with, may, of course, be proved by parole testimony, and it may be right to allow the pursuer to state in a minute, if so advised, what course he proposes to follow as to that part of his case.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This action is laid on the footing that one contract was made for the sale of heritable subjects, and another contract for sale of good-will of business, and stock in trade. The price of the heritable subjects is said to be £450, and that sum is said to be due, or otherwise damages in place of implement.

That is the case on the summons and on the record. I do not think there are averments relevant and sufficient to support a conclusion for damages to the pursuers on any other footing. The record is not here framed to meet a case like the case of Walker v. Milne, 10th June 1823, which has been founded on. That decision is not in point. The circumstances in that case of Walker were peculiar, and were stated on record, and important admissions were there made. It appears to me that the case of Walker was very special, and that nothing but the very special and exceptional circumstances of the case can support the judgment. It is on its facts so peculiar that it is not a safe authority where the circumstances are different, and I think they are different in the case before us. Neither is the case of Bell, nor the case of Heddle v. Baikie, in point. On the pursuer's own averments the case before us and the cases referred to are quite different. The law applicable to the case as here stated is clear. A contract for sale of heritable property cannot be proved by parole. No other proof has been offered, and even if a verbal contract were proved, nothing really of the nature of rei interventus has been averred. A proof at large of the allegation of a contract for sale of heritage cannot, in my opinion, be allowed. That is well settled. I need only mention the case of Gowans v. Carstairs, 18th July 1862; but there are many authorities to the same effect. Then there being no proof of contract, written or verbal, there is no room for applying the principle that resiling is barred rei interventu. I concur in the views on that point expressed by all the Judges in this Division who decided the case of Gowans.

I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary allowing proof should be recalled. No reference to oath has been proposed, and no rei interventus has been relevantly averred, and no foundation is laid for a claim of damages, unless on the assumption that a contract has been proved, and that implement is due.

In so far as regards the alleged sale of heritable property, or as regards the demand for damages in relation to that contract, I concur in the opinion just delivered, and in recalling the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

In regard to an alleged separate or separable contract for sale of good-will, and of stock in trade, it is possible that the pursuer, Alexander Allan, may be in a different position. It occurs to me that if this pursuer, Alexander Allan, has, on this subject, a separate case which he can establish, he will succeed better in a separate action. But if he prefers to lodge a minute in this action to meet an objection to relevancy, and to undertake a separate proof apart from the alleged sale of heritage, I am disposed to allow him an opportunity of doing so.

LORD MURE concurred.

No. 101.
Mar. 10, 1875.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent, but Lord Deas stated that he was understood to concur in the judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced on 5th March 1875:—"Recall the interlocutor of Lord Young reclaimed against: Find that so far as regards the heritable subjects libelled parole proof of the alleged verbal contract is incompetent: Find that no reference to oath is offered by the pursuer, John Allan, in regard to that alleged contract: Find that no relevant claim of damages is stated in the record in respect of or arising out of a breach of that alleged contract: Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action for implement and damages in so far as relates to that alleged contract, and decern; but before answer as to the claim made by or for behoof of the pursuer, Alexander Allan, for implement of the alleged verbal bargain as to the good-will of the business and other articles libelled, appoint a minute to be lodged for the said Alexander Allan stating what course is now intended to be pursued with reference to that claim, and for that purpose continue the cause in the roll till Tuesday next: Find the pursuer, John Allan, liable to the defender in the expense hitherto incurred," &c.

The pursuer, Alexander Allan, accordingly lodged a minute stating that he insisted in his claim for damages in so far as regarded the good-will of the business, shop-fittings, &c.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In disposing of this case I think we must keep in view the interlocutor of 5th March. A minute has been accordingly put in, in which the pursuer, Alexander Allan, states that he insists in his claim for damages, in so far as regards the good-will of the business, shop-fittings, &c. By the minute lodged in the Outer-House the claim of the pursuers was restricted to a claim of damages. Therefore, the conclusion now insisted in is the conclusion for damages, and, as I understand it, damages incurred by the breach of that part of the alleged contract between the parties which relates to moveable subjects. Now, there cannot be a claim of damages for non-implement unless there could have been a claim for implement. Could there, then, have been a claim for implement of this part of the contract apart from the other part which related to the heritable subjects in which John Allan was interested? That may be tested in this way. Suppose that the Allans had wanted to get rid of their contract as regards the heritage, but asked implement of it as regards the moveables, they would thus be entitled to demand that the defender should purchase and pay for the good-will and fittings of a business carried on in premises of which he was not to get possession. That would be a strange demand, particularly looking to the position taken up by the pursuers on record. They say that as soon as the subjects were advertised the defender put himself into communication with them, and John Allan explained to him "that he would under no circumstances accept him as a tenant, and that he would only transact with him on the footing of his proposing to acquire the property of the subjects and the good-will of the business." Thus the two things were inseparably tied together according to the allegation of the pursuers themselves. Throughout the whole communings of the parties, as set forth on the record, the two things are treated as the subject of one indivisible contract. I have, therefore, no doubt that this claim is in tirely irrelevant, and that we could not enforce this part of the claim separately from and independently of the other. No. 101.

Mar. 10, 1875.
Allan v. Gilchrist.

LORD DEAS and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships that this bargain was indivisible, and that as implement of it could not have been enforced as regards the heritage, it could not have been enforced as regards any part of the contract, and I also agreed in holding, when the case was last before us, that no relevant claim of damage for non-implement had been stated on the part of the pursuer, John Allan, with reference to the heritable property. But the question which we have now to decide is, whether a relevant claim of loss and damage has been stated by the pursuer, Alexander Allan, for breach of contract in regard to the good-will of the business, stock in trade, and other things condescended on, and on this I have considerable difficulty in concurring, having regard to the rule laid down in the case of Walker v. Milne, and in the subsequent case of Bell, for, as I read those decisions, it was there settled that although a party may not be able to enforce implement of a bargain affecting heritage he is entitled to indemnification for any actual loss and damage he may have sustained, and for any expense he may have been put to, through failure to implement. And so standing the law, I am not, as at present advised, prepared to hold that there is nothing stated by Alexander Allan on this record, and particularly in the 11th and 16th articles of the condescendence (vide supra, p. 588), which amounts to a relevant averment of actual loss and expense arising out of, or occasioned by, the breach of that part of the contract which did not relate to heritage. If these averments had been stated specifically in a separate action it rather appears to me that the case would have fallen within the principles of Walker v. Milne, and I have difficulty, looking to the authority of that case, and of the subsequent decisions, in saying that these averments, even as put in the present action, are not relevant to go to proof.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find the claim made by the said Alexander Allan, as stated in the said minute, is not founded on any relevant allegation of damages for breach of contract: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the whole conclusions of the summons, so far as not already disposed of, and decern: Find the pursuer, Alexander Allan, liable to the defender in expenses," &c.

GEORGE ANDREW, S.S.C.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM FRASER AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
ROBERT CARRUTHERS AND ANOTHER, Defenders.—Kinnear. No. 102.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Fraser v. Carruthers.

Right in Security—Jus cedendarum actionum—Assignation.—A creditor in a debt, heritably secured, was also assignee of a liferenter of the burdened subject. The fiar having tendered payment of the debt and demanded an assignation, held (in deciding a question of expenses) that the creditor was entitled to qualify the assignation with the condition that if the interest were regularly paid the assignation should not be used in prejudice of the liferent right.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie.

THE following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note:—"In 1844 William Bennet disponed certain subjects in Inverness to Mrs Fraser in liferent, and to Daniel Fraser, and the pursuers William Fraser

No. 102.
Mar. 11, 1875.
Fraser v. Carruthers.

and Margaret Fraser, her three children, share and share alike, in fee, under the real and preferable reserved burden of £700, part of the price. Mrs Fraser also granted a personal bond to Mr Bennet for the said sum of £700. Mrs Fraser for her right of liferent, and her three children as fiars in equal pro indiviso shares, were infeft in 1851 in the said subjects, but under the said reserved real burden. Mrs Fraser was sequestrated in 1853, and in 1855 the trustee in her sequestration sold and disponed for £480 her liferent right and interest in the subjects, but under the said reserved burden of £700, to Andrew Smith, who was infeft in 1855. On 20th July 1858, Mr Bennet, as in right of the said reserved real burden, obtained decree of adjudication against Mrs Fraser and her three children, whereby the subjects were adjudged from them to him for payment and satisfaction of the said sum of £700, with interest from Whitsunday 1858, and a fifth part more of said principal sum as penalty, amounting, the said sums as accumulated at the date of the decree, to £840, and of the annual rent of said accumulated sum during the not redemption. Mr Smith, who was in right of the liferent, thereafter acquired from Mr Bennet right to the reserved burden and to the decree of adjudication, and in 1869 Messrs Carruthers, the defenders, acquired from him under separate dispositions and assignations Mrs Fraser's liferent right and interest in the subjects, but under the real burden and the said reserved burden and accumulated sum in the adjudication, with the decree itself, and whole grounds and warrants thereof. The interest on the reserved burden has been paid, but the principal sum and penalty as accumulated in the decree of adjudication have not been paid.

"The defenders having threatened to obtain decree of declarator of expiry of the legal the pursuers tendered the defenders the sum of £700, along with the expenses incurred under the penalty and the interest thereof, and required, on payment of these sums, a disposition and assignation in their favour of the fee of the subjects and of the decree of adjudication, with its whole grounds and warrants. The defenders having refused to grant such a conveyance, on the ground that it would prejudicially affect their right to Mrs Fraser's liferent of the subjects, the pursuers consigned in bank, in name of their and of the defenders' agents, the sum of £700 on 5th March 1873, and offered to pay or consign the amount of expenses falling under the penalty, with interest thereon immediately upon the defenders' rendering an account of these expenses.

"In these circumstances the pursuers have raised the present action, in which they conclude for decree of declarator that the defenders are bound to grant in their favour a disposition and assignation of the decree of adjudication, with its grounds and warrants, and of the heritable subjects described therein (reserving Mrs Fraser's liferent interest) heritably, but under reversion according to law, and of the sums of money, principal, interest, and penalty, contained in the reserved burden; and also for decree ordaining the defenders, as holders of Mrs Fraser's liferent interest, to pay them the interest on the reserved burden of £700 from 5th March 1873 (being the date when they consigned that amount in bank), and during the subsistence of Mrs Fraser's liferent, together with the interest on the sum to which the penalty may be restricted in this action, from the date of payment or consignation thereof."

The defenders stated on record;—"The defenders have, since defences were lodged on 9th December 1873, been willing and desirous to assign to the pursuers the said real burden and decree of adjudication, provided the assignees would allow a clause to be inserted in the assignation to the effect that so long as the interest on the real burden was regularly paid the parties in right of said burden, decree, and personal bond.

No. 102.
Mar. 11, 1875.
Fraser v. Carruthers.

would not do anything or adopt any proceedings which might prejudicially affect or interfere with the liferent right and interest presently vested in the defenders. But the pursuers declined to allow such clause to be inserted."

The Lord Ordinary, on 26th May 1874, assoilzied the defenders.*

They reclaimed. After some correspondence, it was agreed, before the case came before the Inner-House, that an assignation should be granted, and a clause should be inserted to the effect "that so long as the interest on the real burden was regularly paid the parties in right of said burden, decree, and personal bond, would not use their said right, or the said assignation, to the effect of doing or adopting any proceedings which might prejudicially affect or interfere with the liferent right and interest presently vested in the defenders."

The question of expenses was argued in the Inner-House.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an important question, though it resolves itself into one of expenses. The defenders have acquired right to the liferent of these subjects, and also to a real burden over them for £700, and a decree of adjudication for payment of that sum and interest. The pursuers are in right of the fee. They were desirous of paying off the debt, and tendered payment, but in return they asked that instead of granting a discharge the defenders should assign to them the decree of adjudication. Now, I think they were entitled to ask for an assignation, but subject to the condition that the rights and interests of the other party shall not be prejudiced by its being granted. The right to an assignation is a right in equity, and he that asks equity must give equity. But the assignation would be inequitable if it had the effect of defeating or prejudicing the rights of one of the parties. Accordingly, the question between the parties is, In what terms is the assignation to be granted? or rather, as it has come to be, How is it to be qualified so as to protect the just interests of the defenders?

On the 26th December 1873 the defenders' agents wrote proposing that the

---

* "NOTE— . . . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers are not entitled to decree as concluded for by them, because the assignation claimed by them would injuriously affect the defenders' right to Mrs Fraser's liferent of the subjects. The legal obligation of the defenders, as creditors in right of the reserved burden and under the decree of adjudication, is, on receiving payment of their debt, to grant a discharge. This they are willing to do. The right of the pursuers as debtors to demand an assignation is a mere claim in equity which the defenders are not bound to implement, if they can shew that such an assignation would be prejudicial to them, and that it is contrary to equity to compel them to grant it. Now, if the pursuers were to obtain such an assignation they might use the right thereby acquired against the defenders' right to the liferent, and not only give them annoyance and trouble, but also expose them to loss. The defenders judicially offer (defences, stat. 22) to assign the real burden and decree of adjudication, if the pursuers will agree to insert in the assignation a clause providing that, so long as the interest on the real burden is regularly paid, they will not adopt proceedings which might prejudicially affect or interfere with the liferent right. But the pursuers refuse to accept this very reasonable offer, and insist upon an unconditional assignation as their legal right. As the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers have no such legal right, and are not in the circumstances entitled in equity to such an assignation, he has assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons. (Erskine, 3, 5, 11; 2, 12, 66; Mitchell v. M'Kinlay, 4 D. 634)."

No. 102.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Fraser v. Carruthers.

assignation should be qualified by "a clause freeing and relieving Messrs Carruthers of all risk and consequences of having granted it, and stipulating that the party in right of the real burden and adjudication shall not do anything or adopt any proceedings which can prejudicially affect or interfere with the liferent right and interest vested in Messrs Carruthers, so long as it subsists."

Now, the defenders were not entitled to ask for that qualification. It went a great deal too far. It would have prevented the assignee not merely from using the assignation, but any right or title vested in his person so as to prejudice the cedent. But all the cedent is entitled to is that he shall not be prejudiced by granting the assignation. The pursuers' agents do not appear at first to have understood the clause in that sense, but they ask to have it explained before finally concluding the transaction. The matter was made plain by the letter of the defenders' agents of 21st January, in which they say,—"It is easy to see your clients might attempt to raise actions of maills and duties, and otherwise interfere with and give our clients trouble in their possession and management of the property. Besides, though we are speaking from memory, we think you will find somewhere in course of our long correspondence you indicated that questions of relief might be raised as between fiar and liferenter. Against all these things our clients must be protected by the clause in question, otherwise they will prefer to allow matters to remain as they are."

Now, although the assignation might have enabled the pursuers to raise actions of maills and duties against the defenders, questions of relief between fiar and liferenter had nothing to do with the pursuers' character as assignees, but the possibility of their occurring arose from the fact that the pursuers possessed the character of fiars. I therefore apprehend that that is a risk against which the defenders were not entitled to be protected. Then, on 31st January, the pursuers' agents made a proposition which went beyond what they were bound to do. They agreed to bind "the holders of the assignation (1) not to raise an action of maills and duties so long as the interest on the reserved burden is regularly paid, and (2) not to raise the question of relief against Mrs Fraser (or the liferented rents)."

If that proposition had been accepted, I think the defenders would have got more than they were entitled to. But it was not accepted. It is plain from the correspondence that down to this time, January 1874, the defenders were taking up a position which they were not entitled to assume. Matters stood over for some time. Then, at the beginning of the winter session, when the case was about to come here on a reclaiming note, another proposition was made by the pursuers on 14th October 1874, "that the pursuers shall accept the assignation tendered, on the clause insisted on by the defenders being altered so as to limit the obligation on the assignee to not using the assignation or rights thereby assigned to the prejudice of the liferent right."

I think that was just the clause which the defenders were entitled to, and so they came to think themselves on reflection, for they then agreed to it on 15th October. But down to this date they had asked for a clause different in meaning and effect, both in the correspondence and on record. The question occurs, what ought to have been the end of the case at that date. The dispute was settled, and only a question of expenses remained. As at that date it appears to me both parties were to blame. The pursuers had come into Court demanding an absolute and unqualified assignation. On the other hand, the defenders, besides maintaining other pleas, said they were entitled to a clause to which they were not entitled. In these circumstances, as at that date, I think neither party were entitled to expenses. But further expenses were incurred. Why was the matter not settled then? On 14th, and again on 26th October, the pursuers proposed that each party should pay their own expenses. Being of opinion that that proposal was right, I think the expense which was incurred by further and useless discussion must be borne by the party who caused it, and therefore that the pursuers are entitled to their expenses from 20th October, that is to say, the expenses in the Inner-House.

No. 102.

Mar. 11, 1875.
Fraser v. Carruthers.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, Ordinary, of date May 26, 1874, reclaimed against: Dismiss the action as now unnecessary, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to the expenses incurred by them since 26th October 1874, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account of the said expenses, and report: Quoad ultra find no expenses due to or by either party."

MACARA & CLARK, W.S.—ADAM & SANG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 103.

Mar. 13, 1875.
Cofton v. Cofton.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.

MRS JANET RITCHIE OR COFTON, Pursuer.—Rhind.
JOSEPH COFTON, Defender.

Process—Lost Interlocutor Sheet—A.S. 28th December 1838, sec. 11—Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 15.—In an undefended action of divorce, after decree had been pronounced, the interlocutor sheet, kept in terms of A.S. 24th December 1838, sec. 11, was improperly lent out by the clerk, and was lost. Held, on report of Lord Craighill, that the lost interlocutor sheet was not an "original writ" which could be replaced under the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 15.*

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 104.

Mar. 13, 1875.
Young v. Robertsons.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

CHARLES DENOON YOUNG, Complainer.—J. P. B. Robertson.
D. and W. ROBERTSON, Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

Suspension and Liberation—Bankrupt—Caution for Expenses.—A bankrupt is entitled to bring and prosecute a suspension of diligence which has attached or may attach his person without finding caution for expenses, although it may raise large and intricate questions of accounting between him and the incarcerating creditors.

THIS note of suspension and liberation was brought at the instance of C. D. Young, ironfounder, Perth, a sequestrated bankrupt, against D. and W. Robertson, iron merchants, Dundee.

The complainer set forth that on 24th June 1874 he had been charged on a bill for £692, 16s. 3d. drawn by the respondents upon and accepted by his firm of C. D. Young and Company on 31st January 1874; that

* 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 15).—"Where a summons, petition, or other original writ or pleading is lost or destroyed, a copy thereof, proved in the cause to the satisfaction of the Court before whom the cause is depending at the time, and authenticated in such manner as he or they shall require, may be substituted, and shall be held equivalent to the original for the purposes of the action."

No. 104.
Mar. 13, 1875.
Young v. Robertsons.

subsequent to the date of the said acceptance the respondents, in security of the sum contained in the bill, were put in possession of goods, the nature and amount of which were specified in detail, and which largely exceeded in value the amount of the said acceptance; that these goods had been realised and the proceeds received by the respondents; that, further, by memorandum of agreement, entered into in March 1874 between C. D. Young and Company on the one hand, and the respondents and certain other firms on the other, it was agreed that large remittances due to C. D. Young and Company should be received by the respondents, and that the respondents should discharge C. D. Young and Company of all their claims; that such remittances had accordingly been received by the respondents, but they had not yet executed a discharge in favour of C. D. Young and Company; that there was not at the date of the charge any sum due by the complainer under the bill; and that notwithstanding these facts he was, on 1st July 1874, imprisoned at the instance of the respondents.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The complainer is entitled to immediate liberation, in respect his detention in prison is illegal and wrongful. (2) No debt having been due at the date of the charge complained of, the said charge is wrongous and illegal, and ought to be suspended. (3) In virtue of the agreement libelled, the respondents were not entitled to charge the complainer as aforesaid.

The note was passed on 16th July 1874, and a record was made up in the Court of Session, and closed on 3d November 1874.

On 16th December 1874 the Lord Ordinary allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments, and to each a conjunct probation, and fixed the diet of proof for 4th February 1875.

On 6th January 1875 a motion was made by the respondents for an order on the complainer to find caution for expenses before further procedure in the cause. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion, and his interlocutor was acquiesced in.

On 19th January 1875 the diet of proof was postponed from 4th February to 11th March 1875.

On 3d March 1875 the respondents renewed their motion for an order on the complainer to find caution before further procedure. This motion the Lord Ordinary again refused.

The respondents reclaimed on leave obtained.

Argued for them;—This was not the ordinary case of a bankrupt suspending to protect his person from diligence. It was an attempt by a bankrupt to raise, under this form, and without finding caution, a large and intricate question of accounting between him and one of his creditors. The cases which had hitherto occurred did not cover circumstances such as the present.[1]

Argued for the complainer;—The mere fact that a question of accounting was raised between him and the incarcerating creditors did not prevent the action being one purely to protect his person from diligence. And a debtor was entitled to prosecute such action without finding caution for expenses.[2]

Lord President.—There can be no doubt of the general rule that a sequestrated bankrupt cannot sue without finding caution for expenses or sisting his trustee. But this general rule is subject to exceptions, and one recognised and [1] M'Alister v. Swinburne, Nov. 7, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 166.

[2] Bell's Com., M'Laren's ed. ii. 324.

No. 104.
Mar. 13, 1875.
Young v. Robertsons.

established exception is the case where a bankrupt seeks to suspend diligence which has attached, or may attach, his person (see Bell's Com. M'Laren's ed. ii. 324). He is allowed then to litigate without finding caution for expenses.

Now, it seems to me that the complainer here falls entirely within that exception. His object is to free his person from incarceration, which has already taken place. No doubt, in order to establish the ground on which he seeks suspension and liberation it may be necessary to go into the merits of the respondents' claim, and the parties may become involved in a somewhat complicated accounting. But that cannot interfere with the right of the bankrupt to defend himself against incarceration on all competent grounds, without being called on to find caution for expenses.

I say nothing about the time and stage of the case at which the respondents' motion is made, both of which are most unfavourable to its success. For, apart from that matter altogether, I think the motion should be refused.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

LINDSAY, PATERSON, & HALL, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 105.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

SMITH BROTHERS AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—Balfour—Brand.
THOMAS SCOTT, Defender.—J. Guthrie Smith—R. V. Campbell.

Contract—Timeous Rejection.—A firm of engineers contracted to make and deliver a machine consisting mainly of two heavy pieces of cast iron, "the whole to be of the best description, and warranted." The two parts of the machine were transmitted to a railway station—the place of delivery—on 7th February. On 17th February the purchaser, after removing one of the pieces, discovered serious defects in it, and at once intimated rejection to the sellers. On 28th February an agreement was entered into between the purchaser and the sellers that the purchaser should then take delivery of the machine and pay the price, the sellers undertaking to pay half the expense of replacing the defective portion of the machine if it should break within twelve months. Five days afterwards the purchaser removed from the railway station the remaining portion of the machine, and on the same day intimated that he had discovered defects in this part also. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill, diss. Lord Gifford) that the purchaser was precluded by the agreement from rejecting the machine for defects which he might have discovered by examination before the date of the agreement.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

THOMAS SCOTT, iron merchant, Edinburgh, having received an order from James Tod and Son, engineers and machine makers, Leith Walk, Edinburgh, for a 1¼th inch punching and shearing machine, advertised in November 1873 for a machine of that description. On 24th November 1873 Messrs Smith Brothers and Company, engineers and boilermakers, Glasgow, wrote to Scott offering to furnish and deliver at the railway station, Glasgow, one of their "improved punching and shearing machines," with engine and other appurtenances, for the sum of £418. Scott went to Glasgow and saw one of Smith Brothers' machines at work, and on 3d December wrote accepting the above offer, adding in his letter, "the whole to be of the best description, and warranted." * The machine

* The offer and acceptance are given in full in the Lord Ordinary's note, infra, p. 604.

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

was then proceeded with, and on 22d January 1874 Scott, along with Mr Blackie, one of the partners of Tod and Son's firm, went to Glasgow and inspected the machine, which was then nearly completed. On 7th February the machine, which consisted of two main portions, viz., the punching cheek and the shearing cheek, and was of great weight, was delivered at the Caledonian Railway Station at Glasgow addressed to Tod and Son, Leith Walk, the persons for whom the machine was wanted, and way-bills were forwarded to Scott.

On 17th February Tod and Son directed the railway company to send the punching cheek to their works, and on its arrival there it was inspected by their manager, who discovered that the cross centre-web of the hollow interior of this part of the machine was cracked in several places. He, the same day, wrote to Scott, stating these defects, and asking him to attend to the matter at once. This letter Scott forwarded to Smith Brothers, who sent through one of their partners to inspect the machine. Mr Smith, after seeing the machine, maintained that the cracks made no difference in the strength of the machine, but failed to convince Tod and Son of this. Negotiations were then entered into as to how the matter could be arranged, in the course of which (on 23d February) Smith Brothers offered to take back the machine. Scott also advertised the machine as for sale. Finally, on 26th February, Scott wrote to Smith Brothers stating that he had arranged with Tod and Son that they should keep the machine on the understanding that in the event of the machine failing at the faulty place within twelve months, he should pay one-half of the expense of a new headstock, and they the other half. To this Smith Brothers, on 27th February, replied,—"To avoid disputes we will consent to this arrangement, viz., that you take delivery of the machine now, and pay the price. Should the headstock break in consequence of the cracks now visible in the centre web within twelve months, we will put in a new headstock, you paying one-half the expense thereof, and we paying the other. Please let us have your answer by telegraph.—Yours respectfully." Scott telegraphed on 28th February,—"Agreed. Please send me invoice by first post." The invoice for the whole machine was sent next day.

On 5th March Tod and Son got the shearing cheek from the station, and while unloading it discovered that it also was cracked in two places, one crack being in a portion of the interior called the "box," and the other at a part called the "bracket." They at once wrote to Scott as follows:—"Dear Sir,—Since the adjustment with you as to broken cheek (punching) of machine, we have got in the shearing cheek, and were begun to take it off when we discovered that it also was and is sprung inside in two places. Please see this at once, as we cannot put it up, and oblige." Scott telegraphed to Smith Brothers, and Mr Smith again came to Edinburgh and inspected the machine. He denied the existence of these cracks at all, and maintained that what were called cracks were merely slight ruts in the skin of the casting. Smith Brothers wrote on 6th March to Scott saying that the faults complained of were trifling, and did not affect the strength of the machine. To this letter they received no answer. Tod and Son made some experiments with naphtha to ascertain whether these really were cracks or not, but nothing further passed till 4th April, when Smith Brothers wrote Scott for payment of the price of the machine. Scott wrote Tod and Son for payment, and when they demurred, wrote again as follows:—"Dear Sirs,—I am in receipt of yours of yesterday, and in reply beg to remind you that on the 26th February I offered to relieve you entirely of the punching machine, when you resolved to retain it under the condition embraced in the latter clause of your letter of the same date, which I am prepared to carry out. Therefore you can have no reasonable excuse for withholding the bills, but if you still wish to get rid of the machine, I will do my best to get a purchaser."

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

On 13th April Scott wrote Smith Brothers saying that the machine was useless, and that they must take it back. This Smith Brothers refused to do, and relied upon the arrangement of 27th and 28th February. Scott then referred them to his law-agents.

On 20th May 1874 Smith Brothers raised an action against Scott for payment of the price of the machine. Scott defended the action. On 15th July 1874 Scott moved the Lord Ordinary to remit to a man of skill to report on the alleged defects in the machine, but this was resisted by the pursuers. The Lord Ordinary (Gifford), on the ground that such a report would not exhaust the case, refused the motion, but noted the fact of its having been made in a note to his interlocutor allowing a proof. In the course of the proof, in addition to the facts given above, it appeared, from the evidence of numerous skilled witnesses, that cracks did exist in both portions of the machine, which were of a serious nature. There was some evidence to shew that the shearing cheek was inspected by Mr Wight, Tod and Son's manager, while it was lying at the railway station, although Wight himself denied this.

The following were the pleas for the pursuers;—(1) The pursuers having sold, and the defender having bought and taken delivery of the said punching machine and cranes at the price of £418, and the defender having refused to make payment thereof in terms of the contract, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for. (2) Even although the centre-web was defective, the objection on that ground was obviated by the arrangement of 27th and 28th February 1874, and the machine being otherwise sound and sufficient, the defender is bound to implement the said arrangement, and to pay the price. (3) The foresaid contract of sale and purchase having been duly completed by the pursuers, and delivery taken, the defender is liable in the price, being the sum sued for, with expenses.

Pleaded for the defender, inter alia;—The alleged arrangement of 27th and 28th February 1874 having reference solely to the only defects then known to the defender, and admitted by the pursuers, and the machine being otherwise unsound and insufficient, the defender is not barred by the said arrangement from rejecting the whole machine.

On 28th December 1874 the Lord Ordinary (Curriehill) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers agreed to furnish and deliver to the defender at Edinburgh on or about the 16th January 1874, and the defender agreed to purchase one of the pursuers' improved punching and shearing machines, suitable for punching and shearing 1¼ inch thick plates for the sum of £330, and fitted with angle-iron cutter for the sum of £70 additional, the whole to be of the best description, and warranted: Finds that the pursuers, on or about the 7th February 1874, forwarded to the defender a punching and shearing machine, with angle-iron cutter, but that the same was not of the best description, and was defective and cracked in material parts: Finds that the defender was entitled to reject, and did timeously reject, the said machine: Therefore assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—In this action Messrs Smith Brothers and Company, engineers and boilermakers in Glasgow, claim from Thomas Scott, iron merchant and wholesale ironmonger in Edinburgh, the sum of £418 sterling, being the price of a punching and shearing machine, fitted with an angle-iron cutter and two

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

Smith Brothers reclaimed.*

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a narrow and difficult case. It appears that the pursuers contracted, in November 1874, to supply the defender with a punch-cranes to be used in working the machine, all of which were ordered by the defender from the pursuers, but have been rejected by the defender on the ground of certain alleged defects in the machine.

---

"The defender acted in the transaction as a middleman, the machine having been ordered by him, not for himself, but for Messrs James Tod and Son, Leith Walk, Edinburgh, who had contracted for the iron work connected with the widening the North Bridge, Edinburgh, and required a punching and shearing machine for that and other purposes of their business. Mr Scott advertised for such a machine, and on 24th November 1873 Mr Osborne Smith (one of the pursuers) handed to the defender, in his office in Edinburgh, the offer, No. 65 of process, which is in the following terms:—'Glasgow, 24th November 1873. —Thomas Scott, Esq., Edinburgh.—Sir,—We offer to furnish and deliver here in Glasgow a punching and shearing machine, as described below, at the price stated.

"'One of our improved punching and shearing machines, suitable for punching and shearing 1¼ inch thick plates; punching 28 inches, and shearing 24 inches from the edge, eccentric shaft made of best tilted scrap malleable iron; machine fitted with double power spur gear. The whole of the wheels having capes for strengthening, cast on both sides of teeth, heavy fly-wheel; fitted also with a steam-engine for driving; machine is supplied with one punch-holder and bolster, and one pair of steel shears,—all complete, for the sum of £330.—Yours respectfully, SMITH BROTHERS & COMPANY, p. T. PATERSON.

"'P.S.—The above machine to be fitted with angle-iron cutter for the additional sum of £70 sterling, and to be delivered at the railway station in Glasgow about the 16th January 1874. SMITH BROTHERS & Co.'

"Mr O. Smith at the same time advised the defender to go to Glasgow, telling him that his brother (Hugh Smith) would take him to see one of the machines in operation in the shipbuilding yard of Messrs John Elder and Sons. The defender accordingly went to Glasgow on 3d December 1873, and in company with Mr Hugh Smith he visited John Elder and Sons' yard, where he saw one of the pursuers' punching machines at work. This machine was one of what the pursuers term in their offer their 'improved' machines, and it contained in the hollow interior of the punching apparatus a web of iron, called throughout the proof 'the centre web.' This web, which is a plate of iron about an inch and a-half thick, is designed to add firmness and strength to the machine. And the pursuers admit that it constitutes one of their 'improvements' in the manufacture of punching machines.

"The defender was satisfied with what he saw of the machine, and he on the same day (3d December 1873) wrote and handed to the pursuers an acceptance of their offer in the following terms:—'Glasgow, 3d December 1873.—Smith Brothers and Co.—Dear Sirs,—Referring to your offer of 24th ultimo. I hereby agree to accept of your offer to furnish the machine as therein specified for the sum of £330, and with angle-cutting apparatus for £70 sterling additional. The whole to be of the best description, and warranted, and delivered at Edinburgh on or about the 16th day of January 1874. The above price includes free delivery at railway station, Glasgow.—Yours truly, THOMAS SCOTT.'

---

* The following pleas for the pursuers were tendered at the bar during the debate:—"(3) The defender, having agreed to take delivery of the machine, and pay the price under the said arrangement, was barred from afterwards rejecting the machine on any of the grounds stated, or on any ground whatever. (4) The defender is, in any event, bound to pay the price of the machine, in respect the same was not duly and timeously rejected by him."

ing and shearing machine of a description fully narrated in a written offer and acceptance. This machine was stipulated to be "of the best description, and

"This acceptance, it will be observed, is not precisely in terms of the offer, because in it the defender expressly stipulates that the whole apparatus is to be of the best description, and 'warranted,' and that the delivery is to be at Edinburgh, and not at Glasgow, as was proposed in the original offer. These variations upon the offer were not objected to by the pursuers, who thereupon proceeded to manufacture the machine for the defender.

"It appears to me that the introduction of the stipulation as to warranty had the effect of making that warranty an inherent condition of the contract, so as to entitle the defender to rescind the contract and reject the machine unless it came up in every particular to the warranty. The law on this point is well summarised as follows in Smith's Leading Cases, ii. 27,—'But where the subject-matter of the sale is not in existence, or not ascertained at the time of the contract, an engagement that it shall, when existing or ascertained, possess certain qualities, is not a mere warranty, but a condition, the performance of which is precedent to any obligation upon the vendee under the contract, because the existence of these qualities, being part of the description of the thing sold, becomes essential to its identity, and the vendee cannot be obliged to receive and pay for a thing different from that for which he contracted.'

"The first questions, therefore, to be answered are,—Did the machine forwarded to the defender possess the qualities which it was guaranteed to possess? Was it of the best description? I think these questions must be answered in the negative.

"As the machine was to consist chiefly of cast-iron, and as the pursuers themselves are not founders, they had the necessary castings made at the foundry of Messrs Allison, and sent to their own works to be fitted together. When the work was nearly complete (viz., on 22d January), the defender, accompanied by Mr Blackie, a partner of the firm of James Tod and Sons, for whom the machine had been ordered, went to Glasgow and inspected the machine in the works of the pursuers, and neither of them then observed any defect. But as the machine, which is of great weight, was then standing on its base, no flaw in the interior of the machine could be seen; and as cracks visible on the outer surface were not to be expected, it is not wonderful that the defender and Blackie did not look narrowly for such faults. The machine was not completed until more than a fortnight after that visit, and it was not sent out of the pursuers' works until 7th February, when it was addressed to Messrs Tod and Sons, Leith, and given by the pursuers to the Caledonian Railway Company for conveyance to Edinburgh. The whole apparatus arrived in due course at the Edinburgh station of the Caledonian Railway, and was taken off the trucks and deposited in the station, as Messrs Tod, owing to the crowded state of their yard, could not take immediate delivery.

"It is necessary here to explain that the machine consists of several parts, two of the largest and most important of these being what are termed the 'punching cheek' and the 'shearing cheek,' the angle-iron cutter being attached to the latter. These cheeks are of great weight,—the one weighing 96 cwt., and the other 110 cwt. The centre web, already spoken of, occupies the centre of the hollow interior of the punching cheek, and what is called the 'box,' occupies part of the hollow interior of the shearing cheek, and is designed to give strength and internal support to that part of the machine.

"On the 17th February 1874 Messrs Tod and Sons directed the railway company to bring the punching cheek to their works. It had not previously been examined at the railway station, but before it was taken off the lorry which brought it to the works it was examined by James Wight, Messrs Tod's manager, who discovered the centre web to be cracked and sprung in more than one place. He reported the matter to his principals, who at once communicated with the defender, at whose request the pursuer, Mr Osborne Smith, went to Edinburgh on the following day (18th February) and examined the cracks, which it is admitted were then quite visible, and of considerable extent. There is some con-

No. 105. Mar. 17, 1875. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

warranted." The pursuers accordingly furnished a machine, which was duly forwarded by the Caledonian Railway to Edinburgh, on 7th February 1874, to flict in the evidence as to whether such cracks so materially affected the soundness of the machine as to warrant the defender in rejecting it; but I am of opinion that the great preponderance of the evidence is in favour of the defender's view, that the existence of such cracks in the machine before it had ever been tried at work would have justified its rejection, unless they had been caused by undue violence after delivery. Not only is there no evidence of such violence having been used, but I think it is satisfactorily proved that no violence to which it could have been exposed, during or after the transit by railway, not even in a collision of trains, could have produced either the cracks in the centre web of the punching cheek, or those to be afterwards noticed in the shearing cheek, without shattering the whole machine.

"I am further of opinion that it is proved that the crack in the centre web of the punching cheek had begun to shew itself before it left the pursuers' work. Indeed, one of the founders (Archibald Allison) admits that the cross bar which is connected with the bottom of the centre web was slightly cracked before it was sent from the foundry to the pursuers' works at all; and he also admits, and other witnesses corroborate him, that the main crack in the centre web is continuous with that crack in the cross bar. It is also proved that, before the machine was sent off by the pursuers, it was painted on the side which would be visible while the machine was in a horizontal position before being erected for work. This appears to be an unusual thing with the interior parts of large castings; but if the defender is to be believed—and I see no reason to doubt his veracity—the crack in the cross bar and the crack at the lower part of the centre web had been filled with putty before the paint had been applied. This was, indeed, pointed out by him to the pursuer, Osborne Smith, on his visit to Tods' works on 18th February. It is, therefore, quite clear that the centre web was partially cracked before it left the pursuers' works; and as it is proved that the tendency of such cracks in large castings is to extend indefinitely (as indeed the cracks in question appear to have done since they were first seen by the defender), it is obvious that the existence of such a crack must destroy all confidence in the machine, and the defender would therefore have been justified in at once rejecting the machine as being undoubtedly not of the best description.

"The machine was not, however, at once rejected, and some correspondence took place between the parties; and an arrangement was ultimately made, which is embodied in two letters, dated respectively 26th and 27th February 1874, by which the defender agreed to take delivery of the machine at once, and pay the price, on condition that if the headstock should break within twelve months, in consequence of the crack then visible in the centre web, the pursuers should put in a new headstock at the joint expense of them and of the defender.

"Two points here deserve attention, viz., (1) that up to this date (27th February) the defender had not taken delivery of any part of the machine; and (2) that the one-half of it, viz., the 'shearing cheek,' was still lying at the railway station in Edinburgh, and was not known by the defender to be cracked or in any way defective. It is true that Wight had seen it at the station between the 17th and 27th February; but it is not wonderful that he failed there to discover the cracks presently to be noticed, seeing that the pursuers themselves and some of their witnesses deny to the present hour the existence of any cracks in that part of the machine. It cannot be doubted that the agreement of 26th and 27th February was entered into on the part of the defender in ignorance of the existence of any defect in the shearing cheek, and in reliance upon the warranty of the pursuers that the machine was of the best description; and I am of opinion that if that part of the machine, on being brought to the works, was found to be materially cracked, this agreement cannot bar the defender from rejecting the whole machine.

"What, then, was in point of fact the condition of the 'shearing cheek'? It was brought to the works of Messrs Tod by a railway lorry on or about 5th March 1874, and before it was completely unloaded, the workmen who were en-

No. 105.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

the order of the defender. On 17th February Tod and Son, who had ordered the machine from the defender, wrote to him complaining of a crack or defect in gaged in taking it off the lorry discovered that it was cracked in two places. Wight and William Tod (a son of one of the partners of James Tod and Son) then examined the cheek and found the cracks referred to, one being in the front of the 'box,' and penetrating through and through the front web of the cheek, and the other being at what is called the 'bracket.' The pursuers deny the existence of any such cracks, either at 5th March or even at the present day. But the evidence of the defender and of his witnesses, among others, of Professor Fleeming Jenkin, all of whom tested the machine with naphtha, places it beyond doubt that the crack extending from the box and through the centre web, not only does exist, but was in existence on 5th March; and it is, I think, equally clear from the evidence that the crack is owing, not to any violence used after the cheek left the pursuers' works, but to some defect in the casting, —probably some parts of the box and front web having been made too slight relatively to the other parts of the machine, and thus creating great inequality in the thickness, and consequently in the rapidity in cooling of the casting, and thus giving rise to unequal strains which naturally result in cracks.

"The next question is, were these cracks so material as to justify the rejection of the machine? The pursuer and his witnesses all answer this question in the negative; but as these gentlemen deny the existence of the cracks, their evidence on this point is of no weight. The defender's witnesses, on the other hand, are all clearly of opinion that the cracks are in dangerous proximity to an important part of the machine, viz., the angle-iron cutter, and that the strain, when that cutter is in use, would tend to enlarge the crack and break up the whole machine. I have no doubt whatever that the existence of this crack constitutes a material defect in the machine.

"A great deal of so-called scientific evidence was adduced by the pursuers for the purpose of proving that, even assuming the existence of the cracks, the machine had so much superfluous strength that its breaking strain could never be reached, or even approached. But the simple answer to all such speculative opinions is contained in the following words of Professor Fleeming Jenkin:—'All our formulæ deal with sound machines; we have no formulæ for cracked metal. The view I take is, that I should accept no machine with cracks in it, whatever the calculations might shew.'

"I am therefore of opinion that the defender, on discovering the existence of the crack in question, was entitled to reject the machine.

"The only question which remains is, was the defender's rejection timeously and effectually made.

"On this point I have no doubt. Immediately on making the discovery the defender telegraphed to the pursuers on 5th March.—'Shearing cheek of machine sprung in two places; come through and see it.' The pursuer, Osborne Smith, went to Edinburgh on 6th March and saw the machine; but he disputed the existence of the cracks, and would not admit that the machine was in any way defective. The defender and Messrs Tod and Son then consulted skilled professional men, whose examination and experiments made it clear that the cracks did exist; and on 13th March the defender wrote the pursuers stating that the cracks had increased in number and in size and extent, and that 'I can see nothing for it but that you take it away, as the opinions of several of the most eminent practical men who have seen it is, that the machine is faulty, and very far from being what it should be. Waiting your instructions, yours truly.' The pursuers replied on the 15th March objecting to take back the machine, and maintaining (in my opinion erroneously) that the defender was barred from rejecting it by the arrangement of 27th February. The defender on the same day answered that letter by another, in which he positively declined to retain the machine, and desired all further communications to be addressed to his law-agents. This was a distinct, and, in my opinion, a timeous rejection of the machine; and on the whole matter I am of opinion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses."

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

a portion of the machine of which they had taken delivery from the railway company, the remainder of the machine lying at their order, or that of the defender, at the railway station. The defender forwarded their letter to the pursuers. After some negotiations, which are said to have resulted in a new agreement, Tod and Son removed the rest of the machine from the railway company's premises, and then said that they had discovered a defect in this part of the machine also, in consequence of which they stated that the machine was not according to contract, and consequently refused to retain it or to pay the price. The question now is, whether the defender is bound to pay the price or is entitled to return the machine. I am of opinion that the machine was not according to the original contract, and that the purchaser was not bound to accept delivery of it if he had at once rejected it. There can be no doubt that there was a crack in the web of the punching cheek, that part of the machine which was first removed, and that the defect was of such a nature as to entitle the purchaser to reject it. But, as will be seen, he did not exercise that right. The alleged defect in the other part of the machine gave rise to a serious dispute.

A long and voluminous proof was taken, which I observe with great regret. The machine was open to inspection, and the defects were alleged to be evident, and the proper procedure would have been to obtain a report from a person of skill on the extent and nature of the defects complained of instead of entering into a proof at large. But, on the matter of fact, I am of opinion that the alleged defect in the second part of the machine has been established, and that it was serious.

The next question is, whether, admitting that the purchaser at one time had the right to reject the machine, he has deprived himself of that right. In order to answer that question it is necessary to consider the actings of the parties. The original contract having been of the nature which I have already mentioned we have, first, the letter of 17th February from Tod and Son to Scott, to which I have already referred, and which was forwarded to the pursuers. That was an intimation by Scott of the purchaser's objections to the machine. On 19th February, after inspecting the machine, Smith Brothers wrote as to the crack and the effect it would have on the efficiency of the machine, the ground taken up being that as the web was unnecessary a crack in it made no sort of difference in the strength of the machine. Then, after some further correspondence, Smith Brothers again wrote, on 23d February, reiterating their former assurances as to the strength and efficiency of the machine, but offering, in answer to a suggestion contained in a letter to them, either to cancel the contract or to take back the machine and make another. Up to this time no fault had been found with the other portion of the machine, viz., the shearing cheek. In the view I am inclined to take of this case I consider this letter of 23d February of great importance. The offer either to cancel the contract or to take back the machine and make another—the machine being at the time in the possession of the purchaser, or those representing him—bound the purchaser either to reject the machine altogether or to take it with all apparent faults. That offer was, however, not accepted; the purchaser did not cancel the contract; and the negotiations continued till, on 27th February, Smith Brothers wrote offering, on condition that delivery was accepted and the price paid, that if the headstock broke in consequence of the cracks then visible in the web within twelve months they would put in a new headstock, they paying one-half and Scott the other half of the expense thereof. On 28th February Scott answered by telegraph shortly but quite to the point,—"Agreed; please send me invoice by first post." The invoice for the whole machine was forwarded to him next day. That was a specific agreement, entirely outside the original contract of sale. It was an agreement to accept an article not in the possession of the sellers but of the purchaser.

No. 105.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

I am of opinion, although the point is a narrow one, that this agreement applied to the whole machine. The price of the whole machine was to be paid, and therefore the whole machine was to be taken delivery of. It may be quite true that it was known, at the date of this agreement, that the shearing-cheek, in which defects were afterwards discovered, was lying at the railway station, but I think that the purchaser, entering into a compromise of this nature, was bound to examine the article, and is not now entitled to reject for defects which then existed and could be seen. That seems to have been the understanding at the time, because it appears that Scott had been endeavouring to sell the machine to a third party, but his advertisement was withdrawn whenever this agreement of 27th and 28th February was entered into.

A week after this Tod and Son got the shearing-cheek brought to their works and then discovered cracks in it, and immediately wrote to Scott saying that they could not put it up on account of these defects. If my view be correct it was then too late to make any claim on the makers; and even if the extent of the defects was as great as they said, any remaining question lay between Tod and Son and Scott. Scott at once telegraphed to the pursuers, and one of the partners came to Edinburgh and examined the shearing-cheek, and afterwards embodied his opinion as to the trifling nature of the defects complained of in a letter dated 6th March. No notice was taken of that letter by Scott for upwards of a month. It is said, and to a certain extent truly, that investigations were going on during that month as to the extent of the defect. These investigations, however, could not have taken a whole month; at all events, Scott was bound to answer that letter of 6th March, which he never did. In my judgment, as already indicated, it was then too late to go back on the agreement; but his delay in answering that communication adds great force to the plea.

On 10th April Scott wrote Tod and Son pressing for payment of the price of the machine. That letter proves conclusively that Scott, during the interval between 6th March and 11th April, held himself as having taken delivery of the machine, and as not entitled to throw it back upon the makers.

If I had been of opinion that the agreement only related to the punching-cheek, and was limited—that is to say, to a part of the machine, and not referring to the whole contract—I should have come to a different result. But I cannot doubt that it was understood by the defender, as well as by the pursuers, to apply to the contract as a whole, as indeed the correspondence shews. The pursuers were not responsible for the delay in testing the other part of the machine, and the defender must be held to have satisfied himself, as the defect was not latent.

Where a purchaser, who is entitled to reject an article, elects to retain it on certain conditions, he is bound to retain it with all faults not latent. If, to be sure, the article turned out to be wholly useless on experiment, owing to a defect only to be discovered by experiment, the case would be quite different. In this case, I think, to sustain the rejection would be contrary to the good faith of the agreement, and that therefore the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be

No. 105. recalled, but that a large deduction should be made in the expenses allowed on account of the proof, which should never have been led.

Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

LORD NEAVES.—I have had considerable difficulty with this case, but I am on the whole inclined to concur with your Lordship.

The question is, whether the right to reject this machine was waived by the correspondence and actings of the parties. The defender's letters are very remarkable, and particularly the one of 11th April to Tod and Son, when he plainly took up a position with regard to them the very opposite of that which he now takes with regard to Smith Brothers. The shearing portion of this machine had not been critically examined when the agreement founded on was made, but it was and had been in the power of Scott and his constituents to have examined it. In these circumstances Smith Brothers, in consequence of letters from Scott enclosing others by Tod and Son, offered to cancel the contract altogether, or otherwise to take back the machine objected to and to make another. Then followed a letter from Scott on 26th February, saying that he had arranged with his constituents that they would consent to take the machine on condition that, in the event of it failing at the faulty place within twelve months, they were to be relieved of one-half of the expense of a new headstock. To this, on 27th February, Smith Brothers assented, and Scott confirmed the agreement the same day by telegram.

Considering that all the parts of the complete machine were within the power of Scott and his constituents, we must hold that this agreement was one waiving all ground of rejection for apparent faults. The whole machine had apparently been inspected by servants and friends of Scott and Tod and Son, and after that they agreed to accept delivery of it, and to pay the price instantly.

The letter of 11th April was written by Scott after the discovery of the defects in the shearing portion of the machine, and in it Scott reminds Tod and Son that before the agreement he had offered to relieve them of the machine altogether, but they had resolved to retain it under the conditions in the letter of 27th February. That we must hold to be the authoritative exposition of what Scott understood and meant at the time when the agreement was made. No other construction can be put on the agreement of 27th February than Scott's own, as explained by himself in that letter of 11th April, and in that case Scott's mouth is closed as regards the claim here made. He must take the machine and pay the price.

As to the proof, a great deal of trouble and expense has been involved by it, which, as it was unnecessary, must be taken into consideration in deciding the question of expenses.

LORD ORMIDALE.—(After narrating the facts)—The case undoubtedly presents some questions of importance and difficulty. After a careful consideration of the argument and of the voluminous proof I am of opinion, in concurrence with the Lord Ordinary, that the weight of the evidence as regards the cracks and consequent faulty character of the machine, as furnished by the pursuers, is on the side of the defender, and if there had been nothing else in dispute the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary now under review would fall to be adhered to.

But, although not without considerable hesitation and difficulty, I have come to be of opinion that the defenders are barred and precluded by the arrangement of 27th and 28th February from rejecting, on any of the grounds now found on by them, the machine in question, and refusing to pay its price. It must be borne in mind that the machine was despatched from Glasgow to Edinburgh on the 7th of February, and arrived at the station there next day. From that date the machine must be held to have been delivered to and at the risk of the defender and under his control exclusively, and this I did not understand to be disputed. It can hardly be questioned therefore that the defender had ample time and opportunity, between the 8th and 28th of February when the arrangement was entered into upon which the pursuers found, of fully examining the machine in all its parts and satisfying himself as to its efficiency and freedom at least from patent and visible faults, which, on the defender's own shewing, the cracks in question were. Nor am I able to see how in this matter it can affect the pursuers that the defender for his own convenience or that of his constituents, Messrs Tod and Son, allowed the machine, or a portion of it, to remain for between two or three weeks at the railway station, where it is said a proper examination of it could not be made. Neither can I find any satisfactory evidence to the effect that the pursuers were aware that the machine in all its parts had not, prior to the arrangement being entered into on the 28th of February, been removed from the railway station to the works of Tod and Son and thoroughly examined. I am not indeed satisfied that the machine, or such parts of it as had been allowed to remain at the railway station till after the date of the arrangement might not have been examined there, to the effect at least of the cracks on which he now founds being seen by him. All these cracks were, according to his shewing in the proof, capable of being observed, and therefore it cannot well be taken from him that they were latent. Mr Blackie, one of the two partners of Tod and Son, says that "I was a party to the arrangement of 27th and 28th February. I think that Wight" (the managing clerk) "had been sent to look at the shearing-cheek at the railway station before that arrangement was come to." Mr John Tod, again, says, "The machine in question was intended for our firm. After it arrived at Edinburgh railway station it was examined there, and delivery was refused because it was found to be faulty." It is true that this witness afterwards says, "I do not know of my own knowledge about the machine being examined at the railway station. I knew it from Mr Wight." And it is also true that Mr Wight, when asked if he inspected the machine at the railway station, says, "I inspected nothing at all," but he adds, what appears to me to be very important, "I knew about the arrangement of 27th and 28th February. At that time I had ample opportunity of examining the whole machine."

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co v. Scott.

It was in these circumstances that the arrangement was come to between the parties on the 27th and 28th of February. It relates unquestionably not merely to the punching portion of the machine but to the whole together,—the shearing as well as the punching portion of it. The machine was in the arrangement treated as a unum quid, and was of a description, as well from its construction as otherwise, which required that it should be accepted or rejected as a whole. Accordingly, the price of the whole was asked for by the defender, and requested to be at once transmitted to him. Now, in this view, viz., that the agreement was entered into in reference to the whole machine, it is very important that, except what is said in it about the headstock breaking, the arrangement is quite general and absolute, and is not made subject to any condition or qualification whatever. In particular, it contains no condition or qualification to the effect of reserving the rights of the defender to reject the machine, and to refuse to pay its price should it be found by him on further examination that the shearing portion of it should turn out to be cracked or defective. Just suppose that the parties had in the interval between the 28th February, when the agreement was entered into, and the 5th of March, when it is said the shearing portion of it, as well as the punching portion, was discovered to be cracked, left it to an arbiter to say whether the pursuers were not entitled to immediate payment of the whole price, I cannot doubt that it would be so determined.

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

I cannot therefore see anything either in the terms of the arrangement itself, or in the circumstances in which it was entered into, to warrant the interpretation of it contended for by the defender, viz., that it had reference solely to the defects in the punching portion of the machine. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the terms of the arrangement import a settlement by compromise or transaction of all disputes regarding cracks or faults in the machine or any part of it, or regarding at least all cracks or faults which were not then latent. As already noticed, the machine in all its parts had been delivered and out of the possession and power of the pursuers, and was lying at the risk and under the control exclusively of the defender. And as I have also already noticed, the defender, or, what is the same thing, his constituents, had, previous to the arrangement of the 27th or 28th February, an opportunity of examining the whole machine. Having regard to these circumstances, and to the fact that at and prior to the date of the arrangement the parties had been disputing about the machine and the nature and effect of the cracks which had been observed on it, the cause or reason of their entering into the arrangement, as expressly stated in it, viz., "to avoid disputes," is very material as shewing that it must now be held to bar or preclude the defence. To arrive at any other result would be tantamount to nullifying entirely the arrangement in question. The defender may have been rash or imprudent in entering into it, but as he has not attempted to get it set aside on the ground of fraud or any other ground, I can see no alternative but to allow to it its full effect, for I do not see how it can be read as limited merely to the cracks in the punching portion of the machine, which I understood was the contention of the defender, without materially altering its terms. It is a different matter altogether what would be the rights and liabilities of the parties if the machine, after being put up and in operation, turned out to be wholly insufficient owing to cracks or defects which could not be observed previous to the arrangement. The warranty of the pursuers might then come into operation, and a different question from that at present before us would arise, in regard to which I can say nothing at present.

For the reasons I have now referred to I am of opinion that it ought to be found that the defender is, by the arrangement of 27th and 28th February, barred from rejecting the machine in question and from now refusing to pay its price on any of the grounds stated by him, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuers as concluded for.

Lord Gifford.—My Lords, I agree with all of your Lordships that this is a case of considerable nicety. I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is well founded, and ought to be adhered to.

This is a contract of an executorial nature, in which the pursuers, who are machine makers, became bound to make and to deliver a punching and shearing machine, along with certain other appliances to be connected with it, "th-

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

whole to be of the best description, and warranted." The pursuers undoubtedly were bound to deliver a perfect and a warranted machine.

A machine was made by the pursuers and despatched to Edinburgh, apparently about 7th February 1874, and it arrived a day or two afterwards at the Caledonian Railway Station for Messrs Tod and Son, who had been disclosed to be the parties for whom it was made and by whom it was required. The machine consisted of two main portions—the punching-cheek and the shearing-cheek—both of which were very heavy and cumbrous.

The punching-cheek was first taken to Messrs Tod's yard, and arrived there somewhere about 17th February, for in their letter of that date Messrs Tod state that "the cheek of the punching machine got from railway to-day is sprung or cracked in both the inside cross webs," and that they had not taken it off the railway waggon until Scott or the pursuers should have examined it.

No point has been made, or attempted to be made that the purchaser was not then entitled to reject the machine. The persons for whom it had been ordered objected to it as not according to contract, and Scott forwarded their letter to the pursuers on the same day. The result was that one of the partners of the pursuers' firm came to Edinburgh and inspected the machine. He argued that the cracks were of no importance, but without succeeding in convincing the purchasers of this. Scott afterwards wrote practically rejecting the whole machine, because in the portion sent to Tods' yard, a fatal defect—viz., these cracks—had been discovered. The machine, therefore, lying partly at Tods' yard and partly at the railway station, was then a rejected machine, and the rejection was undoubtedly a valid rejection if the cracks constituted a material defect.

Some negotiations were entered into, and these lasted for some time, but all that time the machine was a rejected machine. In the circumstances of the case Messrs Tod and Son, who were to get the machine, were not bound to inspect the other portion which was still at the railway station. They had rejected the whole machine in consequence of a fatal defect in the portion which had been brought to their works. The machine was a whole and indivisible, and if Messrs Tod were right in maintaining that the cracks in the punching-cheek constituted a fatal defect they needed to go no farther; their rejection was justifiable and conclusive. It is true they might have gone and inspected the rest of the machine at the railway station, but they were not bound to do so till they had arranged about the flaw in the portion they had seen.

Now, it is admitted that the purchaser's objection to the cracks in the punching-cheek was well founded. They were not bound to take the machine with these cracks in it, and the result of the communings which followed the rejection was that an arrangement was come to on 27th and 28th February. I am of opinion that arrangement related solely to the punching-cheek of the machine, and had no reference to the shearing-cheek, which had never been examined, and which was assumed to be all right.

This conclusion I have come to upon a consideration of the letter by Smith Brothers on 27th February, and Scott's telegram in reply.

These documents, fairly read, shew that no delivery had been taken up to that date, indeed, they shew that hitherto the machine had stood rejected. Smith Brothers stipulated that delivery of the machine be taken now; and they also allude to cracks now visible, which shews that these cracks were the only matter in dispute between the parties up to this date.

Having thus come to an arrangement about the cracks in the web of the

No. 105.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

punching-cheek, Messrs Tod and Son proceed to get the shearing-cheek brought down to their works. This was done on or before 5th March, as we see by their letter to Scott of that date, wherein they complain that it also is sprung in two places in the inside. Scott at once telegraphed the objection to Smith Brothers. I apprehend that this challenge also, if material, was timeous. They had challenged the crack in the punching-cheek—that had been arranged; they then proceed to get the shearing-cheek into their works, and at once challenge it also as defective.

I agree with your Lordships that the defect now founded upon,—that is, the defect in the shearing-cheek,—which was only discovered about 5th March, was also a material defect, and one which, apart from peculiar circumstances, would entitle a purchaser to reject.

The cheek was disconform to contract, it was not perfect, it was defective.

The question, therefore, comes to be, were these purchasers barred from rejecting the machine on account of the fatal flaw in the shearing-cheek? Were they bound, although the machine was disconform to order and fatally defective, yet notwithstanding to take it as perfect and pay the full price? Now, this may be so. A purchaser may pass from objections, however strong they are, and he may bind himself to accept an article, however defective, but when once it has been established that the machine was defective, it will require a very strong case to compel a purchaser to accept the machine and pay for it. Surely a very strong case is necessary before you will compel a purchaser, who has stipulated for a perfect machine, to accept a defective one.

In the present case, I do not think that the purchasers have in any way barred themselves from objecting to the defect in the shearing-cheek, or have bound themselves to take and pay for an admittedly defective machine. In the first place, it is urged that there was too great delay in rejecting. But the delay was caused by the discovery of the cracks in the punching-cheek, and so the interval between 7th February and 28th February must be deducted, because the purchasers were not bound to search for other faults when they had already discovered a fatal one. The subsequent delay cannot be said to be sufficient to have the effect contended for by itself. I therefore conclude that the purchasers were not barred by lapse of time.

The case, then, must come to this, that by the agreement of 27th February the purchaser agreed to waive all objections to the shearing-cheek as well as to the punching-cheek.

Now, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it is clear the purchaser, or his constituents, did not at that time know of the flaws in the shearing-cheek. If they did not know of them, then the agreement must be held to be a waiver of all defects, known or unknown. I think, however, that the agreement had reference solely to the cracks in the punching-cheek.

Some doubts exist on the evidence as to whether the shearing-cheek had ever been examined by the purchaser or his constituents, or any one on their behalf. Wight, Messrs Tod and Son's manager, is said to have done so, but he himself denies that he did. Moreover, whether the defect in the shearing-cheek be latent or not, it is, at all events, not very patent. Up to the present moment, Smith Brothers deny that there is any crack in it at all. The flaw being of that nature, can we hold that the purchaser must have seen the defect and waived his objection to it?

I cannot hold that the agreement of 27th and 28th February, the origin.

No. 105.

Mar. 17, 1875.

Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott.

extent, and object of which are perfectly clear, is to be read as a waiver of all right to object to all flaws in any part of the machine not absolutely latent.

Supposing that the cracks in the shearing-cheek break, will an undertaking to pay half the expense of a new headstock for the punching machine give any satisfaction to the purchasers?

On the whole case, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of: Find that the machine in question was transmitted by the pursuers, the sellers in Glasgow, on the 6th day of February 1874, and arrived at the railway station in Edinburgh on the 7th of the same month: Find that the machine was, on the 17th of February, found to be defective in the centre web of the punching-cheek, and that the defender thereon intimated to the sellers that he declined to accept delivery thereof: Find that after some negotiation, during which the pursuers offered to cancel the contract, the parties agreed, on the 27th and 28th of February, that the defender, on the terms mentioned in the pursuers' letter of the 27th, should accept delivery and pay the price: Find that this agreement related to the whole machine: Find that on the 5th of March the defender intimated to the pursuers that the shearing part of the machine was defective, and that this defect has been proved: Find that the defender is precluded by the agreement of the 27th and 28th of February from rejecting the machine, or refusing to pay the price, on the ground of defects which were then apparent: Therefore repel the defences, and decern against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and find him liable in expenses (with the exception of the expenses of the proof), subject to modification, reserving the question as to the amount thereof until the account is taxed; and remit," &c.

The Auditor taxed the pursuers' account (excluding the expenses of proof) at £115, 7s. 4d.

The defender's counsel maintained, that as the judgment of the Court proceeded on grounds not pleaded by the pursuers, he was entitled to a large modification.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Approve of the Auditor's report on the pursuers' account of expenses; and having heard counsel on the question of modification thereof, modify the same to £85, 7s. 4d., and decern against the defender for payment thereof to the pursuers."

A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—MACNAUGHTON & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 106.

Mar. 17, 1875.

Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

ROBERT BROWN AND OTHERS, Complainers.—J. C. Smith.
JAMES S. SUTHERLAND, Respondent.—D.-F. Clark—Thorburn.

Bill of Exchange—Suspension—Joint Adventure—Partnership—Summary Diligence.—The three trustees of an unregistered joint stock building association, who had signed a bill drawn on and addressed to them, B., U., and S., "trustees of the New Imperial Building Association," by one of the members of the association for the amount of an account for plaster work done on the association's buildings, presented a note of suspension of a charge on the bill, on the ground that the charger was not entitled to use summary diligence, in respect (1) that the complainers were only liable qua trustees, and (2) that the drawer was a partner of the association, and

No. 106.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

as such was, under the articles, liable pro rata along with the whole members for the amount in the bill. Held that the charge was competent, in respect (1) that the acceptors' signatures were unqualified, and (2) that, even if their liability could be held to be qua trustees merely, they had not averred that there were no funds of the association in their hands.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

ROBERT BROWN, Robert Utterson, and John Smith, who were trustees of an unregistered joint stock building association, called the "New Imperial Building Association," and Joseph R. M'All, chairman of the association, employed James S. Sutherland, plasterer, Leith, who was a member of the association, to execute the plaster work required for the buildings which the association was erecting in Prince Regent Street, Leith. On 23d September 1874 Mr Shiells, the architect of the association, certified that Mr Sutherland had executed such portion of the plaster work as to entitle him to a payment of £200. In consequence of this certificate Brown, Utterson, Smith, and M'All granted Sutherland the following bill, which was written out by the then agent of the association:—

"Due 2d January.

"Edinburgh, 30th October 1874.

"£200 sterling.

"Two months after date pay to me or my order, within the British Linen Company Bank, St Mary Street, Edinburgh, the sum of £200, for value received.

"Messrs Robert Brown, 10 East Norton Place, Edinburgh, Robert Utterson, contractor, Leith, and John Smith, spirit merchant, Leith, trustees of the New Imperial Building Association, and Mr Joseph R. M'All, builder, Lutton Place, Edinburgh.

JAMES S. SUTHERLAND.
ROBERT UTTERSON.
JOHN SMITH.
ROBT. BROWN.
JOSEPH R. M'ALL."

The bill was not retired at maturity, and on 15th January 1875 Brown, Utterson, Smith, and M'All were, by Sutherland's instructions, charged upon the bill.

Brown, Utterson, and Smith (M'All having absconded), presented a note of suspension of the charge, which, on 22d January, was ordered to be seen and answered in eight days on caution, and execution was in the meantime sisted. The complainers failed to find caution, and on 8th February they referred "the whole matters, statements, and others to the oath of the charger."

The grounds of suspension set forth in the note were—(1) That under the articles of association* the complainers were appointed trustees to

* "Fourth. . . . . ; and the said trustees, surviving, acting, and assumed, are hereby authorised and empowered to sue for and uplift, by legal process or otherwise, all sums of money due or which may become due to said association, and they are also hereby authorised to grant all deeds, writs, or others on behalf of the said association; and it is hereby declared that all deeds and others granted by the said trustees for behoof of the said association shall be valid and binding on the association, without the concurrence of the other members thereto; and all deeds and others granted in favour of the said association shall be granted in favour of the said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heir-male of the last survivor.

"Tenth. The said trustees are hereby authorised and empowered to borrow such sums of money as may be necessary to finish said buildings, and the parties hereto hereby agree and bind and oblige themselves, and their heirs and assignees, to grant their personal obligations, if required, along with the said trustees, in bonds, bills, notes, and other securities, and the said trustees are hereby authorised and empowered to assign, dispone, convey, and make over the said piece of

No. 106.

Mar. 17, 1875.
Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

grant deeds on behalf of the association, and these deeds were to be binding on the whole association; this bill had been granted by the trustees as trustees, and the association was bound by it, not the trustees personally. (2) That the charger being a copartner with the complainers in a joint adventure in the building association, for behoof of which the bill was granted, was not entitled to do summary diligence on it; and (3) that the bill was granted for the accommodation of the charger, and without consideration.

The charger in his deposition, which was taken on 19th February, admitted that he was a member of the association, but denied that the bill was granted for his accommodation and without consideration. The value given he stated to be his plaster work. He denied having come under any agreement not to use diligence against the trustees personally should the bill not be retired, and stated that he had refused to give a receipt, in which there had been inserted an obligation on his part, if the bill was not met at maturity, to accept a renewal thereof. This receipt, which he had retained in his own hands, he produced, signed by himself, but afterwards scored through.

On 25th February the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the oath negative of the reference: Therefore recalls the sist: Finds the letters and charge orderly proceeded: Refuses the note of suspension, and decerns: Finds the respondent entitled to expenses: Appoints an account thereof to be lodged," &c.*

---

ground, with the said tenement erected thereon, or part thereof, in security of the sums so borrowed: Declaring always the whole parties hereto shall pay the law expenses of procuring said loans, and of discharging the same, and any other expense connected therewith."

* "NOTE.— . . . I am of opinion that, according to the sound construction of the articles of association, and of the bill, apart from the oath of the respondent, the complainers would not be entitled to prevail in this suspension, and that the oath is negative of the grounds of suspension, in so far as these are not founded upon the terms of the articles and of the bill.

"By the 4th head of the articles of association, the respondents, Brown, Utterson, and Smith, are named trustees for behoof of the association; and they are authorised and empowered to sue for and uplift, by legal process or otherwise, all sums of money due or to become due to the association; and they are authorised to grant all deeds, writs, or others on behalf of the said association; and all deeds and others granted by the said trustees for behoof of the association are to be valid and binding on the association without the concurrence of the other members.

"By article 10 of the articles the members bind themselves and their heirs and assignees to grant their personal obligation, if required, along with the trustees, in bonds, bills, notes, or other securities; and accordingly the bill in question was, at the request of the trustees, signed by the complainer M'All as acceptor along with them.

"I think that the true meaning of the articles of association is, that as the trustees are appointed the sole collectors and holders of the funds of the association, not only are they to bind the association and its funds for the proper debts of the association, but that unless they expressly limit their liability by the terms of the obligations granted by them they will be personally liable for the amount of such obligations. In the present case there is no such limitation in the bill in question. They are merely designed as trustees in the address upon the bill; but the obligation to pay the amount of the bill is undertaken by them and M'All absolutely as individuals. It is quite settled by many cases, both in this Court and in England, that although a bill is addressed to a person in a fiduciary or factorial character, his acceptance, unless expressly qualified, binds him personally for the amount—see Webster v. M'Calman, 10 D.

No. 106.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—The bill was for a company debt, and the charger was a partner of the company. The question came to be one of accounting, which should not be decided in a summary process. If the bill had passed into the hands of the bank, the charger here would, under the articles of association, have been equally bound with the complainers and the other partners, and he would thus have been both debtor and creditor in the bill. It had been held to be incompetent for one partner to do diligence against another, even after the dissolution of the partnership, where an accounting was still pending.[1] The receipt which had been produced shewed what the intentions of the parties had been in granting the bill. The trustees never meant to bind themselves personally. Moreover, the bill was addressed to them as trustees.[2] The cases relied on by the Lord Ordinary were none of them cases of partnership.[3] In the report of Dutton v. Marsh[4] in the Law Reports it was not said that the holder of the note was a shareholder of the company.

Argued for the charger;—Full value had been given for the bill, as was shewn by the architect's certificate, and the charger had therefore a right of action against the association. The trustees had granted the bill to prevent an action, and they were now bound to meet their bill.[5] The trustees had not stated that there were no funds of the association in their hands. The oath was clearly negative of the reference.

1131; and Chiene v. The Western Bank, 10 D. 1523. And in the recent case of Dutton v. Marsh, 40 L. J. (Q. B.), p. 175, it was held that where the directors of a joint stock company granted to one of the shareholders of the company a promissory-note for money lent by him in the following terms:—'We, the directors of the Isle of Man Slate Company (Limited), do promise to pay to J. D. £1600, with interest at 6% till paid for value received,' the note, though sealed with the company seal, and admittedly granted for a loan to the company, bound the directors personally to pay the amount.

"It appears to be of no importance in such questions that the receiver of the bill or note knew of the fiduciary or administrative character of the granters, or that he happens to be a partner of the company, if, in fact, the consideration for which it is granted is onerous, and has been given in bona fide.

"The terms of the respondent's oath distinctly negative the allegations of the complainers that the bill was granted for his accommodation—that it was taken by him on the footing that the acceptors were not to be individually liable to him for the amount—and that, by his agreement with the association, he was only to receive payment by instalments as the funds of the association were realised by the trustees; and on this part of the case it may be noticed that the complainers have neither averred nor attempted to prove that they are not possessed of funds belonging to the association, or that the association and remanent members are insolvent.

"On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the note must be refused, with expenses."

[1] Caven v. Mackie, May 18, 1832, 10 S. 550, 4 Scot. Jur. 437.

[2] Alexander v. Sizer, Jan. 26, 1869, L. R. 4 Exch. 102; Lindus v. Melrose, Feb. 23, 1858, 3 Hurlst. and Norm. 177; Aggs v. Nicholson, June 10, 1856, 1 Hurlst. and Norm. 165.

[3] Webster v. M'Calman, June 3, 1848, 10 D. 1131, 20 Scot. Jur. 417: Chiene v. Western Bank, July 20, 1848, 10 D. 1523, 20 Scot. Jur. 576.

[4] Dutton v. Marsh, May 8, 1871, L. R. 6 Q. B. 361, 40 L. J. (Q. B.). 175.

[5] Preston v. Strutton, May 21, 1792, 1 Anstruther, Exch. Cases, 50; Beecham v. Smith, May 28, 1858, Ellis, Blackburn, and Ellis, 442; Bedford v. Brutton, Nov. 25, 1834, 1 Bingham (N. C.), 399; Lindley on Partnership, vol. ii. 915.

At advising,— No. 106.

Mar. 17, 1875. Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This suspension belongs to a category in the law in which difficult questions may arise, but the case before us presents no such difficulties. It is a suspension of a charge on a bill signed by the suspenders in their own names. The bill in favour of Sutherland runs as follows :—(reads bill, ut supra). The address on the bill is to these suspenders, in their individual capacities and designations, but it also designs them as trustees of the New Imperial Building Association. This bill is signed with the simple signatures of the parties.

The suspension is brought upon two grounds—(1) the obligation undertaken is not an individual one, and so summary diligence is not competent; (2) the obligation being by the association, summary diligence is not competent by the holder against these individual partners, in respect he is himself a partner.

In regard to the second of these reasons the case does not fall under the category at all. This is not an action against individual partners in one association at the instance of another partner. These individuals are not charged as members of the association. The charge is on the direct obligation in the bill under which they are bound to the charger.

The question truly comes to be, is it an individual obligation, or only an obligation to make forthcoming the funds of the association? I have very great doubts whether on this record, and in face of the fact that the case has been referred to the oath of the charger, we can go into this question of funds or no funds of the association. The individual responsibility is admitted, if there be no funds, and also that there can be no defence against this summary diligence if there be funds in the hands of these trustees. In the absence of any allegation that there are no funds, and in the absence of all proof on the point, I do not see how we can suspend this charge on the grounds urged. I am, however, prepared to go further, and to hold that the subscription of this bill by the suspenders was not factorio nomine, as trustees for this association, but actually as individuals. Wherever signatures to documents of this sort are not expressly qualified they must be held to bind the parties as individuals. This distinction was clearly brought out by Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn in the case of Dutton v. Marsh, which was cited to us at the debate.

The obligation here is not a company obligation, it is a personal obligation by individuals who purposely did not qualify their signatures, and that for the excellent reason that the creditor would not have accepted the bill if so qualified. They undertook an individual obligation to pay this charger £200, and they must now implement it.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion.

The parties here can never have intended to grant this bill as a nullity. Certainly Sutherland never would have given his plaster work for a piece of moonshine. It is incredible that people would enter into a document of debt knowing it to be useless. The intention of the parties, as shewn by the probabilities of the case and confirmed by the oath of the charger, was that this should be an additional guarantee to Sutherland for payment of his work. It is not stated that there are no funds of the association.

The most favourable view for these suspenders is, that they have powers under which they are entitled to borrow money in order to finish the buildings.

No. 106. Mar. 17, 1875. Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

They undertook to borrow and pay Sutherland, and if they have not done so or are not prepared with an explanation why they have not done so, that is enough to enable us to decide the case.

This is a personal obligation by these trustees. If they have funds they can pay, but if not they should explain why they have not.

If they are compelled to make this money forthcoming out of their own pockets they can get relief against the association in an action of count and reckoning. Hoc statu, and on the face of this document, I think it seems one on which a charge is justified.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. The complainers have referred their case to the oath of their opponent, the charger. And what does their case consist of? According to the statements on record three points appear to be relied on by the complainers, 1st, that the bill was an accommodation one; 2d, that no single member of the association can be proceeded against for full payment of the bill, but only rateably for his own share; and, 3dly, that, according to the form and terms of the bill, the association alone became bound, through their trustees, in payment, and not the complainers as individuals.

In regard to the first of these points, it is sufficient to remark that the oath is so clearly negative that no attempt has been made in argument to shew the contrary. In regard to the second point, again, the strict answer is that the complainers did by the terms and form of the bill undertake an individual and personal liability which they must satisfy. The English as well as the Scotch precedents cited in the course of the argument are conclusive to this effect. And as to the third point, which is very much the second repeated in somewhat different language, the same answer applies. Besides, even supposing that the complainers could be held to have accepted the bill merely as trustees for and as representing the association, it does not follow that they are not themselves individually and personally liable, the more especially seeing that it cannot be maintained that there are not association funds or estate to meet the bills. The complainers may possibly have their relief against the association and all its members, but clear it is, in my opinion, they are bound and liable in the meantime to pay the bill themselves, in respect that by accepting the bill as they did they came under a new and independent obligation to that effect.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have no difficulty in coming to the same result. I quite agree that it is enough for the decision of this case that these suspenders, who admit and plead that they are liable as trustees only, have not averred that they have no trust-funds in their hands. The principle which Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn laid down in the case of Dutton v. Marsh is entirely applicable to the present case, and is really conclusive of it. That doctrine was derived from a great number of cases, including some of those which have been quoted at the bar. It is admitted that the bill would be good to a bank, and would create a personal obligation against the suspenders in favour of the bank. Indeed this was the very purpose for which it was granted. It was meant to be discounted on the credit of the granters; but if the granters were to be only liable as trustees, and in valorem of the trust-funds, no bank would have discounted the bill, knowing nothing of the state of the trust. Now, if the bill would bind the suspenders personally and individually to the bank, it must have the same effect to the drawer. Its terms are the same, and the obligation arises from its terms. If the drawer had discounted it the bank could have made these acceptors pay, because they had not limited their liability on the face of the document itself. Whenever a man means to bind another and not himself he should take care to say so. I think this is never to be implied. Even if a trust character is mentioned it will be held in general that this is merely descriptive of the obligant, but does not exempt him from personal liability. A trustee who does not mean to be personally bound should take care to use words which will exclude his personal liability,—for example, "I bind not myself, but the trust-estate;" "I bind not myself, but my constituent, or my client, for whom I act." If he binds "himself" it will not in general limit his responsibility that he adds, "as agent for so and so," or "as trustee." This may indicate that he claims relief, but, in general, he himself will be liable in the first place.

No. 106.
Mar. 17, 1875.
Brown, &c. v. Sutherland.

As to the other plea that the charger is a partner of the association, there was a good deal of subtlety used in arguing it, but there is no authority to the effect that one partner may not enter into a contract with another partner, or even with the whole association, and become their creditor. We must hold the oath negative of the reference.

THE COURT adhered.

This judgment ruled two almost precisely similar suspensions at the instance of the same complainers against two other tradesmen (members of the association) who had done work for the association, and had obtained similar bills on which they had charged the trustees.

T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—WALLACE & FORSTER, L.A.—G. V. DUNCAN & MANN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 107.
Mar. 18, 1875.
Mackie's Trustees v. Martins.

WILLIAM GRAY COCHRANE AND OTHERS (John Mackie's Trustees), First Parties.—A. T. Innes.
MRS JANE ELIZA MACKIE OR MARTIN AND HUSBAND, Second Parties.—Balfour—Moody Stuart.
MICHAEL WELLDON RICE AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Martin's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Third Parties.—Balfour—Moody Stuart.

Process—Special Case—All Parties not called—Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 63.—Circumstances in which the Court dismissed a special case on the ground that certain persons interested were not parties to it, although the parties to the case craved a judgment as between themselves.

1ST DIVISION. B.

THE late Mr John Mackie, by his trust-disposition and settlement, thus disposed of the residue of his trust-estate.—"Ninth, I appoint my said trustees to invest the whole residue and remainder of my said means and estate hereby conveyed, in heritage, bank stock, or other safe investment, and to convey and make over the same to my daughter, Jane Eliza Mackie, and the children to be procreated of her body, whom failing to the said Isabella Mackie or Murray and the heirs of her body; but declaring that if my said daughter Jane Eliza Mackie shall die without issue of her body she shall have power by any writing under her hand to leave, bequeath, or dispose of one-half of the whole sums, means, and effects hereby specially as well as generally directed to be paid or made over to her, but no more." This residue clause became operative on the death of the truster's widow.

There being a difference of opinion between Mr Mackie's trustees, Mr

No. 107.

Mar. 18, 1875. Mackie's Trustees v. Martins.

and the said Jane Eliza Mackie, now Mrs Martin, and the trustees under Mr and Mrs Martin's contract of marriage, as to the construction and effect of this ninth clause of Mr Mackie's settlement, a special case was laid before the Court with the following queries:—

"1. Are the first parties, the testamentary trustees of the late Mr Mackie, bound to make over the residue of Mr Mackie's estate directly to Mrs Martin, excluding the jus mariti of Mr Martin or any future husband? 2. Are they bound to make it over to Mr and Mrs Martin's marriage-contract trustees, to be held and applied for the purposes, subject to the conditions, and with the powers expressed in the marriage-contract? Or, 3. Are they bound to invest the said residue upon investments or securities taken in favour of Mrs Martin in fee, whom failing, of the children of her body in fee, whom failing, of the said Isabella Mackie or Murray, and the heirs of her body, but with the declarations (1) That, if Mrs Martin shall die without issue of her body, she shall have power by any writing under her hand to leave, bequeath, or dispose of one-half of said residue, but no more; and (2) that Mrs Martin shall not be entitled to disappoint the succession by any gratuitous deed, except in so far as authorised by the above declaration; and in this event must the investments or securities be taken with a power to Mrs Martin, if she shall die without issue, to leave, bequeath, or dispose of one-half of the said residue? Or, 4. Are the trustees of Mr Mackie bound to invest the said residue upon investments or securities taken in favour of Mrs Martin, in liferent for her liferent use only, exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and of her children, nati et nascituri, in fee?"

Before hearing counsel the Court drew attention to the fact that all persons interested were not made parties to the special case, and continued the case to allow Mrs Murray and her children an opportunity to appear. Intimation of the dependence of the case, with a copy of the papers, was sent to Mrs Murray, and her children, who were in minority.

After a lapse of some weeks the case was again put out for hearing, when no appearance was made for Mrs Murray or her children.

Counsel for the parties to the special case stated that they were desirous of having the question decided as between themselves, and were prepared to undertake any risk there might possibly be of its again being opened up in the interest of Mrs Murray and her children, or their representatives.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The questions which are raised by this special case all depend upon the construction of that portion of the settlement which disposes of residue. "Ninth, I appoint my said trustees to invest the whole residue," &c.—(reads clause quoted, supra, p. 621).

The single question on which the disposal of the whole case depends is, whether Mrs Martin is entitled to an unlimited fee of the residue of the trust-estate, or whether she is entitled to a liferent only with a fee to her children, or whether there are interests beyond in the person of her sister, Mrs Murray, and her children, of the nature of a protected succession, which Mrs Martin is not entitled to defeat?

The parties to the special case are, first, the late Mr John Mackie's trustees; second, Mrs Martin and her husband; and third, the trustees under Mr and Mrs Martin's contract of marriage.

Mrs Murray and her children are unrepresented, for it is in vain to say that the trustees under Mr Mackie's trust-settlement represent Mrs Murray and her family. So far as they represent any one in this matter, they represent Mr-

Martin and Mrs Murray, and their respective families,—that is to say, they represent opposite and conflicting interests. No. 107.

Mar. 18, 1875. Mackie's Trustees v. Martins.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Court has not the whole parties properly before them, and can pronounce no judgment in this special case.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT accordingly dismissed the special case.

PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

SARAH MASON or JARVIE and HUSBAND, Pursuers.—Macdonald—Millie. THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—R. Johnstone. No. 108.

Mar. 18, 1875. Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Reparation—Damages—Negligence—Railway Company—It is the duty of a railway company to warn intending passengers of the existence of a block on the line, or other circumstances inferring unusual risk in the journey, before entering into the contract of carriage, and if they fail to do so they may render themselves liable to such passengers for injury caused by accidents, for which otherwise the company would not have been responsible.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS was an action of damages at the instance of Mrs Jarvie and her husband, residing in Stirling, against the Caledonian Railway Company for personal injury received by Mrs Jarvie on the night of 19th September 1873, during a journey from Glasgow to Greenock.

On the afternoon of the 19th September 1873 an accident had occurred to a coal train on the Glasgow and Greenock line at Boghead, about a mile west of Paisley, the result of which was to block both lines of rails for a considerable time. Telegraphic intimation of this block was received in Glasgow at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Considerable inconvenience and delay was experienced in working the traffic during the remainder of the afternoon and evening, it being necessary to run the trains from Glasgow up to the east side of the block, and there oblige the passengers to get out and walk about 100 yards along the line to the west side of the block, and again enter carriages which had brought passengers from Greenock, who, in like manner, had to walk along the line to the carriages vacated by the passengers from Glasgow.

Mrs Jarvie left Glasgow that evening by the 7 P.M. train for Greenock. The injury she complained of was alleged to have been received by her in getting out of the carriage in which she had travelled when required to change trains at the site of the block.

The case was tried before Lord Craighill and a jury, and a verdict was returned for the pursuers, assessing the damages at £100.

The defenders obtained a rule.

Mrs Jarvie's own evidence was as follows:—"On 19th September 1873 went to Glasgow from Greenock on a visit. Was to return by 7 P.M. train. Went to station. The train did not start at time. Asked one of the porters the reason. M'Kean the name of the porter. He said there had been an accident. I then asked was anybody hurt? He said, no. I asked if line clear. He said it was, and all safe. I replied that if it was not I would rather remain in Glasgow. Another porter was by at the time, and he said, Come, you're all right, here's the train. My sister got a ticket for me. The door of the carriage locked after I got in. The train went a good bit beyond Paisley and then stopped. It would be twenty minutes to twelve when I jumped out. We had left Glasgow at half-past seven. A little before twelve one of the porters told me to jump out. I looked out and said it was too high. He said, Jump out,

No. 108.
Mar. 18, 1875.
Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co.

and I'll kep you. Giving him my bag and umbrella, I jumped. He kepped me, and we both staggered, but neither fell. My arm was round his neck. My right foot came to level ground, my left went into a hollow. I felt very ill; something came over me; there came a pain in my left side; I grew sick. I felt I had suffered a shock. The porter then said, Do you see these fires? Go over there. I got to the other train. This train pointed out by a guard. I asked him, how am I to get in? and the guard said, The best way you can. A gentleman helped me in. Got to Greenock at one o'clock. Had got very wet, and felt very ill. Dr Shortridge was called in next morning. Previously I had been very strong. The doctor came daily for some time, Suffered severe pain for some time. Could not say how long; a good while. . . . . I was the first that jumped out. I did not know there were steps on the carriage. I knew there was one step on this carriage. It was a third class. I jumped because the man told me. I did not come down on the step. He did not ask me to go on the step. I did not use the step. I jumped on the ground, trusting to his catching me and keeping me from falling. When I jumped I knew I was to jump to the ground. He did prevent me from falling. . . . ."

On the other hand, M'Kean, the platform porter at Glasgow station mentioned by Mrs Jarvie, denied having told her or any other passenger that the line was clear, though admitting that he did not give them notice that it was blocked, he himself having no certain information on the point.

Mrs Jarvie was unable to identify any of the railway porters as the one alleged by her to have asked her to jump from the carriage, while the railway company denied Mrs Jarvie's statement on this point.

It was further proved that precautions were taken by the railway officials and platelayers engaged at the block for the safety of the passengers, and assistance given in transferring them from one train to the other.

At the hearing on the rule, argued for the pursuers;—The verdict was according to evidence,—for (1) it was not proved that Mrs Jarvie had been made aware of the exceptionally perilous nature of the journey she was undertaking; (2) it was proved that at the site of the accident no sufficient assistance was afforded her to alight and pass from the one train to the other; and (3) she was entitled to rely upon the directions given her by a railway official, and the direction to jump from the carriage, which was so given, was, in the circumstances, most improper, and led directly to the injury she had sustained.[1]

Argued for the defenders;—(1) It was proved that if no special warning was given to Mrs Jarvie at Glasgow before taking her ticket she was, at any rate, aware before getting into the carriage of what had occurred along the line, and received no assurance that the line was clear. Had she desired she might have declined to proceed, and would have received back her fare. (2) That she was invited to jump from the carriage rested entirely on her own statement, unsupported by any other evidence; but even if true, it was so manifestly careless and inconsiderate of her to accept such invitation that she must be held guilty of contributory negligence.[2]

---

[1] Foy v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, Jan. 14, 1865, 18 Scott's Common Bench Rep. 225; Potter v. North British Railway Company, June 7, 1873, 11 Macph. 664, 45 Scot. Jur. 413.

[2] Siner v. Great Western Railway Company, May 1, 1868, L. R. 3 Ex. 150, Feb. 9, 1869, L. R. 4 Ex. 117.

No. 108.

Mar. 18, 1875.
Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The circumstances of this case are somewhat peculiar, and raise a question of some novelty and importance. The verdict of the jury is challenged on two grounds,—(1) that there is no evidence of fault on the part of the defenders; and (2) that, assuming fault on their part, there was contributory fault on the part of the pursuer.

On the 19th December 1873 there was a block on the defenders' line between Glasgow and Greenock, caused by an accident, which is not attributed to any fault on the part of the railway company, but which produced great disturbance of the traffic. I am not disposed to hold that the occurrence of such a block on their line disables a company from carrying on their traffic. On the contrary, though a certain amount of additional risk must necessarily be incurred, I am disposed to think that the company are entitled, and even bound, to carry on their traffic, even though at inconvenience to themselves, because the entire cessation of all traffic might involve still greater loss and inconvenience to the public. But, then, under such circumstances, the company must necessarily carry on their traffic with great risk to the public. That implies that they must use unusual precaution and care.

Now, it appears to me, that if this railway company start a train under such circumstances, to carry passengers from Glasgow to Greenock, they are bound to let those passengers know the risk attending their journey—the risk which must necessarily attend a journey where the passengers, in order to reach their destination, must change trains at the scene of the accident, must get out of their carriages at a place where there is no platform, walk along the line where it is blocked, and get into fresh carriages at the other side. There is considerable risk attending such an incident in a railway journey, particularly when it occurs at night. There are many persons very ill fitted to encounter such risks, who are yet constant travellers by railway. The old, the infirm, and the nervous are averse to all such risks, and, in the general case, would avoid travelling under such circumstances, and decline to start if they were in full knowledge of what was before them.

The first duty, therefore, that lies upon the company when entering into the contract of carriage, under such circumstances, is to make their passengers fully aware that it is not a usual journey on which they are going to embark, but one of an unusual and dangerous character.

Now, it is proved without a doubt that Mrs Jarvie was not made aware that she was to encounter any such unusual risk. I do not say that it is proved that the railway porter told her the line was clear from Glasgow to Greenock, but there can be no doubt that she was not informed that the line was blocked, and that she would have to run the risks attending the passage from one train to another at the scene of the accident. She declares that if that had been made known to her she would not have gone on her journey, but would have remained in Glasgow, where she had the option of remaining the night with her sister. I see no reason to disbelieve this statement; on the contrary, I think it would have been the most natural thing for her to do.

That the railway company gave no special notice to their passengers of the state of matters along their line amounted, in my opinion, to negligence on their part, which exposed Mrs Jarvie to risks which, in her circumstances, it was quite unnecessary she should run. And if in encountering these risks Mrs Jarvie did receive any injury, they must be held responsible, for this reason, that, but for their negligence at the commencement of the journey, she would not have incurred them at all.

No. 108. Mar. 18, 1875. Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co.

But there was another duty incumbent on the railway company, and that was, at the scene of the block to use every reasonable precaution to ensure the safety of the passengers in changing from one train to the other. It is dangerous for most people to get out of a railway carriage at the side of the line without a platform to alight upon, and, therefore, I think the railway company were under obligation to give the passengers assistance in alighting, and that if they failed to do so they were guilty of additional negligence. But, in so far as that part of the evidence goes, the verdict is not so unimpeachable as on the first point. If the case depended upon that alone I should have much greater difficulty in supporting the verdict. The evidence at this point of the case depends entirely upon the pursuer's own statement, for I do not think there are either any witnesses or any circumstances corroborating her testimony. Though the defenders make much of this point now, they did not ask the presiding Judge to direct the jury that the evidence of one witness was insufficient. And I do not think he would have taken a sound view of the law if he had so directed them. This was just a part of the history of the case, of the res gestæ, and it is not every fact in a case which requires to be proved by more than a single witness. For my own part I doubt whether there is anything very far wrong in the pursuer's evidence. The place was dark—the light unsteady. To get out under these circumstances where there was no platform was necessarily attended with risk. It is a question whether it was safer to jump into the arms of a porter, or to try and climb down the side of the carriage by means of the steps. That question I do not pretend to decide. It is sufficient for this question that the railway company did not give the pursuer warning of the risk she was to incur in prosecuting her journey, and they are therefore responsible for the injury sustained.

But it is said that there was contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer. Unless, however, it can be said that the jump was any very great mistake and blunder, it can hardly be said that there was contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer any more than that there was negligence on the part of the defenders. But it is not necessary to enter upon that question, because the only evidence on that subject is the evidence of the pursuer, and I do not think it will do to take out of her mouth, as evidence against her, the statement that she did jump, without taking all the circumstances into consideration, and especially her own qualification of the statement, viz., that she jumped, on the invitation of one of the railway officials. If, on his invitation, she did jump, that could not amount to contributory negligence.

Lord Deas.—It is not disputed that there was a block on the line, and that the company's officials at Glasgow knew of it and of its nature at an early hour of the evening in question. I am of opinion that, knowing of that block, and of its nature, it was their duty to have informed intending passengers, at the Glasgow station, of the fact, so that they might go forward or not as they chose. Some might have done so, and some not. Some might have been old or feeble, or lame, or timid. Some might have been children. The burden of proving that notice was given lay on the defenders, and they have not proved it. On the contrary, it appears that no notice was given.

I am further of opinion that it was not necessary for the pursuer to prove that if she had received notice she would not have started on the journey. It is probable enough that she would not, but she did not get the opportunity of considering whether she would or not. Through this neglect the railway company took upon themselves an unusual responsibility for what might happen at the scene of the block. They misled the pursuer into an unforeseen position of anxiety and excitement, without the option which they ought to have given her. That being so, a want of coolness and presence of mind on her part, which, in other circumstances, might have founded a plea of contributory negligence, may not do so in the actual circumstances.

No. 108.

Mar. 18, 1875.
Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Co.

If notice had been given, the passengers who, nevertheless, chose to start, would have taken on themselves much of the responsibility of what might afterwards happen, and I should have hesitated very much to hold that there was any such negligence at the scene of the block on the part of the company as to have rendered them liable to such passengers. That, to say the least of it, would have been a very narrow question. But the negligence of the company at the outset of the journey affects the question very deeply, and, taking that into view, I see no ground for disturbing the verdict of the jury.

LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD MURE, and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

RULE discharged.

THOMAS LAWSON, S.S.C.—HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875.
Ferguson v. Ferguson.

JOHN FERGUSON AND JOHN MAXWELL FERGUSON, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
CHARLES FERGUSON AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Keir.

Liferent and Fee—Heir.—Where an estate was conveyed mortis causa to a father in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs-male of his body and other substitutes in fee,—held (rev. judgment of Lord Craighill) that a fiduciary fee was vested in the father during his life for behoof of his heirs-male and the other substitutes, and that he was not entitled to dispone with the concurrence of his eldest son, who could not be during his father's life, and might never be, his father's heir-male.

Observations on the case of Newlands, April 26, 1798, 3 Ross' L. C. 634.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

BY disposition and settlement, dated 24th March 1855 the Rev. James Ferguson of Easter Dalnabreck, Perthshire, gave and disponed to and in favour of the pursuer, John Ferguson, his brother, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the Rev. Donald Ferguson, also his brother, in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom all failing, his own nearest heirs whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, the town and lands of Easter Dalnabreck and others.

The granter, on 18th July 1855, executed a codicil in the following terms:—"I . . . do hereby restrict the interest of John Ferguson, within designed, my brother, in the lands and others within disponed to an alimentary liferent in the same manner and to the same effect as if the said lands and others had been disponed to the said John Ferguson in liferent for his liferent use allenarly (such liferent being strictly alimentary, and exclusive of his debts and deeds, and the diligence of his creditors), and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom failing, to the substitutes within mentioned, and subject to the burdens and declarations within specified: Moreover (in lieu of the precept of sasine contained in the foregoing disposition, which I hereby recall), I desire any notary-public to whom these presents may be presented, to give to the said John Ferguson, and the heirs-male of his body, in liferent and fee respectively, whom failing," &c.

No. 109.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Ferguson v. Ferguson.

The granter having died in 1855, John Ferguson entered upon possession of the estate, and was infeft. He had two sons, the elder, John Maxwell Ferguson, and the younger Charles Ferguson. At the date of the settlement John Maxwell Ferguson was about fifteen years of age.

John Ferguson and his eldest son brought the present action against Charles Ferguson and other persons, either named in the settlement, or who might be considered to have an interest under it, in order to have it declared that the father as liferenter, and the son as fiar, were entitled to sell or dispose of the estate either onerously or gratuitously.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The destination in the disposition and settlement of the deceased James Ferguson, and codicil thereto, being to the pursuer, John Ferguson, in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, the said John Ferguson has only a liferent interest in the lands and others thereby disponed, and holds a fiduciary fee for behoof of those to whom the succession may open at his death, and he has no right or title to execute a conveyance of the fee of said lands and others, and any such conveyance by him is inept. (2) The liferent interest of the said John Ferguson in said lands and others being declared in said codicil to be strictly alimentary, and exclusive of his debts and deeds, he is not entitled to make a conveyance of the same, and any such conveyance is inept. (3) The pursuer, John Ferguson, being still alive, and it being as yet undetermined who may be the persons entitled to succeed to the fee of said lands and others under said disposition and settlement, the pursuer, John Maxwell Ferguson, has no right or title to obtain a conveyance of said lands and others, or to grant a conveyance thereof to a third party, and any such conveyances are inept.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences, and finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.—This action has been raised to have it found that the pursuer John Ferguson, and his eldest son, John Maxwell Ferguson, representing themselves to be respectively liferenter and fiar of the lands of Easter Dalnabreck, are entitled to dispose of that property at their pleasure. Of course, if both possessed the characters to which they severally lay claim, their right is undeniable. That the pursuer John Ferguson is liferenter the defenders admit, but they deny that the pursuer John Maxwell Ferguson is fiar, and contend that neither he nor any brother of his can be fiar till their father's death. This is the dispute now presented for the decision of the Court.

"The question is raised upon the dispositive clause of a testamentary disposition of the late Reverend James Ferguson, read in connection with a codicil endorsed upon the principal deed. By the principal deed the disponer disponed to the pursuer, John Ferguson, his brother, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the defender, the Reverend Donald Ferguson, another brother, in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly (and which liferent was declared to be strictly alimentary and exclusive of his debts and deeds and the diligence of his creditors), and the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom all failing, to the disponer's own nearest heirs whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the town and lands of Easter Dalnabreck. By the codicil the disponer restricted the interest of the pursuer, John Ferguson, 'in the lands and others within disponed to an alimentary liferent, in the same manner and to the same effect as if the said lands and others had been disponed to the said John Ferguson in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly (such liferent being strictly alimentary, and exclusive of his debts and deeds and the diligence of his creditors), and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom failing, to the substitutes within mentioned.' The effect of the clause in the disposition and of the clause in the codicil which

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875.

Ferguson v. Ferguson.

The defenders reclaimed. They argued;—The term "heir" might be restricted by the context, but it could not be extended beyond its proper have now been presented, when these are read, as they must be read, together, is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the same as it would have been if in the principal deed the disposition to the pursuer, John Ferguson, and the heirs-male of his body, had been engrossed in the very words employed in the codicil. The pursuers' counsel at the debate demurred to this result, though rather faintly; but upon this point the Lord Ordinary's opinion has been formed without any hesitation, and is now expressed without any doubt. The other question debated, which is truly the question in this case, is far more difficult, and the Lord Ordinary has felt some anxiety as to the decision which ought to be pronounced. His reasons for the judgment he has given will now be explained.

"The question upon which parties are at issue is, as already mentioned, whether, by virtue of the destination to the pursuer, John Ferguson, for his liferent allenarly, and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, his eldest son, the other pursuer, John Maxwell Ferguson, has become fiar of, or in other words has acquired a vested right in the lands of Easter Dalnabreck, his father not being dead. The pursuers maintain the affirmative, and seek to have this declared. The defenders urge the contrary, and ask to be assoilzied from the action. Upon this controversy the Lord Ordinary observes, in the first place, that there is no doubt that by the clause, the effect of which is in dispute, the pursuer, John Ferguson, was constituted fiduciary fiar for behoof of the heirs-male of his body. This was settled once for all in the case of Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, Ross' L. C., vol. 3 (Her. Rights), p. 634. In the second place, the reasons for which the pursuer, John Ferguson, is regarded as fiduciary fiar are material in this inquiry. Two things had to be provided for. The first was the rule of feudal conveyancing that a fee cannot be in pendente; and the other, that the will of the disponer must, so far as legal principles will allow, receive effect. Both requirements were thought to be fulfilled by ascribing to the liferenter allenarly under such a clause the character of fiduciary fiar. Possessed of that, he represents his children unnamed, and, it may be, unborn; and this is the only function, the Lord Ordinary thinks, which, as fiduciary fiar, he performs. In the third place, the duration of the fiduciary fee is not a thing which is defined by the disposition. It may be long, or it may be short; that depends on circumstances, and especially on the time when the true fiar appears. Certainly there is nothing in the constitution of such a trust which suggests that, however soon there may be a son to take, the father is not bound, nay, is not entitled, to make over the fee, but may or must retain it so long as he lives. In the fourth place, as there is a trust, the presumption is that it shall not be kept up after the purpose for which it was constituted has been served. Has the purpose for which the pursuer, John Ferguson, was made fiduciary fiar been accomplished? This must be the result if the reason for his getting the character of trustee was that he might represent the true fiar till the latter appear. In the fifth place, the use of the words 'heirs-male of the body,' in the clause in question, does not necessitate the result for which the defenders contend. No doubt we do not usually seek for a man's heirs before he is dead, but when we put off the search till that time, we look for them in the end, that they may inherit property which he has left. Here the fee does not belong to John Ferguson. All he can do by dying is to disburden the fee of his liferent. The fiar, take the fee when he will, takes that which had belonged to none but him since the death of the disponer. And why, the trust not being created to postpone a vesting, or to protect for a time the contingent interests of ulterior beneficiaries, is there to be no fiar, no vesting of the fee till the death of the liferenter? The Lord Ordinary is at a loss to imagine a reason for such an anomaly. In the sixth place, it seems to have been assumed, in the case of Newlands v. Newlands' Creditors, that there was a vesting of the fee in the true fiar in the lifetime of the liferenter and fiduciary fiar. The eldest son, as heir-male of the body of his father—for he had no other character in which he could sue—was the litigant with his father's creditors, and his title was not objected to; but, if the contention of the defenders be sound, all that the son had was a spes succes-

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875. Ferguson v. Ferguson.

meaning so as to apply to a person who was not an heir, otherwise a person might be served heir to his own heir.[1]

The pursuers argued;—The question was one of intention. The disponer had restricted John Ferguson's right to a mere liferent, and nothing but the exigencies of feudal conveyancing had given rise to the legal fiction of a fiduciary fee. In any view the fee was merely fiduciary, and when a male child was born he became the sole beneficiary under the trust. To suspend the vesting of the beneficial interest would be as much at variance with the principles of feudal conveyancing as to keep a fee in pendente. The natural construction of the conveyance was to the father in liferent, and his eldest son in fee. The term "heir" was used in this general sense.[2]

At advising,—

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This action has been brought by John Ferguson and his son, and their object is to have it found that the one as liferenter and the other as fiar have right validly to convey, onerously or gratuitously, certain lands. Now, the question is, what were the rights of the parties under the disposition and settlement of the Rev. James Ferguson, executed in 1855, and the relative codicil executed in the same year. These two documents, the deed and codicil, must be read together. By the deed of settlement the Rev. James Ferguson conveyed the lands in question to his brother, John Ferguson, and the heirs-male of his body, and then to certain others. The codicil is in these terms:—"I . . . . . do hereby restrict the interest of John Ferguson, within designed, my brother, in the lands and others within disponed to an alimentary liferent in the same manner and to the same effect as if the said lands and others had been disponed to the said John Ferguson in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly (such liferent being strictly alimentary, and exclusive of his debts and deeds, and the diligence of his creditors), and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom failing, to the substitutes within mentioned, and subject to the burdens and sionis. This is not the view taken by any one in that case, and the words now to be quoted express the opinion of Lord Braxfield upon the point:—'It is said, where is the fee after the father's death, and during the son's life before the son has children? I have no difficulty in answering that. There was here a fiduciary or trust fee in the son for behoof of the children of the son when they should exist. This is a mere trust, no more than a name, as a fee cannot be in pendente; but the moment children of the son exist the fee is in them.' This passage will be found at page 644 of vol. 3 of Ross' L. C. (Her. Rights). The Lord Ordinary will only add that the destination or clause of disposition in Newlands' case was similar to that with which we have here to do, being to 'the said John Newlands in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs lawfully to be procreated of his body in fee.'

---

"Lastly, the view of the case to which effect has been given is supported so far by the decisions and the opinions delivered in the case of Douglas v. Thomson, 7th January 1870, 8 Macph., p. 374. The destination of the fee no doubt in that case was to children, and not to heirs or heirs-male of the body of the liferenter; but this, in so far as the application of a principle is concerned, is a distinction without a difference."

[1] Ewart v. Cottom, Dec. 6, 1870, 9 Macph. 232; M'Kinnon v. Macdonald, Feb. 14, 1765, M. 5279; Preston Bruce, March 6, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 740.

[2] Erskine's Inst. iii. 8, 38; Todd v. Mackenzie, Jan. 18, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1203; Martin's Trustees v. Milligan, Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 326, 37 Scot. Jur. 155; Pearson v. Corrie, June 28, 1825, 4 S. 119; and the cases cited in the Lord Ordinary's note.

declarations within specified: Moreover (in lieu of the precept of sasine contained in the foregoing disposition, which I hereby recall), I desire any notary-public to whom these presents may be presented to give to the said John Ferguson, and the heirs-male of his body, in liferent and fee respectively, whom failing," &c. The effect of this codicil would be to restrict the right of John Ferguson to a liferent even if, at the date of the deed, he had had no children. But at the date of the deed John Maxwell Ferguson, the son, must have been alive. This appears from several statements on the record, and I understand that the fact is so, and that there is no doubt about it.

I shall first take the case as one depending on the granter's intention. Was it meant that John Maxwell Ferguson should, from the granter's death, be fiar. He was alive when the deed was made, and he could have been named. It is a reasonable presumption that if the granter had intended to make him fiar he would have named him in the deed. The conveyance would in that case have been otherwise expressed. But, being to John Ferguson in liferent allenarly, and the heirs-male of his body in fee, it cannot be ascertained who succeeds as heir-male of the body in fee until the death of John Ferguson. It is quite possible that he might die without heirs of his body; that he may still die without heirs of his body. But if you suppose that the fee vested in John Maxwell Ferguson during his father's lifetime, then if he, being the only son, should die before his father, the father would succeed to the fee, and so would be entitled to break in on the investiture, and to cut out the other persons substituted in the deed. Yet the father is unquestionably only liferenter, and he cannot take the fee under this conveyance. Viewing the case as one of intention, I think the deed cannot be read as conferring an immediate fee on John Maxwell Ferguson.

But it is said that we are compelled to come to this result by the principles of feudal law. This has been very ably argued. But I am not convinced by it.

The case of Newlands, as reported in Ross' Leading Cases, has been referred to. But that case was not intended to decide a point like the present. It was a case with creditors, attaching the interest of a liferenter with a fiduciary fee. It is difficult to understand what the meaning of Lord Braxfield was—"I hold that a fee cannot be in pendente by the law of Scotland, either in heritable or moveable subjects. It is said, suppose a subject was abandoned, derelinquished, there would be no fee. I deny that. It remains with the person who abandons during his life, and is in his hæreditas jacens after his death, and there it must remain till regularly taken up by heirs, or attached by creditors. No length of time can, by the law of Scotland, give a right by negative prescription, if not acquired by positive prescription. But that will not determine this case; for there is another principle that must have effect, that where the intention of the maker of the deed appears, that must have effect; but then every man must be presumed to know that in law a fee cannot be in pendente, and therefore where a conveyance is by a father to a son in liferent, and children to be born in fee, no more is given to the children than a spes successionis, and the solid right of liferent and fee is in the father, who may spend and dilapidate the subject, and disappoint the children. But this is a different case. Here it is given to the son for his liferent use allenarly, which makes this a mere trust in the father, and gives the son the fee, and the father a liferent, and no more. A father may make his son a trustee as well as a stranger. A trustee's debts cannot affect the trust-estate, no more can the son's debts here, where the estate is conveyed for his liferent use allenarly. Therefore the creditors of Newlands cannot affect this estate, nor have they reason to complain, as if they had looked into their debtor's right they must have seen that he had nothing but a liferent. It is said, where is the fee after the father's death and during the son's life, before the son has children? I have no difficulty in answering that. There was here a fiduciary or trust-fee in the son for behoof of children of the son, when they should exist. This is a mere trust, no more than a name, as a fee cannot be in pendente; but the moment children of the son exist the fee is in them." Until you come to these last words there is nothing contrary to the view here taken by the defenders, and these words are not necessary for the decision of the point involved in the only question raised between the parties in the case of Newlands. But I must also say, that although highly appreciating the ability and industry of Mr Ross, I am not quite satisfied that Lord Braxfield used the precise words attributed to him, and a slight variation of expression would materially alter the meaning. The case is of high authority in other respects. It decided that in a conveyance to a parent in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to his children nascituri in fee, the parent has a liferent only, and a fiduciary fee, for behoof of the children,—not a fee which could be attached by his creditors. But the point now before us was not even raised, and certainly was not decided, in the case of Newlands. This is a case of succession as heir-male of the body of the liferenter. But is there an heir-male of the body of the liferenter till the date of his death, when, and not previously, it appears who is his heir-male of the body? That is a very different question from any raised in the case of Newlands.

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875. Ferguson v. Ferguson.

We had lately a case more in point than the case of Newlands. That was the case of Todd v. Mackenzie. In that case the point here raised, and to which I am now adverting, was considered by the Court, and your Lordship in the chair disposed of the question on principle; and your Lordship's opinion is clearly expressed. Concurring in it entirely, I quote a part of it. "The destination is, failing the heirs of the body of Janet Todd or Mackenzie, to the nearest heirs whomsoever of John Todd; and it is maintained that as soon as Mrs Mackenzie died without issue and without having disposed of the estate, it passed in terms of the destination to the nearest heir of John Todd. To this there is a double answer made by the defender, (1) that the destination was exhausted when Janet Mackenzie died, because Mr Todd being then alive there were no heirs of Mr Todd in existence, and could not be, and therefore the destination, although it had not run out in the proper sense, had lapsed and become unavailing, and consequently the estate passed to the heir-at-law of Mrs Mackenzie. But, secondly, they contend that, suppose the destination is to be held as not exhausted or become void, then it must be read as if it contained the name of John Todd himself, because it is unreasonable to suppose that the parties could intend that the heir of John Todd should take in preference to John Todd himself if he was alive when his daughter died." Farther on your Lordship observed,—"But we cannot possibly give effect to that intention, because what is sometimes called the logic of facts prevents it. The fact is undoubted—John Todd is alive, and therefore the event that is contemplated by the parties has not occurred, but the very opposite has occurred." "We must construe this destination according to its true legal construction, and the question comes to be, whether, when Janet Mackenzie died, without issue, and without disposing of the estate, there was anybody in a position to serve heir of provision to her in the character of the next-heir of John Todd. Now, it appears to me that there was not. I do not think anybody can fulfil the part of a man's heir during that man's lifetime. A man's heir has no existence until he dies, and it never can be ascertained, till he dies, who will be his heir." Upon this broad ground, so well explained by your Lordship, that the heir-male of the body of John Ferguson could not serve heir, and cannot be ascertained to be heir, till the death of John Ferguson, I think that this case may most safely and satisfactorily be decided.

The fee had not vested in John Maxwell Ferguson when he, professing to be fiar, granted a disposition. If he were now held to be fiar, and to be entitled to dispose of the estate, and if he should predecease his father, he might by gratuitous disposition defeat the right of the person who was, at John Ferguson's death, really entitled to the character of heir-male of the body of John Ferguson.

I am of opinion that, both in respectof intention and in respect of feudal principle, that result cannot be sanctioned.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that we must take the destination in the codicil as substituted for the destination in the deed. Taking it so, the lands are to be held as disponed to John Ferguson in liferent for his liferent use allenarly (such liferent being strictly alimentary and exclusive of his debts and deeds, and the diligence of his creditors), and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom failing to the granter's brother, Donald Ferguson, in alimentary liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and the heirs of his body in fee, whom failing to the granter's own heirs whomsoever. The question is, whether the eldest son of John Ferguson is fiar during his father's lifetime in such a sense as will enable him, with consent of the father as liferenter, to dispone the property onerously or gratuitously at their pleasure.

I am of opinion that John Ferguson is fiduciary fiar for behoof of whoever may become entitled to the beneficial fee, and that the first beneficial fiar will be John Ferguson's eldest son, John Maxwell Ferguson, if he survives his father, but that whether he will or will not be the heir-male of his father's body, and consequently the beneficial fiar, cannot be ascertained till his father's death. If he predeceases his father without male issue, leaving a younger brother who survives his father, that younger brother will be the heir-male of the body under the destination. A question of feudal rights can never be safely determined without considering how, according to established practice, a feudal title would fall to be made up. Here the appropriate course would be to serve the son as heir-male of the father's body, and thereby heir of provision of the granter of the deed. But in such a service the first step would be to prove the death of the father. It would be a novelty to find the father alive and perhaps present at the service of his own heir-male. If the fiar had been described as the liferenter's eldest son (although not named) the effect might have been different. A declarator might have ascertained that A B was the eldest son. But it could not be ascertained by a declarator that A B is the heir-male of his father's body in his father's lifetime, because this would not be the fact.

I agree with Lord Ardmillan that the observations attributed to Lord Braxfield in the case of Newlands cannot be safely assumed to have been actually used by his Lordship, or used in a sense applicable to this case. They would have been foreign to anything he had to consider in the case before him. The father was bankrupt, and the question was whether the subjects should be struck out of the schedule of the property to be sold for his debts. The son, supposing the beneficial fee had not then vested in him, had a sufficient contin-gent interest to raise that question, and it was enough to warrant the subjects being struck out that the subjects were in no view the property of the father.

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875. Ferguson v. Ferguson.

The granter in the present case was, of course, quite entitled to postpone the vesting of the beneficial fee, and he did so. He satisfied the legal rule that a fee cannot be in pendente by creating a fiduciary fee. His destination of the beneficial fee is no doubt to be regarded as a question of intention, but the intention is to be ascertained by construing the words used according to legal rules. No other principle can be safely admitted in a question of heritable rights.

It is satisfactory, however, to see that the true intention of the granter must really have been that which the law attributes to him. It appears that the son who claims the beneficial fee was in existence and past pupillarity at the date of the deed. The granter was evidently familiar with the state of the family, and if he had wished to give a present fee to the son the familiar course was (as every conveyancer knew) to have conveyed the subjects to the father in liferent allenarly, and to the son nominatim in fee. But in place of this the granter, failing an heir-male of the father's body, destined the beneficial fee to a succession of other substitutes,—creating in fact a sort of tailzied destination.

My opinion is that the beneficial fee has not yet vested in the son, and consequently that, although with the father's consent, he cannot at present deal with the estate.

Lord Mure.—I concur with your Lordships in holding that, under the destination in this deed of settlement, the words "heirs-male of his body" must be held to mean the heirs-male at the date of the death of John Ferguson, the liferenter, and that the defenders are therefore entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. That, I think, is the fair natural meaning of the words; and in the passage from Ersk. iii. 8, 38, referred to in the argument, it is expressly laid down that where, in a marriage-contract, an heritable subject is provided to the heirs-male of the marriage, and a special provision is granted to a daughter, failing such heirs-male, the daughter is entitled to it although a son should exist of the marriage, unless he shall also survive the father; and the reason given for this is, that "one cannot with any propriety be called heir while the ancestor to whom he ought to be heir is alive." Now, although this is laid down with reference to a marriage-contract, the heirs under which, Mr Erskine says, are, in the ordinary case, more favourably regarded than heirs substituted in a simple destination, the reason given, viz., that a party cannot with propriety be called heir while the ancestor is alive, seems to me to apply with equal force to the present case; and such appears to have been the view taken of the meaning of the word "heirs" in disposing of the case of Todd v. Mackenzie, which has also been referred to. I am therefore of opinion that the same rule ought to be here applied; and in coming to this conclusion I do not think that we are in any respect trenching on the decision in the case of Newlands referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note. For there the destination was in some respects different, and there was no decision, as I read the case, that the fee belonged to the eldest son, to the extent of being subject to his immediate disposal, but simply that he had an interest, and was entitled, to object to the fee being sold under the ranking for behoof of the creditors of his father, the liferenter, by whom it was appointed to be held in trust for the benefit of his children.

But, apart from the strict meaning of the words used, there are, I think, in the circumstances of the present case, pretty distinct indications of intention on the part of the testator that the fee of the estate was not to vest in any of the heirs-male of John Ferguson, the liferenter, during his life, so as to be at their absolute disposal even with his concurrence. The destination is not to children nascituri, but to the "heirs-male of the body" of the liferenter. Now, at the date of the execution both of the deed of settlement and of the codicil, John Maxwell Ferguson was in existence. If therefore it had been the intention of the granter to endeavour to vest an immediate fee in him, when he made the alteration on the terms of the original destination in favour of "John Ferguson, and the heirs-male of his body," and restricted the right of John Ferguson to one of liferent allenarly, his course was to have conveyed the estate to John Maxwell Ferguson nominatim in fee. But he did not adopt that course. He created a fiduciary fee in the person of John Ferguson for behoof of the "heirs-male of his body," and the other substitutes called by the destination, thereby, I think, shewing, regard being had to the ordinary meaning of the words used, that the intention was to settle the fee of the estate, not absolutely upon John Maxwell Ferguson, the heir-male then in existence, but upon the heir-male who might be in existence at the date of the liferenter's death.

No. 109.

Mar. 19, 1875.
Ferguson v. Ferguson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The conveyance which we have to construe is "to the said John Ferguson in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, such liferent being strictly alimentary, and exclusive of his debts and deeds, and the diligence of his creditors, and to the heirs-male of his body in fee, whom failing," to certain substitutes mentioned. Now, one thing is beyond dispute, that while there is no person in existence who takes the fee, there is a fiduciary fee in the liferenter, even in a case when he has a liferent of a limited kind. But the question here is whether under this destination a person entitled to take the fee can come into existence during the lifetime of John Ferguson. I agree with all your Lordships that no such person can come into existence, and I do not think the case is attended with any difficulty. There is no other part of the deeds referred to as explaining the dispositive clause, and so the intention of the granter must be gathered from the dispositive clause alone. The words are of common use and well ascertained meaning. "Heir-male of the body" is a person who cannot be ascertained until the death of the liferenter. One can quite understand that when words, such as "children," which have a flexible meaning, are used, the granter's intention may be gathered from other parts of the deeds. But here there is no reason why we should give to the words used any meaning but the ordinary one. The destination is to a father in liferent, and to his heir-male of the body in fee. There must be a fiduciary fee for some time, and there is no reason why it should not subsist till it has been ascertained who the heir-male of the body of John Ferguson is, and that cannot be ascertained till John Ferguson's death.

The Lord Ordinary has been misled by the case of Newlands. He thinks that according to the view of the defenders the heir-male of the body would have had no title to sue in the case of Newlands. But that case was a ranking and sale, and the estate, which the father only liferented, was subject to a destination which gave the eldest son an interest to object although he was not fiar. I must say that I have some doubts whether the observations attributed to Lord Braxfield are authentic. They have been collected by Mr Ross from MS. notes on Lord Elphinstone's session papers. It would be strange if on such observations so recorded we were to found our judgment. Therefore I cast the dicta altogether aside.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled.

No. 109.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Ferguson v. Ferguson.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, sustain the defences, and assoilzie the defenders," &c.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—PEARSON, ROBERTSON, & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

JAMES WILLIAM GAMMELL KENNY, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
MRS ROSA ANN BERTRAM OR GAMMELL OR TAYLOR AND HUSBAND AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Lee.

Entail—Destination—Entail by two Deeds—Fetters.—A proprietor entailed his estate upon A, and the heirs-male of his body, and a series of substitutes, reserving to himself power to revoke and alter by any writings under his hand, "which writings shall be taken as a part of the present deed of entail, and shall be as effectual" "as if the same had been inserted herein." In a subsequent deed the granter revoked the destination in the former deed in so far as regarded the substitutes following the heirs-male of the body of A, and disponed the estates to A, and the heirs-male of his body, and a series of substitutes entirely different from those in the deed of entail. The second deed contained an obligation to infeft A, whom failing, &c., "in manner and on the terms specified in the previous deed of entail," with and under the burden of the provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the said deed of entail, and an assignation to the procuratory and precept in the deed of entail. The deed further contained a declaration that the institute and substitutes should be entitled to possess the estates on the deed of entail and these presents, and on no other title whatever. The entailer recorded the deed of entail, and A recorded the deed of revocation and new destination in the Register of Entails, and completed a title by infeftment and crown charter of confirmation, each bearing to proceed upon both the entailer's deeds.

In a question inter hæredes, held, in accordance with the Countesswells case,[1] that the deed of 1823 must be read as a new and substantive conveyance, superseding that in the entail of 1816, and free from the fetters of an entail.

Question, whether, after the passing of the Rutherfurd Act, the distinction between questions under entails with creditors and questions inter hæredes could any longer be maintained.

Entail—Fetters.—A deed of entail cannot effectually impose fetters by reference to another deed.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. M.

JAMES GAMMELL of Countesswells, on the narrative that his then deceased son, Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, left four sons, William, James, Andrew, and Ernest Gammell, and four daughters, Martha, Mary, Margaret, and Jessie Gammell, executed a deed of entail of his estate of Portlethen, dated 15th March 1816, containing this destination,—"I hereby, with and under the burden of the declarations, reservations, provisions, restrictions, limitations, conditions, and clauses irritant and resolutive after specified, give, grant, alienate, and dispone to and in favour of myself in liferent, and to the said Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to the said Andrew Gammell, son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the said James Gammell, also son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the said William Gammell, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Ernest Gammell; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said

[1] Gammell v. Cathcart (Countesswells entail), Nov. 13, 1849, 12 D. 19, and 21 Scot. Jur. 593, and H. L. Dec. 13, 1852, 1 Macq. 362, and 25 Scot. Jur. 146.

Andrew Gammell, son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said James Gammell, also son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said William Gammell; whom failing, to the said Martha Gammell and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of her body; whom failing, to the said Margaret Gammell and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of her body; whom failing, to the said Mary Gammell and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of her body; whom failing, to the said Jessie Gammell and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of her body; whom failing, to my own nearest heirs whatsoever."

The deed of entail contained all the clauses and fetters of a strict entail directed against Ernest Gammell, as well as against the heirs of entail substituted to him, as also an obligation to infeft, and a procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine. (Quoted in the opinion of Lord Deas, p. 642.)

The deed of entail was further granted "with and under this condition, that the said Ernest Gammell and the whole heirs of entail appointed to succeed to him in the order above specified shall take and possess the lands and estate above written upon this deed of entail only, and upon no other right or title whatever, and that they shall use any other right which they may happen to acquire thereto as additional and collateral titles thereto, for strengthening and supporting the deed of entail only, and for no other purpose whatever."

The deed contained this reserved power of alteration,—"But saving and reserving nevertheless full power and liberty to me, at any time in my life, and even on deathbed, not only to alter the said course and order of succession as to the said Ernest Gammell, and all the heirs of entail before specified, and to revoke or alter all or any of the conditions, provisions, restrictions, irritancies, and others before written, and to revoke this disposition in whole or in part at my pleasure, but also to sell, alienate, wadset, or dispone the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, or contract debts thereon, or even gratuitously to dispose thereof as I think proper, and likewise to empower and authorise the said Ernest Gammell, or any of the said heirs of entail, or any other person or persons whom I shall please to name, to suspend or dispense with the foresaid conditions, restrictions, and irritancies, or any of them, after my death, in the same manner as I could have done during my life, all which revocations or alterations so to be made by myself, or any other person so to be appointed by me as aforesaid, shall be made and done by writing under our several hands respectively, which writing or writings shall be understood and taken as a part of this present deed of entail, and shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been inserted herein."

The deed of entail was registered by the entailer himself in the Register of Tailzies on 9th July 1816.

In virtue of the reserved power above narrated, James Gammell, on 16th April 1823, executed a "deed of revocation of nomination of heirs of entail to Portlethen, and new disposition to heirs of entail to that estate."

Proceeding on the narrative of the original deed of entail and of the reserved power of alteration and revocation, this deed declared,—"And whereas I have now resolved to alter the foresaid course and order of succession, in so far as regards the said Andrew Gammell, James Gammell, William Gammell, Martha Gammell, Margaret Gammell, Mary Gammell, Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their bodies, I have

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

therefore revoked, and do hereby revoke, the foresaid disposition and deed of entail in so far as the same is granted in favour of the said Andrew, James, William, Martha, Margaret, Mary, and Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their respective bodies, and in their place I do hereby nominate and substitute the persons after named, and I do by these presents give, grant, alienate, and dispone to and in favour of myself in liferent, and to the said Ernest Gammell, son of the said deceased Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, in fee, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs-female of his body; whom failing, to William Gammell Kenny (the pursuer) youngest son of Mrs Mary Geils or Kenny and the late Kenny, her husband, and the heirs-male of the body of the said William Gammell Kenny—(Here follows a series of heirs differing entirely from that in the entail of 1816)—whom all failing, to the heirs whomsoever of the person who shall die last infeft and in possession of the said lands and estate of Portlethen in virtue of the foresaid deed of entail and of these presents . . . All and Whole—(Here follows description of lands)—and I bind and oblige me to infeft and seise myself, and the said Ernest Gammell, son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, whom failing, the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him as aforesaid, in the foresaid lands, in manner and on the terms specified in the foresaid deed of entail, with and under the burden of the provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, declarations, clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the said deed of entail, all which clauses I hereby confirm and do hereby assign to my said disponees and heirs of entail in their order, the procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine and whole other clauses in said deed of entail; declaring that the said Ernest Gammell, and the persons substituted to him as aforesaid shall be entitled to possess the said lands under the foresaid deed of entail and these presents, and upon no other right or title whatever, and also that the said Ernest Gammell, son of the said Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, and the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him in the order before mentioned, shall be obliged to record these presents in the Register of Taillies, as also in the Books of Council and Session, in case the same shall not have been done by myself."

James Gammell, the entailer, died on 15th September 1825, and this deed of revocation was recorded in the Register of Tailzies in 1828. He was survived by Ernest Gammell, who completed his title in 1830 to the estates of Portlethen, by taking infeftment upon the precept in the deed of entail. The instrument of sasine in his favour narrated the deed of entail and whole conditions and provisions, and clauses prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive therein contained, and also the deed of revocation and nomination. He thereafter, in the same year, obtained a charter of confirmation under the Great Seal confirming the deed of entail, deed of revocation and nomination, and instrument of sasine in his favour. Ernest Gammell continued during his life to possess the estate of Portlethen under the titles made up by him as above specified. He died on or about 23d February 1855 without issue.

Previous, however, to his death, being advised of the invalidity of the entail and deed of revocation under which he had made up his titles, he executed a disposition of the estate of Portlethen to and in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of his body; whom failing, to Mrs Rosa Ann Bertram or Gammell, his wife, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever.

Mrs Gammell, after her husband's death, was on 2d July 1855 served nearest and lawful heir of provision to him, and was on 12th July 1855 infeft in the estate.

No. 110.

Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

In 1857 she was married a second time to Mr James Taylor, in contemplation of which marriage she, on 19th August 1857, conveyed the estate to trustees, who held it at the date of this action.

The pursuer, Colonel James William Gammell Kenny, named in the deed of revocation William Gammell Kenny, brought this action of reduction of the disposition by Ernest Gammell of 23d December 1852, and the deeds which had followed thereon, as in contravention of the deed of entail and the deed of revocation, calling as defenders Mrs Rosa Ann Bertram or Gammell or Taylor, and her husband James Taylor, and the trustees under her trust-disposition of 1857.

The pursuer pleaded;—2. As the late Ernest Gammell held the estate subject to the fetters of a valid and effectual entail, constituted by the said deeds of 1816 and 1823, the disposition executed by him in 1852, being the writ first called for, was executed in contravention of the entail, and the pursuer, as heir of provision to the said Ernest Gammell under the said deeds, is entitled to have the same reduced and set aside.

The defenders pleaded;—3. The pursuer is not entitled to have the disposition executed by Ernest Gammell in 1852 reduced or set aside, in respect that Ernest Gammell did not hold the estate thereby conveyed under the fetters of a valid and effectual entail, or under any title effectually prohibiting him from executing such disposition. 4. The pursuer is not entitled to claim the estate, or to set aside the titles of the defenders in so far as these depend upon the entail of 1816 (1) in respect that said deed was revoked, and the conveyance of the lands therein contained was superseded by the new disposition of the estate contained in the deed of 1823; and (2), and separatim, in respect that the pursuer is not called to the succession by, and that he has no jus crediti under said deed of 1816. 5. The pursuer is not entitled to claim the estate, or set aside the defenders' titles in so far as these depend upon the deed of 1823, in respect that said deed was a new and substantive disposition of the entailed estate by James Gammell of Countesswells, and that it does not contain the prohibitory, irritant, or resolutive clauses in terms of the Act 1685, c. 22. Separately, The attempted assignation by James Gammell in the deed of 1823 of the procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine in the deed of entail of 1816 was wholly inept, and the disponees and substitutes called to the succession by the deed of 1823 could not competently use said assignation as a means of obtaining infeftment in the said estate under the fetters of the entail of 1816. 6. Esto that so far as regarded Ernest Gammell the entail of 1816 remained unrevoked, and that his infeftment was a valid infeftment under that deed, the pursuer is not entitled to prevail in this action, in respect that the destination contained in that deed in favour of all the heirs called to the succession after Ernest Gammell and the heirs of his body was effectually revoked by the deed of 1823, and that, as Ernest Gammell died without issue, the estate was effectually transmitted to his wife by his disposition of 1852.

The Lord Ordinary, on 1st December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the reasons of reduction, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses."*

* "NOTE.— . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this case must be decided on the principles given effect to in the case of Gammell v. Cathcart, 13th November 1849, 12 D. 19, and 1 Macqueen, 362.

"James Gammell was the granter of two deeds which formed the subject of decision in that case with reference to the estate of Countesswells. These two

No. 110. Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—The case of the Countesswells entail[1] was quite different. The deeds are similar to those granted by him in the present case with reference to the estate of Portlethen, having been prepared by the same conveyancer, and evidently on the same style. The second deed in both cases was executed on the same date. The only difference between the two sets of deeds is that in the Countesswells entail James Gammell revoked by his second deed the nomination of the institute and whole substitutes, with the exception of the nomination in favour of Andrew Gammell, the third substitute, and the heirs-male and female of his body, whereas by the second deed in the present case he revoked the entail of Portlethen in so far as the same is granted in favour of the whole persons substituted to Ernest Gammell, the institute, and the heirs-male and female of his body. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this variation between the two sets of deeds does not afford any sufficient grounds for pronouncing a decision in the present case different from that which was pronounced with regard to the Countesswells entail.

"Here there are two distinct deeds,—the first containing the fetters of entail and the other an unlimited conveyance, with a mere reference to the fetters as contained in the first deed. There is no conveyance or substitution in the first deed hæredibus nominandis, and the pursuer and the other persons substituted to him in the second deed do not take under the disponing words and fetters of the first deed as heirs of entail nominated in virtue of such a conveyance or substitution. The pursuer founded strongly upon the clause in the first deed reserving power to alter and gratuitously dispone, and declaring that all such alterations shall be understood and taken as part of that entail, and shall be as effectual as if inserted therein, and upon the clause in the second deed declaring that the institute and substitutes shall be entitled to possess the estate under the said entail and that second deed, and upon no other right or title whatever. That no doubt shews that it was the intention of the entailer that the two deeds should together make an entail as effectual as if the whole had been contained in one deed. But such an intention cannot make an effectual entail. The disposition of 1823, in favour of the pursuer and the other persons substituted to him, contain none of the fetters, and these fetters cannot be applied by reference to them as contained in the disposition and taillie of 1816, which is a separate deed. The pursuer has no right of succession, and is not an heir of tailzie under that deed of 1816. He has, therefore, the Lord Ordinary considers, no right to the benefit of the fettering clauses of that deed, or to insist in the present action.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the disposition of 1823, containing as it does a new and substantive disposition of the estate in favour of the institute and the heirs-male and female of his body, and of an entirely new set of substitutes, and an assignation in favour of the whole of these parties in their order, to the procuratory and precept inserted in the entail of 1816, entirely superseded the disposition in the deed of 1816, and constituted a new grant and title, and that Ernest Gammell was entitled to take the estate of Portlethen under that new grant as a fee-simple proprietor, seeing that it contains no fettering clauses.

"The case of Porterfield v. Stewart, 8 Shaw, 16, 5 W. and S. 517, does not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, apply, because the first deed in that case contained not only a power to alter the succession but also a substitution hæredibus nominandis, and the second deed contained no new disposition of the estate conveyed by the first deed, but only an alteration of the succession and nomination of heirs. That deed of nomination accrued to and became part of the first original deed. And the heirs thereby named were held to take under the conveyance in the original entail, with all its fetters, as heirs named under or in virtue of the substitution hæredibus nominandis. Without such a substitution a nomination would have been inoperative. In the present case there is no such substitution in the entail of 1816, and the deed of 1823 is not a deed of nomination, but a new and substantive disposition."

[1] Gammell v. Cathcart, Nov. 13, 1849, 12 D. 19, 21 Scot. Jur. 593, H. L. Dec. 13, 1852, 1 Macq. 362, 25 Scot. Jur. 146.

No. 110.

Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

ferent from the present. In that case a new disposition to the new institute was required, for without it he could not take up the estate. He was only a substitute heir under the original entail, and the whole destination was revoked in order to make him institute under the new destination. By the deed of alteration the feudal effect was entirely withdrawn from the original deed, and the new institute, Andrew Gammell, could only take up the estate with the assistance of the deed of alteration. In the present case the institute, Ernest Gammell, required no assistance from the second deed in order to make up his title. He was institute under the original entail, and remained so. The second deed revoked the destination to the substitutes after him and his heirs-male contained in the first deed, and replaced them by a new series of substitute heirs. But it left the destination to him and his heirs-male standing. It might be that it failed to place the new substitutes under the fetters of the entail. But it in no way removed those fetters from the institute and his heirs-male. Ernest Gammell possessed the estate as institute heir of entail during his life. Had he left heirs-male they would have succeeded as heirs of entail. It was not till his death that it became apparent that he was to have no heir-male to succeed him under the entail. On his death without issue the pursuer became entitled to succeed under the destination of the second deed. Whether he then fell under the fetters of the entail was a question between him and those substituted to him, not between him and the representatives of Ernest Gammell. Without admitting that he would not himself fall under the fetters of a valid entail, it was at least clear that he could not be debarred from enforcing the fetters against Ernest Gammell, on the ground that he himself would succeed as fee-simple proprietor.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—The question raised in the present case was settled in terminis by the previous case of Countesswells. The only difference was in the position in the destination in the original deeds of entail held by the first disponees in the deeds of revocation. But that introduced no distinction in point of principle. The second deed in both cases was quite good as a deed of revocation. Having revoked the destination to the prior heirs, the second deed just left Andrew Gammell in the Countesswells case in the position of institute. In the present case Ernest Gammell occupied that position from the beginning. Had the deed of revocation in the Countesswells case been a mere deed of revocation, the original entail would have stood, certain heirs being dropped out of the line of succession. But it went further, it made a new and substantive disposition, free from the fetters of an entail. Though the revocation might have affected the original deed of entail it was held that the new disposition could not in any way be imported into it for want of a conveyance hæredibus nominandis in the former deed. Nor could the fetters of the original entail be imported by reference into the new disposition. That the deed of revocation was in reality a new and separate disposition, free from fetters of entail, and that it superseded the disposition

[1] Pursuer's Authorities.—Bell's Lectures, p. 989; Padwick v. Stewart, March 4, 1874, ante, vol. 1, 697; Fraser v. Lord Lovat, Feb. 28, 1842, 1 Bell's App. 105; Mure v. Mure, Feb. 16, 1837, 15 S. 581, H. of L. May 18, 1838, 3 S. and M'L. 237; Farquhar v. Hamilton, Feb. 3, 1842, 4 D. 600, 14 Scot. Jur. 242; Gordon v. Gordon, March 1, 1862, 24 D. 687, 34 Scot. Jur. 344; Macgregor v. Gordon, Dec. 1, 1864, 3 Macph. 148, 37 Scot. Jur. 72; Porterfield v. Stewart, Nov. 18, 1829, 8 S. 16, H. of L. Sept. 23, 1831, 5 W. and S. 515; Dempster v. Dempster, H. of L. June 12, 1857, 19 D. (H. of L.) 14, 29 Scot. Jur. 391, 3 Macq. 62; Lord Charles Hamilton v. Duke of Hamilton, April 29, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. of L.) 48, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 12.

No. 110. Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

in the original deed of entail, was the ratio decidendi in the Countesswells case, and equally applied to the present.[1]

At advising,—

Lord Deas.—By deed of entail dated 15th March 1816, and recorded in the Register of Entails 9th July same year, the late James Gammell disponed his estate of Portlethen and others to himself in liferent, and his grandson Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to his grandson Andrew Gammell and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to his other grandsons named and the heirs-male of their bodies in their order; "whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Ernest Gammell," and so on.

The deed contained procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, and all the usual clauses of a strict entail, including an obligation to possess on the tailzied titles only. The deed also contained a power to revoke and alter the course of succession, as well as the disposition generally, by any writing or writings under the entailer's hand, "which writing or writings shall be understood and taken as a part of the present deed of entail, and shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been inserted herein."

The precept of sasine directed sasine to be given to the entailer, "and to the said Ernest Gammell, whom failing, to the other heirs of entail above mentioned appointed to succeed to him in the order before specified, for our respective rights of liferent and fee," subject to the conditions, and clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the deed, and held as repeated brevitatis causa, "but which are hereby expressly appointed as aforesaid to be verbatim inserted in the infeftments to follow hereon."

By a subsequent deed, dated 16th April 1823, and recorded in the Register of Entails 19th February 1828, the entailer narrated the deed of entail and the power of alteration and revocation thereby reserved to him, and then proceeded, —"And whereas I have now resolved to alter the foresaid course and order of succession in so far as regards the said Andrew Gammell, James Gammell, William Gammell, Martha Gammell, Margaret Gammell, Mary Gammell, Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their bodies, I have therefore revoked, and do hereby revoke the foresaid disposition and deed of entail, in so far as the same is granted in favour of the said Andrew, James, William, Martha, Mary, Margaret, and Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their respective bodies, and in their place I do hereby nominate and substitute the persons after named." At the end of the nomination of heirs there followed a description of the lands disponed, verbatim as in the original deed, together with an obligation to infeft the said Ernest Gammell, "whom failing, the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him as aforesaid in the foresaid lands, in manner and in the terms specified in the foresaid deed of entail, with and under the burden of the provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, declarations, clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the said deed of entail, all which clauses I hereby confirm, and do hereby assign to my said disponees and heirs of entail in their order the procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, and whole other clauses in said

[1] Defenders' Authorities.—Porterfield v. Stewart, ut supra; Fowler v. Fowler, Jan. 28, 1869, 7 Macph. 420; Paterson v. Leslie, July 1, 1845, 7 D. 950, 17 Scot. Jur. 494; Lord Forbes v. Gammell, May 14, 1858, 20 D. 917, 30 Scot. Jur. 542; Stair, iv. 18, 8; Ersk. iii. 8, 32.

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

deed of entail, declaring that the said Ernest Gammell, and the persons substituted to him as aforesaid, shall be entitled to possess the said lands under the foresaid deed of entail and these presents, and upon no other right or title whatever, and also that the said Ernest Gammell, son of the deceased Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, and the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him in the order before mentioned, shall be obliged to record these presents in the Register of Tailzies, as also in the Books of Council and Session, in case the same shall not have been done by myself." Then followed a reservation of power to revoke and alter both the original deed and this deed at the pleasure of the entailer.

The entailer died on 15th September 1825, and both deeds were thereupon duly recorded in the Register of Entails. Ernest Gammell completed a feudal title by infeftment on 17th April 1830, which was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines on 18th May same year, and obtained a crown charter of confirmation in the course of the same year. This infeftment bore to proceed upon both deeds, and it is enough to say in regard to it that, in its form, it appears to be unexceptionable as a tailzied investiture in his person, completed by confirmation, subject, however, to the questions now raised as to the import and effect of the two deeds on which the infeftment bore to proceed.

Ernest Gammell, who completed that title, subsequently executed a disposition in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, the heirs-female of his body, whom failing, his wife, Mrs Rosa Ann Bertram or Gammell, now Taylor, the defender, and her heirs and assignees. The disposition proceeded on the footing that he was fee-simple proprietor of the estate. The ground on which he held himself to be fee-simple proprietor was that none of the heirs substituted in the entail after himself and his issue (of whom he had none), were effectually laid under the fetters of the entail; and consequently that, failing issue of his body, the entail was at an end. The question we have to decide is, whether this view was well founded.

Now, there can be no doubt that an effectual entail cannot be made by reference. That was decided in a question with creditors in Broomfield v. Paterson, 29th June 1784 (M. 15,618). In that case Sir John Paterson, in 1743, executed an entail, with the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, in favour of his grandson as institute, and certain substitutes. Sir John recorded the entail in the Register of Tailzies, and caused infeftment to be passed upon it. He afterwards renounced the right to revoke and alter, which he had originally reserved. In 1758, with consent of the institute, he executed a new disposition of the lands, varying in material respects the destination, &c. in the deed of 1743, but, in place of repeating the fetters, referring to them thus,—"with and under the provisions, conditions, irritant and resolutive clauses, as contained in the original bond of tailzie, and in the charter and infeftment following thereon." On the death of the entailer the institute completed his title on the procuratory contained in the new deed, but in the instruments, both of resignation and of sasine, he engrossed ad longum the prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses from the deed of 1743. The daughter of the institute, who succeeded to him, made up her titles in the same way. A creditor of the institute (Major Broomfield) thereafter brought an action against her as representing her father, on the footing that the deed of 1758 put an end to the entail of 1743, and was not itself an effectual entail, in respect—1st, that it was not recorded in the Register of Entails; 2d, that it only referred to, and did not

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

in the original deed of entail, was the ratio decidendi in the Countess-wells case, and equally applied to the present.[1]

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—By deed of entail dated 15th March 1816, and recorded in the Register of Entails 9th July same year, the late James Gammell disponed his estate of Portlethen and others to himself in liferent, and his grandson Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to his grandson Andrew Gammell and the heirs-male of his body in fee; whom failing, to his other grandsons named and the heirs-male of their bodies in their order; "whom failing, to the heirs-female of the body of the said Ernest Gammell," and so on.

The deed contained procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, and all the usual clauses of a strict entail, including an obligation to possess on the tailzied titles only. The deed also contained a power to revoke and alter the course of succession, as well as the disposition generally, by any writing or writings under the entailer's hand, "which writing or writings shall be understood and taken as a part of the present deed of entail, and shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been inserted herein."

The precept of sasine directed sasine to be given to the entailer, "and to the said Ernest Gammell, whom failing, to the other heirs of entail above mentioned appointed to succeed to him in the order before specified, for our respective rights of liferent and fee," subject to the conditions, and clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the deed, and held as repeated brevitatis causa, "but which are hereby expressly appointed as aforesaid to be verbatim inserted in the infeftments to follow hereon."

By a subsequent deed, dated 16th April 1823, and recorded in the Register of Entails 19th February 1828, the entailer narrated the deed of entail and the power of alteration and revocation thereby reserved to him, and then proceeded, —"And whereas I have now resolved to alter the foresaid course and order of succession in so far as regards the said Andrew Gammell, James Gammell, William Gammell, Martha Gammell, Margaret Gammell, Mary Gammell, Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their bodies, I have therefore revoked, and do hereby revoke the foresaid disposition and deed of entail, in so far as the same is granted in favour of the said Andrew, James, William, Martha, Mary, Margaret, and Jessie Gammell, and the heirs-male and female of their respective bodies, and in their place I do hereby nominate and substitute the persons after named." At the end of the nomination of heirs there followed a description of the lands disponed, verbatim as in the original deed, together with an obligation to infeft the said Ernest Gammell, "whom failing, the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him as aforesaid in the foresaid lands, in manner and in the terms specified in the foresaid deed of entail, with and under the burden of the provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, declarations, clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the said deed of entail, all which clauses I hereby confirm, and do hereby assign to my said disponees and heirs of entail in their order the procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, and whole other clauses in said

[1] Defenders' Authorities.—Porterfield v. Stewart, ut supra; Fowler v. Fowler, Jan. 28, 1869, 7 Macph. 420; Paterson v. Leslie, July 1, 1845, 7 D. 950, 17 Scot. Jur. 494; Lord Forbes v. Gammell, May 14, 1858, 20 D. 917, 30 Scot. Jur. 542; Stair, iv. 18, 8; Ersk. iii. 8, 32.

No. 110.

Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

deed of entail, declaring that the said Ernest Gammell, and the persons substituted to him as aforesaid, shall be entitled to possess the said lands under the foresaid deed of entail and these presents, and upon no other right or title whatever, and also that the said Ernest Gammell, son of the deceased Lieutenant-General Andrew Gammell, and the heirs of entail hereby substituted to him in the order before mentioned, shall be obliged to record these presents in the Register of Tailzies, as also in the Books of Council and Session, in case the same shall not have been done by myself." Then followed a reservation of power to revoke and alter both the original deed and this deed at the pleasure of the entailer.

The entailer died on 15th September 1825, and both deeds were thereupon duly recorded in the Register of Entails. Ernest Gammell completed a feudal title by infeftment on 17th April 1830, which was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines on 18th May same year, and obtained a crown charter of confirmation in the course of the same year. This infeftment bore to proceed upon both deeds, and it is enough to say in regard to it that, in its form, it appears to be unexceptionable as a tailzied investiture in his person, completed by confirmation, subject, however, to the questions now raised as to the import and effect of the two deeds on which the infeftment bore to proceed.

Ernest Gammell, who completed that title, subsequently executed a disposition in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, the heirs-female of his body, whom failing, his wife, Mrs Rosa Ann Bertram or Gammell, now Taylor, the defender, and her heirs and assignees. The disposition proceeded on the footing that he was fee-simple proprietor of the estate. The ground on which he held himself to be fee-simple proprietor was that none of the heirs substituted in the entail after himself and his issue (of whom he had none), were effectually laid under the fetters of the entail; and consequently that, failing issue of his body, the entail was at an end. The question we have to decide is, whether this view was well founded.

Now, there can be no doubt that an effectual entail cannot be made by reference. That was decided in a question with creditors in Broomfield v. Paterson, 29th June 1784 (M. 15,618). In that case Sir John Paterson, in 1743, executed an entail, with the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, in favour of his grandson as institute, and certain substitutes. Sir John recorded the entail in the Register of Tailzies, and caused infeftment to be passed upon it. He afterwards renounced the right to revoke and alter, which he had originally reserved. In 1758, with consent of the institute, he executed a new disposition of the lands, varying in material respects the destination, &c. in the deed of 1743, but, in place of repeating the fetters, referring to them thus,—"with and under the provisions, conditions, irritant and resolutive clauses, as contained in the original bond of tailzie, and in the charter and infeftment following thereon." On the death of the entailer the institute completed his title on the procuratory contained in the new deed, but in the instruments, both of resignation and of sasine, he engrossed ad longum the prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses from the deed of 1743. The daughter of the institute, who succeeded to him, made up her titles in the same way. A creditor of the institute (Major Broomfield) thereafter brought an action against her as representing her father, on the footing that the deed of 1758 put an end to the entail of 1743, and was not itself an effectual entail, in respect—1st, that it was not recorded in the Register of Entails; 2d, that it only referred to, and did not contain the fetters. The following interlocutor (quoted 3 Paton's App. 51) was pronounced:—"Find that, in respect the disposition 1758 differs in several articles from the entail 1743, and, in particular, that certain heirs or substitutes called by the entail 1743 are omitted in the disposition 1758, and that the disposition was followed with charter and infeftment, therefore it is to be held a new infeftment of the estate; and not having contained the clauses prohibitive, irritant, and resolutive, and not having been recorded in the Register of Entails, is not an effectual entail: Find that, in respect the clauses irritant and resolutive in the entail of 1743 are not particularly inserted in the disposition 1758, the same, though held as a conveyance, is not effectual against creditors, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly." This judgment was affirmed on appeal (3 Paton, 50). Passing from 1784 to 1842, we find the case of Lindsay v. the Earl of Aboyne (4 D. 843), where the question of reference was raised in relation to a supplementary deed of entail. The second head of the rubric correctly enough states the result thus:—"Held that an entail, described as supplementary to a previous entail of other lands, was ineffectual against the creditors of the institute of entail, in respect that it did not itself set forth the fetters under which the lands were conveyed, but made reference for them to the previous entail." I may refer to that part of the opinion of Lord Moncreiff (concurred in by a majority of the consulted Judges), which deals with this question, and which contains a careful discussion of the authorities. In this case of Lindsay, as well as in the case of Don (M. 15,591), the question was with creditors, while here it is a question inter hæredes. Assuming for the present that there is now no distinction between these two classes of cases, I take it to be clear that an entail cannot be made by reference, in one dispositive deed, to the fetters contained in another dispositive deed. But although this is so, there is nothing to prevent a nomination of heirs being made in a separate deed which does not contain the fetters, provided the original deed is properly drawn with the view to such power of nomination. It is a fundamental principle of our law of feudal conveyancing that in order to convey an heritable estate there must be a disposition of that estate in favour of the parties who are to take. But the substitutes who are to take do not require to be all named. They may be described as a class, or other distinct manner,—such as the heirs-male of the body of A B. On the same principle they may be described as the heirs to be named in any deed of nomination to be executed by the entailer. This description of them will place them within the dispositive clause of the deed,—will make them disponees under it,—and so satisfy the rule of law I have mentioned, that an heritable estate can only be taken by disposition.

No. 110.

Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

There is nothing anomalous in this,—nothing more so than in holding that the substitutes in a deed of entail do not require to be existing persons at the time the deed comes into operation. They may never come into existence at all; but if they do come into existence, they are just as much disponees under the deed as those who are named in it. I had occasion to explain this fully in my opinion in the late case of Bruce, 6th March 1874 (vide ante, vol. i. p. 757, top). On the same principle the disposition in the original deed of entail is just as good to those nominated in the subsequent deed of nomination as to those nominated in the deed of entail itself.

But, as regards the present case, it is a fatal objection to the pursuer's contention that in the deed of 1816 we have no disposition to him at all. He is within the deed of nomination. But there is no conveyance in the entail to substitutes

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

to be named in the deed of nomination. He is thus neither named nor described in the dispositive clause of the deed of entail. In other words, there is awanting that which is fundamental, namely, a disposition of the estate in his favour. He can consequently get no assistance from the deed of 1816.

When we come to the deed of 1823 we do find a disposition in his favour. We have, first, a revocation out and out of the disposition and deed of entail of 1816, so far as it is in favour of the whole line of disponees and heirs of entail, with the exception of Ernest Gammell, the institute, and the heirs-male and female of his body, and then we have a disposition to a new series of disponees, including Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male and female of his body. This is followed by an obligation to infeft. Whether the means of getting infeftment by assignation of the procuratory and precept in the entail would be good or not does not matter. Although inept for that purpose this would not prevent the disponees from coming in under the deed. The deed is a good disposition, but unfortunately for the pursuer it does not contain the fettering clauses of a strict entail. These clauses are attempted to be introduced by reference to the previous deed of 1816 in a manner quite contrary to the principles of the decisions in the cases of Broomfield and Aboyne. The position in which the pursuer stands is, that he is not a substitute under a valid entail at all. And that leaves Ernest Gammell in the position of holding under a destination, in which, failing heirs of his body, there are no heirs substituted to him.

But, then, a title was made up by Ernest Gammell upon the precept in the deed of 1816, and his sasine and charter of confirmation narrate the deeds both of 1816 and 1823, and engross all the fetters of the entail. The same thing, however, occurred in the case of Gammell v. Cathcart, and did not prevent the heir so infeft from asserting his right as fee-simple proprietor, he being the last person called under the entail. There is this difference undoubtedly between the present case and the case of Gammell v. Cathcart. There was there no tailzied disposition left standing in the original deed of entail at all, whereas here the entailer left standing the disposition, so far as Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male and female of his body were concerned. It was a good entail, so far as regarded Ernest Gammell and the heirs of his body, if he had left any, and it was quite possible that such a destination might have gone on for centuries, whereas in Gammell v. Cathcart there was no tailzied destination whatever left standing. The question is, whether that introduces any substantial difference to affect the result? The argument for the pursuer is, that the entail being a good entail, so far as Ernest Gammell and his heirs went, it could not be known until after his death whether he was to have an heir of his body or not, and that till that was ascertained he had no title to deal with the estate as fee-simple proprietor. But I am of opinion that that argument is not sound. In this case there is no substitution which can come into operation, except that to the heirs whatsoever of the granter. That leaves Ernest Gammell just in the position of a last heir of entail in possession, who is not fettered at all. This places the case on all fours with that of Gammell v. Cathcart, and the opinions and judgment in that case are, therefore, of binding authority in the present.

The only other observation I have to make is, that in several cases, particularly in the case of Don, Feb. 5, 1713 (M. 15,591), and Hope Vere, March 5, 1833 (11 S. and D. 520, affirmed July 14, 1837, 2 M'Lean, 817), it was held that an entail by reference was quite good inter hæredes. The question whether that is still the law depends on the construction of the Rutherfurd Act, and has not, so far as I know, been expressly decided. But although I brought the point under notice, it was not contended at the bar that, after the passing of that Act, the distinction between questions with creditors and questions inter hæredes could any longer be maintained. Waiving that question, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have stated, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

No. 110. Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In considering the somewhat novel and interesting question here raised it is important to bear in mind the position of the pursuer in reference to the two deeds executed by the late James Gammell.

The pursuer is not named, described, or suggested in the first deed executed in 1816, which is a deed of entail. There is in that deed of 1816 no dispositive clause to the benefit of which the pursuer can make any claim. There is a reserved power to revoke or alter the order of succession, or generally to revoke the deed altogether; but there is no disposition to any who are not therein named or described. There is no substitution hæredibus nominandis, and no reserved power to introduce new heirs substitute of entail. Ernest Gammell is the institute under that deed of entail, and the usual fettering clauses of entail are there introduced.

In 1823 the second deed was executed by Mr James Gammell. By that deed he disponed to himself in liferent, and to Ernest Gammell in fee, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs-female of his body; whom failing, to the pursuer, now Colonel Kenny, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to other substitutes therein named. James Gammell, the entailer, died in September 1825, and was succeeded by Ernest Gammell, the institute under both deeds, who made up a title under both deeds, I think, in 1848, and possessed till he died without issue in 1855. In December 1852 Ernest Gammell, in order to defeat the entail, disponed to his wife, now Mrs Taylor. That disposition was recorded in April 1855, after Mrs Gammell's death. Mrs Ernest Gammell, now Mrs Taylor, is the defender in this action, having taken under that deed, and having been served heir of provision to her husband.

The question which the Court have to dispose of is, whether Ernest Gammell held the property under the fetters of the entail, since, if he did, his disposition in favour of the defender is of no force, and must be reduced. On the other hand, if Ernest Gammell held the estate in fee-simple, the pursuer cannot succeed in this action, and the defender, Mrs Taylor, is entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary has repelled the reasons of reduction, and assoilzied the defenders. I am of opinion that he has rightly decided.

I concur generally in the views expressed by Lord Deas, and I have little to add.

It appears to me impossible, on any intelligible principles of legal construction, to read the two deeds, that of 1816 and that of 1823, as forming one deed of entail. I think the later deed superseded the earlier deed. It is well settled that the fettering clauses must be found within the body of a deed of entail. Of this there is no doubt in a question with creditors, and since the Rutherfurd Entail Act the same rule applies, as I think, in a question inter hæredes. In the very able argument for the pursuer this point on construction of the Rutherfurd Act was not disputed. Now, there are no fettering clauses within the deed of 1823; and unless the destination in the deed of 1823 can be brought within the fettering clauses of the deed of 1816 there is no entailed destination in the deed of 1823. But it is attempted to bring the destination within the fettering clauses of the earlier deed, so as to entitle the pursuer, who is not a disponee or a substitute under the earlier deed, to plead as against Ernest Gammell the fetters imposed by that earlier deed. Under the first deed this pursuer has no right whatever. There is no disposition to him. If there had been a clause reserving a right to name heirs of entail, and disponing to the heirs to be so named, and if, in the exercise of that right, a new deed of nomination of heirs had been executed bringing the pursuer within the scope of the previous deed, his position would have been very different. But the pursuer has no other right than what is conferred by the second deed, and the second deed is not an entail. The first disponee under the second deed is Ernest, and if there be no fettering clauses there is no entail, and if there be no entail within the second deed then Ernest held in fee-simple. A reserved power to alter the succession does not imply a power to bring a new substitute heir of entail within the first deed. A power to revoke the first deed may be exercised by direct revocation, or it may be exercised by the execution of a deed inconsistent with the first deed, but revocation is a very different thing from the introduction of new heirs into an entail; and indeed revocation will not answer the pursuer's purpose. If the deed of 1816 is revoked the deed of 1823 stands alone. If the deed of 1816 had permitted the nomination of new heirs, or if, to use an expression appropriately suggested in former cases, the first deed had constructed a niche in the line of succession under the entail into which a new heir could be planted in the exercise of that reserved power to nominate, then the new heir might have been brought within the first deed and within the fetters. But plainly there is nothing of the kind here. The deed of 1823, with its new structure and its new dispositive clause, and the introduction of new heirs, has been executed under a reserved power to revoke, and not under a reserved power to nominate. As a separate and independent deed it is a disposition to Ernest and the heirs-male or female of his body, whom failing, to the pursuer. But that disposition is not qualified by any fettering clauses. You cannot find the fettering clauses outside of the later deed; and you have no disposition to the pursuer in the earlier deed, so that, where the fetters are, there is no disposition, and where the disposition is, there are no fetters. The pursuer can only claim under a deed which gives a prior right in fee-simple to Ernest. The result is, in my opinion, that the pursuer has no right whatever except under the second deed, and under that deed he is postponed to Ernest, to whom the disposition, on which alone the pursuer founds, is made without any fettering clauses.

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

It was natural and proper for the pursuer to establish, if possible, a distinction between the present case and the case of Countesswells, and we have had ingenious argument in support of that distinction, an argument deserving careful consideration.

I do not say that the decision in the case of Countesswells is in all respects exactly in point, or is altogether conclusive of the present case (Gammell v. Cathcart, 12 D. p. 19, 13th Nov. 1849); but without holding it conclusive as a decision, I think that the judicial opinions in the case of Countesswells are extremely important, and that the leading points maintained by the pursuer in this action were then under consideration of the Court. In the note of Lord Wood, who was Lord Ordinary, and in the opinion of all the Judges, particularly of Lord Mackenzie, there is an exposition of law very valuable, and strikingly appropriate to the deeds now before us. Without dwelling on the opinions which were pronounced in the Countesswells case,—a case raised in regard to deeds made by the same granter as the present, and about the same time, though in reference to a different estate,—without quoting at length, I may mention that Lord Mackenzie says in the Countesswells case,—"The deed of 1823 is not a mere revocation of part of the prior deed. It contains a grant to new parties, not a grant hæredibus nominandis of the old deed. There was no such clause in the first deed. A power to alter does not imply a power to insert new grantees as named in the deed having the power." Lord Fullerton, concurring in the opinion, held the later deed alone to be effectual, and as entirely superseding the earlier deed. It is true that in the later deed in this case Ernest, who was the institute in the first deed, is again institute. But he is so under a new disposition, with new substitution of heirs, and without any fettering clauses. Now, I entertain no doubt that Ernest, taking under the later deed, as he was entitled to do, was free from the fetters of the entail, and consequently that his disposition in favour of the defender is not liable to reduction at the instance of the pursuer, whose only right is under the same later deed. In the deed which contains the fetters the pursuer has no right whatever.

No. 110.

Mar. 19, 1875. Kenny v. Taylor.

Another view has been presented to us by the defender, proceeding on the assumption, for the sake of argument, that even if Ernest held under the entail still he held with no substitutes to follow, as he had no heirs of his body, and was the last heir previous to a destination to heirs whatsoever, and was therefore free. I do not think it necessary to deal with this plea, though there is some force in the argument from analogy by which it has been supported. My opinion rests on the broader view which has been already explained by Lord Deas, and in which I concur.

Lord Mure.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that this case is ruled by the decision in the case of Gammell v. Cathcart, referred to in his note, and I have little to add to what your Lordships have stated as the grounds of your opinions. I was at first disposed to think that a distinction might be drawn between the cases, founded upon the circumstance that Ernest Gammell, whose deed is here under challenge, was the institute in the destination of the original entail, as well as in that of the deed of 1823, so that it was competent for him, by taking infeftment upon the precept in the entail, to place himself under fetters, without seeking to avail himself of the assignation in the deed of 1823 of the precept contained in the entail; whereas in the case of Cathcart, Andrew Gammell, the institute in the second deed, was a substitute in the original entail, and was only brought up to the position of institute by the operation of the deed of 1823. On farther consideration, however, I am satisfied that this is not such a substantial distinction as can be held to take this case out of the rules applied in the case of Cathcart; because, having regard to the decision in the case of Fogo, March 11, 1842, 4 D. p. 1063, and to the opinion of Lord Mackenzie in particular, which appears to have been concurred in by the majority of the Court, as to the meaning to be put upon the words "whom failing" in a destination, the effect of the second deed in the case of Cathcart, by which the nomination of the institute and the substitutes in the original entail prior in order to Andrew Gammell was recalled, was to make Andrew Gammell the institute in the entail; and there was not, I think, any objection, on feudal grounds, to his taking infeftment, which he did upon the precept in the entail, as institute, at the death of the maker of the deed. But the Court nevertheless held that Andrew Gammell, in respect of the operation of the deed of 1823, was precluded from making up a tailzied title under the deed of 1815, inasmuch as the second deed was held to operate as a new and substantive disposition of the estate, and was so worded as not to place the heirs under the fetters of an entail. Now, apart from this distinction as to the terms of the destination, the deeds here in question are almost verbatim the same as those in the case of Cathcart; and upon examining the session papers in that case I find that there was the same anxious argument there maintained upon the clauses declaring that the two deeds were to be read together, and that it should only be competent to possess the estates under the fetters of the original entail, as was addressed to us on the part of the pursuer in the present case. That argument was, however, rejected by the Court in disposing of the case of Cathcart, in which it was held that the deed of 1823 must be dealt with as a new deed, superseding the entail of 1815; and I have not been able to find any sufficient reasons for holding that the propositions stated by Lord Mackenzie in his opinion in that case as the grounds of his judgment do not here apply.

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in affirming the Lord Ordinary's judgment. I am unable to distinguish in principle between this case and that of Countesswells. There are some differences, indeed, in point of fact, but they do not interfere with the application of the principle of that judgment.

It is a circumstance to be remarked that, with the exception of the description of the lands and the names of the heirs called to the succession, the two deeds of entail are word for word the same, prepared by the same conveyancer, and executed at the same time. In the present case the deed of entail contains a conveyance of the estate of Portlethen to Ernest Gammell, the institute, and the heirs-male of his body, and to a series of substitutes. It contains no conveyance hæredibus nominandis, but it contains a very full and ample power of revocation in these words—(reads clause commencing, "But saving and reserving nevertheless," quoted supra, p. 637). Now, it appears to me that the entailer could not under this reserved power, by a mere deed of revocation and nomination, introduce new heirs into the destination contained in the original deed. But I have no doubt that by a deed of revocation he had power to strike out any heir or number of heirs from that destination. By the second deed, executed in 1823, he accordingly proceeds to exercise that power of revocation, and that he does in these words—(reads clause commencing "Whereas I have now resolved," quoted supra, p. 637-8). Now, the effect of that revocation, which I apprehend, was within his power, was to strike out all the substitutes except the heirs-male and female of the body of the institute, but to leave the institute and the heirs-male and female of his body standing. The nomination of a series of heirs in place of the substitutes so struck out is, I apprehend, utterly unmaintainable as a nomination of heirs-substitute of entail, for the simple reason that there is not in the original deed of entail any conveyance hæredibus nominandis. Therefore, if the revocation had stood alone, the effect would have been to leave Ernest Gammell as institute, with remainder over to the heirs-male and female of his body, as the sole subsisting destination under the entail. But the entailer does not stop here; he proceeds to convey of new, and he does not confine himself to doing so in favour of the new heirs attempted to be brought in only.

No. 110.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Kenny v. Taylor.

Now, the question is, looking to the terms of both deeds, whether this was or was not a valid and effectual method of altering the destination in the deed of entail. On this question I should not hesitate to pronounce in this case just the judgment that was given in the Countesswells case, and having that authority before me I do not think it necessary to argue the matter further in point of principle.

Doubtless there are distinctions in point of fact between this case and that of Countesswells, but they are not material to the judgment. In the Countesswells case the deed of nomination and revocation proceeded to revoke the nomination of all the heirs originally nominated, with the exception of Andrew Gammell and the heirs-male of his body. Now, as Lord Mure has stated, Andrew Gammell stood in the Countesswells deed of entail in a different position from that occupied by Ernest Gammell in the present one. For Andrew Gammell was not the institute, but only the third nominatim substitute. But the deed of revocation swept away all the heirs that came before him, and if that deed of revocation had contained no new conveyance Andrew Gammell would then have stood as institute heir of entail just with the same legal effect as Ernest Gammell would have done in this case, and the entail would have been to him and the heirs-male of his body. But, then, the entailer proceeded just as here to convey the estate of new to the new series of heirs, including Andrew Gammell. Now, if the entail in that case would have stood good to Andrew Gammell and the heirs-male of his body had it not been for the new conveyance, it seems to me to be plain that the deed in the present case would have stood in the same position in point of law. The effect of the revocation was not entirely to destroy the destination, but to leave part of it standing and effectual.

Now, so in the present case, though the destination would have stood as a good destination in favour of Ernest Gammell and the heirs-male and female of his body, yet that comes to be over-ridden by the new conveyance. In short, according to the principle of the Countesswells case, the new conveyance superseded entirely the conveyance in the original deed of entail, and that, in my opinion, is the principle on which our judgment should proceed.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the pursuer liable in additional expenses."

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—JOHN AULD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 111.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Galloway v. Nicolson.

JAMES GALLOWAY (Collector of Poor-Rates in the Parish of South Leith), Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.
DAVID NICOLSON, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—J. G. Smith.

Poor—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 34—Poor Assessments Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 37)—Assessment.—In prescribing the manner in which the assessment for relief of the poor is to be imposed, the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sec. 34, as amended by the Poor Assessments Act, 1861, requires that "one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages." Held that one-half of the sum to be raised by assessment falls to be laid upon owners as a class, and the other half upon occupants as a class.

No. 111.

Mar. 19, 1875.

Galloway v. Nicolson.

1ST DIVISION.

Ld. Curriehill.

M.

JAMES GALLOWAY, collector of poor-rates in the parish of South Leith, raised this action for recovery of poor-rates against David Nicolson, the owner of certain lands and heritages in the parish.

The real object, however, of the action was to have judicially determined the meaning of the clause of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, regulating the imposition of assessments for the poor.[1]

The 34th section of that Act provided three alternative methods according to which the assessment might be imposed. The first of these methods was adopted by the parish of South Leith, and was subsequently, by the Poor Assessments (Scotland) Act, 1861,[2] made the only legal method of imposing the assessment for the poor.

---

[1] The clauses of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, bearing upon the subject are as follows:—Section 33 enacts that it shall be lawful for the parochial board of any parish or combination to "resolve that the funds requisite for relief of the poor persons entitled to relief from the parish or combination, including the expenses connected with the management and administration thereof, shall be raised by assessments."

Section 34 enacts that "when the parochial board of any parish or combination shall have resolved to raise by assessment the funds requisite, such board shall . . . . . resolve as to the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed; and it shall be lawful for any such board to resolve that one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, or to resolve that one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, and the other half upon the whole inhabitants, according to their means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland, or to resolve that such assessment shall be imposed as an equal percentage upon the annual value of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland; and when the parochial board shall have resolved on the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed, such resolution shall be forthwith reported to the Board of Supervision for approval; and if the manner of assessment so resolved upon shall be approved by the Board of Supervision the same shall be adopted and acted upon in such parish or combination, and shall not be altered or departed from without the sanction of the Board of Supervision."

Section 36 enacts that "where the one-half of any assessment is imposed on the owners and the other half on the tenants or occupants of lands and heritages it shall be lawful for the parochial board, with the concurrence of the Board of Supervision, to determine and direct that the lands and heritages may be distinguished into two or more separate classes, according to the purpose for which such lands are used and occupied, and to fix such rate of assessment upon the tenants or occupants of each class respectively as to such board may seem just and equitable."

Section 42 enacts "that it shall be lawful for the parochial board of any parish or combination to exempt from payment of the assessment, or any part thereof, to such an extent as may seem proper and reasonable, any persons or class of persons on the ground of inability to pay."

Section 43 enacts that "where the one-half of any assessment is imposed on the owners and the other half on the tenants or occupants of lands and heritages, it shall be competent for the collector of such assessments to levy the whole thereof from the tenants or occupants, who shall be entitled to recover one-half thereof from the owner, or to retain the same out of their rents on production of a receipt granted by the collector of such assessment."

[2] 24 and 25 Vict. c. 37.

No. 111.

Mar. 19, 1875. Galloway v. Nicolson.

This method was thus described,—"One-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages."

The parochial board, as represented by the pursuer, contended that the meaning of this clause was that the rate per pound on the annual value of lands and heritages within the parish necessary to be imposed in order to produce the gross funds requisite for relief of the poor having been fixed, individual owners and occupiers alike were to be assessed at half the rate.

The defender, on the other hand, contended that the gross amount of funds required was to be divided equally, and one-half raised from the owners, as a class (rateably according to the value of the lands and heritages owned by them), and the other half from the occupiers, as a class (rateably according to the value of the lands and heritages occupied by them). In many parishes there are always a considerable number of subjects unlet and unoccupied during the year, on which no assessment can be imposed in respect of occupancy; and also a considerable number occupied by persons who are exempted from payment of the assessment on the ground of inability to pay, whereas in both cases the ownership rate can always be levied from the owners. The practical result therefore of imposing the assessment, according to the pursuer's interpretation of the statute, was that a considerably larger portion of the gross assessment was levied from the owners as a class than from the occupants as a class.[1]

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by resolution of the parochial board of the parish of South Leith, sanctioned by the Board of Supervision, the funds requisite for the relief of the poor in that parish are to be raised by assessment, one-half of which is to be imposed upon the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages: Finds that according to the sound construction of the Act 8 and 9 Vict., cap. 83, entituled 'An Act for the Amendment and better Administration of the Laws relating to the Relief of the Poor in Scotland,' such assessment must be imposed so that one-half of the whole assessment for each year shall be imposed upon the owners of the said lands and heritages as a class, and the other half upon the tenants or occupiers thereof as a class," &c.*

---

[1] The total assessment required for the relief of the poor in South Leith for the year 1872-73 was £9110, 11s. 4d., of which, in consequence of the parochial board having imposed a uniform rate of 1s. 4d. per pound upon all the ratepayers indiscriminately, the sum of £4654, 0s. 8d., or more than one-half, was collected from the owners, and only £4456, 10s. 8d., or less than one-half, from tenants and occupants.

* "NOTE.— . . . I have felt the present question to be one of great importance, and to be not unattended with difficulty; but after the best consideration which I have been able to give to the case I have come to be of opinion that the mode of distributing the assessment adopted by the parochial board is not in conformity with the statute, and that the rule indicated by the Board of Supervision is that which ought to be adopted. It appears to me that throughout the whole of the sections of the Poor-Law Act which deal with the subject of assessment there is a marked distinction maintained between the class of ratepayers who are owners and the class of ratepayers who are tenants and occu-

No. 111.

Mar. 19, 1875. Galloway v. Nicolson.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—The Lord Ordinary had gone wrong in interpreting the word "assessment" in the 34th section of the Act of 1845 as meaning the whole sum to be levied, and not the rate. The Act in this section carefully distinguished between these two things, "the funds requisite" to be raised, and the "assessment" or rate. It bore "that when the parochial board of any parish or combination shall have resolved to raise by assessment the funds requisite," &c. Now, the word "assessment," evidently meaning "rate" at the beginning of the clause, "such assessment" occurring a few lines further down must mean "such rate," and could not be interpreted to mean "such gross amount of funds requisite." Further, the 43d section, which entitled occupants, on paying the total assessment or rate, to recover one-half thereof from the owners, shewed that it was the rate which was to be pants, and that parochial boards must so adjust the imposition of the assessment that one-half of the whole amount shall fall upon the one class and the other half upon the other class. This is, I think, the natural necessary meaning of the word 'rateably' which occurs in section 34 already quoted. The assessment is to be imposed, one-half 'upon the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages.' I read these words as meaning that one-half of the amount is to be imposed upon the owners of lands and heritages rateably, i.e., upon each in proportion to annual value of the lands, &c., belonging to him, and the other half upon the tenants and occupants of lands and heritages rateably, i.e., upon each in proportion to the annual value of the lands, &c. of which he is tenant or occupant.

---

"It further appears to me that if it had been intended that a uniform rate should be imposed upon all the ratepayers alike, i.e., upon owners, tenants, and occupants indiscriminately, the Legislature would have said so. And not only is such intention not expressed, but it would have been inconsistent with the provision of section 36, by which parochial boards may in certain cases fix different rates to be paid by different classes of tenants. That section assumes that, while one-half of the whole assessment is to be paid by a uniform rate imposed upon all owners irrespective of the purposes for which their lands and heritages are used or occupied, the other half of the assessment (i.e., the tenants' or occupants' half) may be imposed upon the members of that class in such a way as to make the rate paid by each vary according to the purpose for which the subjects are used or occupied by him, and to that end the parochial board may subdivide the class of tenants and occupants into two or more classes.

"A little difficulty in the way of the construction of the Act which I am inclined to adopt may, at first sight, appear to be created by the language of section 43, which authorises the collector to levy the whole assessment made upon owners and tenants or occupants from the tenants or occupants alone, but entitles the latter to recover one-half thereof from the owners, or to retain the same out of their rents. And it may be argued that this section implies that the assessment upon each owner and each occupant is to be at one uniform rate. I think, however, that this is not the sound construction of the section. It appears to me that in this, as in the other sections referred to, the distinction already noticed between the owners as a class, and the tenants or occupants as a class, is kept up; and that, while the whole assessment may be levied, in the first instance, from the latter class, they, as a class, are to have right to recover from the owners, as a class, one-half of the whole assessment; but each tenant or occupant will have right to recover only that portion of the owner's half of the whole assessment which has been imposed upon and paid by him for his own landlord."

No. 111.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Galloway v. Nicolson.

divided, and not the gross amount imposed. This clause would be inapplicable and unworkable if the defender's contention was sustained, and a different rate imposed on the owner from that imposed on the occupant. Lastly, the mode of imposition contended for by the pursuer was the only practicable one. If that suggested by the defender were adopted it would require the board in fixing the rate to be imposed to forecast what tenements would be unoccupied, and what tenants would have to be exempted on the ground of poverty, a thing which they could not possibly do.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case is whether, in directing one-half of the assessment for relief of the poor to be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants and occupants of all lands and heritages within a parish, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages, the Legislature meant that one-half of the funds required should be laid on the owners as a class, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants as a class, or whether the intention was that the amount of the percentage or rate per pound necessary to produce the required sum should be divided, and one-half of the rate be laid on each owner, and the other half on each tenant or occupant in the parish.

It is rather surprising that, although the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, has been in operation for nearly thirty years, this question should never yet have been settled, but that the practice in different parishes should be, as I understand it is, various and inconsistent. The question itself, however, does not appear to be attended with much difficulty. On a consideration of the statute, I have arrived at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, viz., that one-half of the whole assessment for the year is to be laid on the owners as a class, and the other half on the tenants or occupants as a class.

In considering the question, it is to be kept in view that the mode of assessment whereby one-half is imposed on owners, and the other half upon tenants or occupants of lands and heritages, is now, since the passing of 24 and 25 Vict., c. 37, the only legal mode of assessment. But in the 34th clause of the Act of 1845 two other alternative methods were given besides that now authorised, and it is necessary to consider the whole of these in dealing with the construction of that part of the clause more immediately in question.

An argument, which appeared at first sight very plausible, was stated for the pursuer to this effect, that it was impossible to read the word "assessment" when used in relation to the mode of imposition in question as equivalent to the aggregate amount of funds required, for the result would be to give two different meanings to the word "assessment" in the same clause. Now, in the first of the places where the word "assessment" is used in the 34th clause it means the act of imposing the tax. In the other places where it occurs, namely, in connection with the different modes of imposing the tax, it means the produce or expected produce of the tax, i.e., the fund requisite to be raised. Thus, then, the word has at least two perfectly different meanings in the same section, and so, unfortunately for the pursuer, his argument may be used as well against him as for him. For assuming, as he contends, that the word "assessment," where used in relation to the modes of imposition, is equivalent to rate or percentage per pound, you have still a different meaning given to it in the body of the section from that which you have at the beginning. The one argument may, therefore, be very well set off against the other.

No. 111.

Mar. 19, 1875. Galloway v. Nicolson.

But, in considering the three modes of imposition given by the 34th section, it is important to notice that one mode is distinguished from the other two in an especial manner,—I mean the third. By it the assessment may "be imposed as an equal percentage upon the annual value of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, and upon the estimated annual income of the whole inhabitants from means and substance other than lands and heritages situated in Great Britain or Ireland." Now, if in the first and second modes of imposition an equal rate or percentage had been intended, it is to be presumed that the same language would have been used. And finding a different language used, we may conclude that something different was meant than an equal percentage. By the first mode of imposition "one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages," &c. According to the pursuer's argument, that means that if a shilling rate is necessary to raise the required sum you are to divide it into two halves, and lay 6d. on the owner and 6d. on the tenant or occupant. What is this in practical effect? Just that you lay a uniform rate of 6d. on every person interested in land whether as owner or occupant. That is simply laying an equal percentage upon these persons, and nothing else. But when you come to the second mode of imposition you find that the application of this construction produces a grave anomaly. The same language is used as in reference to the first mode,—"one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners of all lands and heritages," &c., "and the other half upon the whole inhabitants, according to their means and substance other than lands and heritages," &c. Now, if one-half of the assessment—that is 6d. out of the 1s.—is to be imposed on land, and the other 6d. on income from all other means and substance, the consequence would probably be that in one parish of large area and scattered population you would have a large produce from land, and next to nothing from means and substance; and in another parish of small area and large population you might have a comparatively small return from land, and a very large one from means and substance. That does not look a very likely result for the Legislature to have intended; still it is the result of so construing the words of the statute. But farther, it will be found that this interpretation reduces the second mode of imposition to the very same thing as the third, viz., an equal percentage on land, and on other means and substance. This anomaly is quite sufficient to lead to the conclusion that the statute did not mean by the term "assessment," as used in relation to the mode of imposition, a rate or percentage, but an aggregate sum required to be raised, and intended under the first mode of imposition that that aggregate sum should be divided, and one-half laid upon owners as a class, and the other upon tenants or occupants as a class. That is the only construction of the section which makes it consistent with itself, and distinguishes the second mode of imposition from the third. Therefore, upon a consideration of this 34th section alone, I think the argument of the defender is irresistible.

But there is obviously a very good reason why this should be the construction intended by the Legislature. For, consider how the assessment will fall on the owners and on the occupants. If owners and occupants necessarily represented the same value, and paid the same amount of tax, the result of the pursuer's

No. 111.
Mar. 19, 1875.
Galloway v. Nicolson.

and the defender's contention would be the same. But it is hardly possible that that should be the state of the facts. Occupancy is liable to many vicissitudes. Houses may be unlet and unoccupied. Tenants and occupants may be so poor that their taxes are irrecoverable. In the case of owners the assessment must always be paid in full, for the collector has always the value of the tenement to fall back upon. But in the case of occupants, the assessment may be much diminished by unoccupied houses and irrecoverable arrears.

The case of poverty amongst a large class of occupants is particularly provided for. By section 36 parochial boards are allowed to classify the tenements within the parish in two or more separate classes for the purpose of laying the tax unequally upon the tenants or occupants according to the classes to which they belong, so that the result would be that instead of the 6d. in the 1s. being laid on all occupants, 6d. would be laid on some, and perhaps 4d. or 3d. on others, and the produce of the assessment so laid upon occupants would be much less than that of the assessment laid upon owners. That would be an odd way of dividing a tax to be laid upon two different classes of persons in the way contemplated by the statute.

The only proper way of providing against the produce of the tax being less than is contemplated is to divide the total amount required, and lay one half on the owners, and the other half upon the tenants or occupants.

It only now remains to notice the 43d section, which gives power to "the collector of such assessment to levy the whole thereof from the tenants or occupants, who shall be entitled to recover one-half thereof from the owner." Now, the pursuer maintains that this clause supports his view, that by assessment is meant equal rate or percentage. That it should do so it is necessary that it should apply to every case and every property in the parish, and not only to those cases where the amount to be levied on owners and occupants happens to be the same, otherwise it will not avail him. But how is it possible to make it universally applicable? In one case the collector comes to an occupant, and finds him exempted from poverty. He cannot levy the whole tax on him. In another case he comes to a tenement, and finds it unoccupied; there is there no person to levy the whole tax on. In a third case he comes to an occupant who, by reason of the classification provided for by section 36, pays a threepenny or fourpenny rate, say, instead of a sixpenny. How can the 43d clause be made to apply to his case. The conclusion, therefore, is that the 43d section is not intended to be of universal application, but is meant only for those cases in which the assessment on owners and occupants is an equal rate. I am informed that, in point of fact, in parishes where a classification has been made under the 36th section, no attempt has been made to act upon the 43d section.

On the whole matter, I have little difficulty in concurring with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. C. IRONS, S.S.C.—D. CRAWFORD & J. Y. GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 112.

BARROW MOSS, Pursuer.—Asher—R. V. Campbell.
CUNLIFFE AND DUNLOP, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour—Readman.

Mar. 20, 1875.
Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

Agent and Principal—Ship—Shipbroker—Commission.—A broker sued a shipbuilder for 2½ per cent commission on the price of a ship built by the defender, on the ground that the order had been obtained through the pursuer's introduction and recommendation. Held upon a proof (diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk upon the facts, and rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill) that the pursuer had failed to prove any contract between him and the defender for payment of the commission sued for, or to shew that the order was the direct result of his intervention, and consequently that he was not entitled to commission.

THIS was an action at the instance of Barrow Moss, a commission merchant in Liverpool, in which he sought to recover from the defenders, Cunliffe and Dunlop, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, the sum of £782, 10s., being, as he alleged, commission at the rate of 2½ per cent upon the price (£31,300) of a steamer sold by the defenders to the Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company, in consequence of the pursuer's having introduced the defenders to the purchaser.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

The defence was that the pursuer was not instrumental in any way in procuring the order for the steamer in question, and that he was therefore not entitled to any commission. The defenders, however, stated that the pursuer did introduce them to a Captain Le Couteur, in the employment of Louis Karl Beckmann, who, it was said, was then contemplating the purchase of a small steamer, of which the price was to be £13,850, that the negotiations for the purchase of that steamer were still in dependence, and that if the said small steamer should be ordered they were ready to pay to the pursuer commission on the price thereof at £2, 10s. per cent.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having performed services for the defenders, on a contract for a commission upon the order obtained by the defenders through the pursuer's introduction, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the summons. (2) The order for the large steamship having followed on and been obtained through the pursuer's introduction, the pursuer is entitled to the sum sued for as a reasonable commission for his services; and the defences being unfounded in fact and in law, the same should be repelled, and decree granted in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The order for the large steamship at the price of £31,300 not having been obtained through the instrumentality of the pursuer, the defenders are not liable for the sum sued for. (4) The negotiations for the vessel, in regard to which the defenders agreed to pay the pursuer commission, being still pending, and the commission sued for not being the commission agreed to be paid upon the order of said vessel, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The defenders being ready to pay to the pursuer the commission agreed on with him as soon as it is earned, the present action is groundless and untenable, and the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The material facts admitted or proved were shortly as follows:—

About the end of the year 1873 certain persons connected with the Brazil trade began to promote the formation of a company for the establishment and maintenance of a line of large ocean steamers between London and other European ports, on the one hand, and the port of Rio Grande do Sul and other Brazilian ports, on the other hand. The person most actively concerned in the promotion of the company, and in developing the expected business, was Louis Karl Beckmann, sole active partner of Julius Beckmann and Company, who were to be the general agents of the company in London.

No. 112. Mar. 20, 1875. Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

Although the company was not incorporated until the 19th February 1874, the arrangements for its formation had been in progress for some months previously, and in January, or early in February, Beckmann, on behalf of the promoters, had entered into a provisional contract with Messrs William Hamilton and Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, for the construction of four ocean steamers for the embryo company, but with power to cancel the order for one of the steamers.

About the same time some of the promoters of the company started the project of establishing a smaller steamer of light draught and capable of burning Brazilian coal, for the purpose of river traffic on the Rio Grande. This smaller steamer was intended as a private speculation and not as part of the proper business of the Rio Grande Company, although the two schemes were calculated mutually to aid and develope one another.

Beckmann, having undertaken to procure estimates for the smaller steamer, applied to John Bennett junior, shipbroker in London, who was afterwards appointed broker to the company, to see if he could furnish a small steamer of the kind required. Bennett at the time did not himself know where such a steamer could be got, but mentioned the pursuer's name to Beckmann as a person who, from his large connection with shipbuilders, was likely to be able to furnish the required information; and after repeated communings with Beckmann he wrote to the pursuer on 16th February 1874 sending him a specification for a twin screw steamer of light draught, with furnaces adapted for burning Brazil coal, and other particulars as supplied by Beckmann, and asking him to quote a price therefor.

The pursuer, on receipt of that letter on 17th February, at once wrote to the defenders, who had about two years before introduced themselves to him as shipbuilders, the following letter:—"I have principals open to build an iron twin screw steamer, dimensions and particulars as per enclosed, and shall be glad to receive your lowest price per return, subject to 2½%." He enclosed a copy of Bennett's letter of 16th February, omitting Bennett's name.

The defenders on 18th February answered the letter, informing the pursuer that they had just completed a steamer for an African company, which was to go on a trial trip on 21st February, and a duplicate of which would probably suit, and suggested that if the pursuer's principals were in earnest they should go down to Port-Glasgow and see the trial.

The pursuer upon receipt of the defenders' letter went to London and saw Bennett, and handed him the letter, which Bennett took to Beckmann, who was at the time in the office of the Rio Grande Company. After consultation on the subject between Bennett and Beckmann, the latter sent Captain Le Couteur (who was then desirous of being appointed, and was ultimately appointed, marine superintendent of the Rio Grande Company) to Port-Glasgow, with instructions to inspect the vessel, and if possible to be present at the trial trip. Le Couteur accordingly left London by the night mail on 20th February, and the pursuer on the same evening telegraphed to the defenders,—"Captain John Le Couteur comes down by to-night's mail train to go trip in boat you wrote about. Please wait arrival of train."

Le Couteur arrived too late for the trial trip, but he inspected the vessel at Glasgow, where it had gone. At a meeting with Mr Cunliffe, one of the defenders, he presented Bennett's card, and said that he had come from Beckmann. He stated to Cunliffe that the steamer was not exactly what was wanted. He and Cunliffe then went to the defenders' building yard in Port-Glasgow, where Cunliffe prepared a sketch shewing the lines and dimensions of such a steamer as he thought would suit the requirements of Le Couteur's principals. The price was £13,850, including 2½ per cent commission to be paid to the pursuer. Le Couteur formed a favourable opinion of the defenders as shipbuilders, and in the course of conversation mentioned to Cunliffe that the Rio Grande Company had been negotiating with Hamilton and Company for the building of ships, and asked Cunliffe to call upon Beckmann in London, whom he mentioned as connected with the Rio Grande Company.

Upon the 24th February the defenders wrote to the pursuer:—"Captain Le Couteur arrived at mid-day on Saturday, too late for trial, but we saw him on Monday, and he went all over the vessel. He, however, wants something rather different, for which we quoted him a price, and we gave him a rough sketch of it with him. He left for London by the limited mail on Monday night, and before leaving said he would do what he could to give us the order. We may have to go south end of this week, when we will do what we can to bring about business. The commission we added was 2½% as requested by your good selves. Captain Le Couteur gave us the card of a Mr John Bennett junior, who, he informed us, was working with you in the matter and sharing commission. In case we go to London on Thursday night it would be well if you would post us up in these matters by return of post.—Yours truly, CUNLIFFE & DUNLOP."

Upon the 25th February the pursuer wrote to the defenders:—"I am in receipt of your favour of yesterday, and contents noted. I should advise you to call on Mr Bennett when in London to try and secure an order for one or more. The boats are required for the Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company, and they are about giving orders out for the building of four larger ones. With respect to the commission it must be 3% on all orders, as I have to give two-thirds of same to Mr Bennett and friends in London. I remain, &c., BARROW MOSS.

"Mr Bennett's address is 43 Fish Street Hill, London, and wish you to call upon him, and I have advised him I have requested you to alter the commission to 3%; please advise us you agree to same."

Upon the 26th February the defenders wrote to the pursuer,—"Your favour of 25th inst. to hand. We expect to be in London on Monday first, and will call upon Captain Le Couteur and his principals, and also on Mr Bennett with reference to the small steamer, particulars and price of which we have already given them—and we will do our best to carry through the business, and in the event of succeeding will have pleasure in including 2½ commission for Mr Bennett and your good selves as you may arrange. We only included 2½% on the price we gave Captain Le Couteur, that being the percentage which you named to us, and unless the price be correspondingly increased we cannot afford 3%.

"The four larger steamers we have known of sometime since, and we understand that they have been fixed recently with one of our neighbours here.—Yours, &c."*

---

* Mr Cunliffe stated in evidence,—"My object in saying (in my letter of 26th February to pursuer) that we had known about the four large steamers, was to keep myself clear should any business result at any time between us and the Rio Grande Company; I thought it possible that pursuer might at some future time make a claim upon us for commission—a claim which I felt he had no right to make, and I wrote that intimating previous knowledge of the Rio Grande Company, intending it to be a declinature of his claim. The letter was written purposely and carefully."

No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1875. Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

Cunliffe went to London on 2d March. He did not, however, call upon Bennett, as he had promised to do in his last letter to the pursuer, but went at once to Beckmann. He sent in his card, and explained that he had called to see if there was anything doing about the small steamer, the sketch of which had been given to Le Couteur. Beckmann said that nothing could be done without communicating with his friends. He did not mention who his friends were, but he said the steamer was intended to be used at Rio Grande for inland navigation. The subject of the large ocean steamer was then introduced by Beckmann, who mentioned his connection with the Rio Grande Company, and asked Cunliffe if he could quote a price for a sister ship to those being built by Hamilton and Company. Cunliffe undertook to do so, and after some further negotiation the price was fixed at £31,300, including a commission of £800, which Beckmann stipulated should be paid to his firm of Julius Beckmann and Company. Beckmann, who acted as the adviser of the Rio Grande Company in the purchase of ships, laid Cunliffe's offer before the board of directors, and through his influence the offer was accepted, and the order for the fourth steamer to Hamilton and Company was cancelled.

Proof was led in regard to the custom of trade regulating the broker's right to commission, the result of which is sufficiently stated by the Lord Ordinary and the Judges of the Second Division.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th December 1874, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that in February 1874 the pursuer introduced the defenders to Louis Karl Beckmann, who then represented the Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company (Limited), and that in consequence of such introduction the defenders sold to the said company a steamship at the price of £31,300: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to commission on said price at the rate of £2, 10s. per centum, and that the same amounts to £782, 10s.: Ordains the defenders to pay the said sum of £782, 10s. sterling to the pursuer, with interest at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the 16th day of June 1874 till payment, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts)—The opinion which I have formed, as the result of a careful study of the evidence, oral and documentary, is, that whether commission be due or not upon the price of the large steamer which was ultimately ordered from the defenders, they never would have received the order, or even heard of the steamer, had it not been for the introduction to them, through the instrumentality of the pursuer, of Le Couteur as Beckmann's representative, sent down for the express purpose of opening negotiations with them for the purchase of a steamer in connection with the Brazilian trade. A small steamer and a large steamer were both wanted by Beckmann at the time,—it may be for owners wholly or in part different,—but still Beckmann was the person treating on behalf of both sets of owners; and it appears to me that when a person having such requirements, and being himself unacquainted with shipbuilders, asks an introduction to a builder from a person whose business it is to introduce sellers and purchasers of ships to each other, and is by that person introduced to a shipbuilder, it would be inequitable to allow him to deal with the introduction as having reference to only one of his requirements. If so, it follows that if Beckmann, on being introduced to the defenders, has, without expressing any dissatisfaction of the plan for the small steamer, suspended consideration of it for a time,—and has made a contract with them,—whether for himself or for a constituent,—for a much larger vessel, neither he nor the defenders can be allowed to maintain that the introduction by the broker was not the causa causans of that order being given. . . . .

(After examining Beckmann's evidence, his Lordship proceeded)—"All this very clearly shews (1) that Beckmann held himself out to the defenders as the person on whom the purchase of the steamer really depended; and (2) that

The defenders reclaimed.[1] At advising,— No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1875. Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

LORD NEAVES.—This case is of a peculiar kind, and attended with nicety, but on the whole I have come to be of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not well founded.

The custom at the foundation of the pursuer's case is not unknown to the law. Any custom which is reasonable ought to be enforced, provided it is clearly proved, and provided the facts of the case support the application of the custom.

The custom is stated in very general terms, viz., that a broker who introduces a shipbuilder to a purchaser is entitled to commission on the first business done. This mode of stating the custom does not point to any distinction between a general and a special introduction.

The case is somewhat strangely libelled. Mr Moss sets forth on record,—"In or about February 1874 the Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company were requiring at least one steam vessel of a light draught, and one or more larger steam vessels to be built." This is not a very accurate statement. Then he continues,—"The pursuer in the ordinary course of his business was duly made aware of the wants of this company, and from his own position and credit, and through his friends, correspondents, and connections, he had influence to give any shipbuilder an introduction, and a very probable prospect of getting an order for one or more of the vessels. The pursuer communicated with the defenders as to the said company's wants in February 1874, stipulating in the outset for 2½ per cent commission, which was agreed to by the defenders. They sent to the pursuer certain estimates, and explained that they had a steamer nearly completed, which they had built for an African company, and they requested the but for the pursuer's having introduced the defenders to Beckmann as being good shipbuilders they never would have heard of the order.

---

"This being so, the only remaining question is, Whether the pursuer is entitled to commission on the order? and if so, to how much? The law on this point is clearly stated by Erle, C. J. in the case of Green v. Bartlett, 30th May 1863, 32 L. J. C. P., 261—'The question whether the agent is entitled to be paid commission on the sale is one which has been often litigated, and the rule has been to hold that there has been a sale by the agent which would entitle him to commission if the relation of buyer and seller has been really brought about by what he has done; if, in other words, he was the causa causans by which the property was sold.' It appears to me that the pursuer was in the present case truly the causa causans of the sale of the steamer in question to the Rio Grande Company, by means of the introduction which he gave the defenders to Beckmann. And the evidence adduced by the pursuer—which is indeed corroborated by the evidence of the defenders, and by the whole history of the case—shews that it is a well established rule in the shipbuilding and shipbroking business that commission is due to the broker or agent upon the first order which results from his introduction of the builder to a customer, even although the parties, after the introduction has been effected, arrange the details of the transaction without calling for further assistance from the broker.

"The rate of commission is also proved to be 2½ per cent, in the absence of any special agreement to the contrary.

"The pursuer is therefore, in my opinion, entitled to decree for the sum claimed by him, with expenses."

[1] Authorities cited.—Wilkinson v. Martin, Feb. 16, 1837, 8 Carr and Payne, 1; Green v. Bartlett, May 30, 1863, 32 L. J. C. P. 261 (per Erle, C. J.); Burnet v. Bouch, July 4, 1840, 9 Carr and Payne, 620. See Russell on Mercantile Agency, pp. 130, &c.

No. 112.
Mar. 20, 1875.
Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

pursuer to send his principals, or some one representing them, to attend the trial trip of said steamer on the Saturday following, with a view to business. The pursuer thereupon went to London, and by his influence with the said Rio Grande Company and their friends and officers, Captain John Le Couteur was sent down to the defenders' yard at Port-Glasgow. The pursuer communicated with the defenders, and gave to Captain Le Couteur the defenders' letter and his card to introduce him to the defenders, and he presented these documents to the defenders. The representatives of the Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company were thereby introduced for the first time to the defenders, and the defenders had the benefit of the pursuer's recommendations and influence in doing business. In consequence of the pursuer's introduction and through his influence the defenders, in or about March 1874, obtained an order for a steam vessel to be supplied to the said company at the price of £31,300."

I do not think that these averments are proved. It is not proved that the Rio Grande Company wanted the steamer first mentioned. Beckmann, who was looking after the interests of the Rio Grande Company certainly, but also after his own, wanted a steamer, not of the proper class for the company's ocean trade, but a smaller steamer. It had occurred to him and others that advantage might be taken of the existence of the company to start a river steamer for inland traffic on the Rio Grande. But it does not follow that the two undertakings were to be in connection.

The first thing that brings the defenders into contact with Beckmann was the smaller steamer. The pursuer gives the defenders an introduction to Beckmann, who, in order to satisfy himself of their efficiency, sends down Le Couteur to Port-Glasgow, and Le Couteur forms a favourable opinion of the defenders as shipbuilders. Nothing more is said about the smaller steamer. The defenders are employed to execute an order for a large steamer for the company which had been previously given to Hamilton and Company, but with power to cancel the order.

I do not think that the facts as proved come up to the case on record, which is that the party who gave the order was identical with the party to whom the builder was introduced. I have great doubts whether any custom is proved which will cover the real facts. The smaller steamer was not necessarily for the Rio Grande Company, but for a speculation that might be quite independent.

There seems a great difference between a general and a special introduction. A broker acts for both parties, and acts according as he has been appointed. If general business is wanted on both sides, the broker is entitled to commission on the first transaction. But a recommendation of a shipbuilder to build a small steamer is not necessarily a recommendation to build a large steamer. If the parties, even without circuity of persons, drop the business for which they have been introduced and take up a much larger transaction, I see no evidence of a custom that the broker shall still get a commission on the first piece of business that may be brought about, however large, and after an interval however long. The broker there is not the causa causans but only the causa causæ causantis.

The fact that the persons who gave the employment were not the same as the person to whom the introduction was given is a special difficulty in the way of the pursuer proving that he has done the work for which he claims payment.

LORD ORMIDALE.—This is one of a class of cases of which few, if any, have been under the consideration of this Court. I do not doubt, however, that the custom on which it is laid is legitimate in itself, and a salutary one for interests of trade. No objection, indeed, was taken to the validity of an obligation or contract based on such a custom as that averred in the present case if it were established; but it was denied and disputed that any such obligation or contract has been proved.

Although the proof is somewhat voluminous, the real question at issue is to be found,—with very little assistance from the parole proof,—in the correspondence of the parties. The pursuer, so far as we see, was never indeed in personal communication at all with the defenders. That being so, I have directed my attention chiefly to the correspondence, which commences with a letter by Mr John Bennett, the broker of the Rio Grande Company, to the pursuer, Mr Moss, dated 16th February 1874. Moss transmits the letter, or a copy of it, to the defenders. The only steamer referred to in that letter is a small one for river trading in Brazil. The defenders answered that they had just built a steamer, a duplicate of which they thought might suit Mr Moss's constituents, and that it was to be forthwith subjected to a trial trip. Moss then gets a person,—Captain Le Couteur,—sent down from London to witness the trial trip, and Captain Le Couteur, accordingly, when he comes to Scotland, puts himself in communication with the defenders. He finds, however, that the vessel they had built would not suit, and so that particular matter terminated.

We then come to the letter of 25th February by Moss to the defenders—(Reads).[1] This is the first time that any allusion is made to the large or ocean steamers. The previous correspondence had related exclusively to a river or small steamer. Here, for the first time, Moss, I do not say thrusts himself into the matter of the large steamers, but, so far as appears, without being asked or employed by any one to do so, introduces the subject of the larger steamers. Now, although a broker chooses to write such a letter to a shipbuilder, that will not necessarily impose a liability for commission to him on the shipbuilder. What is the defenders' answer?—(Reads defenders' letter of 26th February 1874).[2] It is reasonable to presume that the defenders knew quite well what was doing in their neighbour's yard, and, therefore, that it was quite true they had been previously aware that the Rio Grande Company might require one or more large or ocean steamers. But even if they got the information for the first time from Le Couteur, which induced them to go to London, I do not, at present, see how that would found a good claim against them for commission by Moss. I rather think that, if a competition for commission had arisen between Moss and Le Couteur, the latter would have had the preferable claim. No doubt Le Couteur came down in consequence of the previous proceedings taken by Moss, but it is clear that he was sent down for a special purpose only, viz., to see whether the river or small steamer would suit.

It was in this state of matters that Cunliffe, one of the defenders, went to London, and got into communication with Beckmann. And it was he, and not Moss, who introduced Cunliffe to the Rio Grande Company, from whom an order was obtained for a large or ocean steamer.

Such are briefly the circumstances in which the question arises, whether Moss, the pursuer, has established his present claim for commission against the defenders on the cost of the large or ocean steamer just referred to. I concur with

---

[1] Supra, p. 659. [2] Ibid.

No. 112. Mar. 20, 1875. Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

Lord Neaves in being unable to find any sufficient evidence to support such a claim on the part of the pursuer.

In the first place, there is not sufficient evidence that Moss gave the defenders any general, or, indeed, any introduction at all, to the Rio Grande Company. Looking at the correspondence I find nothing but a special introduction having reference to a special object, viz., a small, or river steamer; and that introduction was not to the Rio Grande Company, but to certain subordinate parties. I cannot hold that the fact of Moss saying in one of his letters to the defenders, "I know of a larger steamer," of which the defenders had themselves previously heard, is enough to support the present claim,—the more especially as it appears the defenders had, independently of Moss altogether, arranged to go to London to endeavour to get an order for the large steamer. Moss may have had a good claim against the defenders in reference to the small steamer, if an order had been obtained for it; and he may still have such a claim for anything that appears to the contrary. In the second place, it is not proved that the Rio Grande Company was identical with the persons who required the smaller steamer, and if so, this raises an additional bar to the pursuer prevailing in his present claim. If a broker gives a shipbuilder an introduction to A, for the purpose of obtaining an order for the construction of a small, or river steamer, and the shipbuilder, in the course of his negotiation with that purpose, comes into contact with a third party, who gives him an order for a large or ocean steamer, I cannot hold that this would give the broker a claim for commission against the shipbuilder on the latter transaction, merely because it may be said that in a certain loose sense it arose indirectly from, or in consequence of, the introduction which had been given to a different party, and in reference to a different kind of transaction.

In short, and without entering into farther details, it appears to me that there are wanting in the present case the elements of employment and service necessary to support the pursuer's claim, and, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary will fall to be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied.

Lord Gifford.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The action is brought by a commission-agent or broker, in order to recover his commission. Commission is the remuneration to which a broker is entitled under the contract of agency. There must always be a contract of agency to warrant the charge of commission. If there is no agency—no "commissioner" appointed—there is no room for "commission." In general, commission is due to the agent as recompense or payment for his skill, trouble, and responsibility. In the present case the claim for commission is somewhat peculiar. It is not laid upon skill, or work, or trouble, in the special transaction. The agent did not carry through the contract of sale. He did not even initiate it. The claim is for introduction and recommendation,—for the use, so to speak, of the agent's influence or intervention in bringing the parties together, and then leaving them to make their own contract, and this is not the ordinary way in which a commission is earned. Still, I do not doubt that such a claim may be well founded. When parties make a distinct contract for an introduction or recommendation, and where the introduction or recommendation is stipulated and agreed to be paid for—then, if the contract is fair and reasonable, it will receive effect. But there must be such a contract before the agent is entitled to remuneration, and the law will look somewhat narrowly to see that it is fair and reasonable, especially when the commission is really added to the price, and charged against the purchaser, who did not employ the broker, and was not a party to the contract of agency.

No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1875.
Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

In the present case I think that there was a contract between the parties, but of a very special and limited kind. The contract is contained in the letter of the pursuer to the defenders of 17th February 1874. Enclosed in that letter was an excerpt of a letter received by the pursuer from Mr John Bennett junior, in which Bennett asks the pursuer if he would quote a price for a light draught steamer. Mr Bennett's name, however, was withheld, and merely an excerpt from his letter was sent to shew what he was prepared to order. So that the enclosure, which gives a variety of details of requisites of the steamer, defines the business for which Moss became agent, if employed by Cunliffe and Dunlop. He was to be agent or broker between an undisclosed principal (Bennett) and Cunliffe and Dunlop, with a view of getting that principal to order from Cunliffe and Dunlop a vessel of the specified dimensions. I do not think that there was any other contract between the parties. Suppose that this steamer had been built, or may yet be built for Mr Bennett or for his constituents by Messrs Cunliffe and Dunlop, I do not doubt that the 2½ per cent commission will be due to the pursuer, because Cunliffe and Dunlop have expressly agreed to pay that commission, and the obligation is not illegal. I do not see that his claim could be resisted on the ground that another transaction had intervened. In short, I read the bargain as an agreement that if the defenders should be employed to build the river steamer which was wanted then they should pay the pursuer, in consideration of his introduction and influence, 2½ per cent on the price. But the pursuer maintains that his introduction was not special for any particular order, but general, and that a general introduction implies by custom of trade or by express stipulation a commission of 2½ per cent upon the first order which may be obtained, and the pursuer's claim is for a commission upon the first order, whatever that may be, and however different in its nature it may be from the river steamer which was originally contemplated.

I do not think that this contention is well founded, and I am not satisfied that any such custom of trade has been proved. There may no doubt sometimes be such a bargain, but I think it must always be specially alleged and proved, and there is no such bargain proved in the present case. I think the pursuer has failed to shew that the defenders agreed to pay him commission on the large ocean steamer which they built for the Rio Grande Company.

The first defence is that the larger steamer was not ordered by the same parties who were prepared to order the river steamer. I think this defence has been made good. There was some idea that the two steamers might come to belong to the same company, but at the date when the introduction was given for the river steamer there was no arrangement with the Rio Grande Company to take that river steamer. It may be that some of the parties interested in the Rio Grande Company were also interested in the river steamer, but there was no identity between the concerns.

In the next place, there was a material and essential difference between the things ordered. Suppose that instead of a large steamer, a very small vessel had been ordered, or it may be a mere boat, would Moss have been contented with commission on that, as being the first order? If the introduction was general, he would have been obliged to be contented with the first order, however small.

Still further, it was indirectly and not directly from Moss that Cunliffe and Dunlop got the order for the larger steamer. At the time when Moss mentioned the river steamer he knew nothing of the larger steamers. Bennett had told him nothing about them. We see how the order for the larger steamers came about. Bennett or Moss sent down Captain Le Couteur. He was not then connected with the Rio Grande Company. He was sent down with reference to this river steamer, which was the private speculation of certain parties. It would be a strong thing to hold that because a broker introduces parties for one contract, that will entitle him to commission on another contract, not even between the same parties, but indirectly brought about, in consequence of the parties being brought together and introducing a third party, with whom new transactions arise. It is said that the large steamer was substituted for the smaller. If it could be made out that one order came in place of the other that would make a difference. But all the four larger steamers had been ordered from Messrs Hamilton before the smaller steamer was thought of, though there was a power to cancel the order for one. The smaller steamer was therefore in addition to and not in substitution of the larger steamers. The order which the defenders obtained for the larger steamer arose indirectly from Captain Le Couteur being sent down. It was Captain Le Couteur, and not the pursuer at all, who was the means of the defenders being employed by the Rio Grande Company to build the ocean steamer now in question, and I cannot hold that Moss was the causa causans of the order, or that he is entitled to any commission thereon.

No. 112. Mar. 20, 1875. Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to prevail, (1) because it was a special contract for which alone he was agent, and (2) because he was only the indirect and not the direct cause of the order in question.

I cannot help adding that I very strongly disapprove of the practice which seems to prevail of charging commission merely by adding it to the price without letting it separately appear as commission. The result is that the purchaser is made to pay commission without knowing or being aware of it, and he has no means of checking or objecting to the amount or rate. It may be charged at any rate; he cannot tell what, because it is charged as price. A fair commission will never be grudged, but it should always appear, and the agent or broker who charges the commission should be disclosed as such to the party by whom the commission is paid.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case would have been a very suitable one for a jury, and we are sitting very much in that capacity. The question to a large extent turns on the credibility of evidence, and had it not been for the importance of the case, although differing to some extent in my impression of the evidence, I should have simply acquiesced in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I am anxious to make a few remarks on the general aspect of the case.

The custom of trade, by which a broker who introduces a shipbuilder to a customer is entitled to a commission of 2½ per cent on the first order which is the direct result of the introduction, is well averred and sufficiently proved. This right can only be claimed by a man in the profession, and therefore the notion of either Beckmann or Le Couteur, neither of whom are brokers, being entitled to commission, is out of the question.

The subject of contention is, whether the order for the large steamer was the direct result of the pursuer's introduction. If it were only the indirect result, our verdict must be against the pursuer. My opinion is that, if the witnesses are to be believed, it was the direct result. Lord Ormidale considers that the elements of our decision are very much limited to the written evidence. I do not take this view. The letters do not contain the constitution of the relation of principal and broker between the defenders and the pursuer. It is proved by the pursuer's evidence, and not denied by Cunliffe, that the defenders made the pursuer's acquaintance two years before this transaction, and introduced themselves as shipbuilders desirous of orders. Bennett, the London broker, who was acting for the Rio Grande Company, wanting a small steamer, writes to Moss whether he can quote a price. Moss writes to the defenders sending them the dimensions and particulars. It is right to say that this letter is not an introduction. It introduces the defenders to no one. It only asks a question. That letter does not, therefore, constitute the relation of principal and agent.

No. 112.

Mar. 20, 1875.
Moss v. Cunliffe & Dunlop.

After getting the defenders' answer Moss goes to London, and mentions to Bennett the defenders as the parties whom he would recommend to receive the order. If Moss is to be credited, Bennett then told him of the large steamer. That information was given to Moss before Le Couteur went down to Glasgow. In consequence of the pursuer's recommendation Bennett pressed upon Beckmann to send some one to Port Glasgow. The first introduction is the telegram by the pursuer of 20th February that Captain Le Couteur was to come down by that night's mail. Le Couteur accordingly comes down as Beckmann's agent, and the result of his visit is that Cunliffe went to London and got the order for the large steamer.

A distinction has been drawn between a general and a special introduction. I can understand the difference between a general and a special recommendation, but I cannot see any reason for drawing a distinction between a general and a special introduction.

It is said that the small steamer was for a different party. I am by no means satisfied of this upon the evidence, but in the view which your Lordships take of the evidence I do not dissent from the result.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall said interlocutor: Find that the pursuer has failed to prove any contract between him and the defender for payment by the defenders of the commission sued for, or any facts sufficient to infer their liability for such commission: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons: Find the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—HILL & FERGUSSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 113.

Mar. 20, 1875.
Macknight.

JAMES MACKNIGHT AND ANOTHER (M'Cormick's Trustees), Petitioners.—Hall.

Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 14.—The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 14, enacts that "when any person shall be entitled to the possession for his own absolute use of any heritable property, or moveable or personal property, the title to which has been taken in the name of any trustee .... or other person who has died or become incapable of acting without having executed a conveyance of such property, it shall be lawful for the person beneficially entitled to such property to apply by petition to the Court for authority to complete a title to such property in his own name," &c.

Held that the above enactment does not apply to the assignee of a beneficiary.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

THIS petition was presented by James Macknight, W.S., and Robert Hill, W.S., testamentary trustees under a mutual settlement executed by the deceased Miss Rachel M'Cormick, who died in 1874, and her sister

No. 113.

Mar. 20, 1875. Macknight.

Helen, who died in 1865. The petition prayed for warrant to the petitioners as trustees foresaid to complete a title under sec. 14 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867,* to £695 of the stock of the Royal Bank of Scotland, to which Miss Rachel M'Cormick was alleged to have right under the settlement of her father, the deceased Edward M'Cormick, who died in 1814. The stock still stood in name of Mr M'Cormick's trustees, the last of whom died in 1837.

The Lord Ordinary, on 11th March 1875, reported the petition to the Inner-House.†

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am sorry I cannot concur in the opinion indicated by the Lord Ordinary. He says,—"If I had seen my way to dispose of the petition in the Outer-House, I should have been inclined to hold that the petitioners, as assignees (though in trust) of the party who herself was beneficially entitled to the stock or part of it for her own absolute use, are entitled to obtain from the Court authority to complete their title, in the mode proposed, to said stock, or to the share thereof to which their author was entitled." Now, the words of section 14 of the Trusts Act, 1867, are very precise. They are intended to apply to the case where there remains a proper beneficiary under a lapsed trust, and to enable him to have access to the property directly without reconstituting the trust, or obtaining new trustees appointed. The question is whether the clause is so expressed that it can be extended to cover the case of those who have acquired right from the proper beneficiary? I am of opinion that the expressions used cannot be so interpreted. The person who can take advantage of the provision is the person who is entitled, as beneficiary, to the absolute possession of property which was vested in trustees, and to which he has not got an operative conveyance. The petitioner would construe the words as including not only the person beneficially entitled, but also his assignee, whether for the assignee's

* Sec. 14 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97) enacts, —"When any person shall be entitled to the possession for his own absolute use of any heritable property, or moveable or personal property, the title to which has been taken in the name of any trustee, or curator bonis, or factor loco absentis, or factor loco tutoris, or judicial factor, or other person, who has died or become incapable of acting without having executed a conveyance of such property, it shall be lawful for the person beneficially entitled to such property to apply by petition to the Court for authority to complete a title to such property in his own name," &c.

† "NOTE.—. . . . . It seems to be clear that Miss Rachel M'Cormick, had she been now alive, might have competently obtained authority from the Court to complete a title under the statute to the shares of the stock to which she and her sister Helen were beneficially entitled, as she was entitled to the same for her own absolute use. The petitioners, however, are not entitled to said stock for their own absolute use, but solely as trustees for the purposes of the said mutual settlement; and it is therefore doubtful whether they come within the category of persons who are entitled to avail themselves of the summary method of completing a title introduced by the statute referred to.

"As the question is one of novelty and importance, and as there is in this case no contradictor, I have thought it expedient to report the point to the Court, in order that an authoritative judgment may be pronounced without unnecessary loss of time. I may be permitted to say that if I had seen my way to dispose of the petition in the Outer-House, I should have been inclined to hold that the petitioners, as assignees (though in trust) of the party who herself was beneficially entitled to the stock, or part of it, for her own absolute use, are entitled to obtain from the Court authority to complete their title, in the mode proposed, to said stock, or to the share thereof to which their author was entitled."

own uses or for those of other parties. I cannot so construe the clause, and, therefore, I am of opinion that we must remit to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the prayer of the petition. No. 113. Mar. 20, 1875. Macknight.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT accordingly remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the prayer of the petition.

JAMES GOW, S.S.C.—Agent.

No. 114.

Mar. 20, 1875. Rae v. Linton, &c.

JOHN RUTHERFORD RAE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—M'Kechnie.
THOMAS LINTON, Defender.—M'Laren.
THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders.—Macdonald.

Issue—Reparation—Criminal Prosecution—Public Officer—Malice.—A person was charged before a police magistrate with the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, in so far as he did "wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently," present and cash at the head office of a bank a cheque on a branch thereof, "he well knowing that he had then no money" in the branch bank. Upon this charge he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. The conviction and sentence having been quashed by the Court of Justiciary in respect that the libel contained no relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, he brought an action for £2000 damages against the procurator-fiscal, who prosecuted, and the bank, who gave the information. The pursuer averred that he had an account current with the branch bank, and that he had previously drawn cheques upon it which had been duly honoured at the head office. Held that in regard to each defender the pursuer required to put in issue malice and want of probable cause.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

IN August 1874 John Rutherford Rae was charged before the Police Court in Edinburgh at the instance of Thomas Linton, superintendent of police for the city of Edinburgh, and procurator-fiscal of the Court, with "the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, actor, or art and part, in so far as upon the 23d day of July 1874 years, or about that time, in the bank of Scotland, situated in Bank Street, in or near Edinburgh, the said accused did wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently, cause to be presented for payment to Robert Thomas Scott, a teller in said Bank of Scotland, a cheque or order for money, conceived in the following or similar terms:—'No. , Annan, 22d July 1874.—To the agents of the bank of Scotland, Annan.—Pay to the bearer the sum of ten pounds sterling £10 stg., J. RUTHERFORD RAE,'—he well knowing that he had then no money in said Bank of Scotland, Annan, and having in this manner imposed upon and deceived the said Robert Thomas Scott, he did then and there cause to be delivered to the said accused the sum of nine pounds, nineteen shillings and sixpence sterling, being the amount of said cheque or order, less sixpence for commission."

The presiding magistrate found the complaint proved, and sentenced Rae to twenty days imprisonment.

Rae presented a note of suspension to the High Court of Justiciary, who on 11th December 1874 pronounced the following judgment:—"In respect the libel contains no relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, pass the bill: Suspend the conviction and sentence complained of simpliciter: Find the suspender entitled to expenses," &c.*

Upon 22d January 1875 Rae raised an action of damages against Linton and the Bank of Scotland.

* For the proceedings in the High Court, see Justiciary Cases, p. 17.

No. 114.

Mar. 20, 1875. Rae v. Linton, &c.

The pursuer averred that he had an account current with the branch bank of Scotland at Annan, where he resided at the time when he drew the cheque in question. He stated;—The said cheque was sent by the pursuer to the head office of the said bank in Edinburgh, where it was cashed. This was not the first time that the pursuer had negotiated cheques in a similar manner upon said bank, which were duly honoured by the bank, and paid by the branch office in Annan on transmission thither.

The bank admitted that the pursuer had previously opened an account with the Annan branch, and that he had previously presented cheques at the head office, which were cashed; but explained that upon these occasions there were funds at the pursuer's credit in the Annan branch to meet the cheques, that he had never been permitted to overdraw his account, and knew that he would not be allowed to do so.

Linton founded on the 30th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864:—"No procurator-fiscal, or other party prosecuting for the public interest by complaint under the provisions of this or any other Act, shall be liable to pay or be found liable by any Court in a greater sum than £5 as damages for or in respect of any proceedings taken or anything done on such complaint, or on any judgment following on such complaint, unless the person prosecuting for damages shall aver and prove that such proceedings were taken or done maliciously, and without probable cause." He tendered to the pursuer the statutory allowance of £5.

The following issues were adjusted by the Lord Ordinary:—"(1) Whether the defenders, the said governor and company of the Bank of Scotland, on or about the 7th day of August 1874, maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the pursuer to be apprehended, and thereafter to be tried in the Police Court of the city of Edinburgh, and convicted of the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and subsequently to be imprisoned in the prison of Edinburgh for twenty days, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £2000. (2) Whether, on or about the 7th day of August 1874, the defender, the said Thomas Linton, maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the pursuer to be apprehended, and thereafter to be tried and convicted in the Police Court of the city of Edinburgh, for the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and subsequently to be imprisoned in the prison of Edinburgh for twenty days, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £2000."

Rae moved the Court to vary the issues by deleting the words "maliciously and without probable cause" from each issue.

Argued for the pursuer;—Probable cause could only arise on the facts. The pursuer had been charged with acts which were not a crime by the law of Scotland. The proceedings were entirely outwith law, and the defenders were not entitled to have malice and want of probable cause inserted in the issues.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The line of demarcation between a proceeding entirely without warrant of law and one in which the law has not been accurately carried out is in some cases very subtle. But I have no doubt in this case. We have a private party laying an information before the competent authority, and that authority taking steps to have the complaint investigated. Ultimately it is found that the complaint is not relevant, not that it did not set forth what might be a crime, but that the acts averred did not amount to the crime libelled. The question now is, whether the defenders are liable without an averment of malice and want of probable cause. I think this is just such a case as requires proof of malice, even apart from the Act. A public officer in the discharge of his duty, although an error has been committed, cannot be made responsible without an allegation of malice. The case of Bell v. Black and Morrison, 3 Macph. 1056, was very different. The ratio of that judgment was that the proceedings complained of had not even a colour of law. It may turn out that the defenders knew things which ought to have prevented them acting as they did, but in that case it will be easy to prove malice. Malice and want of probable cause must enter the issues.

[1] Authorities cited.—Arbuckle v. Taylor, May 1, 1815, 3 Dow, 160; Strachan v. Stoddart, Nov. 13, 1818, 7 S. 4; Hollands v. Richardson, July 12, 1843, 5 D. 1352, 15 Scot. Jur. 599; Barclay v. Barclay, March 2, 1854, 16 D. 714, 26 Scot. Jur. 309; Bell v. Black and Morrison, June 28, 1865, 3 Macph. 1056, 37 Scot. Jur. 543.

No. 114.
Mar. 20, 1875.
Rae v. Linton, &c.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE motion was refused.

W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—RICHARDSON & JOHNSTON, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

SUMMER SESSION.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers and Respondents.—Johnstone.
THE GREENOCK SACKING COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.
THE CLYDE SUGAR REFINING COMPANY, Defenders and Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—M'Laren.

No. 115.
May 13, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others.

Reparation—Culpa—Insufficiency of Building—Landlord and Tenant.—The tenant of a store employed a carrier with a horse and cart to remove goods. The horse was killed by the fall of the building.

In an action of damages at the instance of the carrier against the tenant and the owner of the building, after proof, held that the tenant was liable to the pursuer, in respect that the accident had been caused by his fault in overloading the store, and in not warning the pursuer of the insecurity of the building and danger which had been apparent for some days, but reserving to the tenant any claim of relief he might have against the landlord.

Expenses.—In the above action, held that the tenant was liable in expenses, not only to the pursuer, but to the other defender.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrewshire. I.

BY missives, dated respectively 24th December 1872 and 23d February 1873, the Greenock Sacking Company leased from the Clyde Sugar Refining Company the first and second storeys and the attic storey of a large store, which the sugar company had bought from a cotton mill company, and which had been used by the former owners as a warehouse and reeling rooms.

The sacking company, after getting possession of the store, proceeded to use it for the purpose for which it was known that they had taken it, viz., as a jute store. They commenced storing the bales of jute in the attic storey, and after the men had been three days at work the store shewed symptoms of giving way, and, although some uprights and supports were put in by the sugar company's orders, on the fourth day the store fell, the outer wall falling outwards, and among other things seriously injuring a horse belonging to the Caledonian Railway Compay, who had been employed by the sacking company to carry the jute to the store. The horse died of its injuries, and the railway company raised an action for £95, 5s. 3d., as the value of the horse and harness, in the Sheriff-court, in which they convened both the sacking company and the sugar company as defenders.

No. 115.

May 13, 1875. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others.

In the course of the proof led by the railway company it was established that the sacking company had been informed by their men of the dangerous state of the store, and that they had given no warning of that to the railway company or their servants.

Both defenders led evidence at great length. The sacking company led evidence, with the view of proving that the accident happened owing to the original insufficiency of the store for the use for which it was let, and the sugar company, with the view of shewing that the fall of the store had been caused by the manner in which the sacking company had used the store.

The sacking company, before the proof was led, put in a minute agreeing to the case being tried as between them and the sugar company, the party found liable to pay the whole expenses. This minute was not, however, accepted by the sugar company.

In consequence of a great part of the proof having been taken by the Sheriff, and at his request, the Sheriff-substitute (Smith) made a vizandum to the Sheriff.

The Sheriff (Fraser), on 21st December 1874, pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found, inter alia, that the building fell, and the damage to the horse was caused, "through the culpa of the Greenock Sacking Company,—First, by overloading the building; and, secondly, by recklessness and want of care in the mode in which the jute was stored in the attic and second floors of the building." He accordingly decerned against the sacking company for £89, 18s. 3d. and assoilzied the sugar company from the action, and found the sacking company liable in expenses to both the railway company and the sugar company.

The sacking company appealed to the Court of Session.

THE Second Division pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that by the missives, Nos. 6 and 7 of process, the Clyde Sugar Refining Company let to the Greenock Sacking Company the premises in question for the purpose of using the same as a store: Find that the defenders (appellants) last-mentioned proceeded to store a quantity of jute in the attics of the building, and that during this operation various indications were observed tending to shew that the weight imposed was dangerous to the building, and that these indications were communicated to the said defenders: That, in the knowledge of this danger, the said defenders employed one of the servants of the pursuers (respondents) with a horse and cart to come within the building without intimating the state of the same, or the warnings received, and proceeded notwithstanding with the further loading of the premises: Find that the building suddenly fell, and so injured the horse belonging to the pursuers as to cause its death: Find that the fall of the building was caused by the imposition by the defenders on the floor of the attic thereof of a greater weight than the building could sustain: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment appealed from; reserving to the said defenders (appellants) any claim of relief they may have against the other defenders, the Clyde Sugar Refining Company: Find the defenders, the Greenock Sacking Company, liable in additional expenses to the pursuers and the other defenders; and remit to the Auditor of this Court to tax the additional expenses, and to report: Quoad ultra remit the cause to the Sheriff, and decern."

No. 115.

May 13, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others.

HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—MASON & SMITH, S.S.C.—WILLIAM ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

AGNES STEWART OR SIMPSON, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Mitchell.
ROBERT STEWART, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Lorimer.
Et è contra.

No. 116.

May 14, 1875.
Simpson v. Stewart.

Process—Proof before Answer—Procedure-roll.—When a case is in the procedure-roll it is the duty of the Lord Ordinary, before allowing proof, to decide whether there should be any limitation of the mode of proof.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. M.

THIS was one of four conjoined actions between Robert Stewart (the pursuer in the conjoined actions), and Mrs Agnes Stewart or Simpson, as executrix of her husband, the late George Simpson, being a counter action at the instance of Mrs Simpson against Robert Stewart, as executor of Andrew Stewart, for payment, inter alia, of certain bills. Mrs Simpson alleged,—(Cond. 3) "The said Andrew Stewart was, at the said date of his death, indebted to the pursuer's late husband in the following sums, with interest, viz.:—(1) £98, 10s. sterling, under bill dated 1st February 1870, drawn by the said George Simpson upon and accepted by the said Andrew Stewart, payable two months after date; (2) £200 sterling, under bill dated 28th September 1870, drawn by the said George Simpson upon and accepted by the said Andrew Stewart, payable one month after date; (3) £100 sterling, under bill dated 28th September 1870, drawn by the said George Simpson upon and accepted by the said Andrew Stewart, payable two months after date. No part of any of these sums has been paid or compensated for by either the said Andrew Stewart, or the defender as his executor, or in any other capacity, to either the pursuer's late husband or the pursuer; and the defender, as executor foresaid of Andrew Stewart, is indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the said sums, with interest, as concluded for."

The defender stated,—(Ans. 3) "Denied. The defender does not admit the genuineness of the signatures of the said Andrew Stewart on the bills in question. If they are genuine, he believes and avers that the bills were accommodation bills granted for behoof of the said George Simpson, and that the said Andrew Stewart never got any money or value for them."

There was no plea to the effect that the defender's allegations could only be proved by writ or oath.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor conjoining the actions, and "in the conjoined actions allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to both a conjunct probation."

A proof was led, part thereof consisting of evidence taken under a submission of the various subjects in dispute, which had proved abortive, which the parties agreed to hold as proof in the present case, and the

No. 116.
May 14, 1875.
Simpson v. Stewart.

Lord Ordinary thereafter pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"Having considered the cause and proof in the conjoined actions—(First) In the action at the instance of Mrs Agnes Stewart or Simpson, defender in the conjoined actions, widow of the late George Simpson, as sole executrix and universal disponee of her late husband, and as an individual, finds that in the accounting between the parties the said defender is entitled to credit for the following sums, viz., (1) £98, 10s., with interest from 4th April 1870; (2) £200, with interest from 31st October 1870; (3) £100, with interest from 1st December 1870, the said sums being the amounts of the bills mentioned in article 3 of the condescendence in the action at the said defender's instance."*

Robert Stewart reclaimed.

Lord President.—(After disposing of the other parts of the case)—Various bills are, inter alia, the subject of a counter action at the instance of Mrs Simpson against Robert Stewart, and she sets out in the 3d condescendence,—"The said Andrew Stewart was, at the date of his death, indebted to the pursuer's late husband in the following sums, with interest, viz.:—(1) £98, 10s. sterling under bill, dated 1st February 1870, drawn by the said George Simpson upon and accepted by the said Andrew Stewart, payable two months after date," and then she specifies two other bills. She then states,—"No part of any of these sums has been paid or compensated for by either the said Andrew Stewart or the defender as his executor, or in any other capacity, to either the pursuer's late husband or the pursuer, and the defender, as executor foresaid of Andrew Stewart, is indebted and resting owing to the pursuer in the said sums, with interest, as concluded for."

That is an action laid upon bills which have suffered no prescription.

What is the answer? That the bills were accommodation bills. The answer is distinct and specific, and the only competent way to prove it is by writ or oath. But unfortunately the Lord Ordinary did not notice this part of the case separately, and has allowed to both the parties a proof at large of their averments.

The pursuer ought to have stated a plea to the effect that these averments

* "Note. . . .—In regard to the bills, the three acceptances by the late Andrew Stewart, who is now represented by the pursuer, have been produced in process. The defence to the claim is that these were bills granted as accommodation bills for behoof of George Simpson, and for which Andrew Stewart never received any value. According to the ordinary rule this defence must be proved by the writ or oath of the drawer, and there is no such proof of the defence in this case. The pursuer, founding on the deposition of the late Mr Simpson, emitted before Mr Boyd as referee, and which has, in terms of the agreement of the parties, been admitted as proof in the present case, contends that the whole circumstances connected with the bills are so suspicious that he is entitled to the benefit of proof at large, and is not limited by the ordinary rule of law just referred to. It appears to me that the pursuer has not established circumstances which entitle him to the benefit of parole evidence; but further, that even if such evidence be admissible, he has failed to instruct that the bills were granted for Mr Simpson's accommodation. . . . . However this may be, it lies with the pursuer to cut down the acceptances, which bear to be for value, and I am of opinion that he has failed to do so, even if it were assumed that parole evidence could be received for that purpose."

No. 116.
May 14, 1875.
Simpson v. Stewart.

could only be proved by writ or oath. But there is no such plea on record, and it is reasonable to presume that the Lord Ordinary overlooked this part of the case. I cannot imagine that the present mode of allowing proof will justify the Lord Ordinary in sending a case to proof, leaving it to come out at the trial what part of the case must be proved by writ or oath. The matter falls to be disposed of when the case is in the procedure-roll. The Lord Ordinary should then direct his attention to the record, and see what part falls to be proved by writ or oath. I am not disposed to attach any blame to the Lord Ordinary, because he has been misled by the parties, and it is fortunate that the leading of the evidence does not bring out a different result.

But it would now be too late for the pursuer to limit the mode of proof, because she was the leader in the proof in which the whole matter of the onerosity of the bills was gone into. We are thus necessarily driven to consider the proof at large. I have no difficulty in holding that the presumption of onerosity is not removed by the proof which has been led.

The circumstance that a party has lost his right to limit the proof will not remove the presumption in favour of onerosity.

LORD DEAS.—I agree so entirely with your Lordship upon the merits of this case that I have nothing to add. There is one matter of procedure, however, as to which I think it right specially to express my concurrence with what has fallen from your Lordship, and that is as to the effect of the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on 15th October 1874, allowing to the parties a proof at large of their averments. The closed record in the fourth action, which is at the instance of Mrs Simpson, sets forth various bills in which her late husband is ex facie the creditor of Robert Stewart, the defender. The defence substantially is that these bills were accommodation bills. There is no plea to the effect that the proof of this defence should be limited to the writ or oath of the drawer of the bills, and consequently it seems to have escaped the Lord Ordinary to keep in view the rule of law to that effect in his interlocutor allowing a proof. There may be circumstances of real evidence affording so strong a prima facie suspicion of fraud as to justify allowing a proof before answer, so that it may be seen whether the case is so exceptional that the onerosity of the bills falls to be determined by the parole proof. But the interlocutor in question does not bear to be before answer. It is an interlocutor which settled the mode of proof, and unless proposed to be opened up (which it has not been) under the reclaiming note, so that the whole procedure might be gone back upon, we have no choice but to take the interlocutor, quoad the mode of proof, as the law of the case. Luckily, in the present instance, that does not lead to any miscarriage of justice, and it is therefore sufficient to notice the error. It is suggested that the Lord Ordinary may have considered that there was no difference in the effect of an interlocutor allowing a proof before answer and an interlocutor containing no such qualification. I cannot listen to that suggestion. I have been acquainted with the practice of this Court for nearly half a century and I never knew that doctrine acted on. The utility of the distinction has, on the contrary, been more and more recognised. The shape of the interlocutor must, no doubt, have been accidental, from the mode in which the pleas were stated, and the complicated nature of the accounting involved in the four conjoined actions.

No. 116. LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

May 14, 1875. Simpson v. Stewart.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to on the three leading questions which have been submitted to our consideration. And as regards the mode of proof, applicable to the bills founded upon in the counter action, I am also of opinion that under the interlocutor by which a proof at large was allowed, and which was acquiesced in, it is not now competent for the holder of the bills to maintain that the proof as to their non-onerosity must be restricted to writ or oath. There is no such plea upon the record, nor any such restriction in the interlocutor, and had it been the intention of the holder to stand upon the ordinary rule of law to that effect, care should have been taken to have the interlocutor by which the proof was allowed qualified in that respect. But that was not done. The interlocutor does not even bear to be "before answer," and I concur with Lord Deas as to its having been the practice, more especially in cases relative to the onerosity of bills, when proof otherwise than by writ or oath was to be allowed, for the interlocutor to bear expressly that the proof was to be before answer. For I have always understood that one reason for adopting that course has been that if the averments of fraudulent or suspicious conduct in relation to the bills, which were considered to be relevant to lead to a relaxation of the rule, should not be proved, it might still be open to the holder of the bills to ask the Court to give effect to the rule, that their onerosity could only be redargued by writ or oath. To such an extent has this been held to be the practice that in a case of Willans, Overbury, and Company (N. R.), relative to the onerosity of bills, decided by the Second Division of the Court in 1868, where the Lord Ordinary, in respect of the suspicious circumstances attending it, had relaxed the general rule, fully explaining in his note the grounds on which that course had been adopted, and that the proof was intended to be before answer, but had omitted so to qualify the interlocutor, the Court, while they approved of the course adopted, and allowed the proof, varied the interlocutor itself by adding the words "before answer."

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—D. J. MACBRAIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 117. MRS JANET NIELSON OR RAE AND ANOTHER, First Parties.—D.-F. Clark—Adam.
JOSEPH NIELSON, Second Party.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Blair.

May 14, 1875. Rae v. Nielson.

Marriage-Contract—Mutual Settlement—Jus Quæsitum Tertio—Revocation—Donatio inter virum et uxorem.—Held that a mutual settlement executed by a husband and wife was ineffectual, in so far as it derogated from the wife's rights under an antenuptial contract of marriage, and quoad ultra was revocable by the wife after her husband's death as a donation inter virum et uxorem, the wife not having received any benefit therefrom.

2D DIVISION. I.

THE deceased James Nielson, master in the merchant service, about the end of the year 1838 married Elizabeth Haining of Lochbank, in the county of Dumfries. By antenuptial marriage-contract between the spouses, dated 5th December 1838, Mr Nielson, in consideration of the provisions in his favour therein contained, disponed and conveyed in favour of himself and Elizabeth Haining, and the longest liver of them, and the heirs and assignees of the longest liver, his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, of whatever nature or denomination, wherever situated, then belonging or which should belong to him at the time of his death; and he appointed Elizabeth Haining to be his sole executrix and universal legatory. For these causes, and on the other part, Elizabeth Haining, inter alia, disponed and conveyed in favour of herself and Mr Nielson, and the longest liver of them in fee, and the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver, All and Whole her just and equal half pro indiviso of the lands of Lochbank; as also all other lands and heritable estate of every description that should belong to her at the time of her death, or that belonged to her at the date of the contract; as also the whole moveable estate then belonging or which should belong to her at the time of her death.

No. 117.

May 14, 1875.
Rae v. Nielson.

At the date of the marriage the whole of Mr Nielson's estate consisted of a sum of about £800 in money. Mrs Nielson was at that date infeft as joint proprietrix of one-half pro indiviso of the lands of Lochbank, which she had inherited from her father, and she had also a considerable sum of money.

In 1855 Mr Nielson purchased, at the price of £392, the property of Bank House, in the parish of Troqueer, in which he and his wife afterwards resided. The purchase-money was borrowed from his wife's sister. After the marriage Mr Nielson did not pursue his former employment, and the funds for the subsistence of himself and his wife were derived chiefly from the rents of the properties already mentioned, and the profits of land which was cultivated by Mr and Mrs Nielson and her sister as tenants.

In 1857 Mr and Mrs Nielson executed a mutual disposition and settlement, narrating that the testators "from our affection for each other, and for other good causes and considerations, have agreed and resolved to execute these presents," and disposing of their property as follows, viz.:—(1) The Bank House property was disponed by Mr Nielson to Mrs Nielson, in the event of her survivance, in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, whom failing, to Janet Nielson, his sister, and Janet Nielson (sometime Douglas, now Rae), his niece (daughter of his brother Charles Nielson), during their joint lives, and to Janet Nielson, his sister, in the event of her surviving his niece (Mrs Rae), also in liferent, and to his niece (Mrs Rae), in fee, whom failing, to others therein mentioned; but declaring that in the event of Jane Haining, the sister of Mrs Nielson, surviving both of the spouses, she should be entitled during her life to the possession of Bank House, and the use of the furniture therein, at a rent to be fixed by arbitration. (2) Mrs Nielson disponed her half of the lands of Lochbank in the following terms, viz.:—"To the said James Nielson, in the event of his surviving me, the said Elizabeth Haining or Nielson, in fee; whom failing, to the said Charles Nielson and Joseph Nielson, presently residing in London, brothers of the said James Nielson, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, equally between them, and to the said Charles, Mary Anne, Janet (Mrs Rae), Amelia, and Joseph Nielson equally, and the issue of such of them as may die, who shall be entitled to their parent's share, and the survivors and survivor of them, in fee." (3) They further gave, granted, assigned, and disponed "to each other, and to the survivor of us, and after the death of the survivor to the said Charles Nielson and Joseph Nielson, brothers of me, the said James Nielson, in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, equally between them, and to the said Charles, Mary Anne, Janet (Mrs Rae), Amelia, and Joseph Nielson equally, and the issue of such of them as may die, who shall be entitled to their parent's

No. 117.

May 14, 1875.
Rae v. Nielson.

share, and the survivors and survivor of them, in fee, the whole other heritable property, and all the other heritable and moveable estate, of whatsoever nature or denomination the same may be, which shall belong and be addebted to us or either of us at the time of our decease respectively." And (4) The survivor was appointed executor; and there was reserved power to revoke or alter "these presents during our joint lives in whole or in part," and "all former settlements, contracts of marriage, and codicils formerly executed by us" were cancelled and recalled, and declared to be of no force or effect.

Mr Nielson died without leaving issue on 7th October 1860.

The power of alteration and revocation contained in this mutual disposition and settlement was not exercised during the life of Mr Nielson. Mrs Nielson assumed the office of executrix under the mutual disposition and settlement executed in 1857, and was confirmed as such. She gave up an inventory of her husband's personal estate, which amounted to £500, and intromitted therewith.

Mrs Nielson died on 12th July 1873 leaving a settlement and codicil, dated in February and May 1873. By this settlement she conveyed to Janet Nielson or Rae, "and to the heirs of her body in fee," whom failing, to Charles Nielson and Joseph Nielson (brothers of her deceased husband), in liferent, equally between them, and to Charles, Mary Anne, Amelia, and Joseph Nielson, children of Charles Nielson, equally, and the issue of such of them as might die, and the survivors and survivor of them, in fee, her whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, which might belong to her at the time of her death, in so far as she had the power to dispose thereof; and she nominated executors, and revoked all former settlements made by her of the estate and effects thereby conveyed, in so far as inconsistent therewith.

During her lifetime Mrs Nielson disposed of the greater portion of the money to which she succeeded by the death of her sister, and which had accumulated after her husband's death; but she nevertheless possessed considerably more money at the time of her decease than the amount which came into her possession at her husband's death. Charles Nielson and Joseph Nielson, the brothers of James Nielson, both survived his widow.

Differences having arisen as to the effect of the various deeds above quoted, a special case was prepared, in which the foregoing facts were set forth. Mrs Janet Nielson or Rae and her husband were the first parties, and Joseph Nielson the second party to the case.

It was maintained for the first party (Mrs Rae) that the onerous conveyance in the antenuptial contract by which the fee of the property of both the spouses was conveyed to the longest liver, and his or her heirs or assignees, could not stante matrimonio be gratuitously altered even by joint consent; that by the terms of the postnuptial settlement Mrs Nielson's interest in her husband's property was gratuitously reduced from a right of fee to one of liferent only, the fee being given to the husband's relations, while the fee of her own heritable property was without any consideration destined to her husband if he should survive her, and failing him, to the children of his relations, and all the other property of both spouses was destined after the death of both to the husband's relatives; and that Mrs Nielson was entitled to revoke, and did effectually revoke, the postnuptial settlement by her own settlement of 14th February 1873, which now regulated the succession not only to her own property but to the property of her husband, to the fee of all which properties she was entitled under the marriage-contract.

No. 117.
May 14, 1875.
Rae v. Nielson.

On the other hand, the second party (Joseph Nielson) maintained that the postnuptial settlement was a mutual and onerous contract between the spouses, which neither party after the death of the other could alter or revoke by deed, mortis causa or inter vivos, of a gratuitous nature; and further, that according to the sound construction of Mrs Nielson's deed of settlement of 1873, she intended to dispose and did dispose only of what means she might have acquired after her husband's death.

The following were the questions submitted to the Court:—"(1) Whether the antenuptial marriage-contract, of date 3d December 1838, was validly revoked to any and if so to what extent by the mutual disposition and settlement of date 2d March 1857? (2) Whether the mutual disposition and settlement was validly revoked to any and if so to what extent by the disposition and settlement and relative codicil, dated respectively 14th February and 29th May 1873? (3) Whether the estate which belonged to Mr and Mrs Nielson, or either of them, at the date of the dissolution of their marriage, falls to be disposed of under and in terms of the said last-mentioned disposition and settlement and codicil to any and if so to what extent? (4) Whether the second party is entitled to the liferent of the subjects provided to him by the said mutual disposition and settlement, or to any and what part thereof?"

Argued for Mrs Rae;—Any alteration made during the lives of spouses on an antenuptial settlement must be held as a donation by the wife if it in any degree diminished her rights. In this case, the wife, in the event of her surviving, would, under the provisions of the mutual settlement, have only got a liferent, whereas under the marriage-contract she was made liar of the whole estates. The right to revoke the mutual settlement existed as long as either of the spouses lived. The provisions in it were of a purely testamentary nature as regarded the estate of each,[1] and were not of the nature of contracts. The right to revoke, if competent against the husband, was competent against his gratuitous donees, or otherwise the husband could have been able to give his gratuitous donees a higher right than he had himself. The test of donation inter virum et uxorem was, did the wife gain or lose by the alteration? Here she certainly lost. But apart from such questions, under the case of Menzies,[2] recently decided, it was clear that the mutual settlement was ineffectual, being in contravention of the provisions of the antenuptial marriage-contract. The mutual settlement was beyond the legal capacity of the spouses, and so it could be disregarded. To the argument that the wife was barred from setting aside the mutual settlement by confirming as executrix under it, the answer was that she took no right by so confirming which she could not have got aliunde: she did not confirm with the intention of homologating the deed.

Argued for Joseph Nielson;—The rights under the marriage-contract which the wife renounced were not of the nature of rights under a trust for her protection. All she gave up was the right of settling the estate after all the objects of the marriage-contract were fulfilled. That distinguished this case from that of Menzies, where the means of maintenance during life were proposed to be diminished. This was not a case of donation—there was no inequality in the nature of the rights waived by the spouses respectively. All that was done was practically

---

[1] Davidson v. Mossman, May 27, 1871, 8 Macph. 807, 42 Scot. Jur. 457; Traquair v. Martin, Nov. 1, 1872, 11 Macph. 22, 45 Scot. Jur. 28.

[2] Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, supra, p. 507.

No. 117.

May 14, 1875. Rae v. Nielson.

at a time when it was uncertain which would survive to give the predecessor a voice in the settlement of the estate. The husband had not influenced the wife to favour his relations against her will, as her subsequent deed showed. A donation by a husband and wife to a third party stante matrimonio, where made by such a mutual deed as this, was irrevocable immediately on the death of one of them,[1]—the death operating as delivery. It was not a donatio inter virum et uxorem when the husband was excluded; it was a conveyance to a third party. It was competent to recall a gift of the substantial fee to the husband, with only a spes successionis to his heirs,[2] but here the husband could not defeat the rights given under the deed.

Separatim, The widow had homologated this mutual settlement by having herself confirmed as executrix under it, and it had thus become operative.

At advising,—

Lord Ormidale.—The disputed points in this special case have appeared to me to be attended with some difficulty in themselves, and to be also important in regard as well to the interests more immediately involved as to the class of cases generally of which the present is one.

Contrasting the provisions in the antenuptial contract of marriage with those in the mutual disposition and settlement, the latter deed must, I think, be held to be of such a nature as to be revocable by Mrs Nielson on the principle of donatio inter virum et uxorem stante matrimonio. It was clearly an infringement of the rights which had been secured to her by the antenuptial contract of marriage. And if so, it must, according to well established principles of law, have been revocable by her. Besides, the recent case of Menzies and Others (supra, p. 507), the principles recognised in which have certainly some bearing on the present question, I may refer to that of Jardine v. Currie, 17th June 1830 (8 Sh. 937),[3] where Lord Moncreiff, whose judgment as Ordinary was adhered to unanimously by the Court, expressly found that "the rule of the law of Scotland whereby donations inter virum et uxorem stante matrimonio are liable to revocation applies equally to all deeds, whether executed directly in the form of donations, or in the form of mutual contracts, or of grants taken by purchase from third parties, wherever such deeds do in truth and substance import gratuitous gifts by the one spouse in favour of the other." And his Lordship also "held this rule specially to apply to deeds infringing the rights settled by antenuptial contract."

It was strenuously argued, however, in the present case, that a mutual disposition and settlement such as there is here, assuming that it was revocable while both spouses were alive, could not be revoked by one of them after the death of the other; but no authority was cited in support of this proposition,

---

[1] Anderson v. Garroway, Jan. 27, 1837, 15 S. 435, 9 Scot. Jur. 233; Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, Dec. 20, 1854, 17 D. 232, 27 Scot. Jur. 86; Hogg v. Campbell, March 18, 1863, 1 Macph. 637, 35 Scot. Jur. 296; Kidd v. Kidds, Dec. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 227, 36 Scot. Jur. 112.

[2] Erak. i. 6, 29; Heisleid v. Lindsay, 1591, M. 6087; Fernie v. Colquhoun's Trustees, supra.

[3] 2 Scot. Jur. 483.

No. 117.

May 14, 1875.
Rae v. Nielson.

and it appears to me to be contrary to principle as well as precedent. To hold, indeed, that a wife cannot revoke after the death of her husband a deed which, ex hypothesi, had been executed by her under the undue influence of the marital power, would obviously be practically holding that it is not revocable at all. Not only, however, is there no authority, so far as I know, for such a contention, but there is authority the other way in the case of Jardine v. Currie already referred to, where it was held that donations by a husband in favour of a wife contained in a mutual deed of settlement were revocable by him after her death.

It was, in the next place, argued that the mutual settlement here in question could not be revoked in respect of the jus quæsitum tertio which it was said it involved by rights of liferent and fee being created in favour of the husband's relatives, and in respect also of the acts of adoption or homologation by the surviving wife of the mutual settlement which are referred to in the 7th article of the special case. But as the husband's relations, in favour of whom the rights of liferent and fee referred to are created, were not parties to the deed at all, and the interests which were created in their favour are entirely gratuitous, I cannot hold that such interests can interpose any bar to the revocation by the surviving wife, assuming revocation to have been otherwise open to her. Neither do I think that there is sufficient in this case to entitle the Court to hold that the right of the surviving wife to revoke has been barred on the principle of adoption or homologation. She does not appear to have taken anything by the mutual deed to which she had not right independently altogether of that deed. The only act of hers which can be referred to as an adoption of the mutual deed was her confirming as executrix under that deed. But I cannot hold that the expeding a bare title in that way—especially as it is not proved or even said that she was at the time aware of her legal rights—is sufficient to support a plea of adoption or homologation. A similar plea, in circumstances more favourable for it, was disregarded in the case of Borthwick v. Scott, July 21, 1724 (M. 6149). Nor do I suppose that any reliance was placed on such a plea in the present case, seeing that no special reference is made to it in any of the questions submitted for judgment. The point, indeed, was not even noticed in argument till after it had been suggested by the Court as possibly arising under the 7th article of the special case.

In regard to the only remaining point requiring notice, viz., the effect of Mrs Nielson's last deed of settlement, all that is necessary to say is that if my views on the other points are correct it necessarily follows that Mrs Nielson had the power, and did by her last deed of settlement exercise the power, of revoking the mutual disposition and settlement.

In these circumstances, I am of opinion, in answering the first question in the special case, that the antenuptial marriage-contract was not and could not be infringed upon or prejudicially affected by the mutual disposition and settlement; that in answer to the second question, the mutual disposition and settlement was wholly revoked by the disposition and settlement and relative codicil of dates 14th February and 29th May 1873; that in answer to the third question, that the whole estates of Mr and Mrs Nielson existing at the death of the latter fall to be disposed of in terms of the said disposition and settlement and relative codicil; and that the fourth question ought to be answered in the negative.

No. 117. LORD NEAVES concurred.

May 14, 1875. Rae v. Nielson.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion.

An antenuptial contract of marriage is the most onerous deed known in law, and fixes the rights of the married persons throughout the duration of the marriage.

Where there is no antenuptial contract questions may arise as to whether the provisions of any postnuptial settlement are reasonable, and where an antenuptial contract does exist, and a mutual settlement has been afterwards executed, the inquiry must be, not whether the provisions of this later deed are reasonable, but whether they differ from those of the antenuptial contract. The terms of the antenuptial contract, and the provisions therein, determine in all cases whether subsequent or substitutional provisions are or are not donations between the spouses.

The law in such a case has been clearly laid down by Erskine, b. i. tit. 6, sec. 29, where, after explaining what are donations, he proceeds :—"But where the interests of the husband and wife have been settled by antenuptial contract, postnuptial deeds are revocable, in so far as they either add to or diminish the provisions of the first contract without a valuable consideration on the other part; for every such provision, adding to the wife's prior settlement, is a donation by the husband to her, and every deed by which the wife renounces the least share of her former provision is a donation by her to the husband."

I have read this passage, because it has never been altered or called in question, and is an absolute rule of law which has never been derogated from.

In the present case we have an antenuptial contract, whereby the wife is made a creditor on the husband's estate, should she survive him, for the whole property left by him, heritable and moveable. In the event of her survivance the whole estate of the husband is to become the property of the wife in fee. The postnuptial mutual settlement, however, limits her interest from a fee to a liferent. Surely, according to the doctrine of Erskine, that is giving something up. In other words, she makes a donation to her husband, and such donation is revocable.

The fact that the husband is dead makes no difference as regards this donation by the wife; it remains a donation notwithstanding, and is revocable during the life of the donor.

So strongly, however, does an antenuptial contract settle the rights of the parties to it that the wife cannot deprive herself of her rights under it, or of any of the protections or safeguards, such as trusts, which the antenuptial marriage-contract provides. That was decided in the recent case of Menzies (supra, p. 507).

It is clear, then, that the wife here had an undoubted right to revoke the postnuptial mutual settlement, in so far as it derogated from the antenuptial contract. I think she effectually did so by her final settlement, and accordingly that deed must regulate the whole succession.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the opinions expressed.

The first question, as has been pointed out, perhaps does not raise the real matter intended to be decided. I think that our finding, in answer to the first question, should be that the antenuptial contract was not effectually "altered" by the mutual settlement of March 1857.

No. 117.
May 14, 1875.
Rae v. Nielson.

The only doubt I ever entertained was as to the effect of the widow's confirmation under the mutual settlement, whether it did not raise a jus quæsitum tertio to the beneficiaries; but as the widow took nothing under that deed to which she was not entitled otherwise I do not think the confirmation can be held to have the effect contended for.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords are of opinion, and find (1) that the antenuptial marriage-contract of date 3d December 1838 was not effectually altered by the mutual disposition and settlement of date 2d March 1857 so as to prevent the widow from subsequently revoking that deed; (2) that the said mutual disposition and settlement was validly and wholly revoked by the disposition and settlement and relative codicil dated respectively 14th February and 29th May 1873; (3) that the estate which belonged to Mr and Mrs Nielson or either of them at the date of the dissolution of their marriage falls to be disposed of under and in terms of the said last-mentioned disposition and settlement and codicil; (4) that the second party is not entitled to the liferent of the subjects provided to him by the said mutual disposition and settlement: Find the parties of the first part entitled to the expenses incurred by them in connection with the special case," &c.

J. C. & A. STEUART, W.S.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 118.
May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

JAMES HOULDSWORTH, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh. ALEXANDER BRAND'S TRUSTEES AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Alison.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease, resumption of—Minerals—Clause.—A mineral tenant qualified his lease by a minute of agreement in which it was provided that in the event of his death the landlord might resume possession of the minerals if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the tenant. The tenant died, and the minerals were worked by trustees for a year after his death, when the landlord intimated his dissatisfaction with their working, and his intention of resuming possession. The trustees refused to remove, in respect (1) that there was no ground for dissatisfaction, and (2) that the landlord was acting in mala fide. Held, on a consideration of a proof and correspondence (1) that it was not necessary for the landlord to state his grounds for dissatisfaction, and (2) that the trustees had failed to prove mala fides on the landlord's part.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. I.

IN November 1867 Mr Henry Houldsworth of Coltness let to Jonathan Hyslop and Robert Brand and their heirs the Greenhead ell coal and fireclay in a portion of his estate of Coltness, for a period of nineteen years, at a fixed minimum rent of £1000, or in his option for certain specified lordships.

Hyslop and Brand entered into possession of the mineral field, but after some time they disagreed and became involved in a litigation in the Court of Session. Ultimately it was arranged that their partnership should be dissolved, and that Hyslop should retire from the concern. Brand then applied to Mr James Houldsworth, who had succeeded to the estate of Coltness upon the death of his father, Mr Henry Houldsworth, to be continued as sole tenant of the minerals. Mr Houldsworth consented to this, upon Brand entering into a minute of agreement, which was dated 5th October 1869. This minute proceeded on the narrative of Hyslop and Brand's disagreement, and Brand's desire to be acknowledged as sole tenant, and provided—"First, that on the event of the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease the landlord is hereby empowered, if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery and other subjects of the lease, at a valuation as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand." The other provisions referred to the possibility of Mr Brand's health failing, and to the mode in which the valuation was to be taken.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

Brand continued to work the colliery and minerals under the lease and minute of agreement until September 1871, when owing, as Mr Houldsworth and his advisers said, to the improper working of the colliery by him the pit was flooded by a large quantity of liquid moss. Mr Houldsworth, after a meeting with Brand as to the removal of this moss, wrote on 11th October 1871 a letter to Brand, in which he agreed to allow a deduction on the lordships in consideration of Brand removing the moss. To this letter Brand appended a holograph acceptance. Brand worked the colliery under the lease, agreement, and last-mentioned letter until January 1873, when he died. He left a trust-deed, in which he directed his trustees, inter alia, to hold and work the Greenhead colliery for behoof of his son Robert, who was in minority.

Robert Brand junior died on 3d July 1873, being still a minor, and Alexander Brand, Robert Brand senior's immediate younger brother, came forward, as the nearest heir-at-law to the two Robert Brands, and claimed the heritable estate in that capacity. Alexander Brand died on 6th November 1873, leaving a trust-deed, under which he conveyed his whole estate to certain trustees. After Robert Brand senior's death the colliery was conducted by his trustees until 19th January 1874, when, by arrangement among the parties, it was handed over to the care of Alexander Brand's trustees, who continued to work it.

On 3d February 1874 Mr Houldsworth's agents, Messrs Murray, Beith, and Murray, W.S., Edinburgh, wrote by his instructions to the trustees of Robert Brand senior, Robert Brand junior, and Alexander Brand, intimating that Mr Houldsworth was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and intended to resume possession of it under the provisions of the agreement of 5th October 1869. The trustees, however, disputed Mr Houldsworth's right to resume possession, and accordingly Mr Houldsworth raised this action to have declarator of his right to enter on and resume possession of the minerals, and for decree of removal.

Alexander Brand's trustees defended the action.

Mr Houldsworth averred that the lease had been originally granted in reliance on the skill and experience of Hyslop, and that Robert Brand senior was not possessed of such skill. He also stated, that "since the death of the said Robert Brand senior the pursuer felt, and had just cause for feeling, serious dissatisfaction with the manner in which the colliery was carried on; and this dissatisfaction, and the causes of it, have been growing ever since, and exist down to the present time. Either from the inability of the said representatives to fulfil the tenant's part of the said lease and agreement, or in consequence of the deaths within so short a period of the said Robert Brand senior, the said Robert Brand junior, and the said Alexander Brand, and the subsequent disputes and litigations, the said colliery has not been and is not now carried on with any proper energy or attention, nor is the tenant's part of the stipulations of the lease duly fulfilled. While it was of great importance that the output should be kept up, so that the pursuer should be enabled to receive the lordships contemplated by the said lease, the representatives of the said Robert Brand have, since his death, permitted the output very seriously to decline, to the great loss and injury of the pursuer. Further, beneath the ell coal let to the said Robert Brand there are the main and splint coals, which are let on lease to the Coltness Iron Company, who are retarded in their working by the inefficient manner in which the ell coal workings are and have been carried on by the said representatives, and are consequently making serious complaints to the pursuer, and are claiming damages from the pursuer on account of their being retarded in their workings through the inefficient progress of the defenders. For the same reason the pursuer is also deprived of the lordships which he would earn if the Coltness Iron Company were permitted duly to prosecute their work. Moreover, in consequence of the existing disputes and litigations between and among the representatives of the said Robert Brand, the pursuer has no responsible person with whom he can deal in regard to the said colliery, or from whom he can secure implement of the stipulations of the said lease, none of the defenders having any experience or knowledge of colliery working. Further, the representatives of the said Robert Brand have not fulfilled the stipulations of the said letter of 11th October 1871 in regard to the removal of the moss from the colliery workings, whereby serious loss has been caused to the pursuer."

No. 118.
May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

The trustees denied the accuracy of these averments, and stated that they had employed a thoroughly competent manager, and had conducted the colliery in the most approved manner, so that Mr Houldsworth could have no grounds whatever for dissatisfaction. They further stated,—"The defenders have ascertained, and aver, that negotiations for a transfer of the lease have been opened between the pursuer and a third party, whose name at present is unknown to the defenders; and he has raised the present action not in consequence of any bona fide dissatisfaction with the defenders' management of the works, but in the hope of being enabled to carry out these negotiations, and so secure the bonus, goodwill, or price of the lease, instead of allowing the defenders to transfer the lease to William Robertson, or some other suitable or competent person, and receive the price agreed on between them."

On 30th June 1874 the Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof of their averments.

Evidence was led, the result of which is given in the Lord Ordinary's note and the opinions of the Judges.

Mr Houldsworth was himself examined as to the grounds of his dissatisfaction, which he summarised as follows:—"My reasons for being dissatisfied were, that I did not consider the colliery was worked with proper energy and attention; the output diminished; the moss was not removed,—is not, I believe, to this day; the Coltness Company could not get on with their workings below; and there was no proper head with whom I could deal and communicate beyond the underground manager." It appeared that Mr Houldsworth had been in treaty with a Mr Robertson as to taking a lease of the colliery at an increased lordship and fixed rent before he gave notice to the trustees of his dissatisfaction with their working.

On 15th January 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by minute of agreement, dated 5th October 1869, entered into between the pursuer, proprietor of the estate of Coltness, and the late Robert Brand, coalmaster, Wishaw, with reference to the lease of Greenhead colliery, then current, and which had been granted to the said Robert Brand, and Jonathan Hyslop, coalmaster, Wishaw, it was provided, inter alia, that in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand, the pursuer was thereby empowered, if he so wished, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery, and other subjects of the said lease of the Greenhead colliery at a valuation as therein provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery: Finds that the said Robert Brand died on 26th January 1873: Finds that in exercise of the powers conferred on him by said minute of agreement the pursuer, by letter dated 3d February 1874, sent by his directions and authority by his agents to the defenders, intimated that he was dissatisfied with the working of the said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and had resolved to resume possession of the colliery in accordance with the power to that effect contained in said minute of agreement: Finds that the defenders have failed to instruct that the pursuer was not at the date of the said notice truly dissatisfied with the working of said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and that the said notice was not given by the pursuer in bona fide: Therefore decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Ordains the defenders to concur with the pursuer in taking steps for having a valuation of the plant and machinery connected with the colliery, including waggons, if any, ascertained in terms of the said minute of agreement, and decerns ad interim: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.*

No. 118.

May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

---

* "NOTE. . . . .—By the minute of 5th October 1869 the pursuer, in consideration of his agreeing to accept the late Robert Brand as sole tenant under the lease of the ell coal in the lands of Greenhead, then current between him and Mr Brand and Mr Hyslop, was empowered 'in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease, . . . if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery and other subjects of the lease at a valuation as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand.'

"This clause undoubtedly gives very extensive power to the landlord. Before the agreement was entered into, serious differences had arisen between Mr Brand and his partner Mr Hyslop, which had resulted in litigation; and Mr Brand was evidently anxious to secure the lease entirely to himself, so far as the landlord was concerned, and prepared to make important concessions with this object. The pursuer, on the other hand, was apprehensive, in consequence of Mr Brand's state of health, that the colliery might not be conducted with sufficient energy, and it was a matter of great consequence to him to have the coal rapidly worked out, not only for the return of rent or lordship to be got from the colliery itself, but also because, until that coal was worked out the Coltness Iron Company, his tenants in the lower seams, which are of considerable value, were almost at a stand with their operations, and considerable loss was taking place from this cause. For this reason he stipulated that in a certain contingency he should be entitled to resume possession of the colliery even during Mr Brand's life, and that in the event of Mr Brand's death he should have the same power, if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery; and these terms were agreed to.

"The effect of this stipulation, on the terms of which the present case turns, was to empower the landlord to resume the colliery and take possession of the plant at a valuation as therein provided, if at any time he was himself dissatisfied with the working of the colliery by the tenant's representatives succeeding after

Alexander Brand's trustees reclaimed. At advising,—

M ., 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is one not only of some complexity as to the facts, but also of novelty in regard to the nature of the condition contained his death. The tenant consented to the question of dissatisfaction on the landlord's part being left to the determination of the landlord himself, and did not require or stipulate for any judgment or determination by a third party as arbiter. No question was to be submitted to a disinterested person as referee. The landlord was accepted as the arbiter in the matter in which he was himself interested.

"It has been maintained for the tenants that as the exercise of the landlord's power under the agreement is challenged by them the landlord is bound to shew by sufficient evidence that reasonable grounds existed for his dissatisfaction, and that if the Court should be of opinion that he was acting unreasonably, or without sufficient grounds, he is not entitled to exercise the power. I cannot, however, adopt this view. By the agreement it has not been left either to the Court or to any other party than the pursuer to say whether sufficient grounds for dissatisfaction in point of fact exist. Persons may fairly differ in opinion on such a question. One person may be satisfied with grounds of dissatisfaction which, in the opinion of others, are quite insufficient. The landlord may deem certain grounds of dissatisfaction as sufficient which the Court or an arbiter might think insufficient; but as to this, provided he is acting honestly and in good faith, he is by the terms of the agreement the sole person to decide. The Court may be of opinion on the proof that when the notice was given good reasons for dissatisfaction did not exist; but the question to be solved is, not whether such reasons existed, or whether the Court shall be of opinion that such reasons existed, but whether the pursuer was truly dissatisfied with the working of the colliery on grounds satisfactory to his mind. If this was the case, the pursuer is entitled to resume the lease.

"There is no dispute as to the meaning of the words 'the working of the colliery.' Neither party contends that they are to be read in the limited sense of referring to the underground operations in the colliery. They plainly refer generally to the carrying on of the business, including not only the underground working, but the output and sale or disposal of the coal.

"The pursuer, on 3d February 1874, intimated that he was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and required the defenders to give up possession. This notice must be accepted, in the first instance, as sufficient to enable the pursuer to exercise the power which the agreement gives him. For the reasons I have stated the defenders, on disputing the effect of the notice, are not, I think, entitled to have the case decided on the issue whether the landlord had reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction. The issue on which the case turns must, I think, be, 'was the landlord, when he gave the notice, in point of fact dissatisfied with the working of the colliery.' On this point the defenders allege (answer to cond. 18) that the pursuer has raised the present action not in consequence of any bona fide dissatisfaction with the defenders' management of the works, but in the hope of being able to carry out certain negotiations with another party, and so as to secure a bonus, or goodwill, or price for the lease. This averment amounts to a denial of the truth of the pursuer's notice, that he was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and an averment that he had given the notice, not in bona fide, or because of dissatisfaction with the working of the colliery, but entirely for the purpose of gain to himself.

"In consequence of this averment proof became necessary; and in disposing of the proof it appears to me that the pursuer having formally intimated his dissatisfaction by the notice of 3d February, the onus lies on the defenders to instruct their defence, as I have now stated it. In order to succeed, the defenders must, I think, shew that the notice was untrue, in so far as it bore that the

No. 118. May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

in the minute of agreement of 5th October 1869 between Mr Houldsworth and the late Robert Brand. That condition is as follows:—"That in the event of pursuer was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery. If, in fact, he was so dissatisfied, it appears to me that his right to resume possession of the colliery cannot be affected by the circumstance that he had at the time, as appears to be the case, arranged to let the coal on terms more advantageous to himself than were contained in Mr Brand's lease. Assuming that he was really dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and was to resume the lease, he was entitled to let the coals to a new tenant on the most advantageous terms he could obtain.

"I do not think it necessary to enter very fully on a consideration of the evidence which has been adduced. The pursuer has distinctly deponed that, when the notice of 4th February was given, he was in fact dissatisfied with the working of the colliery. At that time fully a year had elapsed from the date of Mr Brand's death. In the meantime the colliery had been in the hands of the trustees, who had carried on the operations and business until 3d July 1873, in the hope that Mr Robert Brand jun., the original tenant's only son, would be able to take up the lease. On that date, however, Mr Robert Brand jun. died, before attaining majority. The right to the lease then devolved on Alexander Brand, a brother of the original tenant, but while the colliery was still under the management of Robert Brand's trustees he also died, on the 5th of November 1873. Questions had arisen between Alexander Brand and his brothers and sisters in regard to the rights of succession to the late Robert Brand, the original tenant, and his son. These questions were arranged under an agreement by which Alexander Brand had undertaken to collate the heritage with them, including the right to the lease in question. At Alexander Brand's death it was found that he had left a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of trustees, to whom the trustees of the original tenant, Robert Brand, transferred the colliery on 19th January 1874; and Alexander Brand's trustees were in possession of the colliery and carrying on the business when the pursuer's notice was given.

"The pursuer in his evidence states the reasons of his dissatisfaction with the working of the colliery to have been that the output had diminished considerably, and that there had also been a failure to remove a quantity of moss which had burst into the workings, and which the tenant had bound himself to remove under an agreement contained in letters between the parties dated 11th October 1871; that he was of opinion that there was a want of energy in the carrying on of the colliery, and that it was also a cause of dissatisfaction to him that the work was in the hands of a body of trustees and that there was no practical man at the head of the concern with whom he could deal. The parole proof adduced by the pursuer clearly corroborates his evidence; and if the case had stood there it would, I think, have presented no question raising any difficulty. The defenders' evidence was directed to shew that every effort had been made to carry on the operations at the colliery with proper skill and attention, and that they had raised and disposed of as much coal as was in their power; and I may say that I think the evidence shews that the mineral workings were properly carried out, and that the defenders—at least the defenders, the trustees of Robert Brand—made considerable exertions in order to make the most of the business. The question, however, being whether the defenders have thereby succeeded in shewing that the pursuer was not, in point of fact, dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, the evidence now referred to plainly does not establish this.

"Referring, in the meantime, specially to the period between the beginning of November 1873 and the landlord's notice of February 1874, the proof contains not only the evidence of the pursuer to the effect that he was dissatisfied during that period, and that his adviser Mr Landale, and his factor Mr Bain, entertained the same feeling, but also the evidence of Mr Landale and Mr Bain to this effect. In addition to these it is proved by John Brand, one of the de-

the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease the landlord is hereby empowered, if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of fenders, and by Mr Bain, that at Martinmas 1873 Mr Bain complained of the want of output at the colliery. Mr Andrew, the defenders' cashier, refers to a similar complaint. And Mr William Robertson, another of the trustees, who was himself for sometime in negotiations with the landlord for taking over the colliery, states that in the end of 1873 Mr Bain expressed a wish to him that the colliery should be placed in his hands in order that it might be carried on with energy, which he understood Mr Bain to consider was wanting in the management of the trustees, and with his acquiescence the letter dated 16th December 1873 was written by Mr Bain to the trustees' agent, intimating that 'the present miserable output from the pits renders it necessary for the landlord to interfere very shortly' unless the trustees should have the matter wound up. There are two letters by Mr Bain to the pursuer, dated 2d and 4th January 1874 respectively, which contain expressions calculated to convey to the pursuer the impression that there was much want of energy in carrying on the colliery, and that this was Mr Bain's opinion. The evidence which I have thus generally noticed is, in my opinion, sufficient to shew that dissatisfaction in the working of the colliery did exist in the pursuer's mind at the date of the notice, even if it were incumbent on the pursuer to instruct this as matter of fact by evidence beyond the notice.

"Against this evidence the defenders rely on the terms of a number of letters which were produced on their call at the close of their proof by Mr Beith, the landlord's agent, consisting of communications passing between Mr Landale, Mr Bain, and the pursuer. It was not without difficulty that I admitted these documents at the stage of the case at which they were called for. But in a case in which the question really is, what was the state of the pursuer's mind when the notice was given, and in which the pursuer must obviously have been influenced to a great extent by the communications made to him by his factor and mining engineer on matters which were necessarily beyond his own observation, it appeared clear that such letters might have an important bearing, and that injustice might be done if they were not admitted. It is very unfortunate, however, that the call for these letters was not made before the proof began, for it was certainly the duty of the defenders, if they meant to found on such documents as part of their case, to have had them in process before the proof, or at least to call on the parties to bring them to the trial, and in any view to have made the correspondence the subject of cross-examination of the parties to it. In consequence of the lateness of the call the parties were allowed to give their evidence very much on mere recollection without reference to documents which would have refreshed their memory, and it may be to some extent have modified the terms of their depositions. In so far as disadvantage arises in disposing of the case on the proof, from the stage at which the documents were put in, I think that disadvantage must rest entirely with the defenders. It was suggested that it was not clear to the defenders that they had right to recover the documents until the pursuer had been examined, but I see no ground for this. In a case in which the bona fides of the pursuer was challenged, I should have had no doubt the defenders were entitled to recover the communications with the landlord and his factor and mining engineer, from whom he derived most of his information as to the working of the colliery. . . . .

"The defenders maintain they have established a want of bona fides on the pursuer's part, by the evidence shewing that the pursuer, before giving the notice, had evidently made the best bargain he could for reletting the colliery; that he let it for a higher lordship, and on an obligation by the new tenant to undertake the litigation which he had reason to expect would ensue with them. It appears to me, however, that the evidence as to this new arrangement is not entitled to the effect which the defenders seek to attach to it. Believing, as I do, that the pursuer, when he gave the notice of 3d February, was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and was therefore resolved to resume the lease, entered into between the pursuer, proprietor of the estate of Coltness, and the late Robert Brand, coalmaster, Wishaw, with reference to the lease of Greenhead colliery, then current, and which had been granted to the said Robert Brand, and Jonathan Hyslop, coalmaster, Wishaw, it was provided, inter alia, that in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand, the pursuer was thereby empowered, if he so wished, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery, and other subjects of the said lease of the Greenhead colliery at a valuation as therein provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery: Finds that the said Robert Brand died on 26th January 1873: Finds that in exercise of the powers conferred on him by said minute of agreement the pursuer, by letter dated 3d February 1874, sent by his directions and authority by his agents to the defenders, intimated that he was dissatisfied with the working of the said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and had resolved to resume possession of the colliery in accordance with the power to that effect contained in said minute of agreement: Finds that the defenders have failed to instruct that the pursuer was not at the date of the said notice truly dissatisfied with the working of said colliery by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, and that the said notice was not given by the pursuer in bona fide: Therefore decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Ordains the defenders to concur with the pursuer in taking steps for having a valuation of the plant and machinery connected with the colliery, including waggons, if any, ascertained in terms of the said minute of agreement, and decerns ad interim: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.*

No. 118. May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

---

* "NOTE. . . . .—By the minute of 5th October 1869 the pursuer, in consideration of his agreeing to accept the late Robert Brand as sole tenant under the lease of the ell coal in the lands of Greenhead, then current between him and Mr Brand and Mr Hyslop, was empowered 'in the event of the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease, . . . if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of the colliery and other subjects of the lease at a valuation as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand.'

"This clause undoubtedly gives very extensive power to the landlord. Before the agreement was entered into, serious differences had arisen between Mr Brand and his partner Mr Hyslop, which had resulted in litigation; and Mr Brand was evidently anxious to secure the lease entirely to himself, so far as the landlord was concerned, and prepared to make important concessions with this object. The pursuer, on the other hand, was apprehensive, in consequence of Mr Brand's state of health, that the colliery might not be conducted with sufficient energy, and it was a matter of great consequence to him to have the coal rapidly worked out, not only for the return of rent or lordship to be got from the colliery itself, but also because, until that coal was worked out the Coltness Iron Company, his tenants in the lower seams, which are of considerable value, were almost at a stand with their operations, and considerable loss was taking place from this cause. For this reason he stipulated that in a certain contingency he should be entitled to resume possession of the colliery even during Mr Brand's life, and that in the event of Mr Brand's death he should have the same power, if he should at any time be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery; and these terms were agreed to.

"The effect of this stipulation, on the terms of which the present case turns, was to empower the landlord to resume the colliery and take possession of the plant at a valuation as therein provided, if at any time he was himself dissatisfied with the working of the colliery by the tenant's representatives succeeding after

Alexander Brand's trustees reclaimed. At advising,— No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is one not only of some complexity as to the facts, but also of novelty in regard to the nature of the condition contained his death. The tenant consented to the question of dissatisfaction on the landlord's part being left to the determination of the landlord himself, and did not require or stipulate for any judgment or determination by a third party as arbiter. No question was to be submitted to a disinterested person as referee. The landlord was accepted as the arbiter in the matter in which he was himself interested.

"It has been maintained for the tenants that as the exercise of the landlord's power under the agreement is challenged by them the landlord is bound to shew by sufficient evidence that reasonable grounds existed for his dissatisfaction, and that if the Court should be of opinion that he was acting unreasonably, or without sufficient grounds, he is not entitled to exercise the power. I cannot, however, adopt this view. By the agreement it has not been left either to the Court or to any other party than the pursuer to say whether sufficient grounds for dissatisfaction in point of fact exist. Persons may fairly differ in opinion on such a question. One person may be satisfied with grounds of dissatisfaction which, in the opinion of others, are quite insufficient. The landlord may deem certain grounds of dissatisfaction as sufficient which the Court or an arbiter might think insufficient; but as to this, provided he is acting honestly and in good faith, he is by the terms of the agreement the sole person to decide. The Court may be of opinion on the proof that when the notice was given good reasons for dissatisfaction did not exist; but the question to be solved is, not whether such reasons existed, or whether the Court shall be of opinion that such reasons existed, but whether the pursuer was truly dissatisfied with the working of the colliery on grounds satisfactory to his mind. If this was the case, the pursuer is entitled to resume the lease.

"There is no dispute as to the meaning of the words 'the working of the colliery.' Neither party contends that they are to be read in the limited sense of referring to the underground operations in the colliery. They plainly refer generally to the carrying on of the business, including not only the underground working, but the output and sale or disposal of the coal.

"The pursuer, on 3d February 1874, intimated that he was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and required the defenders to give up possession. This notice must be accepted, in the first instance, as sufficient to enable the pursuer to exercise the power which the agreement gives him. For the reasons I have stated the defenders, on disputing the effect of the notice, are not, I think, entitled to have the case decided on the issue whether the landlord had reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction. The issue on which the case turns must, I think, be, 'was the landlord, when he gave the notice, in point of fact dissatisfied with the working of the colliery.' On this point the defenders allege (answer to cond. 18) that the pursuer 'has raised the present action not in consequence of any bona fide dissatisfaction with the defenders' management of the works, but in the hope of being able to carry out' certain negotiations with another party, and so as to secure a bonus, or goodwill, or price for the lease. This averment amounts to a denial of the truth of the pursuer's notice, that he was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and an averment that he had given the notice, not in bona fide, or because of dissatisfaction with the working of the colliery, but entirely for the purpose of gain to himself.

"In consequence of this averment proof became necessary; and in disposing of the proof it appears to me that the pursuer having formally intimated his dissatisfaction by the notice of 3d February, the onus lies on the defenders to instruct their defence, as I have now stated it. In order to succeed, the defenders must, I think, shew that the notice was untrue, in so far as it bore that the

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

in the minute of agreement of 5th October 1869 between Mr Houldsworth and the late Robert Brand. That condition is as follows:—"That in the event of pursuer was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery. If, in fact, he was so dissatisfied, it appears to me that his right to resume possession of the colliery cannot be affected by the circumstance that he had at the time, as appears to be the case, arranged to let the coal on terms more advantageous to himself than were contained in Mr Brand's lease. Assuming that he was really dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and was to resume the lease, he was entitled to let the coals to a new tenant on the most advantageous terms he could obtain.

"I do not think it necessary to enter very fully on a consideration of the evidence which has been adduced. The pursuer has distinctly deponed that, when the notice of 4th February was given, he was in fact dissatisfied with the working of the colliery. At that time fully a year had elapsed from the date of Mr Brand's death. In the meantime the colliery had been in the hands of the trustees, who had carried on the operations and business until 3d July 1873, in the hope that Mr Robert Brand jun., the original tenant's only son, would be able to take up the lease. On that date, however, Mr Robert Brand jun. died, before attaining majority. The right to the lease then devolved on Alexander Brand, a brother of the original tenant, but while the colliery was still under the management of Robert Brand's trustees he also died, on the 5th of November 1873. Questions had arisen between Alexander Brand and his brothers and sisters in regard to the rights of succession to the late Robert Brand, the original tenant, and his son. These questions were arranged under an agreement by which Alexander Brand had undertaken to collate the heritage with them, including the right to the lease in question. At Alexander Brand's death it was found that he had left a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of trustees, to whom the trustees of the original tenant, Robert Brand, transferred the colliery on 19th January 1874; and Alexander Brand's trustees were in possession of the colliery and carrying on the business when the pursuer's notice was given.

"The pursuer in his evidence states the reasons of his dissatisfaction with the working of the colliery to have been that the output had diminished considerably, and that there had also been a failure to remove a quantity of moss which had burst into the workings, and which the tenant had bound himself to remove under an agreement contained in letters between the parties dated 11th October 1871; that he was of opinion that there was a want of energy in the carrying on of the colliery, and that it was also a cause of dissatisfaction to him that the work was in the hands of a body of trustees and that there was no practical man at the head of the concern with whom he could deal. The parole proof adduced by the pursuer clearly corroborates his evidence; and if the case had stood there it would, I think, have presented no question raising any difficulty. The defenders' evidence was directed to shew that every effort had been made to carry on the operations at the colliery with proper skill and attention, and that they had raised and disposed of as much coal as was in their power; and I may say that I think the evidence shews that the mineral workings were properly carried out, and that the defenders—at least the defenders, the trustees of Robert Brand—made considerable exertions in order to make the most of the business. The question, however, being whether the defenders have thereby succeeded in shewing that the pursuer was not, in point of fact, dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, the evidence now referred to plainly does not establish this.

"Referring, in the meantime, specially to the period between the beginning of November 1873 and the landlord's notice of February 1874, the proof contains not only the evidence of the pursuer to the effect that he was dissatisfied during that period, and that his adviser Mr Landale, and his factor Mr Bain, entertained the same feeling, but also the evidence of Mr Landale and Mr Bain to this effect. In addition to these it is proved by John Brand, one of the de-

the death of the said Robert Brand during the currency of the lease the landlord is hereby empowered, if he so wishes, to enter on and resume possession of

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

fenders, and by Mr Bain, that at Martinmas 1873 Mr Bain complained of the want of output at the colliery. Mr Andrew, the defenders' cashier, refers to a similar complaint. And Mr William Robertson, another of the trustees, who was himself for sometime in negotiations with the landlord for taking over the colliery, states that in the end of 1873 Mr Bain expressed a wish to him that the colliery should be placed in his hands in order that it might be carried on with energy, which he understood Mr Bain to consider was wanting in the management of the trustees, and with his acquiescence the letter dated 16th December 1873 was written by Mr Bain to the trustees' agent, intimating that 'the present miserable output from the pits renders it necessary for the landlord to interfere very shortly' unless the trustees should have the matter wound up. There are two letters by Mr Bain to the pursuer, dated 2d and 4th January 1874 respectively, which contain expressions calculated to convey to the pursuer the impression that there was much want of energy in carrying on the colliery, and that this was Mr Bain's opinion. The evidence which I have thus generally noticed is, in my opinion, sufficient to shew that dissatisfaction in the working of the colliery did exist in the pursuer's mind at the date of the notice, even if it were incumbent on the pursuer to instruct this as matter of fact by evidence beyond the notice.

"Against this evidence the defenders rely on the terms of a number of letters which were produced on their call at the close of their proof by Mr Beith, the landlord's agent, consisting of communications passing between Mr Landale, Mr Bain, and the pursuer. It was not without difficulty that I admitted these documents at the stage of the case at which they were called for. But in a case in which the question really is, what was the state of the pursuer's mind when the notice was given, and in which the pursuer must obviously have been influenced to a great extent by the communications made to him by his factor and mining engineer on matters which were necessarily beyond his own observation, it appeared clear that such letters might have an important bearing, and that injustice might be done if they were not admitted. It is very unfortunate, however, that the call for these letters was not made before the proof began, for it was certainly the duty of the defenders, if they meant to found on such documents as part of their case, to have had them in process before the proof, or at least to call on the parties to bring them to the trial, and in any view to have made the correspondence the subject of cross-examination of the parties to it. In consequence of the lateness of the call the parties were allowed to give their evidence very much on mere recollection without reference to documents which would have refreshed their memory, and it may be to some extent have modified the terms of their depositions. In so far as disadvantage arises in disposing of the case on the proof, from the stage at which the documents were put in, I think that disadvantage must rest entirely with the defenders. It was suggested that it was not clear to the defenders that they had right to recover the documents until the pursuer had been examined, but I see no ground for this. In a case in which the bona fides of the pursuer was challenged, I should have had no doubt the defenders were entitled to recover the communications with the landlord and his factor and mining engineer, from whom he derived most of his information as to the working of the colliery. . . . .

"The defenders maintain they have established a want of bona fides on the pursuer's part, by the evidence shewing that the pursuer, before giving the notice, had evidently made the best bargain he could for reletting the colliery; that he let it for a higher lordship, and on an obligation by the new tenant to undertake the litigation which he had reason to expect would ensue with them. It appears to me, however, that the evidence as to this new arrangement is not entitled to the effect which the defenders seek to attach to it. Believing, as I do, that the pursuer, when he gave the notice of 3d February, was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and was therefore resolved to resume the lease, the colliery and other subjects of the lease, at a valuation as afterwards provided for, if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand." Then there is another condition with which we have no concern at present, as it was only to come into operation in the event of Mr Brand falling into a state of health incapacitating him from attending to business. And then there is the farther provision that "in the event of the first party or his successors in the Coltness estate entering on possession of the said colliery in either of the foregoing referred to contingencies he will have right to acquire from the second party or his representatives full possession of the said colliery and lease referred to, without any process of law being used or necessary, together with the whole pits, plant, and others connected with the same, including waggons belonging to and leased by the second party, as soon as the value of the latter can be fixed and ascertained, and the amount paid to the second party, or his representatives." Now, the landlord says that the first of these contingencies has occurred—that he is dissatisfied with the mode of working the colliery by Mr Brand's representatives—and that consequently he is entitled, on a valuation, to enter into possession of the colliery, and of the plant, waggons, &c.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

The answer to that demand of the landlord is twofold. First, that the construction of the clause of the agreement above quoted requires not merely that the landlord shall be dissatisfied with the working, but that he shall be able to allege and prove a sufficient ground for his dissatisfaction. I am of opinion that this contention is not sound. The condition is not that the tenant is bound to remove on a third party, whether an arbiter or otherwise, being satisfied that the landlord has good grounds for being dissatisfied. The condition is simply that he shall remove on the landlord being dissatisfied. It is impossible for us to add to that condition anything which we do not find in the contract. Second, the actual fact that the landlord is dissatisfied is denied, and the defenders aver that he only pretends to be dissatisfied, and is using his right under the agreement as a pretext for getting rid of them without true and just cause. The Lord Ordinary has so far sustained the relevancy of this defence as to allow a proof, and on the proof being led he has found that the defenders have failed to instruct this averment.

My opinion is that where a condition is made to depend upon the opinion or conviction of one party to a mutual contract, his announcement of that opinion or conviction is meant to be conclusive. You cannot go behind it. It is controlled only by the conscience of the individual. The fact to be determined here is whether the landlord is dissatisfied, and, as nobody can tell but himself so as to take it from the defenders, he was entitled, in arranging for another tenant, to make the best bargain he could; and he seems to have stipulated that the working should be energetically carried on.

---

"The pursuer, at the close of the proof, objected to the title of the trustees of Alexander Brand to take up and hold the colliery, and thereupon Alexander Brand's eldest son and heir, a pupil, was sisted as a party by minute and interlocutor of 9th December last. This meets the pursuer's objection. The fact remains, however, that the tenant is a pupil, and that his tutors are persons unacquainted with mining business, and further, that they are carrying on the colliery really for the benefit of the trust; and all this affords an additional element which the pursuer was entitled to have before him, and seems indeed to have had in view, in coming to the conclusion to give notice."

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

whether he is dissatisfied or not, his own deliberate expression of his dissatisfaction must be accepted as absolute. It is quite a different matter where the question whether the landlord has just ground for dissatisfaction is referred to the determination of an arbiter. But where the condition depends on consent, approval, satisfaction, or the reverse,—things in fact which depend on the mind of an individual,—I doubt whether it is a relevant allegation to send to a proof at large that the individual did not really consent, approve, was not really satisfied, or the reverse. The parties were satisfied to leave this matter to the conscience of the landlord; that was their contract.

But the defenders support their case by attempting to prove that Mr Houldsworth is using his right here in mala fide, to further private ends; and therefore, although that is the impression I have on the construction of this clause, I am not sorry that the Lord Ordinary has followed the course which he did, because I have come to the clear opinion that not only have the defenders failed to shew that this is a dishonest attempt to take advantage of the clause, but I am satisfied that Mr Houldsworth has entirely vindicated his action in this matter. It seemed to be thought that because Mr Houldsworth thought he could make a better bargain if the lease came to an end, therefore he was actuated by a dishonest motive in the course which he took. That, I think, is entirely fallacious. Of course Mr Houldsworth would not give effect to his dissatisfaction unless he thought he was to be benefited by it. He might be dissatisfied, but he might be entirely powerless to make a better bargain than the one he had with his existing tenant, and therefore the fact so much founded on, that he had a better offer, so far from tending to weaken Mr Houldsworth's position, is the very groundwork of it. He takes advantage of this condition because he thinks it is for his benefit to do so. But in regard to the working of the colliery it is quite clear that he was subject to very serious and considerable disadvantages. There were three matters in which unquestionably the existing lease was to his prejudice, so far as the tenant who had the working of the colliery was concerned. In the first place, he had to deal with representatives, and not with a principal. It seemed to be argued that this was not a reason for dissatisfaction within the words of the clause, but I do not agree with that. I think the working of the colliery meant the whole method in which the colliery was carried on; and the fact that there was no principal with whom the landlord could communicate was a material inconvenience, which was not removed and was not affected by there being a skilled manager appointed by the trustees. As he had not an individual interest in the colliery he was not in the same position as a responsible tenant. In the next place, there was the unquestionable fact that the output was diminishing. It is said that this was not the fault of the tenant. It is of no moment whether it was the fault of the tenant or not; it was a ground of dissatisfaction with the existing working of the colliery which Mr Houldsworth was quite reasonably entitled to consider as raising the question whether the lease should continue or not. And, lastly, there was that most important element, that there were two separate leases of the two seams of coal, which more and more as the working went on came into collision with each other, and that the Coltness company could not carry on their operations with the rapidity which was necessary for the landlord's advantage as long as the other lease was in the hands of Mr Brand's representatives. The tenants, it is true, said that they could not get waggons, and it was the want of waggons that prevented them from working as fast as they might otherwise have done. That might be; but does it follow that the landlord may not be dissatisfied with that state of matters, and hope to remedy it by putting the lease into other hands? I think not, and therefore, on the whole matter, without going into the details of the evidence, I am of opinion that even if the landlord had required to prove reasonable cause for dissatisfaction he has done so.

No. 118. May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

I cannot conclude my observations without saying that I think there has been, to say the least of it, very great laxity in the way part of the evidence has been put in. The letters between Mr Houldsworth and Mr Bain, in the first place, should not have been produced or admitted at the stage at which they were without Mr Houldsworth and Mr Bain being both put into the box by the party adducing the correspondence. Certainly as regards Mr Bain's letters, being the letters of a third party,—not a party to the suit,—they are not evidence of anything.

I think we should adhere.

LORD NEAVES.—I have arrived without difficulty at the same conclusion. The case is of importance both to the parties and to the law in reference to a lease of this peculiar kind. The general principles applicable to the case are not, I think, attended with much difficulty. But I am not quite satisfied with the way in which the case has been matured. I think it was scarcely advisable to pronounce the interlocutor of 30th June 1874 in the terms in which it is expressed, particularly as it is not qualified by the usual expression "before answer." I am not disposed to decide on any abstract question, or to do more than is necessary for putting the case on a right foundation. In particular, I do not think it necessary to determine whether such a clause as this may or may not be got behind by proving, habili modo, that there is a mere fraudulent pretence of dissatisfaction, where no dissatisfaction truly exists. I do not say that if that could be proved I should be prepared to give the landlord power, in such circumstances, of putting an end to the lease as if he were dissatisfied. If, for instance, there existed documents under his own hand, declaring he was not dissatisfied, but quite well satisfied, and merely said he was dissatisfied for the purpose of giving the lease to some favourite tenant,—if there was any such case, we might or might not remedy it. But there is nothing of that kind here. On the contrary, we have the landlord appearing and affirming on oath that he was dissatisfied. The word "dissatisfied" admits of considerable latitude. It may mean that he was not satisfied, because a man is dissatisfied when he is not satisfied. That is one form and a very serious form of dissatisfaction. A man may see that a thing is not working well, but he may not be able to point to the particular matter which is the cause of the mismanagement. Here there is a falling off in the output, which is a most material circumstance; and there are many things which obviously were natural sources of non-satisfaction or dissatisfaction; and I must say that Mr Houldsworth is entirely free from any suspicion that he was not acting in an honourable and fair manner to these parties. There has not been an approach to proving that it was a mere pretence; and when once you find the sincere feeling of a man's mind, and that he had probable cause for acting in a particular way, I do not see that, in the circumstances of the case, the matter can come under our jurisdiction. Upon these grounds, which are virtually adopted by the Lord Ordinary—though he goes a little further—I concur in the view which your Lordship has taken. I see nothing in the case to make me doubt that the termination of the lease has been made in good faith. I concur in the remarks your Lordship has made as to the admission and use made of the letters, and altogether in the result at which you have arrived.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have arrived at the same opinion, and without any difficulty. I think it of importance to keep in view that, in regard to this mineral lease, the tack was originally conceived in favour of two parties, Brand and Hyslop, and that there is evidence to the effect that Hyslop was the individual chiefly relied upon. Then I find that while it is granted to these two individuals and their heirs, it is not given to the survivor of them and his heirs. I think that of some importance, because it leads at once to the explanation of how it was that the minute of agreement of 1869 was entered into. Hyslop, and Brand, his co-tenant, got into disputes, and while they were in dispute the minute of agreement, which is dated in October 1869, was come to between the landlord and Mr Brand; and it expressly bears to proceed upon the consideration that the landlord was to accept of Mr Brand as sole tenant, the latter having got rid of Mr Hyslop. Now, the landlord was not bound to do that, and, for anything we see to the contrary, things may have got into such a position that, if it had been in the least desirable for the landlord, he had it in his power then, if he had pleased, to have got rid of these parties altogether. But he does agree, on the application of Brand, to accept of him as sole tenant, although Hyslop, the co-tenant, was the individual who clearly, according to some of the evidence in the case, was originally chiefly relied upon. It is upon a consideration of that circumstance that the particular stipulation or clause in the agreement on which the present discussion has turned was made a part of it.

Now, it is pretty obvious that the clause is differently expressed from any of those clauses that are said to be analogous or similar in any of the cases that were cited; and I have not been able to discover any decided case in which there was a similar clause. It is very peculiarly expressed, and it is not very easy to ascertain exactly what the parties intended by it. The peculiarity of the terms in which it is expressed probably arose from its not having been framed by a professional man, for it would rather appear to have been made out by Mr Bain, who, although evidently a man of very considerable intelligence, was probably little skilled in the framing of formal writs. Be that, however, as it may, it is undeniable that the clause in question is very peculiar, and that it is not very easy to understand what its true interpretation is. It bears that, in the event of the death of Robert Brand during the currency of the lease, the landlord was empowered, if he wished, to enter on or resume possession of the colliery, &c. The contingency of Robert Brand dying during the currency of the lease is referred to as entitling the landlord, if he pleased, in place of allowing his heirs or representatives to take up the lease during the remainder of its natural endurance, to resume for himself possession of the colliery. It is obvious therefore that, looking at the clause so far as I have now referred to it, all the landlord had to do was to express his resolution to put an end to the lease. But there are other parts of the clause which require attention, for it goes on to provide for the representatives of Robert Brand taking up the lease and carrying on operations under it. This portion of the clause is somewhat differently expressed from the first part, for it bears that if he, the landlord, should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the said Robert Brand, he should be entitled, on giving notice in a particular way, and on certain valuations being made, to resume possession. Now, what is the meaning of his being dissatisfied? If it was that he required to instruct good and sufficient reasons for his dissatisfaction, or, in other words, if he required to shew that the colliery was not properly worked, that would raise an issue of fact which could only be determined judicially, if not otherwise adjusted. But the terms of the clause are, "if he shall be dissatisfied." Now, I cannot doubt that the views expressed by both your Lordships on this subject are correct, and that we must hold it was put into the power of the landlord himself to say he was dissatisfied, and so put an end to the lease. All he had to do was to satisfy himself that things were not going on well, and to intimate that he was dissatisfied.

No. 118.
May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

But the defenders state, in answer to the 18th article of the condescendence, "that the landlord has raised the present action, not in consequence of any bona fide dissatisfaction with the defenders' management of the works," &c. In consequence of that allegation I am disposed to think the Lord Ordinary followed the right course in allowing a proof, for the statement is to the effect that the defenders undertook to prove that although intimation had been given by the landlord that he was dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, he, in point of fact, was not dissatisfied, and that his statement of dissatisfaction was a mere pretence put forward in mala fide. I can conceive circumstances in which this might be established. Suppose that in this very case, where there has been an exhaustive diligence, under which there has been recovered and put into process every scrap of correspondence or writing that bears on the matter, and suppose, farther, that there were letters or correspondence between Mr Houldsworth, on the one hand, and Mr Bain and Mr Landale and Mr Beith, on the other, in which Mr Houldsworth distinctly stated to these parties, or some of them, that he had a sinister object to accomplish by getting quit of the tenants and putting an end to the lease,—desiring, it might be, to give the benefit of the lease to another party, one of his own family, while at the same time he was quite sensible that everything was conducted in an unobjectionable manner by Brand's representatives, and that things could not be better managed,—if such a case as that were proved by writing under the pursuer's own hand, it might very well be maintained that he was not acting in bona fide when he gave the intimation which he did give in February 1874. It is certainly not very likely that such a case would occur, and most undoubtedly it has not occurred here. For, looking at the proof, I am unable to find any ground whatever on which the defenders' allegations of mala fides can be supported. On the contrary, there is a great deal of evidence not only to shew that Mr Houldsworth was dissatisfied, but that he had sufficient grounds for his dissatisfaction. We have this most material circumstance, that there was a diminution of the output. No doubt it is said in excuse by the tenant that he could not get waggons, and there is some evidence that he was hampered by the railway company in regard to getting waggons, but that of itself might be a reason for dissatisfaction to the landlord. It was most material for him to get the coal put out in as large a quantity as possible, so as to be in possession of his lordship, but he could not get that accomplished. And the proof shews that Mr Houldsworth had reasons for thinking that if the lease was in other hands waggons would have been got in sufficient number so as to allow of a larger output. It is also very obvious that there was ground for dissatisfaction on the part of Mr Houldsworth in the fact that the colliery was now in the hands of trustees and of a pupil, and that there was no proper head; and though Mr Anderson appears to have been unobjectionable in his management underground, a great deal more had to be done than that. For example, Mr Anderson, while engaged under ground, could not attend to that most material matter, the obtaining of a sufficient number of waggons. There were also other grounds of dissatisfaction, and instead of its being proved that Mr Houldsworth acted in mala fide, I think it clear that he was indulgent and forbearing. It is true that Mr Bain in some of his letters appears to have been satisfied with the working of the colliery, and especially with the operations of Mr Anderson, the underground manager, but still it is very important to keep in view that during the few months immediately before the notice was given—after the death of Mr Alexander Brand—satisfaction was not expressed even by Mr Bain with the operations, but, on the contrary, there are letters in which, about that time, he expressed to Mr Houldsworth his dissatisfaction.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

In regard to Mr Houldsworth's having acted throughout in perfect good faith, it ought to be also noticed that there are two letters which, to my mind, are quite conclusive on the point. On the 1st of August 1873, when the negotiations between Mr Houldsworth and Mr Bain and Mr Beith had commenced with a view to terminating the lease, Mr Houldsworth writes to Mr Bain,—"In what position is Brand's colliery? Has Beith written? and, if so, what? Nothing must be done unfair to Brand's heirs, and anything Beith does in my name must be done at the request of the Coltness Iron Co." That is stated by Mr Houldsworth in a letter to his own manager, and nothing, I think, could indicate more completely the good faith of Mr Houldsworth in this matter. And in his anxiety to avoid the risk of anything being done unfairly or harshly to Brand or his representatives he again, in his letter of 22d August to Mr Bain, repeats,—"It would be much the best for the Iron Co. to make a previous arrangement with the heirs and trustees if possible; if not, and they wish me to take any action, 1st, Mr Beith must assure me that I can properly do so under the agreement, and, 2d, the Iron Co. must relieve me of all expense." Accordingly, Mr Houldsworth would not proceed to give intimation without the advice of his law-agent, Mr Beith, who was made acquainted with everything, and Mr Beith acted cautiously and prudently, as might have been expected, in the advice he gave. And, acting on that advice, intimation was postponed for a considerable time, till at last matters came to such a crisis in February 1874 as to satisfy Mr Beith and Mr Houldsworth that intimation could be no longer delayed. For the reasons I have now stated I concur in the proposed judgment, which I understand is to the effect of an adherence in substance to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but perhaps there should be an additional finding to the effect that Mr Houldsworth, when the intimation was given, had sufficient grounds to be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to be of the same opinion, and, latterly, without any doubt whatever. The question turns upon the true import and meaning and upon the legal effect of the clause in the minute of agreement of 5th October 1869. The agreement was to the effect that the landlord, instead of his two tenants, Brand and Hyslop, accepted Mr Brand senior alone as the sole tenant, but stipulated that he, the landlord, should, in certain events, have a power to resume and terminate the lease. There are two of these provisions relative to the resumption of possession by the landlord which are very material, and I think the latter one, which has not been fully founded upon, throws light upon the first, which has been the main subject of contention between the parties. The second provision is to take effect during old Brand's life, and it declares that if he shall become unwell and be absent from the colliery, and if, during any period of six months, the output shall fall below £2000, then the landlord, if he so wishes, may put an end to the lease even during old Brand's life. There are here two conditions, first, the condition of the illness of Brand, combined with the falling of the output below £2000 in the half year; and, second, the landlord has the power to declare the lease at an end if he so wishes, —an option is given to the landlord—an absolute power if he chose—to terminate the lease, and this will be enough if it concurs with the other two matters.

No. 118.
May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

But then Brand might die and another set of circumstances arise, for which provision is also made in the lease, though this is placed before the condition I have just alluded to. The provision is that if Brand should die and be succeeded by executors or representatives then the landlord, if he so wishes, and if he is dissatisfied, for I read the two ifs together—I think the two things must concur—if Brand shall die, and if the landlord shall be dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and wish to put an end to the lease, then he may do so. Now, it is under this clause, and in the circumstances for which it provides, that the question has arisen here. Brand died, and was succeeded by successive representatives, and the landlord ultimately came to be first dissatisfied with the working of the colliery, and second, desirous to put an end to the lease. There is no dispute about his being desirous to put an end to the lease. It was a mere option on his part. He is not bound to put an end to it, even though dissatisfied. He has exercised the option given to him, and the dispute really is, was he dissatisfied in the sense of the provision in the lease. What is the true legal meaning and effect of the clause which provides for putting an end to the lease "in the event of the landlord being dissatisfied with the working?" Now, I am of opinion that this provision has reference solely to the mind of the landlord. The condition is not as to the actual working or state of the working of the colliery, but as to the mind of the landlord. Is he or is he not dissatisfied with the working? I do not doubt that the parties might get beyond the mere statement of dissatisfaction, and shew that the dissatisfaction with the working was merely simulated and was not real, but to do that I think the averments of the defenders must come up to an averment of mala fides or of fraud on the part of the landlord. I prefer the word "fraud" rather than "mala fides," because I think it must come up to that. The landlord must be proved to be merely pretending dissatisfaction without really feeling it; and unless the defenders can make out that the landlord is (as one of your Lordships has said) telling a lie, saying he was dissatisfied when he really was not, the defence must fail. Now, if that is the sole question of fact, I can only come to one conclusion on the evidence. I think the landlord has acted in perfect bona fide throughout all this negotiation. It is a very serious allegation which the defenders must undertake to establish against the landlord. I think it is an allegation of fraud, and the defenders cannot succeed in their defence without proving that the landlord is acting fraudulently,—that he is using this clause not for the true purpose and not in the true sense which the parties intended it, but for another purpose altogether, and without the real state of facts having arisen on which alone the lease was to be put an end to.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875.
Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

I do not need to go into the evidence, because it really cannot be contended that a case of fraud has been made out. I put it to the Dean, in the course of the argument, whether he held upon the evidence that fraud was proved, and he rather avoided putting the issue as if it were so. He did not wish to accuse Mr Houldsworth of fraud, but I do not see how he could avoid that if he has a case at all. If Mr Houldsworth was perfectly sincere in expressing his dissatisfaction, and if that was his true state of mind at the date when he gave the notice, it seems to me to be quite enough; for it is his dissatisfaction, and not the dissatisfaction of the Court or of Mr Landale, or any third party, to which reference is made; it is the dissatisfaction of the landlord himself. Now, turning to the landlord's evidence, it is impossible to doubt that, if he is to be believed, he was much dissatisfied with the state of the working at the date of the notice, and is so still. He expressly swears that. The issue really is, whether he was or was not dissatisfied; and in order to prove the negative of the issue the defenders would require to prove that the landlord was merely pretending or simulating dissatisfaction while he had no such feeling, and so was actually forsworn. I cannot face that issue, and look at the evidence, without coming to the conclusion on all grounds that the defenders have not made their case out. Not only does the landlord swear to his dissatisfaction, but he gives very good reasons for that dissatisfaction; and although it is not the question for the Court to determine whether these reasons are well founded or not, still, when the sincerity and bona fides of the landlord are impugned, it is important to see that his alleged dissatisfaction was not unreasonable and groundless. Whether he had sufficient grounds for his dissatisfaction is not the question at all. That would have been the issue (as Lord Ormidale pointed out) if the clause had been expressed that the landlord might put an end to the lease if the colliery were not well conducted. But that is a totally different issue from the issue really raised, whether the landlord is or is not dissatisfied with his tenant. Now, the reasons which the landlord gives he puts in five particulars. He says, at page 5 of his evidence,—"My reasons for being dissatisfied were that I did not consider the colliery was worked with proper energy and attention; the output diminished; the moss was not removed,—is not, I believe, to this day; the Coltness company could not get on with their workings below; and there was no proper head with whom I could deal and communicate beyond the underground manager." Now, suppose all these reasons were bad reasons, they still may have had such force in Mr Houldsworth's mind as to create dissatisfaction, and that is enough in this case; for if the parties refer to the conscience of the landlord being really and truly dissatisfied, effect must be given to the bargain which they themselves have made. It is true Mr Houldsworth was not intimately conversant with many grounds on which he founded his dissatisfaction, but that only removes the case one step, for he was entitled to take and be guided by the opinion of the advisers in whom he had confidence. It is plain that Mr Landale had told him that he was not satisfied, and Mr Bain was not satisfied. Now, Mr Houldsworth was entitled to go upon the advice of those in whom he had confidence as to this matter, and if he believed Mr Landale, his own adviser, and was dissatisfied in consequence of the opinion which he received from that gentleman, and if he really came to this conclusion fairly and honestly, I think this is enough to determine the case. If that is to be overcome by putting it to the Court whether they would be dissatisfied in consequence of Mr Landale's statement, or, in the whole circumstances now disclosed, it would be changing the issue altogether, and making the termination of the lease to depend not on Mr Houldsworth's dissatisfaction but on the dissatisfaction of the Lord Ordinary or the Court. I think that, after every possible light has been thrown on the subject by the proof, after perusal of all the documents that have been recovered, after the disclosure of the landlord's most intimate negotiations with his own engineer and his own agent, mala fides has not been established against Mr Houldsworth, but on the contrary, I think the proof and the whole private documents demonstrate his bona fides. Lord Ormidale has read part of the letters, which shew that he was very careful to do nothing hastily, but to be fully satisfied in his own mind that he had good grounds for putting an end to the lease. Therefore it cannot be said that it was a mere pretence to put an end to the lease. These documents disclose a very careful and conscientious proceeding on the part of Mr Houldsworth in order to be quite sure that he had grounds for dissatisfaction, and they shew that time was given which might possibly remove these grounds before he availed himself of the clause in the minute of agreement enabling him to put an end to the lease. Therefore, viewing the issue as being whether the notice was given fraudulently and in mala fide, I can come to no other conclusion, and I do so with perfect confidence, than that the defenders have failed to instruct the affirmative of that issue.

No. 118.

May 18, 1875. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees.

THE COURT adhered.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—ALEX. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 119.

May 21, 1875. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

ALEXANDER ROBB, Pursuer.—Scott—Young.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF LOGIEALMOND, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Keir.

School—Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. c. 62), sec. 60—Process—Relevancy.—A parish schoolmaster, appointed before the Education Act, 1872, was removed by the school board, under sec. 60 of the Act, proceeding on a report by an inspector that there were no pupils in attendance at the school, and that the schoolmaster was unfit for the office of schoolmaster in that parish, and his application for a retiring allowance was refused without a reason being assigned. In an action against the board by the schoolmaster claiming a retiring allowance he averred that the scarcity of scholars was caused by decrease of population, by political feeling, and by sectarian rivalry, which led the inhabitants to support other schools. The Court remitted to the school board to specify the ground of their resolution to refuse the pursuer a retiring allowance, if they still adhered to it. The board adhered to their refusal, and specified as the ground of it the pursuer's inefficiency, caused by his extreme indolence, culpable neglect of duty, and general misconduct, "as proved by the complete absence of scholars, and substantiated by the evidence of the inhabitants of the district." Held that, in the face of this resolution, the pursuer's averments were not relevant, and defenders assoilzied, but without expenses, as they had not at first assigned any reason for refusing an allowance.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

SEQUEL of case reported ante, p. 417.

The pursuer lodged a minute of amendment, in which he alleged as causes of the small attendance at the school the smallness of the population in proportion to the number of schools, and that the other schools were more conveniently placed in the centres of population, and that the population was decreasing, and had decreased by one-third since 1858, and that the school had been farther injured by sectarian rivalry and political feeling, leading the inhabitants to support other schools.

No. 119.
May 21, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

THE COURT, without deciding on the relevancy of the amended record, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before further answer, remit to the school board of Logiealmond to reconsider their resolution of 29th October 1873 refusing the pursuer a retiring allowance, and, if they adhere thereto, to specify in their resolution the ground of such refusal."

The school board met on 27th April 1875 and unanimously "resolved to adhere to the resolution contained in their former minute of 29th October 1873, to refuse Robb a retiring allowance; and, in obedience to the deliverance by the Court, the meeting specified, and hereby specify, the pursuer Robb's inefficiency as the ground of their refusal, that inefficiency being occasioned by his extreme indolence, culpable neglect of his duties as a teacher, and general misconduct, as proved by the complete absence of scholars, and substantiated by the evidence of the inhabitants of the district."

A copy of the minute of this meeting was produced to the Court.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case of Robb v. the School Board of Logiealmond we gave opinions on 5th February last differing from those of the Lord Ordinary, and holding that a schoolmaster dismissed under the 60th section of the statute might have right to a retiring allowance although his case did not fall within the category of old age or infirmity, and we continued the case that the pursuer might give us some more definite statement as to the cause why he was dismissed. He did amend his record, but there was no statement in the minutes of the school board as to the grounds of dismissal. We then determined to remit to the school board to specify the grounds of their refusal to grant a retiring allowance. We have now before us a minute of the school board, in which they state,—"In obedience to the deliverance by the Court, the meeting specified, and hereby specify, the pursuer Robb's inefficiency as the ground of their refusal, that inefficiency being occasioned by his extreme indolence, culpable neglect of his duties as a teacher, and general misconduct, as proved by the complete absence of scholars, and substantiated by the evidence of the inhabitants of the district."

Now, if the schoolmaster had received this deliverance before his original dismissal, I should have thought that we had a strong case against the schoolmaster, and we would have required a very strong case on his side to have got the better of it. The board are entitled to take into account the grounds on which the dismissal had taken place in deciding whether they would grant a retiring allowance. The ground stated, if well founded, will prevent him from having a right to a retiring allowance. The school board, if they think fit, may still grant him an allowance. But the only question is, whether Robb has made statements which can form the subject of inquiry. I think that is out of the question. One prominent fact is that the school of which the pursuer was the schoolmaster has for some time been a school without a scholar. Any attempt

No. 119. to do away with this fact has absolutely failed. I am therefore bound to come to the conclusion that the schoolmaster has no case.

May 21, 1875.
Robb v. Logie and School Board.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. I adhere to what I said on a former occasion, that the onus ought not, in the first instance, to be laid on the schoolmaster to prove that he is not in fault. But the circumstances here are peculiar. The school is absolutely without a scholar. That fact, I think, calls for explanation from the schoolmaster, and I agree with your Lordship that the schoolmaster here has failed to give any satisfactory or even intelligible explanation of it. On the other hand, we have now a distinct deliverance from the school board stating the grounds upon which they have proceeded. I by no means say that there might not have been a case stated for the schoolmaster, which, even in the face of such a deliverance, ought to be admitted to proof. But the presumption against him here is very strong, and I am satisfied that he has not made any relevant statements to meet it.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—When the case was before us last session we had nothing to guide us as to the claim for a retiring allowance beyond a statement by the school board that the pursuer was removed, on the report of an inspector, for inefficiency, it being the fact that there were no pupils in attendance at the school. Confessedly the master had been competently and rightly removed. But as the school board had simply declared the teacher to be inefficient, without saying any more, we were all of opinion that we had not the explanation necessary. It is possible that there may be a case in which a master is entitled to a retiring allowance, although removed for inefficiency, if the inefficiency was not occasioned by any fault of his own. Now, however, that the school board have explained the matter, and stated by a regular minute that the pursuer's inefficiency has been occasioned "by his extreme indolence, culpable neglect of his duties as a teacher, and general misconduct," I think it would require a very special and peculiar case to be stated on his part to overcome the effect of that minute, and open the door to any farther inquiries. Nothing approaching to such a case has been stated by the pursuer, and I have no doubt that the judgment proposed is the right one.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, for there are not, I think, set forth on the record, even as amended, any facts and circumstances relevant and sufficient to get the better of the inferences to be deduced from the broad and admitted fact that, for a considerable period prior to the dismissal of the pursuer, there had been no pupils attending his school. This absence of scholars being admitted, it would, in my opinion, require some much more distinct and specific averments in explanation of the reason why no pupils have attended the school than those here made to warrant us in allowing the pursuer a proof to traverse the grounds of dismissal as now laid before us by the board.

The defenders moved for expenses.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No. I think when a school board refuse a retiring allowance they should state their reasons.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur in that observation, which, I think, is very important.

No. 119.

May 21, 1875.
Robb v. Logiealmond School Board.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having resumed consideration of the reclaiming note for Alexander Robb, pursuer, against Lord Young's interlocutor of 18th November 1874, with the record as amended, and minute of the school board, dated 27th April 1875, No. 68 of process, reported to the Court in terms of the interlocutor of 20th March last, and heard counsel farther, refuse the said reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against."

GEORGE BEGG, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 120.

May 21, 1875.
Staig v. Johnston.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
M.

DAVID STAIG, Petitioner.—J. C. Smith.
PETER JOHNSTON, Respondent.—J. M. Gibson.

*Process—Reclaiming Note—*20 and 21 Vict., c. 56*—Court of Session Act,* 1857, sec. 10.—The Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in disposing of petitions for factors, &c., during vacation, under sec. 10* of the Court of Session Act, 1857, does not exercise his Bill-Chamber jurisdiction, but merely acts in place of the Junior Lord Ordinary, and his interlocutors must be reclaimed against within eight days.

ANDREW CLARK, S.S.C.—MACNAUGHTON & FINLAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 121.

May 25, 1875.
Jamieson v. Forrest.

GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON AND ANOTHER, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
JOHN CLARK FORREST (Trustee on S. S. Robertson's Estate), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—R. V. Campbell.

Bankrupt—Cautioner—Ranking.—Although a cautioner for the debt of a person who has become bankrupt will not be allowed to rank on the bankrupt's general funds for his loss as cautioner when the creditor has already been ranked for the full debt, if the cautioner holds a lien over any special fund belonging to the bankrupt his right to full indemnity therefrom will not be affected by the ranking of the creditor.

Bankrupt—Cautioner—Ranking—Security.—Held that a person holding a lien over a portion of a bankrupt's estate in security of advances made to him, and against risks and loss through a cautionary obligation undertaken for the bankrupt, was entitled to apply the security in the first instance to extinguish his loss through the cautionary obligation.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

THIS was an appeal by George Auldjo Jamieson, C.A., and James Auldjo Jamieson, W.S., against a deliverance by John Clark Forrest, trustee on Stewart Souter Robertson's sequestrated estate, on claims lodged by the appellants.

The following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note:—"The appellants are admittedly creditors of the bankrupt in respect of two bills dated 14th May 1874, the one for £2000 and the other for £700, and amounting, with interest, as at the date of the sequestration, to £2731, 14s. 6d.

"The claimants are also admittedly cautioners for the bankrupt in a bond for £2000, granted by him to Mr William Burnett.

---

* "The Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation shall have the same powers in regard to petitions for the appointment of factors loco tutoris, curators bonis, and judicial factors as are by this Act conferred in relation thereto on the Junior Lord Ordinary as aforesaid."

No. 121.

May 25, 1875. Jamieson v. Forrest.

"It is also admitted that the claimants, at and prior to the sequestration, held, and that they still hold, on ex facie absolute and unchallengeable titles, certain moveable property belonging to the bankrupt, as specified in the foregoing interlocutor, for security, satisfaction, and relief of the debts owing to them by the bankrupt, and of the liabilities which they have incurred for his behoof.

"The main question raised in the present appeal is, whether they are entitled to apply these securities in relieving themselves of their liability to Mr Burnett under their cautionary obligation?

"It appears that Mr Burnett, in addition to the cautionary obligations of the claimants, held, in security of the debt due under the bond, certain policies of assurance on the life of the bankrupt. At the date of the sequestration, the sum, with interest due on the said bond, amounted to £2033, 8s. 3d. Mr Burnett realised by the surrender of the policies £172, 2s. 9d., leaving a balance due under the bond of £1861, 5s. 6d., for which he has claimed and been ranked in the sequestration as an ordinary creditor, and on which he will receive a dividend of 3s. 6d. per £, amounting to the sum of £325, 14s. 6d. The debt due under the bond will thus be reduced to £1535, 11s., and for that sum he has a claim against the claimants as cautioners.

"The claimants, as creditors of the bankrupt in virtue of his two acceptances above mentioned, have claimed to be ranked as ordinary creditors for the amount thereof, £2731, 14s. 6d., under deduction of the value of the securities held by them. But they propose, in the first instance, to apply these securities, to the extent of £1535, 11s., in relief of their cautionary obligation to Mr Burnett, and to deduct from their debt only the balance of the value of the securities. And as the total value of the securities is £1660, 19s. 8d., it follows that only £125, 8s. 8d. will be available as a deduction from the claim on the bills, if the claimants are entitled to apply the securities in the manner proposed.

"The trustee maintains that they are not entitled so to apply the securities, because he thinks that by doing so the cautioners would virtually be ranking upon the general funds for £1535, 11s., which sum was included in the ranking of Mr Burnett, the principal creditor, for £1861, 5s. 6d."

The trustee issued the following deliverance:—"The trustee rejects the claim as lodged, for the following reasons, viz.:—(1) The claimants are not entitled to deduct from the amount of their securities the sum in which they may ultimately be found liable as co-obligants with the bankrupt to Mr William Burnett under the bond to him for £2000. Mr Burnett has ranked upon the bankrupt estate for the amount of his bond, and if the present claim were allowed it would in effect be paying the full amount of Mr Burnett's debt out of the bankrupt's estate. The trustee holds that all claim upon the bankrupt's estate in respect of Mr Burnett's debt is exhausted by Mr Burnett ranking. It would have been open to the claimants to have required and obtained from Mr Burnett an assignation to the debt on payment of the amount thereof, and in virtue thereof to have entered a claim on the estate; but the trustee holds that they are not entitled to take credit for it, or profit by it in any other way." . . .

The claimants appealed.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal, and recalls the deliverance of the trustee appealed against: Finds that the claimants are co-obligants with and cautioners for the bankrupt in a bond for £2000 to William Burnett, which, at the date of the sequestration, amounted, with interest, to the sum of £2033, 8s. 3d., but in security of which Mr Burnett held an assignation to certain policies of insurance on the life of the bankrupt: Finds that Mr Burnett

No. 121.

May 25, 1875.
Jamieson v. Forrest.

realised the surrender value of said policies, amounting to £172, 2s. 9d., which reduced the amount due under the bond to £1861, 5s., for which sum he has been ranked in the sequestration, and will receive a dividend at 3s. 6d. per £, amounting to £325, 14s. 6d., whereby the liability of the claimants as cautioners foresaid will be reduced to £1535, 11s.: Finds that the claimants held at the date of the sequestration, and still hold, on titles ex facie absolute and unchallengeable, securities over certain shares and other assets of the bankrupt: Finds that the securities so held by the claimants consist of—(1) 600 £10 shares of the State Line Company, the value of which is £1485, 19s. 8d., being the value of said shares at £3, 10s. each, or £2100, less £614, 0s. 4d., being the amount of calls paid by the claimants; (2) claim on Lewis T. Merrow under his letter to the bankrupt guaranteeing said shares, the value of which is £50; (3) claim on the estate of L. T. Merrow and Company, in respect of a bill for £2500 granted by them to the bankrupt, and indorsed by him to the claimant George Auldjo Jamieson, in security of the claim of the claimants against the bankrupt, the value of which is £125, being an expected dividend from the estate of L. T. Merrow and Company of 1s. per £: Finds that in the value of said bill there ought not to be included the sum of £430, 18s. 1d., being the amount of an expected dividend on a separate claim in this sequestration made by the said George Auldjo Jamieson in respect of said indorsed bill of £2500, which claim has been rejected by the trustee: Finds that the true value of the whole securities so held by the claimants is £1660, 19s. 8d.: Finds that said securities are available to the claimants for extinction and relief pro tanto of all their lawful claims against and liabilities for the bankrupt, and that they are entitled to hold and apply the same, in the first instance, for their relief of the said balance of £1535, 11s., or for such other balance as shall be ultimately claimed from them by Mr Burnett under their foresaid cautionary obligation: Finds that on the assumption that the liability of the claimants under said cautionary obligation will amount to £1535, 11s., the value of the said securities available for payment or satisfaction of the other debts due to them by the bankrupt, and falling to be deducted from the claim of the claimants in respect of the bankrupt's acceptances to them for £2000 and £700, and interest, is £125, 8s. 8d.: Remits to the trustee to rank the claimants accordingly, and decerns: Finds the appellants entitled to expenses," &c. *

---

* "NOTE.—(After the narrative above quoted)—It appears to me that the trustee is mistaken in this view. If indeed the securities held by the claimants had been appropriated to the bill debts alone, to the exclusion of their cautionary liabilities,—in other words, if, as cautioners, they were mere unsecured creditors,—the trustee would have been right in refusing to allow them so to apply the securities, and they would not be entitled to rank upon the general estate for the amount of their liability. In the words of Mr Bell (Com. i. 348), 'If the creditor have already been admitted to rank on the funds of the bankrupt the cautioner is not also to be admitted.' But that doctrine is not applicable to the present case, where the cautioners hold securities over the bankrupt estate for their indemnification.

"For in a note to the foregoing passage Mr Bell says, 'It will be recollected, however, that the subject under discussion is only the claim of indemnification against the general fund. The cautioner may have security for his indemnification—(1) by heritable security; (2) by pledge or other security on moveables; (3) by retention or compensation. In all of these cases he will be entitled to a total relief so far as the security reaches.' This doctrine, which is obviously founded on clear principles of equity, appears to me to be conclusive against the contention of the trustee; and I therefore think that his deliverance must be

No. 121. The trustee reclaimed.

May 25, 1875. Jamieson v. Forrest.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, with the variation of inserting the words "in accordance with the foregoing findings," in place of the word "accordingly" in the remit to the trustee.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—ALEX. WYLIE, W.S.—Agents.

---

recalled, in so far as it refuses to allow the claimants to operate their relief from the cautionary obligation out of the securities held by them.

"This being so, it follows that the claimants are entitled to hold or apply their securities to the extent of £1535, 11s. in relief of their cautionary obligation, and that the sum which they are bound to deduct from their claim under the bills is only the sum of £125, 8s. 8d., being the balance of the total value of their securities after deducting the amount of the cautionary obligation.

"In their oath the claimants had valued their securities at the sum of £2091, 17s. 6d., in place of £1660, 19s. 8d., the true value. The error was pointed out by the trustee, and rectified in his deliverance. It arose in this way. One of the securities held by the claimants is a bill for £2500 granted by L. T. Merrow and Company to the bankrupt, and indorsed by him to Mr George Auldjo Jamieson, who, however, admittedly holds the bill not for any separate value but as an additional security to himself and his brother for the general liabilities of the bankrupt to them.

"Unquestionably that bill is a security which must be deducted from the present claim, in so far as any dividend shall be received upon the same out of the estate of Merrow and Company, and that expected dividend, amounting to £125, is accordingly included in the foresaid sum of £1660, 19s. 8d. as part of the securities held by the claimants. In the oath, however, the claimants value that bill at the further sum of £430, 18s. 1d., thus stating it as of the total value of £555, 18s. 1d. This was done because Mr Auldjo Jamieson, regarding the bankrupt's indorsation as a separate and independent obligation for £2500, had lodged a separate claim to be ranked for that amount, and had anticipated that he would receive a dividend of £430, 18s. 1d., which would certainly have increased the value of the bill as a security. But as the trustee has rightly rejected that separate claim, the bill for £2500 ought only to be valued as a security for Merrow's dividend of £125.

"The result of the whole matter thus comes to be, that as the total value of the securities held by the claimants amounts to only £1660, 19s. 8d., and as the claimants are entitled to deduct from that value £1535, 11s. sterling, the amount of their cautionary liability, the value which they must now deduct from the £2731, 14s. 6d. due under the bill forming the subject of the present claim is £125, 8s. 8d., leaving £2606, 5s. 10d. as the sum for which they are entitled to be ranked as ordinary creditors.

"I should add that at the debate the trustee stated (and he has now lodged a minute to the same effect) that if the claimants would cause Mr Burnett's claim to be withdrawn, and should themselves claim as in his right on the unpaid balance of £1861, 5s. 6d. due under the bond, he would allow the claimants to lodge such a claim, and he would rank them upon the estate to the full amount of £1861, 5s. 6d., and of the £2731, 14s. 6d. due under the bankrupt's two acceptances, in all for £4593, under deduction of the total value of the securities, £1660, 19s. 8d.; in other words, he would give a ranking as ordinary creditors for £2932, 0s. 4d. But the claimants declined to accede to that proposal, because they would thereby not obtain out of their securities that to which they are entitled, viz., relief of their cautionary obligation to the extent of these securities. They could not place themselves in the position proposed by the trustee without paying to Mr Burnett £1861, 5s. 6d., so that they would have to pay out a much larger sum than at present they can ever be called upon by Mr Burnett to pay, and they would do so with the certainty that they could not recover it out of their securities. Mr Burnett was not bound to demand, in the MARY HUME OR M'DONALD, Pursuer and Respondent.—Rhind.

DAVID M'DONALD, Defender and Appellant.—Balfour.

No. 122.

May 25, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment—Sheriff.—A married woman raised an action in the Sheriff-court against her husband for interim aliment until a permanent arrangement of the rights and interests of the parties should be made in a competent Court, on the ground that the pursuer was obliged to live separately on account of her husband's cruel conduct. It appeared from a proof that at the date of the action, and until a few days before the proof, the pursuer was living in her husband's house. Held that in the circumstances the action was incompetent in the Sheriff-court.

Observed (per Lord Deas), that in granting an interim allowance of aliment to a wife the Sheriff ought to fix a time at which the aliment should cease.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire on 16th December 1873 by Mary M'Donald, residing at 373 Bath Street, Glasgow, wife of David M'Donald, clothier, against her husband, concluding for interim aliment "aye and until a permanent arrangement of the rights and interests of the parties shall be made by a competent Court, with expenses, the pursuer being compelled to live separately from the defender by reason of the defender conducting himself towards her in such a harsh, cruel, and tyrannical manner as to endanger her health and life, and more particularly upon the 11th day of December current, within the house occupied by them at 373 Bath Street aforesaid, having struck her with his fists upon the face and other parts of her person to her serious injury and effusion of blood, and also having on various previous occasions ill-used her."

The record was closed on 30th December. On 23d January 1874 a proof was allowed. Evidence was led on 2d April, 30th May, 25th September, and 26th October. It appeared that the parties were married in October 1872, and had been on bad terms ever since, but they continued to live in separate rooms in a house of which the defender was the tenant, until about 17th March 1874, when the pursuer left the house.

On 5th December 1874 the Sheriff-substitute (Clark) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on the 11th day of December 1873, within the house occupied by them, the defender struck the pursuer with his hand on the head to the effusion of blood, and that she has since and is now living separate from him: Therefore decerns against him for the first instance, full payment of his debt from the cautioners; on the contrary, he was entitled, and morally bound, to go, in the first instance, against the bankrupt and his general estate. And it is only the deficiency, after deduction of the amount of his dividend, which he is entitled to demand from the cautioners. This he has done, and the general creditors have no title to complain that the bankrupt had, before his insolvency, lawfully given to these cautioners security available for their relief. If Mr Burnett, after claiming to be ranked on the estate for £1861, had called upon the claimants as cautioners to pay to him to account of their obligation the sum of £1535, 11s., and they had done so, the position of the parties would have been this, viz., that the cautioners would have recouped themselves out of these securities, while Mr Burnett would still have been entitled to rank upon the estate for the full amount of his debt, but only to the effect of enabling him to recover the difference between the full amount of his debt and the sum paid by the cautioners—(see Black v. Melrose, 2 D. p. 706). He would in that case have obtained precisely the same dividend as that for which he has now been ranked on. I do not see that the rights of the cautioners as holders of these securities can be altered by Mr Burnett having received that amount from the general estate before making the demand upon the cautioners."

---

No. 122.

May 25, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald.

sum of 12s. a-week in name of interim aliment for the maintenance and support of the pursuer, commencing payment of the said aliment as on the 11th day of December 1873, and so on weekly thereafter in advance, aye and until a permanent arrangement of the rights and interests of the parties shall be made by a competent Court: Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses."

The defender appealed, and the Sheriff (Dickson) adhered.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

He argued;—The Sheriff had no power to award aliment to a wife who was at the date of raising the action living in her husband's house. The proof did not disclose such a case of cruelty as would justify the pursuer in separating herself from her husband.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have had occasion more than once to express opinions on the powers of Sheriffs exercised in cases of separation and aliment in granting interim aliment. It is a useful jurisdiction, and one which I should be unwilling to interfere with if exercised in circumstances suitable for its operation. But there is great risk of the Sheriff interfering in cases where there is no necessity, and where he cannot approach the subject without trenching on ground which is only suitable for the supreme Court.

When this action was raised the pursuer was living in family with her husband in his house, which was the domicile of the marriage. It was an essential preliminary to granting aliment that she should prove her right to separation, and this she could only do by a consistorial process, an action of separation and aliment in this Court. It would have been quite different if the spouses had been long separate, or had been living separate under a joint arrangement. Then it might be supposed that the parties consented to an allowance being made to the wife. But so far from this being the nature of the case, the pursuer continued to live with her husband after defences were lodged, and after proof was allowed. Then, for the first time, when she considers herself safe of obtaining interim aliment, she thinks fit to leave the house. Nothing could more clearly illustrate the abuse of the power of granting interim aliment than the conduct of the pursuer here. It was just because she saw she was going to obtain her aliment that she left the house. I think that the action is incompetent under the circumstances, and should be dismissed.

LORD DEAS.—At the date when this action was raised, 16th December 1873, the pursuer was living in the house of her husband. The house was taken in his name as tenant, and he was liable for the rent. The only sense in which she says that she lived separate from him is that she did not sleep in the same bed, or live in the same room. That was plainly no proper separation. On 31st December, when the record was closed, and on 2d January when a proof was allowed, she was still living in the same house with her husband. She left on 17th March, and she has lived separate since that time. After she had so left, a diet of proof was fixed, and evidence led on 2d April, again on 30th May, again on 24th June, again on 25th September, and again on 26th October. On 5th December the Sheriff-substitute awarded a sum of interim aliment payable for all that time. I agree with your Lordship that this course of procedure was virtually converting this process into a process of separation and aliment, which is competent only in this Court. No. 122.

[1] Authorities.—Benson v. Benson, Feb. 14, 1854, 16 D. 555; Smith v. Smith, June 11, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 1010; M'Gregor and Barclay v. Martin, March 12, 1867, 5 Macph. 583, 39 Scot. Jur. 294.

May 25, 1875.
M'Donald v. M'Donald.

I should wish to make one other remark. The conclusion of the action is for aliment "aye and until a permanent arrangement of the rights of the parties shall be made by a competent Court," and the Sheriff-substitute has given effect to this conclusion in his interlocutor. This is a common form, and I do not therefore say that the Sheriff-substitute erred in adopting it. But I think that it would be much better if a time were limited within which, if an action of separation and aliment was not instituted, the interim aliment awarded should cease. This would tend very much to do away with the objections so frequently made to the course of these actions in the Sheriff-court.

LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt that actions of aliment by a wife against her husband, as contended for by the respondent, are competent in the Sheriff-court, but they are so, I conceive, only when brought for aliment ad interim, and when the parties are living separate. They are, moreover, summary processes, as pointed out by the authorities, and require to be carried on with more than ordinary despatch. In the present case, ex facie of the summons, the action appears to me to be relevant and competent, as it bears to be for interim aliment, and proceeds upon the allegation that the parties were separated, in consequence of the conduct of the defender. But that statement is not correct in point of fact, as it appears from the evidence that the parties were not separated at the date of the action in December 1873, but were living in the same house, and continued to do so down to the middle of March 1874. If, then, proof had been led in the case, as it ought, I think, to have been done in a summary proceeding, in January, or at latest in February 1874, it would have appeared that the parties were living in the same house at the defender's expense, and that the statement in the summons on which the relevancy and competency of the action depended was unfounded, and the result must, I think, have been either that the defender would have been assoilzied, or the action dismissed. But the proof was not begun till the 2d of April, three months after the record was closed, and was not concluded till the 26th of October, after several adjournments, and one of them for nearly four months, while the judgment appealed against was not pronounced till the 10th of February 1875, fourteen months after the date of the summons, which was raised in December 1873.

In the circumstances, therefore, as disclosed in the evidence thus led, negativing as the proof does the allegation as to the separate residence of the parties, on which the action proceeded, I concur with your Lordships that this action was incompetent. The remedy in such a case was plainly that of an action of separation and aliment in this Court, and had one been raised in December 1873 it would, I have no doubt, have been disposed of one way or other, at least by the Lord Ordinary, of an earlier date than that fixed for the first diet of proof in the Sheriff-court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff complained of: Find that when the action was raised in the Sheriff-court the pursuer and defender were living together in the defender's house: Find that they continued so to live together during the dependence of the action down to the 17th of March 1874, when the pursuer left the defender's house, and has since lived separate from him: Find that, in these circumstances, the action for aliment was and is incompetent; dismiss the said action, and decern."

No. 122.

May 25, 1875. M'Donald v. M'Donald.

WILLIAM KELSO THWAITES, S.S.C.—J. & R. D. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875. Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

GLASGOW CORPORATION WATER COMMISSIONERS, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark—M'Laren.

THE SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Rutherfurd.

Assessment—Income-Tax.—The Glasgow Water Commissioners were appointed under a local Act of Parliament, by which they were authorised to borrow money on annuities and mortgages, and to acquire the works of certain private water companies which had formerly supplied the city with water, and to bring in an additional supply of water. They were empowered to levy a compulsory rate within the municipal boundary, and also a rate on persons who chose to take the water outside the boundary, and to sell the water to manufacturers and others. The Act required the commissioners to levy a rate sufficient along with the other income to cover all annual expenses, including a sum of not less than one per cent on the money borrowed, to be accumulated as a sinking fund for redemption of the annuities and mortgages, and to be applied to no other purpose, any balance to be applied to reduce the rate of the following year. Held that the surplus after paying expenses was not assessable as profits under the Income-tax Acts.

1st DIVISION. B.

THIS case was presented by the commissioners acting under the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Acts against a determination of the commissioners for general purposes under the Property and Income-tax Acts for the City of Glasgow, in an appeal from an assessment of income-tax. The following facts were set out in the case:—"The Glasgow Corporation Water Commissioners appealed against a supplementary assessment made upon them under schedule D of the Income-tax Acts for the year 1872-73,[1] in respect of the sum of £17,032, 15s., on the ground that the sum charged, which is the surplus of the water-rates, after payment of all other current expenses necessary for carrying on the undertaking, has been applied, as directed by Act of Parliament, viz., towards the formation of a sinking fund in redemption of the annuities and mortgages, and the remainder of the sum carried forward to the following year's account, to be applied, as the Act directs, in reducing the domestic water-rate, and not therefore assessable.

"The facts are these:—By the Act 18 and 19 Vict., cap. cxviii., the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Glasgow were appointed commissioners to obtain a supply of water for the city of Glasgow and its suburbs, and as such commissioners were empowered to acquire, and have acquired, by purchase, the 'Glasgow Water-Works' and the 'Gorbals Gravitation Water-Works,' the two joint stock companies by which the city of Glasgow and its neighbourhood were previously supplied with water, together with power to introduce an additional supply of water from Loch Katrine.

"For these purposes they are authorised to borrow money by annuities, mortgage, and otherwise, and it is provided that the several sums so borrowed should be applied in defraying the expense of purchasing and acquiring lands and other property, and of executing the authorised works.

"They are required, by compulsory clauses in the Act, to furnish the city

[1] 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, sec. 60, No. III., rule 3d; 29 Vict. cap. 36.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875.
Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

of Glasgow, i.e., within the municipal boundaries, with a supply of water for domestic purposes, and to erect thirty-two public fountains, and the area within these boundaries is termed 'the limits of compulsory supply.'

"They are also required to introduce a supply to the suburbs within a prescribed area, embracing a very large population.

"They are also empowered to sell water for the purposes of trade, manufacture, &c., either by measure, or upon such special terms as may be agreed on between them and the consumer.

"They are also authorised to let meters on hire to those parties who consume by measure, and make a charge therefor of ten per cent per annum.

"Householders residing beyond the limits of compulsory supply are not required to take water, but having once done so, must continue to take it for three years, when they may cease doing so.

"To provide for the annual expense connected with carrying on these undertakings the water commissioners are required to meet once a year to make an estimate of the probable expense, and, having done so, are empowered to levy (1) A rate, to be called 'the domestic water-rate,' from the occupiers of all dwelling-houses within the municipal boundaries, being the 'limits of compulsory supply,' according to their rents; (2) The 'public water-rate,' not exceeding 1d. per pound on the full annual value of all dwelling-houses, shops, warehouses, buildings, &c., within the municipal boundary, and this rate is payable within these limits, whether the water supplied by the corporation be used or not; (3) Such rates as may be fixed by the commissioners from all parties residing beyond the limits of compulsory supply who use the water; but these rates are not to exceed the rates previously charged by the old companies.

"The sum to be thus raised, together with the sums received from traders and others supplied under special agreement, and for the use of meters, must be sufficient to cover all the annual expenses, including a sum of not less than one per cent on the money borrowed, to be set apart as a sinking fund for the redemption of the annuities and mortgages, and such sinking fund, it is declared, shall be from time to time applicable to the redemption of mortgages and annuities, and to no other purpose whatsoever; and the rates to be levied must be so regulated that such rates shall be sufficient to pay the interest on money borrowed, and the annuities payable under the Act, together with all other charges and expenses and such other sums as shall be set apart for the purpose of the sinking fund. And if in any year the amount received shall be more than sufficient for all these purposes the commissioners are required to make a reduction in the domestic water-rate of the next year.

"The appellants specially referred to sections 89, 90, 92, 109, 110, and 119 of the Act 18 and 19 Vict., cap. cxviii., 'Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act, 1855,' and they desire that these be held as part of their case.

"It was argued on behalf of the appellants that the case of the Attorney-General v. Black,[1] founded on by the Inland Revenue, was not analogous, because—(1) The question in that case was whether the corporation of Brighton were liable to pay income-tax in respect of a coal-duty levied by them, and it was held that the corporation were liable to pay income-tax in respect of the coal-duty. (2) The grounds upon which that decision proceed do not exist here. In that case the duty was of the nature of a toll, and was levied from whatever persons landed coals, whether inhabitants of Brighton or strangers. It was thus not a 'district-rate'—a rate levied from the inhabitants or owners or occupiers of property within a defined area. While the Court held the coal-duty to be taxable, they intimated clear opinions that any revenue which was truly of the nature of a 'district-rate' would not be taxable. (3) The question thus comes to be, whether the monies dedicated to the creation of the sinking fund and the surpluses are profits from carrying on the business of introducing water, or whether they are a 'district-rate.' The appellants submit that whether regard be had to their origin or application they are a 'district-rate.' The sinking fund is created to provide for reduction or repayment pro tanto of the sums borrowed for the purposes of the Act. (4) The rate is in the strictest sense for the public benefit within the particular district. The money is not of the nature of 'property or profits,' for another reason, viz., that it does not belong to any one for his patrimonial benefit, and that no one is enriched by it. The case is not varied by the fact that the appellants took over the undertakings of private water companies. These companies were undoubtedly commercial undertakings, established and carried on for the purposes of profit and for no other purposes; and accordingly their rates were fixed at such an amount as to yield a profit to the shareholders.

[1] 17th June 1871, Law Reports, 6 Exchequer, 308.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875. Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

"The appellants maintain that no valid argument against them arises from the fact that their statutes contain provisions for supplying water beyond the limits for compulsory supply. In a certain sense the supply of water even beyond these limits, but within the limits of the Act, is compulsory, inasmuch as section 86 of the Act of 1855 declares that the appellants shall cause pipes to be laid down and water to be brought to every part of the places and districts within the limits of the Act beyond the limits for compulsory supply whenever a sufficient requisition upon them to do so shall be made, and they are not entitled to make profit by such supply beyond, any more than within, the proper compulsory limit.

"The income, on which the city of London were held liable to be assessed in the case of the Attorney-General v. Scott,[1] was different from the rates levied by the appellants, and in that case the city were making large accumulations of money not appropriated by statute or otherwise.

"On behalf of the Inland Revenue it was replied;—(1) Whatever name may be applied to the water-rate it is certain that in its origin the water company was a commercial undertaking. It is so still, except that payment of rates under the old companies was not compulsory. The commissioners enter into contracts with traders and others to supply them with water on terms which may be mutually agreed on, and also let meters on hire, which are transactions of a purely commercial nature. The appellants are empowered to fix from time to time the rates to be levied without the limits of compulsory rating, but the rights of limitation of rates obtained by certain districts under the Acts of the companies existing in 1855 are still in force. So far, therefore, as the extra-municipal districts are concerned the Glasgow Water Commissioners are carrying on a commercial undertaking. A rate of this kind cannot legally be deemed a 'district-rate.' (6) The fact of the appellants being merely trustees, and personally deriving no gain or profit from their office, does not affect the question, Is there any surplus after deducting from the receipts all the ordinary expenses which are necessary for carrying on the undertaking?

"In the Attorney-General v. Scott, January 1874, the city of London were held liable for the tax on their income, just like an individual. In the case also of the Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. Overseers of Chirton,[2] and the Birkenhead Dock Trustees v. Overseers,[3] provision was [1] January 1874, 28 Law Times, 302.

[2] 1 Ellis and Ellis, 516.
[3] 2 Ellis and Blackburn, 148.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875.
Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

made by Act of Parliament for the application of the profits, in the formation of a sinking fund or otherwise, for the repayment of principal monies borrowed, and the Court did not regard that circumstance as affecting the question before it, but held that the profits constituted the income, which was the measure of the extent of the liability in respect of occupation for rating purposes.

"The commissioners, having considered the whole case, refused the appeal, and affirmed the assessment; but the appellants, being dissatisfied with that decision, craved a case for the opinion of the Judges."

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case stated for the opinion of the Court by the Commissioners of Property and Income-tax of the city of Glasgow. The Glasgow Corporation Water Commissioners were charged, under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, with duty upon profits to the amount of £17,032, 15s., arising for the year 1872-3 upon their undertaking; and they maintain that that sum of £17,032, 15s. does not consist of profits arising upon their undertaking, and is not assessable to income-tax under schedule D. For the purpose of answering this case it is necessary to attend very particularly to the constitution of this water corporation commission, and to the clauses of the statute by which it was brought into existence. It is a local Act—18 and 19 Victoria, cap. cxviii.—an Act which was obtained by the citizens of Glasgow for the purpose of obtaining a liberal supply of good water for the city, as we all know, by the importation into the city of the water of Loch Katrine. The commissioners for executing the Act are the municipal corporation; but in so far as this question is concerned, and in so far as regards their powers as water commissioners, they are a separate corporation. The first step that was necessary in prosecution of the design of that statute was to buy up two old companies who had been in the habit of supplying the town with water, one on the north side and the other on the south side of the Clyde; and accordingly the new corporation not only bought up the whole works of these two companies, but they also bought up the stock of the companies, and paid for this acquisition in the form of annuities to the shareholders of the two companies. It became necessary also to provide money for the purpose of executing the necessary works for bringing in the water of Loch Katrine, and it seems to have been estimated that that would cost somewhere about £700,000; and accordingly a power is given to the commissioners to borrow money to that extent. The old companies were bought up, the annuities were granted, the money was borrowed, and the works have now been executed for several years, and are in active operation. The next question to attend to is what is the revenue of the commissioners under this statute. They are required by the Act of Parliament to meet once a-year, and make up an estimate of the probable expense for the year of the whole undertaking; and for the purpose of meeting that, they are empowered to levy a rate, which is called the domestic water-rate, from the occupiers of all dwelling-houses within the municipal boundary, which is otherwise called in the statute the limits of compulsory supply. That rate is laid on according to the rental of the dwelling-houses. Besides that, they are empowered also to impose a public water-rate not exceeding a penny in the pound on the full annual value of all premises whatever—not dwelling-houses only, but every kind of premises within the same limits; and as regards what are called the limits of compulsory supply, these rates are payable whether the inhabitants of the district within these limits

No. 123.

May 26, 1875. Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

choose to use the water or no. In addition to that, the water commissioners are entitled also to deal with the inhabitants of a certain district beyond the limits of compulsory supply, and to give them water if they choose to have it; and if they choose to have it, they are also empowered to lay on a rate upon these parties; and the rates thus raised, whether within the limits of compulsory supply or beyond them, are to be applied, in the first place, for the payment of the current annual expenses of keeping up the undertaking and conducting the supply of water to the city—in short, all ordinary current expenses. They are also applicable, of course, to the payment of interest upon the money borrowed on mortgage, and to the payment of the annuities which have been granted to the shareholders of the old water companies. There is a further provision, that after the lapse of ten years there shall be a sum, at the rate of £1 per cent upon the total amount of the money borrowed upon mortgage, paid over into a sinking fund for the redemption of that debt, and after the lapse of twenty years a sum of 30s. per cent is to be paid over into the sinking fund for the same purpose. If, after providing for all these purposes, there is any surplus of the income for any year, the water commissioners are required to apply it in making a reduction on the amount of the water rate for the next year, and therefore any surplus which they may have after providing for these purposes must be carried into the next year's account, so to be applied.

Now, the sum of £17,032, 15s., upon which the charge is made under schedule D of the Income-tax Act, comprehends the whole portion of the revenue of the water commissioners which is applied towards the formation of the sinking fund in redemption of the annuities and mortgages in the manner that I have already mentioned, and also the balance, if any, which is carried forward to the following year's account, to be applied as the Act directs in reducing the domestic water-rate; and the question is, whether income arising from this assessment, which is appropriated to such purposes, is assessable for income-tax under schedule D as profits of this undertaking. I am humbly of opinion that it is not. It seems to me that this is an Act of Parliament by which the citizens of Glasgow have undertaken, through this water corporation as their representatives, to assess themselves for a very important public purpose—a purpose very conducive to their own comfort and wellbeing—to obtain a good supply of water for the city. In so assessing themselves they had not in view certainly to make profit by the undertaking. On the contrary, what they have distinctly in view is to pay money in order to obtain this particular benefit. They are not therefore trading in any commodity, nor are they entering into any undertaking for the use of property that is to be attended by a resulting profit, or a beneficial interest accruing to any individuals, or to any corporation. The object of the assessment is to pay for bringing in the water, and when that is done the assessment and the authority to levy it come to an end. If in the progress of the operation of this Act the city of Glasgow is in so happy a condition that they can afford to reduce their assessments to a mere fraction of a penny, that must be done under the operation of the statute. If that fraction of a penny is sufficient to pay the current expenses of maintaining this water commission, and the works under their charge, and I suppose if by some wonderful scheme of good management they should so contrive that they would be able to get water for nothing by-and-by, then the right to levy assessment would come to an end altogether. But one thing at least is perfectly certain, that it is made matter of absolute statutory regulation that the expense of supplying this water, including all the various items that I have already mentioned, and the revenue, are to be kept actually commensurate and equivalent, as near as possibly can be; and that being practically impossible in every year, the way in which the same object is achieved is by carrying over any surplus of one year into the next year, and employing it in reducing the assessments, and so in reducing the revenue for the next year. Now, it seems to me that it is not within the contemplation of schedule D of the Income-tax Act to charge any portion of a local rate raised for such a purpose as profit, or as anything else falling within that schedule D. The case is entirely different from those that have been cited which have been decided in the Court of Exchequer in England, because in those cases the statute which gave the right to levy the assessment did not impose it upon the citizens of the particular burgh or locality which obtained the Act. It was not an authority to the citizens of a particular locality to assess themselves. On the contrary, it was a right and privilege given to a particular corporation to assess everybody—the whole public who happened to import, in the one case, coals into the burgh, and, in the other case, to import something else—I forget what it was. But there, it must be observed, the corporation of the particular burgh, or the commissioners—for it does not matter in the least degree which they were—were making a profit out of a tax levied upon the lieges generally, and were applying the proceeds of that tax for the benefit of the community which they represented; and therefore they were held, most justly I think, to be making profit, no doubt not for individual benefit, but for corporate benefit, and for the benefit of the community, represented by the administrative body that levied the tax.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875.

Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

I have only further to say, that if any attempt had been made here to discriminate between that portion of the revenue which arises from the rates levied within the limits of compulsory supply and that portion of the revenue which is raised in the districts beyond the limits of compulsory supply I should have been very glad to attend to any grounds which might have been urged for such a distinction. It was said no doubt in argument, but rather by way of illustration of the general claim than anything else, that this corporation does in a certain sense trade in water, and sell it to those people who are outside the limits of compulsory supply—that it is matter of traffic with them; and what they may derive from them in the shape of rates may perhaps be fairly represented as coming within the denomination of profit—of revenue derived from the use of a certain subject of which they are the administrators. But it appears to me that that question does not arise here. We have not before us the means of seeing what the result of the transactions between the water commissioners and the persons beyond the limits of compulsory supply are or have been. We do not know that any surplus has arisen from these transactions. Most certainly we know that the only sum which is here charged with income-tax does not represent anything in the nature of profits derived from that special source, but, on the contrary, represents the whole part of the revenue of the water commission which is devoted by Parliament towards the formation of a sinking fund, and which has been directed, quoad ultra, to be carried forward to the next year's account. I therefore give no opinion upon any question which may arise perhaps hereafter as to the portion of the revenue of this water commission which may be derived from those parties who lie outside the limits of compulsory supply. But as the case stands, I am against the deliverance of the commissioners, and I think it must be quashed, and the assessment disallowed.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875. Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

LORD DEAS.—If there are any profits made here, I think it quite clear they must be profits made by the ratepayers, because there are not two parties—the corporation on the one hand and the ratepayers on the other. The corporation is the mere trustee, hand, and instrument of the ratepayers. There is no room, therefore, for saying that the corporation can make profit. That is impossible. The whole question is, are the ratepayers making profit? Now, as your Lordship has pointed out, if we confine our attention, as it is right to do, in the first instance at least, to the bounds of compulsory supply, I do not see how it is possible to say that the ratepayers are making any profit. They are paying for the water, and the water being paid for, even if it becomes free, there is no profit made. If that be so, the only question that could well have been raised would have been that which your Lordship has latterly alluded to, viz., whether the ratepayers were making profit by selling water to parties beyond the compulsory bounds. Now, there is no evidence that they are making profit of that kind. If they be, it is certain that this £17,000 odds does not represent that profit. That profit may be comprehended in the £17,000 for anything I can tell, but that sum certainly does not represent the profit. I entirely concur with your Lordship that questions which may be raised about assessing the profit made from parties beyond the bounds of the compulsory supply are not before us, and I am not prepared to give any opinion as to how far such profit, if there be any, may be liable for assessment. The assessment, at all events, could not be upon the £17,000, but upon something very much smaller than that. I need hardly say that in coming to this result I do not indicate any opinion against what was done in the poor-law cases quoted, and more particularly in the case of Adamson v. The Clyde Navigation Trustees (22 D. 606).[1] I prepared the joint opinion in that case, which was substantially adopted by all the Judges with one exception, and affirmed in the House of Lords (4 Macq. 931), and it would be very strange if I were to say anything contrary to what is laid down in that opinion, and I certainly am not doing so. But the difference between that case and this is sufficiently clear from the explanation which your Lordship has given of the facts of this case. I entirely concur in the views stated by your Lordship, and have nothing further to add.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have very little to add to what your Lordships have said, for I entirely concur. I have only two observations to make. Where the area of taxation and the area of distribution exactly correspond—where a rate is raised for a public purpose, and the whole of what is collected is applied to that public purpose—I take it that that is what is meant by the English Judges when they speak of a district rating or assessment; and in that case there could be no income which could be chargeable with income-tax. Further, where there is an excess of revenue over the necessary expenditure for distribution, if a company voluntarily use that excess of revenue to pay off their debt by the formation of a sinking fund, a question might very well be raised whether, that being their voluntary use of funds which would have been profit if not so applied, they might not still be liable for income-tax. But that is not the case here. The statute, and not the will of the company, applies the whole excess to the creation of the sinking fund, and the statutory result of the application of that money is the ultimate diminution, and, it may be, the ultimate extinction

[1] 32 Scot. Jur. 203.

No. 123.

May 26, 1875.
Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

of the assessment; for if ever it came to this, that the water could be got for nothing, there would be no assessment. The statute, therefore, not only authorises but directs the appropriation of the money, and that being the case I do not think that this sum applied under the powers of the statute and by direction of the statute to the purposes of the statute, can be considered as income. A separate question might arise, but it is not now before us, in regard to the sum raised from the non-compulsory district, as it is called—i.e., the district beyond the compulsory area, it being said to be used to some extent for the benefit of those in the compulsory district. A curious question may perhaps be raised as to whether the fund raised beyond the line and used for the benefit of those within the line does not to some extent partake of the nature of income as profit. All I say now is, that that question is not raised here, and we are not at present called on to deal with it. I have formed no opinion, and I reserve my opinion, upon it. I think it is a nice point, but it is not now before us.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Reverse the determination of the commissioners, and disallow the assessment: Find the appellants entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account thereof, and report."

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—DAVID CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.—Agents.

THE DUKE OF ROXBURGHE AND OTHERS, Appellants.—D.-F. Clark.

No. 124.

May 26, 1875.
Duke of Roxburghe.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburghshire.

M.

Process — Appeal, competency of — Competition.—In a petition for division of the area of the parish church of Jedburgh among the heritors the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding that the heritors in that part of the parish which had been disjoined and erected into the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston were not heritors of the original parish so far as regarded the division. The interlocutor did not finally dispose of the petition as regarded the remaining heritors, and there was no finding as to expenses. The heritors of Edgerston appealed. When the case was called in the Single Bills no objection was taken to the competency of the appeal, but the Court considered the question, and held that the appeal was competent, in respect that the process was a process of competition, and that the interlocutor disposed of the whole subject-matter of the competition so far as the appellants were concerned.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES MORISON, Pursuer.—Mackintosh—Robertson.
GLENSHIEL SCHOOL BOARD, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Keir.

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

School—Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), secs. 60 and 55—Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107), sec. 19.—In an action brought by a parish schoolmaster, appointed prior to the Education Act, 1872, against the school board of the parish, by whom he had been dismissed, for declarator that he was entitled to a retiring allowance, held that his claim was excluded by the resolution of the board dismissing him on the ground of fault, and that the judgment of the board finding fault proved was not subject to review in a Court of law.

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. I.

THE school board of Glenshiel being dissatisfied with James Morison, who had been schoolmaster of the parish since 1860, applied for a report from the inspector of schools for the district as to the state of the school. On 10th April 1874 the inspector sent his report.* A copy of the report was sent to Morison. The board on 15th June passed this resolution,—"The school board having considered the said report, and finding that Mr Morison has failed to make any communication to this meeting, of which he had notice, and a copy of the special report having been sent to him, they have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion, on the strength of this report, and from the knowledge of the majority of the members of the school board of the circumstances of the case, that the teacher is unfit by his conduct, and inefficient from his own fault, and that, in justice to the inhabitants of the parish, he should be removed from the office of teacher. They therefore resolved, subject to the confirmation of the Education Board, to dismiss, as they hereby do dismiss, the said Mr James Morison from the office of teacher of the Glenshiel public school aforesaid, together with all the privileges and emoluments attaching thereto; and they respectfully trust that the Education Board will grant the necessary confirmation of this judgment and resolution."

The Board of Education confirmed this judgment on 24th July. Morison thereupon raised this action against the school board, concluding for declarator that he was entitled to a retiring allowance equal in amount to his whole salary at the date of his removal, or at least for two-thirds of it.

He averred;—"The defenders being, as the pursuer believes and avers, unduly influenced by the said Rev. Alexander Matheson and others, lately took proceedings under the 60th section of the 'Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' for the removal of the pursuer from office, as incompetent, unfit, or inefficient. . . . The inspector did not visit the school before framing the report which is founded on by the defenders. He visited the school in March 1874 in order to report on the state of the school to the Lords of the Treasury, but he did not again visit and inspect the school before furnishing his report to the defenders. The defenders, nevertheless, at a meeting held on 15th June 1874 passed the following resolution. . . . . The pursuer does not admit that he is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient; on the contrary, he avers that he is at least as competent, fit, or efficient, as he was when appointed in 1860. In any view, however, he denies, and it is not the fact, that there has been any incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency on his part, which is, or has been, due to his fault. The defenders are called on to specify in what particulars the pursuer has been guilty of fault in the discharge of his duties."

He also cited the 60th section of the Education Act, 1872, and the 19th section of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861.†

* The report bore,—"I found 18 pupils present under one master. The state of instruction was extremely unsatisfactory. Sixteen pupils were presented in the standards, of whom ten only passed in reading, three in writing, and but one in arithmetic. Those that passed in reading had but a very imperfect knowledge of the meaning of what they read. Geography was the only extra subject professed, and in geography I could scarcely get a simple correct answer to any out of several very elementary questions. It is rare to meet a school whose general condition is so low, with nothing of a redeeming feature, as in the case of Glenshiel public school. I therefore express my opinion, with no hesitation, that the present teacher is inefficient."

† 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 69, sec. 60.—"Any teacher of a public school appointed prior to this Act may be removed from his office in manner following,—

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

The school board in their defences, stated that the bad condition of the school had "been caused by the fault of the pursuer, and, in particular, by his neglect and want of attention in the discharge of his duties, and by his intemperate habits." They also added,—"The pursuer's misconduct has continued throughout, and since the defenders were intrusted with the administration of the school they, from their own knowledge and observation, became well aware of his inefficiency, and of acts of misconduct on his part."

Pleaded for the pursuer;—The pursuer's removal not having been occasioned by any fault on his part, he is entitled to a retiring allowance in terms of the statute.

Pleaded for the defenders;—(1) The action is not supported by relevant averments, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The defenders ought to be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the summons, in respect that the pursuer having been removed for inefficiency caused by his fault, he is not entitled to any retiring allowance.

On 6th February 1875 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

---

that is to say . . . (2) If the school board of any parish or burgh shall consider that any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient, they may require a special report regarding the school and the teacher from Her Majesty's inspector charged with the duty of inspecting such school; and on receiving such report the school board may, if they see cause, remove such teacher from office, provided that before proceeding to give judgment on the matter they shall furnish to the teacher a copy of such report, and that a judgment removing the teacher shall not have effect until confirmed by the Board of Education: Provided also, that in the case of teachers of parish schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act who may be so removed, school boards shall have the same powers of granting retiring allowances, and the teachers shall have the same rights to retiring allowances, as were vested in heritors and ministers and in parish schoolmasters respectively, by secs. 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861, in the case of parish schoolmasters permitted or required to resign, or dismissed or removed from office, as therein provided."

24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107, sec. 19.—"In case it shall be found, on a report by one of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, made on the application of the heritors of the parish, and concurred in by the presbytery of the bounds, that the schoolmaster of any parish is disqualified, because of infirmity or old age, for the due performance of the duties of his office, or that from negligence or inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties, it shall be lawful to the heritors and minister, at any meeting called and held as aforesaid, to permit or require such schoolmaster to resign his said office, and in case of his refusal to do so, to dismiss or suspend such schoolmaster, and, when necessary, to declare the school vacant; and in every case of such resignation the heritors and minister may grant to such schoolmaster a retiring allowance, payable during the remainder of his life; provided that, where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster, the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance, the amount whereof shall not be less than two-third parts of the amount of the salary pertaining to said office at the date of said resignation thereof, and shall not exceed the gross amount of such salary, which retiring allowance shall be payable in all respects in like manner with the salary of the schoolmaster."

* "OPINION.—This is an action by a schoolmaster, removed under clause 60 (sub-section 2) of the Education Act, 1872, for unfitness and inefficiency, to recover the retiring allowance to which he alleges right under the provisions of that clause. The action proceeds on the same construction of the clause which I rejected in a similar action at the instance of the schoolmaster against the school board of Logiealmond. The parties here were not content to abide by the final decision in that case, and I was not unwilling to hear a full argument

No. 125.
May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The Education Act, 1872, did not contemplate that school boards should be the judges between their own from the able counsel who represented them, and to reconsider the opinion which I had previously formed on a question of novelty and interest. In deciding the Logiealmond case I assumed that the management of the school (in the ordinary sense of the term 'management') was by Act committed to the school board, with the power and duty of seeing to its continuing efficiency as an educational establishment, and of removing the teacher if, in their judgment, the school should at any time fall into a state of inefficiency by reason of his unfitness. It was not suggested in argument, nor did it occur to myself as a reasonable or even possible view of the Act, that the school board were only managers to the effect of seeing that the material and mechanical appliances of education were provided with due economy to the ratepayers, and had so little concern with education itself that they were not at liberty, without the teacher's leave, to visit the school for the purpose of satisfying themselves that it was efficiently conducted, but only to see that the building in which the children were taught was sufficiently commodious, and kept in decent repair. In the view that the members of the school board were chosen by the constituency, not from any confidence in their ability to manage the schools as educational establishments, and to take care that they should be efficiently taught and conducted, but only as likely persons to see to the condition and repair of the school buildings and furniture, I should have had some difficulty in dealing with the case of the removal of a teacher by such a board, because they considered him 'incompetent, unfit, or inefficient.' The language of section 60 might have been found too strong to admit of the removal with all its consequences being resisted, but it would have been impossible not to feel that the Legislature had unfortunately and quite inexplicably committed an important and delicate duty to a body which, as being chosen for a very different kind of duty, were presumably unfit to discharge it, and were even denied the most obvious and apparently essential means of enabling themselves to perform it with such intelligence as they might accidentally possess. In such a case a Court of law would at least regard the proceedings with considerable distrust, and, attaching no importance or weight to the opinion of so incompetent a body, would be disposed to strain the construction of the statute in order to compensate the dismissed teacher with a pension.

"As a right view of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of school boards is material to every question that can arise out of the relation between them and their teachers, I deem it my duty to take this opportunity of stating my opinion on the subject, as one of general interest and concern, and bearing, not remotely, on the case before me.

"The leading principle and feature of the Act of 1872 is, that the direction and management of the public schools supported by local rates and Government grant is thereby committed to the people themselves, to be exercised by means of school boards elected, as the Act directs, in the several districts into which, for the purposes of education, the country is divided. I venture to lay it down as a true proposition that the whole management of every public school existing, or which may exist, under the Act, is committed to the school board of the district in which it is situated. The management is certainly not divided, and, therefore, if it were true, which I think it is not, that anything which school management involves is withheld from the school boards, it is certain that to this extent the schools are left without management altogether, for no power of management is given to any other bodies or persons. With respect to the parish and burgh schools, which constitute a considerable though ever-decreasing proportion of the public schools under the Act, the whole powers and duties of their former managers, viz., the heritors, ministers, and town-councils, are transferred to the boards, while all power of interference by church courts is taken away. The power and duty not only of providing suitable buildings and furniture, but of appointing and removing teachers, is expressly conferred and imposed on the boards. It has been suggested that there is significance in the pockets and their obligations to their servant—the teacher. If that had been intended, there would have been some express judicial machinery circumstance that the visiting powers of presbyteries are not transferred to the boards. But as these (whatever they were) are not transferred at all, but simply abolished, the only significance is that any connection between the Established Church and the schools is severed, which cannot, I should think, signify that the schools are not to be visited by their managers.

"The whole powers and duties respecting the material appliances, and the personal staff of every school established under the Act in any district, being thus conferred and imposed on the school board of that district, it was perhaps superfluous to provide, as section 36 does in express terms, that 'the school board of every parish and burgh shall maintain and keep efficient every school under their management,' for this would probably have been implied. One purpose of the provision was to guard against the possibility of a school board, which had, under section 28, been compelled to establish a school which they thought unnecessary, thereafter, when an opportunity occurred, practically discontinuing it, by simply omitting to do what was necessary to maintain it in a state of efficiency, as by omitting to appoint a teacher when a vacancy occurred, or continuing an inefficient teacher who drew no scholars, which would, of course, be as efficacious for the discontinuance of the school, contrary to the opinion of the Board of Education, as allowing the school buildings to go into disrepair. If it was necessary to make express provision against the practical discontinuance by the school boards of any schools instituted or taken over under the Act, this is the only clause which does so, and it will probably be generally thought that the provision was a prudent one. I am aware that it has been suggested that the clause relates only to the school buildings and furniture, and that a school board will well perform its duty to 'maintain and keep efficient any school,' by keeping the school-house with its furniture in good repair, although it is not resorted to by a single child, whether because there is no teacher at all, or because the teacher is so 'incompetent, unfit, or inefficient' that no prudent parent will, and no parent ought to be required to, intrust a child to his tuition. With reference to this suggestion, I will only observe that it is not in accordance with my notion of maintaining and keeping a school in a state of efficiency by a board which is intrusted with the power, and charged with the duty of appointing efficient teachers, and removing such as they shall 'consider' to be inefficient. I should certainly be greatly surprised if, on a complaint by the Lord Advocate, under section 36 of the Act, this Court should acquit a school board which had really discontinued a school by neglecting to provide and maintain a proper educational establishment therein, because the school-house, although disused and empty, was commodious and in decent repair. It is, indeed, abundantly clear that the words 'maintain and keep efficient' in the first branch of the clause are opposed to the word 'discontinue' in the second; and that as allowing the school buildings to go to ruin is not the only way of discontinuing a school, so keeping these in repair is not the only thing requisite in order to maintain the school in a state of efficiency.

"But if school boards be responsible, as I think they clearly are, for maintaining and keeping the schools 'under their management' in a state of efficiency, it is obviously necessary that they shall have the power not only of appointing, but also of removing, the teachers, and so the provisions of the Act which confer this power appear to be in harmony with the principle of the measure. It is clear that they have the choice of the teachers, for whose fitness and competency they are responsible, and, being equally responsible for the conduct and continuing efficiency of every teacher whom they employ, they have also the power of removal. Nor need the power surprise any one, for not only had Parliament conferred the same power on the school boards of England only two years before, but it is a power which, so far as I know, is possessed and exercised by every body of school managers in the civilised world. It is true that, by a rule of which I believe there is no example elsewhere in any case at all similar, the parish schoolmasters of Scotland held their places for life. That this was an provided to investigate questions, such as this, of fault. There was no such machinery, so there was no jurisdiction. The powers of school inconvenient and inexpedient rule appeared (so, at least, Parliament thought) not only from the experience we had of its operation, but from the conduct of mankind, proceeding on experience, in every department of life and business. Parliament accordingly determined that there was no reason why the school boards of Scotland should employ their teachers upon any other footing than those of England, or why such contracts as all school managers, including those of the great foundation schools of the country, and, indeed, the managers of all undertakings whatever, found the most expedient with their employés, should not also be esteemed the most expedient for the Scotch school boards and their teachers. They are, accordingly, required by the Act to contract with teachers exactly as all others who require the services of teachers contract with them. In the public interest there is a certain qualification prescribed, to be testified by certificate. This is analogous to the qualification prescribed by law for ship masters, medical practitioners, and many others who seek employment in their several callings.

No. 125. May 28, 1875. Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

"But it is according to the practice of Parliament to make reasonable provision for the protection of existing interests, and accordingly clause 60 was introduced into the Act. The object of it, as is plain, I think, from the language, was to modify with respect to teachers appointed before the Act, to such extent as was deemed necessary for their reasonable protection, the power of removal which in all other cases was conferred absolutely on the school boards. It would have been against the public interest and contrary to the policy of the Act to exempt them from the control of the boards who were made responsible for their efficiency. But, on the other hand, it was considered proper, in deference to the principle of reasonable protection to existing interests, that the action of the boards, with a view to their removal for inefficiency, should be subjected to certain specified checks. Accordingly, while the school board of every parish or burgh is empowered officially to 'consider' whether 'any such teacher is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient,' a board which considers that he is so must, before proceeding to remove him, require a special report 'regarding the school and the teacher' from H. M. inspector, and furnish the teacher with a copy of it. This is the first check. The second and only other is, 'that a judgment removing the teacher shall not have effect until confirmed by the Board of Education.' It is, I think, not amiss that I should mention, with reference to some views which have been expressed regarding the functions of inspectors, that it was not without hesitation and difficulty that the department of the Government charged with the administration of the Parliamentary grant, whose servants Her Majesty's inspectors are, consented to allow this duty to be put on these officers, it being contrary to the rule and practice of the department to interfere, or permit their inspectors to interfere with the management of any school, or to interpose in any way between the managers of a school and their teachers. But the case was considered to be exceptional and temporary, and so the clause was allowed to pass as matter of public convenience.

"But, attaching all due importance to the checks, it must nevertheless be acknowledged that the duty imposed on the school board is of a very onerous kind, and that respect is justly due to their judgment. They are responsible for the efficiency of the school, although taught by a teacher appointed before the Act, and may be made answerable (upon a complaint to this Court) if they allow it to fall into a state of inefficiency, although its inefficient condition is attributable to the unfitness or incompetency of the teacher. Their opinion, or, as the Act expresses it, what they, as managers of the school, 'consider' regarding the efficiency of the teacher, is the primary condition of any action under the Act. If their judgment be favourable to the teacher, there is no power elsewhere to remove him, although they may no doubt be compelled to take action by proceedings against themselves, under section 36 of the Act. They are thus put to form their judgment under the responsibility of a grave duty, for the due discharge of which they are answerable, not only to their constituents, but to boards as to removal for old age or infirmity were administrative, and in these cases a retiring allowance was compulsory. In a question of refus-

No. 25.
May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

the law. With the opinion which I have expressed, I cannot hold that they are unfit for the duty which Parliament has put on them, or that they are without the means of acquiring the knowledge necessary to enable them to perform it intelligently. I cannot hold that the teacher is entitled to set them at defiance, and to exclude them from the school, unless they come to see to the repair of the building or the condition of the desks and forms. I must hold, on the contrary, that the managers of a school, responsible for its efficiency (as all managers presumably are, and as these managers expressly are), are entitled to visit it, and that, acting on the ordinary prompting of the human understanding, they will do so before condemning the teacher as 'incompetent, unfit, or inefficient.' I have already pointed out that the school board must themselves judge in the first instance, although their first judgment (if condemnatory of the teacher) is provisional, and need take no more formal shape than a requisition for a special report by one of H.M. inspectors. It is not, however, too much to say that reasonable men will not form such a judgment and act upon it, even to the extent of calling for a special report from the inspector (in itself a serious and significant step), without grave deliberation on the subject, after taking all due means of informing themselves regarding the school and the teacher.

"When, therefore, the school board in this case required a special report from the inspector, I must assume that they had previously, after due deliberation, and in the intelligent and honest discharge of their statutory duty, come to the conclusion that the pursuer was 'incompetent, unfit, or inefficient.' These expressions are almost undistinguishable in meaning, and really only aid each other exegetically. On resuming consideration of the case with the inspector's report, they had 'no hesitation in coming to the conclusion, on the strength of this report, and from the knowledge of the majority of the members of the school board of the circumstances of the case, that the teacher is unfit by his conduct, and inefficient from his own fault, and that in justice to the inhabitants of the parish he should be removed from the office of teacher,' and they pronounced judgment removing him accordingly. Nothing remained but the application of the second statutory check, and it was applied, with the result that the judgment was confirmed by the Board of Education.

"In condescendence 3 the pursuer declines to admit the regularity of the proceedings; but the only criticism which he makes seems to me to be unfounded, and no conclusion or plea is put upon alleged irregularity. The action assumes regular and effectual dismissal under the Act, and concludes for a retiring allowance on the ground alleged in condescendence 4, that the pursuer 'denies, and it is not the fact, that there has been any incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency on his part which is or has been due to his fault.' The pursuer makes no other averment, but calls on the defenders 'to specify in what particulars the pursuer has been guilty of fault in the discharge of his duties'—a call which the defenders, disputing the pursuer's right to make it, answer by alleging intemperate habits, neglect, and frequent absences from his duties.

"The question thus raised for decision seems to be whether a teacher who has been removed under clause 60 (sub-section 2) of the Act has a good action for a retiring allowance, on a general denial that the unfitness, &c., for which he was removed was due to his fault; and I am of opinion that he has not.

"It is obvious that the trial of such an issue would be most perplexing, although, were such trial necessary to vindicate a right clearly conferred by statute, the difficulty would no doubt have to be encountered. The general rule is that the proof of fault is on the party alleging it, and perhaps the pursuer's case may be put most strongly on the call which he makes on the defenders for a specification of the fault they allege and undertake to prove, for the purpose of resisting his claim. But it would, in my opinion, be contrary to the meaning and intention of the Act to require the defenders to establish by evidence in this Court the grounds on which they proceeded in the discharge of their statutory duty. The managers of a school, if they are to do their duty fearlessly, must ing a retiring allowance, however, questions arose affecting civil rights, and the civil courts must decide in such matters. It was possible to conoften proceed on their observation of results during a considerable period, and their judgment of the teacher's responsibility for them. Their conclusion of fault on his part may be just, and such as they are bound in duty to act upon, without the possibility on their part of establishing it by evidence in a court of law. They are themselves the best judges, and have the best opportunities of judging. It is to them, accordingly, that the statute commits the duty of judging, so far at least as regards removal; and they are assuredly not tied to proceed only on such evidence as a court of law requires. Then, does the Act provide that they must pay a retiring allowance unless they prove fault in a court of law? I think it does not.

No. 125. May 28, 1875. Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

"The Act of 1872 (clause 60, sub-section 2) gives no larger power to school boards to grant, and no larger rights to teachers to demand, pensions than were conferred on heritors and schoolmasters respectively by the Act of 1861 (section 19). This is clear, for the later Act refers to the prior for the measure of the powers and rights which it gives. The prior Act authorised the heritors to remove and give pensions to teachers who were 'disqualified because of infirmity or old age for the due performance of the duties' of their office, but it authorised removal with a pension in no other case whatever. Removal without pension was authorised in the case of a teacher who 'from negligence or inattention has failed efficiently to discharge such duties.' The defenders say that the pursuer 'is unfit by his conduct and inefficient from his own fault,' and this is on the face of their judgment which the Board of Education confirmed. The pursuer denies 'fault;' but as he does not allege 'infirmity or old age,' I fail to see how he can have right to a pension. Had he been removed under the Act of 1861, it must have been for 'negligence or inattention,' for he is not old or infirm, and it seems clear that the heritors could not have granted him a pension. But if this be so, the school board which removed him under the Act of 1872 have no power to grant him a pension, for the power of the heritors under the one Act is the measure of the board's power under the other.

"In refusing to allow the pursuer a proof of his negative averment of no fault, or to require the defenders to prove the faults which, in answer to his call, they have averred in general terms, I proceed on what I conceive to be the law applicable to all cases of removal under this clause of the Act, and it concerns the community that the law should be settled. I think it would be contrary to the intention of the Act, and detrimental to the public interest, to put a school board which has dismissed a teacher in the same position as a defender in an action for slander, by requiring them to condescend upon and prove the veritas of the grounds on which they proceeded. The members of the board may be morally certain that the teacher is inefficient, intemperate, negligent, and frequently absent from duty, leading to the utter destruction of the school, without being able to establish much of it (except, perhaps, the condition of the school) on a trial in a court of law. It is not for the interest of the community that they should be deterred from dismissing the teacher, if they, the inspector and Board of Education, all concur in thinking that the interests of education require it, by the apprehension of a litigation with a dismissed teacher, in which they may be required to satisfy this Court also of the propriety of that step. The question may only regard a pension, but a pension means a higher school rate in the parish, and I am not disposed to countenance the notion that there must either be proof of delinquency in a court of law, or a pension and increased rate. This was not, I think, the intention of the Act, and so to construe it would be calculated to deter school boards from the due discharge of their duty. No public department, no business or domestic establishment, could be efficiently conducted on the condition that those in charge and having the responsibility should not dismiss an employé unless prepared to set forth and establish his misconduct at law. Even in private establishments good men require no such protection against the caprice of employers, and school boards are public bodies which ought to be regarded, and I trust ever will be regarded by this Court,

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.

Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

ceive the case of a man naturally inattentive from incapacity without fault, and surely a board could not remove him without compensation.[1] with a confidence in their integrity and discretion corresponding to that which Parliament has manifested by the large and important duties committed to them. Teachers who are disabled by infirmity or old age are proper objects of compassion, and the Legislature has made fair provision for them accordingly. But to allow a young and vigorous man who (after applying all the statutory checks in his favour) has been properly dismissed for unfitness and inefficiency, to call the school board into Court and insist that they shall there either make and prove charges of misconduct against him, or submit to judgment for a pension, is what I for one do not find consistent with the provisions of the statute, or the interests of the public.

"It was conceded that the Court has no power to review the judgment of removal on its merits, or at all, the regularity not being questioned, and I think the Court owes it the respect due to any final judgment or determination by the proper statutory authority. Nor do I think that it is to be regarded by the Court only in the abstract as a judgment under section 60 of the Act, without looking to the import and plain substance of it as a judgment in the particular case. So looked at it is a judgment of removal for unfitness by misconduct and inefficiency from fault. The pursuer says that it is erroneous in fact, and he reflects on the motives of his judges, or some of them, and thus (but only thus) represents his removal as without fault on his part. I think this is not relevant, for the judgment of removal is final, and not examinable on its merits in this Court.

"If a teacher who is not disqualified by age or infirmity may be well removed under section 60, without fault on his part, it must be for a cause which is not only satisfactory to the school board but approved by the Board of Education as good reason for the removal, which they confirm. I am unable to conjecture (within the bounds of reason and likelihood) such a cause, and the possibility of its occurrence may, I think, be prudently left for determination till an actual removal shall occur for a cause having such an aspect. I do not admit that a school board may (as has been supposed by way of illustration) direct new subjects to be taught in an old parish school which the schoolmaster is excusably unable to teach, or task him in any way beyond his reasonable powers, and then remove him for unfitness. Such a removal, on the report of the inspector, and confirmed by the Board of Education, is, I think, beyond the region of reasonable supposition, and a speculative consideration of it is at least foreign to the case which the pursuer presents; for he, being on the face of the judgment removed for unfitness and inefficiency, which the school board and Board of Education concur in attributing to his misconduct and fault, does not allege a cause of removal which involved no fault on his part, but only that the cause assigned by the proper authority was not true in fact, and that he was thus unjustly removed without any cause at all. It was not maintained that a judgment of removal for unfitness and inefficiency from misconduct and fault ought to specify the facts in which the misconduct and fault consist, or that it would be less assailable in such an action as the present if it did. I think the generality of expression is preferable, and do not suppose for a moment that the school board and Board of Education adopted the general terms without particular grounds established to their satisfaction in the individual case. Looking to the judgment on the one hand, and to the case stated by the pursuer on this record on the other, it seems to me impossible to represent the latter as consistent with the former, or otherwise than as a direct contradiction of it. I am myself of opinion that the Act of 1872 sanctioned a retiring allowance only in the case of infirm or aged teachers, to which case it was admittedly confined by the Act of 1861, which is referred to as the measure of the power and right which the [1] Robb v. Logiealmond School Board, Feb 5, 1875, and May 21, 1875, supra, pp. 417 and 699.

No. 125.
May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

Prior to the passing of the Act of 1861 the dismissal of a teacher had to be justified before a civil court, and no alteration had been made in the law where civil rights were involved.

Argued for the defenders;—It was the duty of school boards, under the Act of 1872, to see to the efficiency of the schools, and so they were bound to remove an inefficient master. There was nowhere in the Education Act any provision entitling an inefficient schoolmaster to a pension, if the inefficiency arose from fault. Here the only claim for a pension was under the Act of 1861, but that Act only provided for pensions to masters removed for old age or infirmity, and the Act of 1872 did not add to these powers. The ground of removal was the test whether a pension was to be given or not. The pursuer had been removed for fault, and had no claim.

At advising,—

LORD NEAVES.—This is one of a class of cases which for a time will unquestionably involve some anxiety to all the parties interested. Matters are in a state of transition, and some time must elapse before the schoolmasters under the latter Act confers. I also think that this does not result from any rigid or strict construction of the words of the Act of 1872, but accords with the intention and plain reason of the Act, for no other case of legitimate or reasonably supposable removal under the Act without fault on the part of the teacher has been suggested or occurs to my mind; and the notion that the Legislature intended to confer a power and create a right conditioned on the opinion of a court of law on the question of fault or no fault on the part of the removed teacher, upon a general inquiry into the whole circumstances and merits of the removal, is one which I cannot adopt. It has been said that the Act of 1872 extends, with respect to old teachers, the power of removal without fault on their part. I do not think so, for I think it only further (and reasonably and beneficially) extends and facilitates the power of removal for fault. But if it be reasonably supposable that a teacher, who is neither infirm nor old, may nevertheless be properly removed under the Act of 1872 after observing all the checks provided for his protection, without fault on his part, it is not too much to require that a party appealing to this Court in reliance on so special a case should condescend on the particular facts which raise it. And these facts must consist with the notion of a just dismissal without fault on the part of the teacher; for that is the condition of relevancy in this view of the matter. But the pursuer condescends on no facts whatever. He only impugns the justice of his removal, and upon that, as the only medium, claims a retiring allowance. His case is, that on a true construction of clause 60 he is entitled to be compensated by a retiring allowance, on satisfying the Court that the judgment of removal (which, as such, the Court is precluded from reviewing) was an unjust judgment, which ought not to have been pronounced.

---

"To sustain the relevancy of such a case would, in my opinion, be not to put a liberal construction on a remedial statute, but to put an erroneous construction on a statute which is remedial in no other sense than every statute is remedial. The managers of the old parish schools (viz. the valued rent heritors who supported them) could always practically get quit of an unfit and inefficient schoolmaster by giving him a retiring allowance. The evil of the law was that they could not get quit of him except on that condition, the practical result being that teachers who really ought to be removed were retained to the detriment of education, rather than burden the rates with a pension to a man who had no just or reasonable claim to it. This evil was partially remedied by the Act of 1861, and more completely by that of 1872, both Acts providing (the latter by simple reference to the former) for a retiring allowance to aged and infirm teachers, and no others."

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

new system are established, and before the time comes when those under the old system will have become extinct.

A person in the responsible position of a public schoolmaster is entitled to every fair protection against injustice. It is a serious thing for a man, through old age or under a change of circumstances, to be deprived of his position and means of maintenance. At the same time we must look to the intention and objects of the law, in what it has enacted. The pursuer complains of what has been done, or rather of what has not been done, by the school board of Glenshiel in regard to his office.

The clauses of the Act of Parliament which need to be considered are the 60th, and in connection with it the 55th section of the Education Act of 1872. The 60th section provides, in its 2d sub-section, that in the case of teachers of parish schools appointed previously to the passing of the Act who may be removed under the provisions of the section, the powers of the school board and the rights of the teachers shall be the same as were vested in the minister and heritors and in parish schoolmasters respectively by sections 19 and 20 of the Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters Act, 1861.

In this case the schoolmaster was displaced from his office, and of that he cannot complain; but he complains that the school board did not exercise the powers conferred on them by the sections above mentioned of giving him a retiring allowance. It is answered that the retiring allowance is withheld because he was removed or dismissed in consequence of his own fault, and that in that case a retiring allowance cannot be demanded.

That gives rise to the questions, who are to determine that there is fault, in what way is the determination to be formed and intimated, and whether there can be any review of it by this Court? A body in such a position as the school board here occupies is, I think, bound to state that they withheld the allowance on statutory grounds. This the board here has done. They find on the strength of the special report of Her Majesty's inspector for their district, and from their own knowledge of the circumstances, that the teacher was "unfit by his conduct, and inefficient from his own fault," and they resolved, therefore, subject to the approval of the Board of Education, to dismiss him from his office. It cannot be said that the school board here have not brought themselves within the enactments of the statute, so far as regards the expressions used in their finding. If the reasons they allege are assumed to be true, they are clearly entitled to withhold the retiring allowance. The two things to be considered are—1st, whether it was necessary for the board to be more specific as to the nature or particulars of the fault found; and 2d, supposing the statement sufficient, whether this Court is competent to review their deliverance by allowing a proof or instituting an inquiry of their own as to the existence of fault. After careful consideration, I am of opinion that a large and almost unlimited discretion is reposed in school boards in this matter. I do not say that they could not be controlled if there was any appearance of their evading consideration of the questions before them, or of malice and bad faith in their proceedings. But there is nothing of that kind here. The board had a special report to the effect that the schoolmaster was inefficient, and in addition to that they had their personal knowledge. They state in their resolution that the master is unfit. How? Not from want of accomplishments or modern attainments, nor from physical weakness, but by his conduct, by his own fault. Was it, then, necessary for the board to go further and specify the particular head or name under which this fault falls? I do not think so; the words of the statute are "any fault." If he is not acquitted of fault at his removal, but, on the other hand, is charged with and convicted of fault, it is not necessary to have a detailed narrative of the fault complained of; all that seems to be required is that enough be specified to justify the conclusion arrived at.

No. 125.
May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

In the Logiealmond case, in the other Division, a remit was made to the school board to state whether they found that there was fault, but the Court would not allow an investigation into the truth of the report. In so doing, the Court seems to have proceeded on the intelligible ground that in dealing with a public body their statements must be believed as true, unless the contrary appears; they must be assumed to do their duty properly, unless something can be shewn inconsistent with that view. So when the specific charges were furnished, which was done, perhaps, a little more in detail than here, no further inquiry was permitted.

On these grounds, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, though I do not necessarily adopt all the views stated in his note.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same result without any difficulty.

I do not understand that the pursuer complains that there was any departure from statutory forms in his dismissal, and if so, it cannot be said that the school board went beyond its powers. What the pursuer complains of is that, while he must be held to admit—not in express words, but still necessarily—that he has been dismissed by the school board as being "unfit by his conduct, and inefficient from his own fault" (which I concur with Lord Neaves in holding must mean misconduct), he has not received a retiring allowance. The question thus comes to be, whether the school board, not being bound to give a retiring allowance in such circumstances, were thus justified in withholding it?

The pursuer concludes for payment of a retiring allowance, just as if he had been guilty of no fault, and yet he sets forth in the third article of his condescendence the resolution of the school board dismissing him "as unfit by his own conduct, and inefficient from his own fault." And in the 4th article of his condescendence, again, he says, that he does not "admit that he is incompetent, unfit, or inefficient." Now, that is a somewhat peculiar statement as coming from the pursuer, and all the more when what follows is kept in view, viz., "on the contrary, he avers that he is at least as competent, fit, or efficient, as he was when appointed in 1860. In any view, however, he denies, and it is not the fact, that there has been any incompetency, unfitness, or inefficiency on his part, which is, or has been, due to his fault." He then calls upon the board "to specify in what particulars" he "has been guilty of fault in the discharge of his duties." The school board, whether they were bound to do so or not, have responded to this call, because we find both in their statement of facts, and in their answer to a previous article of the condescendence, a detailed narrative of the grounds upon which they dismissed him. If, as there stated, he neglected his duties and was intemperate, the board was not only entitled, but bound to dismiss him from the important position he occupied under them. It is true he denies the truth of their allegations, and that raises the question whether, merely because he denies the statements of the board, he is to be entitled to have a trial of the whole question in an action at law, an action beginning, it might have been, in the Sheriff-court, coming thence to this Court, and then going to the House of Lords. Now, I do not see in the Education Act of 1872 anything to suggest even that there is such a right or power in the schoolmaster; and if it did exist, I must say that it would, in my opinion, go a long way to destroy the beneficial objects of the Act, for all the time such a litigation depended the school and the scholars would inevitably be sustaining prejudice. But it is fortunate that the Education Act does not, in my opinion, give any countenance to any such litigation. On the contrary, it appears to me that it was intended by the Legislature that school boards—who are elected by those who are principally interested in the matter, the ratepayers—should have powers of dismissal subject only to certain checks, such as the necessity for a special report from the Government inspector, and then the approval of the Board of Education. The latter is the review provided by the statute. The whole matter is reported to the Board of Education, and if the resolution of the school board is there approved of that is an end to the matter.

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

I can conceive the possibility of such behaviour on the part of a school board in dismissing a schoolmaster, such as malice and oppression, or departure from the requisite forms, which, if brought under the review of this Court in a competent and relevant way, might result in the proceedings being quashed or set aside. But the present is most certainly not a case of that description, or anything like it.

Without, therefore, adopting all the views of the Lord Ordinary, or, on the other hand, saying that I consider them ill-founded, for it is unnecessary for me to do so, it is enough that I should express my concurrence, on the grounds I have indicated, with your Lordship, in adhering to the interlocutor complained of. At the same time, I am desirous of adding that I entirely approve of the following, which appears to have fallen from the Lord Ordinary:—"It would be contrary to the intention of the Act, and detrimental to the public interest, to put a school board which has dismissed a teacher in the same position as a defender in an action for slander, by requiring them to condescend upon and prove the veritas of the grounds on which they proceeded. The members of the board may be morally certain that the teacher is inefficient, intemperate, negligent, and frequently absent from duty, leading to the utter destruction of the school, without being able to establish much of it (except, perhaps, the condition of the school), on a trial in a court of law. It is not for the interest of the community that they should be deterred from dismissing the teacher, if they, the inspector, and the Board of Education, all concur in thinking that the interests of education require it, by the apprehension of a litigation with a dismissed teacher, in which they may be required to satisfy this Court also of the propriety of that step. The question may only regard a pension, but a pension means a higher school rate in a parish, and I am not disposed to countenance the notion that there must either be proof of delinquency in a court of law, or a pension and increased rate. This was not, I think, the intention of the Act, and so to construe it would be calculated to deter school boards from the due discharge of their duty." In every word of that passage, which I find in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, I concur, as expressing very clearly my own views on the subject.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur, chiefly on the authority of the case of Logiealmond in the other Division, and on the very strong grounds given by the Lord Ordinary in his note. The difficulty which I have felt is that the 60th section of the Act of 1872 has provided that schoolmasters appointed before that Act came into operation shall have all the rights they had under the Act of 1861, and thus in reality continues their former status under which they held their office ad vitam aut culpam. It seems clear that schoolmasters appointed before the late Act cannot be removed merely at the pleasure of the board, but only for fault, and my difficulty is that the Act does not expressly provide who are to decide whether there has been on the part of the schoolmaster sufficient fault to warrant his dismissal. The Act does not say that the school boards shall be the judges in all matters of fault. The question thus comes to be, can we make out from the statute, taken as a whole, that the school boards are meant to be the final judges in such cases, and that their decision must be accepted as final, unless in such flagrant instances of oppression as those suggested by your Lordships? I think it is much to be regretted that the statute was not made more explicit on this matter. It is quite proper that school boards should be the judges of fault on the part of schoolmasters; they have the best opportunity of being able to judge of fault; and it would be a very unfortunate result if every dismissed schoolmaster, who did not also get a pension, could call on the school board to prove the fault alleged, and to shew to the satisfaction of the ordinary Courts of the country that the decision of the school board was well founded. Of course in such action the judgment would be liable to all the known processes of review.

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

I concur in the view that in the general case school boards are the sole judges of the fault which warrants dismissal and in no case should there be review, unless oppression or some such ground is averred and proved.

I cannot say that I have come to this conclusion without difficulty, because it is only to be come to by gathering a meaning from the statute which is not set forth in it.

I think, however, that the reasons set forth by the Lord Ordinary, and very strong reasons of expediency, lead to this result.

There is another thing which tends to this conclusion, namely, that there is no provision for the trial as to fault in the statute. I think that shews that the school board is just to form an opinion upon the question. If, then, the case came to be tried in a court of law, that Court would really try the case for the first time. It seems unreasonable that the school board, with all its means of private knowledge, should be obliged to come into Court to try a case of such a kind before a body of strangers, who are ignorant of all the facts and circumstances which influenced them.

In the case of Whitburn,[1] my judgment in which was acquiesced in, both parties moved for and obtained an allowance of proof, so I really had no opportunity of considering the question raised here. I remember I was most unwilling to go on with the proof, and most doubtful of its competency, but that case turned out to be a simple one, and raised no practical difficulty. I am glad that the question may now be considered as settled, and that questions as to the nature or sufficiency of fault for which schoolmasters are dismissed are not to be tried by ordinary proof in this Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the result of the opinions delivered by your Lordships, and I think it both sound and salutary. This schoolmaster was [1] Not reported.

No. 125.

May 28, 1875.
Morison v. Glenshiel School Board.

dismissed for fault; it is for the school board to judge of that matter, and we are not here to review their decision. It thus becomes unnecessary for us to decide on the prejudicial question raised in the Lord Ordinary's note as to how far the school board have any power to give a retiring allowance to any but schoolmasters disabled by old age or infirmity. The Lord Ordinary points out that the 60th clause of the recent Act says nothing in regard to fault, but simply gives to the school board the same power as to retiring allowances as those which were possessed by the minister and heritors under the Act of 1861, and those powers were limited to cases of removal for incapacity arising from old age or infirmity. I wish it to be understood that in concurring in the proposed judgment I am not to be held as differing from the Lord Ordinary on that subject. I reserve my opinion should the question again arise. I think there is great weight in the Lord Ordinary's views, although as we are confirming the action of the school board it is unnecessary to give effect to them, even if we should think them sound.

THE COURT adhered.

GIFFORD & SIMPSON, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

MRS ISABELLA M'LAREN OR GOW AND ANOTHER (John Gow's Trustees), Petitioners and Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—M'Laren.
DAVID MEALLS, Respondent and Appellant.—D.-F. Clark—Lancaster.

Property—Title—Servitude—Acquiescence—Sheriff—Possessory Judgment.—In 1814 the proprietor of a village feu A acquired the adjoining feu B, and occupied both down to 1842. Prior to 1814 the access to the back court of each was by means of a passage within its own boundary. During the period from 1814 to 1842 the proprietor sometimes used the passage on B as a means of access to the back court of A. From 1842, when the properties again came to be possessed separately (A having been sold under a bond and disposition in security granted over it alone in 1831), down to 1863, the use of the passage on B as an access to the back court of A was continued and increased, and in 1863 the passage on A was shut up, and from that time till 1874 the passage on B was exclusively used as the access to the back courts of both properties.

In a Sheriff-court process of interdict at the instance of the proprietor of A against the proprietor of B, to prevent him obstructing this passage on B, held (1) that the claim of the proprietor of A was for a servitude right of way over the property of B; (2) that as it was competent for the Sheriff to entertain and decide on the merits of that claim, it was incompetent for him to decline to do so, and confine himself to a mere possessory judgment; (3) that the disposition of A in security in 1831 could not be construed as conferring by implication the right of servitude, the use of the passage on B not being at that date essential to the convenient enjoyment of A; and (4) that there were no termini habiles on which prescription could be pleaded.

Observations on the case of Cochrane v. Ewart.[1]

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling and Dumbarton.
M.

MRS ISABELLA M'LAREN or GOW and her daughter, as trustees of the late John Gow, proprietors of a feu in the village of Dunipace, in 1874 presented a petition in the Sheriff-court of Stirling against David Mealls, proprietor of the adjoining feu, in which they set forth "that the peti-

[1] Jan. 13, 1860, 22 D. 358, 32 Scot. Jur. 160—March 25, 1861, 23 D. (H. L.) 3, 4 Macq. 117, 33 Scot. Jur. 435.

No. 126. May 28, 1875. Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

tioners and their predecessors, as proprietors of the subjects before described, have for a period of upwards of forty years, by themselves and their tenants, used" a roadway or passage through the respondent's subjects "as an access or entrance, not only for foot-passengers, but also for horses, carts, and cattle, to their property, and the back premises thereon; that at least for a period of upwards of seven years they have possessed and exercised the right of access as aforesaid by said roadway or passage to their said property and back premises," and craved interdict against a threatened interruption on the part of the respondent.

The defence was "a denial of the whole statements in the petition as to the situation and past use of the so-called roadway or passage referred to in the petition, under the explanation that the same is included in the measurement of the respondent's property, and belongs exclusively to him, and that any use thereof which the petitioners, or their predecessors or tenants, may have been allowed to obtain has not continued for forty years and has not been founded on any written title, but has been granted only during the pleasure of the respondent and his predecessors or authors, and cannot constitute a right of servitude, or entitle the petitioners to a possessory judgment."

The history of the petitioners' subjects, as disclosed in the titles, and in a proof before answer allowed by the Sheriff-substitute, was as follows:—

In 1806 Andrew Adam obtained a feu from John Adie of the subjects described as "All and Haill that piece of ground presently possessed by himself, and whereon he is building a house," extending in measure to 14 falls and 22 ells of ground Scots measure, and bounded, inter alia, by a hedge separating it from Thomas Fleming's feu (the respondent's subjects), together with the whole privileges and pertinents thereto belonging. Adam possessed the subjects till his death in 1841. In the year 1831, however, he executed a bond and disposition in security over the subjects, under which they were brought to sale in 1842, the year following Adam's death. They were purchased by Alexander Forsyth, and subsequently, after passing through several other hands, they came in 1863 to be vested in the person of John Gow, joiner in Dunipace. He died in 1864, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement conveying them to the petitioners, his wife and daughter, as trustees.

The history of the respondent's subjects was this:—

In 1801 John Thomson obtained a feu of them, described as "All and Whole the foresaid weaving shop and piece of ground, extending in measure to 28 falls 4 ells Scots measure, or thereby, as lately possessed by the said William Thomson," bounded, inter alia, by the feu subsequently given off to the petitioners' author, with the haill parts, privileges, and pertinents thereto belonging. In the same year Thomson disponed them to Thomas Fleming, who possessed them till 1814. In 1814 they were acquired by Andrew Adam, who had already, in 1806, obtained the adjoining feu above mentioned. In the disposition to him they were described as "All and Whole that weaving shop, now converted into a dwelling-house, and piece of ground, extending in measure to 28 falls and 4 ells Scots measure, or thereby," &c., with the pertinents. They were possessed by Adam till his death in 1841, when they passed to his two children, John and Jean Adam, who in 1873 sold them to the respondent, David Mealls, joiner in Dunipace.

The subjects were similar, and each consisted of a piece of ground, whereon houses were erected facing the road, and of a back court or yard behind. Each feu had originally an access from the road in front to the back premises by means of a passage within its own boundary, but closely adjoining the march between the two subjects. In the case of the petitioners' subjects, the southmost of the two, the passage to this back court had been through an arched pend at the extreme north end of the property, where it marched with the respondent's subjects.

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

In the case of the respondent's subjects, which were the northmost of the two, the access to this back ground was by means of an open space left at the south end of the buildings, and along the south march of their ground, where it marched with the petitioners' property.

From 1814 till 1842, while the two properties were in the same hands, the use of the pend and of the open space was at first indiscriminate as an access to the back ground of both, but after a time the open space came to be used exclusively as such access, and the pend to be used as a lye for carts and other purposes. This continued down to the time when John Gow acquired the property in 1863. In that year Gow, on the request of the police authorities, built up the pend, as having become a public nuisance from harbouring vagrants. He and his predecessors since the separation of the two properties following on Adam's death, as well as his successors, had full and undisturbed use of the open space on the respondent's ground as an access to their back yard, until it was threatened to be shut up and built upon by the respondent David Mealls in the beginning of 1874.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sconce), on 19th May 1874, pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found that the petitioners' demand was a pure claim of servitude, and required forty years' possession to sustain it; that any use which Adam might have had of the open space on the respondent's ground as an access to the petitioners' back court was only for his own convenience as proprietor of both subjects, and as in occupation of both, and did not create and could not be the foundation of the prescription of any servitude right in favour of the proprietor of the petitioners' subjects over the subjects now belonging to the respondent; that whatever might be the nature of the use of the open space had by the petitioners and their authors subsequent to Adam's death and the separation of the properties, it did not extend to the prescriptive period; and he therefore refused the petition.

The respondent appealed.

The Sheriff (Blackburn), on 16th July 1874, pronounced an interlocutor recalling the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, and containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"Finds that, since the year 1863, the petitioners and the late John Gow have used the said space, roadway, or passage without interruption as an access to the back premises of their said property, for carts, cattle, and foot-passengers: Finds that, from the year 1826 down to 1863 the said space, roadway, or passage has been used by the petitioners' predecessors in the property and occupation of the said subjects, and without interruption, in a similar manner, though not exclusively for any of these purposes, as has been the case since 1863: Finds that the back premises, belonging to the petitioners, consist of a byre and other similar buildings, and a courtyard or dung court, and that access to said premises for carts is necessary: Finds that the respondent has recently interrupted the petitioners and their servants in their use of the said access: Finds that although the solum of the said access is not claimed by the petitioners, they claim a right of access over the said ground: Finds in law that the petitioners' title is sufficient to carry such a right; but finds that in respect the petitioners' and respondent's properties for many years prior to 1842 belonged in property to and were occupied by the same proprietor, the late Andrew Adam, there has been 'confusion' prior to that year, and no right of servitude can have been constituted by prescrip-

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

tion over the respondent's property: Therefore sustains the appeal, recalls the interlocutor appealed against, repels the defences, finds the petitioners entitled to a possessory judgment, ordains and interdicts the respondent in terms of the prayer of the petition, and decerns: Finds the respondent liable in expenses," &c.*

The respondent appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—(1) Both Sheriffs concurred in this, that it was impossible on the evidence to affirm the claim of Gow's trustees to a right of servitude. The logical result would have been to refuse the petition as the Sheriff-substitute had done. The Sheriff had gone wrong in limiting himself to a possessory judgment. In doing so he had declined to exercise a statutory jurisdiction. For it was a proper question of right which the petitioners had raised; and where it was competent to go to the Sheriff on a question of right, it was not competent to ask from him alternatively a possessory judgment as the petitioners had done. The Sheriff could only give a possessory judgment where his limited jurisdiction did not enable him to decide the question of right. (2) The Sheriff-substitute was right on the merits in holding that there was here no grant of a servitude—that there had been no acquisition of a servitude by prescriptive possession, for during a large part of the prescriptive period both subjects had been in the hands of a common proprietor, and res sua nemini servit,[1]—and that there was no room in the circumstances for applying the principle of implied grant as in the case of Cochrane v. Ewart.[2]

Argued for the petitioners, respondents in the Court of Session;—(1) The case was not strictly one of servitude. The right claimed was something less than a servitude—a right of access merely, arising out of the actings of parties, and which might be sustained on acquiescence, though less than the prescriptive period had passed. At any rate it was competent for the Sheriff to maintain it by a possessory judgment till the question of right was determined.[3] (2) The principle of the case of Cochrane v. Ewart did apply. There was an implied grant of this right of access to be inferred in the whole circumstances, rebus ipsis et factis, though there

---

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff does not, on full consideration of the able argument on both sides in this case, think he is called upon to decide more than the possessory question.

"It is no doubt competent for the Sheriff to decide questions of servitude, but the present case does not properly raise the question of right for decision, and neither petitioners nor respondent have dealt with the case, in the petition and defence respectively, as a case involving a judgment decisive of the right.

"The judgment now given is based on a consideration of the principles laid down with great clearness in the House of Lords in the case of Ewart v. Cochrane, 22d March 1861, 4 M'Queen, 117.

"It is quite true that on the question of prescription the petitioners could not succeed; but on the equitable principle enunciated in the decision referred to their title may be sufficient to establish their right, and at all events is sufficient to entitle them to the possessory judgment they now seek."

[1] Bell's Prin., sec. 997; Ersk. 2, 9, 37; Donaldson's Trustees v. Forbes, Feb. 1, 1839, 1 D. 449, 11 Scot. Jur. 284.

[2] Vide supra, p. 729, note.

[3] Johnstone v. Murray, March 5, 1862, 24 D. 709, 34 Scot. Jur. 350; Thomson v. Murdoch, May 21, 1862, 24 D. 975, 34 Scot. Jur. 482; Calder v. Adam, March 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 645, 42 Scot. Jur. 319; M'Donald v. Dempster, Nov. 15, 1871, 10 Macph. 94; Stobbs v. Caven, March 14, 1873, 11 Macph. 530, 45 Scot. Jur. 340; M'Laren's Trustees v. Kerr, Oct. 25, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 60.

was neither express grant or prescriptive possession.[1] (3) Things were not entire, for expense had been incurred in building up the old access on the petitioners' own property, and the respondent, having bought in the knowledge of the state of possession, could not be heard thereafter to complain.[2]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The precise state of the facts is material to the decision of this case, and we should therefore have them clearly before us.

The history of the case begins with the acquisition, by Andrew Adam, in 1806, of the subjects which now belong to the respondents. These he acquired, as original vassal, by feu-contract, which we have printed in the appendix, and which conveys to him a piece of ground, the exact measurement of which is given, and on which he is said to have been then building a house. This piece of ground he possessed by itself till 1814, when he purchased the adjoining subjects which now belong to the appellant, and which had been originally feued out, in 1801, to John Thomson. The conveyance in this case also was of a specific piece of ground of exact measurement. Adam thus, in 1814, became proprietor of both the respondents' and the appellant's subjects, and from 1814 he retained possession of both until his death in 1841. In the course of this possession he erected additional buildings on both. In 1831 Adam granted a bond and disposition in security over the first mentioned subjects, viz., those acquired in 1806, but this effected no change in the possession during his lifetime. In 1842, however, the year following his death, the subjects were brought to sale by the creditor under the power in his bond. After passing through one or two other hands the property was, in 1863, acquired by John Gow, the respondents' author.

Adam left a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed the other property, viz., that acquired in 1814, to his wife and children. This they retained till 1873, when they sold it to the appellant.

That is the history of the various transmissions of the two different subjects. Now, it appears that part of the first mentioned subject, that belonging to the respondents, consisted of an open shed or pend abutting on the march between the two properties, and adjoining a space which was then and still is open ground, belonging to the other property. This pend was used partly as a covered place for laying up carts, and partly as an access to the back ground or court. It is not clear when this shed or pend was erected, but it was so erected as to afford this passage or access when required. It did not give such ready and complete access as would have existed had there been no building at all, but it was sufficient for the necessary purposes of the proprietors. Adam was, however, in the habit sometimes of using this pend, and sometimes of using the open space adjoining, but forming part of the last mentioned or appellant's subjects, as a means of access to the back ground of the first mentioned or respondents' subjects. Latterly this open space came to be more and more exclusively used and the pend to be disused, until, in 1863, Gow, the then owner of the respondents' subjects, was called upon by the police authorities to build up the pend to prevent its becoming a public nuisance by harbouring vagrants and such like.

---

[1] Preston's Trustees v. Preston, March 7, 1844, 22 D. 366, 16 Scot. Jur. 433.
[2] Muirhead v. Glasgow Highland Society, Jan. 15, 1864, 2 Macph. 420, 36 Scot. Jur. 201.

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

From that date the open space on the appellant's ground has been used exclusively as an access to the back ground of both properties.

Adam's representatives having now sold their property to the appellant, he has raised the question whether the respondents are entitled, as matter of right, to the use of the open space belonging to him as an access to the back part of their property.

Now, there is no question that the whole of the open space over which the respondents claim a right of passage is within the feu of 1801, and belongs in property to the appellant. It is plain also that the claim of the respondents is to a right of passage or access to their own property, through or over the appellant's property, and therefore it is a claim to a proper right of servitude. It is not an innominate privilege in favour of the one subject and burdening the other which is claimed, but a proper right of servitude of way. The action, therefore, competently raised before the Sheriff the whole merits of the dispute between the parties, and not a mere possessory question. When a possessory judgment regarding an heritable right is made the foundation of action in the Sheriff-court, it is implied that the Sheriff is not in a position to settle the ultimate dispute between the parties; that he can only regulate possession ad interim, until the parties have obtained a decision of the Supreme Court on the merits of their case. But here the question is one of servitude; the Sheriff is competent to deal with it unreservedly, and he ought to have entertained and disposed of the merits of the question. I am of opinion that, in confining himself to a possessory judgment, he has gone wrong; and that, on the merits, we must return in substance to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

There is no grant of a right of servitude founded on, and though there has been use to a certain extent and effect, there are no termini habiles on which prescription can be pleaded. The properties came into the same hands in 1814, and were possessed together from that date to 1842. During that time, therefore, prescription could not run in favour of one against the other—res sua nemini servit. From prescriptive use the law does indeed imply a grant. But the proprietor's own use can never imply a grant to himself. Not only so, but even if there had been any ground for saying that prescription was running prior to the union of the two properties—which there is not in the present case—that union would interrupt the currency of prescription. As, then, there was nothing on which to found prescription prior to 1842, and as, whatever may have been the state of possession since 1842, the prescriptive period has not yet run, there has been clearly no acquisition of a servitude by prescription in the present case.

There remains only to consider whether the claim now made falls under the principle recognised in the case of Cochrane v. Ewart, viz., that the use claimed is so essential to the convenient enjoyment of the respondents' subjects as to lead to the implication that when they were severed from the united property they carried with them this right of servitude. That there may be such cases is not denied. A proprietor may have so burdened a part of his property with uses—or, as the English call them, easements—that when he parts with the remainder the constitution of a servitude or servitudes may be implied in his grant; that along with the property which he is disponing there must be understood to go the privileges annexed, when they can reasonably be said to be essential to the convenient enjoyment of that which is conveyed. It is easy to imagine many circumstances in which questions of light, air, water, or drainage,

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

must lead to this as an equitable conclusion. Such was the case of Cochrane v. Ewart. The Lord Chancellor there says,—"I consider the law of Scotland as well as the law of England to be, that when two properties are possessed by the same owner, and there has been a severance made of one part from the other, anything which was used and was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of that part of the property which is granted shall be considered to follow from the grant." . . . . "When I say it was necessary, I do not mean that it was so essentially necessary that the property could have no value whatever without this easement, but I mean that it was necessary for the convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the property as it existed before the time of the grant." In these remarks I entirely concur.

The question then remains, was the use of this piece of ground, as an access, necessary for the convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the respondents' subjects as they existed at the time they were again separated from the appellant's? It is not enough to say that the common proprietor used his property as he thought most for his own benefit. Something more than that is needed. The use of the one subject must be necessary for the convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the other, so as to admit the inference of implied grant in the conveyance of the divided property.

The present case does not, in my opinion, stand the test of this rule, and does not therefore fall under the principle of the case of Cochrane v. Ewart. There were originally two separate subjects, each capable of being fully enjoyed by itself, and independently of the other. They were so possessed and enjoyed for some time prior to 1814, when they came into the hands of a common proprietor. That he used the one to give access to both is by itself a matter of no moment. Had he possessed a dwelling-house and a warehouse adjoining one another he might, for his own convenience, have used his dwelling-house as a means of access to his warehouse; but it could never be contended that when he sold his warehouse the buyer was to have, by implied grant, an entrance through the dwelling-house. Yet that would be as reasonable as the present contention. We have here two separate tenements each fronting the high road. That of the appellant's has certainly the more convenient access to the back ground of both. But that of the respondents' has a perfectly good and sufficient access whenever the proprietors choose to open it up, and it was sufficient when the tenements were separated. It is impossible to hold that the use of the appellant's ground was in any way essential to the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of the respondents' property at the date of the disposition in security in 1831; and, therefore, it is impossible to infer that the separation of the two properties in 1831 carried with it an implied constitution of a servitude over the former in favour of the latter.

The respondents' case, therefore, fails in every view.

LORD NEAVES.—The real question here is, whether this case comes under the same category as that of Cochrane v. Ewart,—whether, that is, these two properties having been at one time held by a common proprietor, when the one of them came to be again separated from the other, such a state of things was found to exist as naturally leads to the presumption that both parties were at one in the understanding that a servitude was created in favour of that which was separated over that which remained.

In determining this question, it is most material to inquire whether, if the properties were originally separated, there existed any right of servitude between them prior to their being united in the hands of a common proprietor. If there did not, and if the two properties were separately possessed and enjoyed without any such right of servitude having been created, then, though it may not be conclusive of the matter, the presumption is against the implied grant of a servitude by the common proprietor when he comes to part with one of them.

No. 126.
May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

Just take the case of two adjacent fields which originally belonged to different proprietors coming into the hands of one man, and suppose that when united they are bounded on two sides by a high road. Though each has access to the high road the common proprietor may, for his own convenience, make a short cut diagonally from corner to corner, and so give each of them a slightly more convenient access to the high road through the other. If he, again, part with one of them, is that short cut to be kept up for ever? Certainly not. There must be some reasonable ground for saying that the servitude claimed is necessary for the convenient enjoyment of the part sold off, is, in fact, so necessary that the purchaser would not, as a reasonable man, have bought without it. Now, here, instead of being a reasonable necessity, the servitude claimed is rather a superfluous luxury. The same pend exists to the respondents as an access to their property which was used before, and even for a long time after the two properties came to be united under one proprietor. They can get through it all the access really required to their back premises. There is therefore a total want in this case of that reasonable necessity which alone can be the foundation of what is sought to be established—namely, an implied grant of a servitude, where there has been no express grant and no constitution by prescription.

Lord Ormidale.—In the present case we have to start with this most important circumstance that these two subjects were held by Adam under different titles, each containing accurate measurements, so that if the right of passage claimed by the respondents has been really acquired it must have been, originally at least, an encroachment upon the appellant's property. Still, though not expressly granted, it might have been acquired by prescriptive possession; and the petition is laid, in the first place, on that ground. There is also an alternative ground to the effect that if the petitioners failed on the first, if they could not make out prescriptive possession, they were still entitled to a possessory judgment in respect of seven years' possession. This latter part of their case was, I think, ultimately abandoned, or, at any rate, not seriously insisted in, in respect that nothing was to be gained by a possessory judgment, as the parties would be left to fight the question over again under another form of action. The question was one of servitude; the Sheriff had competent jurisdiction to try the case on that footing, and after the parties had gone deliberately into the more important question and led all the proof they could on that question, I am not satisfied that the petitioners could ultimately limit their demand to a possessory judgment. Their opponent was entitled, in my opinion, to say that as the matter of right had been competently raised and tried it required to be determined.

On the facts of the case there can be no doubt, I think, that not only was there no express grant of a servitude, but also there has been no acquisition of one by prescriptive possession. But there remains a question which, though not raised on record, must be determined in order to dispose of the whole case between the parties, and that is, whether there was not an implied grant of a servitude. Now, it is quite clear that the creditors, in 1831, and the purchaser from him, in 1842, could acquire nothing more than was in the bond and disposition in security by Adam to the former. But the question is, whether, on the principle of Cochrane v. Ewart, as decided in the House of Lords, the disposition in security did not include an implied grant of the right of passage in dispute. I agree, however, with your Lordships that the present case does not fall under the principle of Cochrane v. Ewart. In that case the Lord Chancellor stated that he held the law of England and Scotland to be the same in this matter, and he refers to the case of Pyer v. Carter,[1] where I find the principle still more clearly stated than even in the case of Cochrane v. Ewart. The Lord Chancellor says, in Cochrane's case,—"Anything which was used and was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of that part of the property which is granted shall be considered to follow from the grant." And Baron Watson, in Pyer v. Carter, thus explains the word "necessary." By it "is to be understood the necessity at the time of the conveyance, and as matters then stood, without alteration, and whether or not, at the time of the conveyance, there was any other outlet for the drainage water, and matters as they then stood must be looked at for the necessity of the drainage." Now, although Cochrane's and Pyer's cases related to drains, the expressions used by the Lord Chancellor and Baron Watson are equally applicable here. The question therefore is, was the passage now claimed reasonably necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of the respondents' property at the time the disposition in security was granted, and as matters then stood? That has not, I think, been established. There was then existing the original access by means of the pend, quite sufficient for all reasonable uses and purposes; and looking at the nature of the two adjoining properties, the claim for another passage would, I think, at the date of the disposition in security, have been neither necessary nor reasonable.

No. 126.

May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

This case therefore does not, in my opinion, fall within the principle of Cochrane v. Ewart, and I concur accordingly in the proposed judgment.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the property of the appellant (respondent in the Sheriff-court) was originally feued out in 1801 by the feu-contract, No. 5/1 of process, and acquired by his author, Andrew Adam, in 1814, and that the measurement therein specified comprehended the ground in dispute: Find that the property of the respondents (petitioners in the Sheriff-court) was acquired by Adam in 1806, and that the title, No. 8/1 of process, also contained specific boundaries and measurement: Find that Adam, during his occupancy of both properties, used as an access to the back premises sometimes a pend or open archway erected on the property of the respondents, and sometimes the ground in dispute: Find that, in 1831, Adam granted a bond and disposition in security over the property of the respondents, and that the creditor, in 1842, sold this property under the powers of his bond, and it has been transmitted to the respondents: Find that, down to 1863, the ground in question has been from time to time used as an access to the back ground along [1] Feb. 21, 1857, 1 Hurl. and Norm. 916.

No. 126.
May 28, 1875.
Gow's Trustees v. Mealls.

with the open archway: Find that the respondents' author built up the latter access in 1863, and that the only access since then has been over the ground in question: Find that the claim made under this petition is that of a servitude of way which the Sheriff was competent to decide: Find that no servitude has been constituted by prescription, and that the bond and disposition in security granted in 1831, which is the title of the respondents, did not convey to the disponee by implication any such right, and that the same is not essential or necessary to the enjoyment of the subjects disponed: Therefore, sustain the appeal; recall the judgment appealed against; refuse the prayer of the petition, and recall the interdict; assoilzie the appellant, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in both Courts," &c.

MILLAR, ALLARDICE, & ROBSON, W.S.—J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 127.
June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

JOHN GOURLAY (Pinkerton's Trustee), Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Guthrie Smith.
WILLIAM HODGE, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Asher—Alison.

Bankrupt—Sale—Security—Statute 1696, c. 5.—On 16th May 1874 P and Son, merchants, received from H £500, and granted the following written obligation:—"We have this day received from you £500; and we hereby promise to give you, within one month from this date, delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for wheat, oats, beans, or Ind. corn, to the full value." P and Son then purchased grain in the market from various persons on credit, and between 22d May and 8th June handed delivery-orders therefor to the value of £238 to H. P and Son were sequestrated on 25th June.

In an action brought by the trustee on P and Son's estate, held (rev. judgment of Lord Young) that the deliveries of grain were reducible as granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction or further security of a prior debt in preference to other creditors within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 5.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

THE estates of James Pinkerton and Son, merchants in Glasgow, and of James Pinkerton senior and James Pinkerton junior, the individual partners, were sequestrated on 25th June 1874. On 16th May 1874 the bankrupt, James Pinkerton junior, on behalf of his firm, had received from his father-in-law, William Hodge, brickmaker and contractor, the sum of £500, granting at the same time a letter in the following terms:—"37 Hope Street, Glasgow, 16th May 1874.—Mr Wm. Hodge, 4 Great-Eastern Road.—Dear Sir,—We have this day received from you the sum of (£500) five hundred pounds sterling, and we hereby promise to give you, within one month from this date, delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for wheat, oats, beans, or Ind. corn, to the full value, viz., £500.

"JAMES PINKERTON and SON."

Thereafter, at various dates between 22d May and 8th June 1874, Mr Hodge received from the firm delivery-orders for various quantities of peas, oats, and beans, of the value of £238, 5s., with a discharged account for the same. These goods were bought by the bankrupts on credit, and were not to be paid for till dates subsequent to 25th June 1874.

John Gourlay, as trustee on Pinkerton's estate, raised the present action against Mr Hodge, concluding for reduction of the account above mentioned, and of the deliveries of grain, and for declarator that the grain was fraudulently delivered to Hodge in order to defeat the rights of the other creditors of the bankrupts, and for decree to redeliver the grain, and failing redelivery, for payment of £238, 5s.

No. 127.

June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The oats, beans, and peas specified in the foresaid account having been given in security of or satisfaction of a prior debt within sixty days of bankruptcy, contrary to the terms of the statute 1696, c. 5, the pursuer is entitled to have the transaction reduced and set aside as concluded for. (3) The parties being conjunct and confident, and delivery having been given without any just, true, and necessary cause, the transaction is null and reducible.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The goods in question having been delivered in partial implement of a contract of sale, under which the price had been paid by the defender, the action is untenable. (3) The action, so far as founded on the statute 1696, cap. 5, cannot be maintained, in respect the deliveries were made, not in satisfaction or security of a prior debt, but in fulfilment pro tanto of the bankrupts' obligations under the contract of 16th May 1874, which were the counterpart of the payment then made to them by the defender. (4) The deliveries not having been made to a conjunct or confident person without a just, true, or necessary cause, to the prejudice of prior creditors, they are not challengeable under the Act 1621, c. 18. (5) The defender having, under the transaction in question, paid the sum of £500 to the bankrupts within sixty days of bankruptcy, in consideration and on the faith of performance of their counter obligations as to delivery, and the deliveries made in pursuance of the contract having been of much less value than the said sum, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

A proof was taken before the Lord Ordinary. The material facts proved appear in the Lord President's opinion. There was no entry of the transaction in the business books of the defender.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the deliveries of the goods referred to in the summons and in the record were not in contravention of the Act 1696, c. 5: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and remits," &c.*

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that the deliveries of the goods referred to in the record were not contrary to the Act 1696. I think they were not voluntary within the meaning of that Act. The bankrupt was not volunteering a preference to his father-in-law over other creditors, but was doing exactly what was to be expected of him, in consequence of his obligation by the letter of 16th May 1874. As Mr Asher observed, there might have been difficulty in specifically enforcing that obligation, but there can be no doubt as to the true intent and meaning of it, and the honest duty of the obligant under it; and I think he acted only according to the true intent and meaning of it, and of his own obligation under it, when he granted delivery-orders, in pursuance of which the deliveries in question took place. No doubt such deliveries might have been made under circumstances which a Court of justice must have characterised as fraudulent; but there are no such circumstances here. I have no reason whatever, upon the evidence, to conclude that the deliveries now challenged were made otherwise than in honest pursuance of the obligation come under a very short while before,—on 16th May, when the £500 was advanced; and, seeing no reason to doubt the integrity of the whole matter, I am not of opinion that the rule of the Act 1696 applies to the effect of operating what would be, in my opinion, the substantial injustice of making the defender pay twice over for the same goods. I think the advance of £500 on 16th May was undoubtedly made in perfect good faith, and in reliance upon the obligation the defender received to supply him with oats for his horses. The only circumstance which makes one hesitate for a moment is, that the quantities were larger than were needed for the immediate consumption of the defender's stables, and probably, although on that matter the evidence is not so clear, larger than the stores of provender which the defender was in the habit of laying in within a similar

No. 127.
June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—A promise to grant a security will not entitle the bankrupts to grant the security within sixty days. This was not an ordinary business transaction, but a much larger one than usual. The deliveries here were made in implement of the prior obligation, and were therefore struck at by the Act 1696, c. 5.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer is trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Pinkerton and Son, merchants in Glasgow. Sequestration was awarded on the 25th day of June 1874, and the object of the action is to reduce and set aside certain deliveries of grain made by the bankrupts to William Hodge, who is the father-in-law of James Pinkerton, one of the partners of the bankrupt firm, between the 22d day of May and the 8th day of June, within the period of constructive bankruptcy. The action seems to be laid not only on the Act 1696, but also on fraud at common law. But the ground of challenge relied upon in the argument was, that the deliveries were made in satisfaction of a prior debt, and were therefore challengeable under the Act 1696. The reply made is that the deliveries are not challengeable, because they were the natural performance of a prior obligation contained in the letter of 16th May 1874. It is necessary to attend, 1st, to the terms of the obligation contained in that letter; 2d, to the nature and circumstances of the deliveries made between 22d May and 8th June.

The letter is expressed in rather remarkable terms. It is signed by the bankrupts, Pinkerton and Son, and is addressed to Mr Hodge,—"We have this day received from you the sum of (£500) five hundred pounds sterling, and we hereby promise to give you, within one month from this date, delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for wheat, oats, beans, or Ind. corn, to the full value, viz., £500." The defender represents this transaction as being a sale, and perhaps it partakes of the nature of a sale more than of any other nominate contract. It is a very peculiar sale, if it be a sale at all, because the purchaser immediately advances the price of the commodity he is to buy, while the corpus of the grain is not ascertained, but the seller comes under an obligation to deliver grain, or to deliver orders for grain, within one month. The delivery of any grain, period. But upon consideration, I am not greatly moved by either of those circumstances, for it is quite intelligible that a man who has advanced money to his ordinary fodder merchant, should take delivery-orders for the delivery of a larger quantity than he needs for immediate consumpt, and the quantities here are certainly not of such an amount as to excite any suspicion. They put him in the position of having a larger stock of fodder in store than he perhaps was accustomed to have, but he had advanced £500 to his fodder merchant in reliance that the fodder should be so delivered; and the deliveries not being under circumstances which even raise a suspicion of fraud, I think they must stand good to the defender who received them.

---

"I shall therefore find that the deliveries of the goods referred to in the summons and on record were not in contravention of the Act 1696, and I shall therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

[1] Authorities cited.—Stiven v. Scott and Simson, June 30, 1871, 9 Macph. 923, 43 Scot. Jur. 511; Gibson v. Forbes, July 9, 1833, 11 S. 916, 5 Scot. Jur. 542; Taylor v. Farrie, March 8, 1855, 17 D. 639, 27 Scot. Jur. 266; Miller's Trustee v. Shield, March 19, 1862, 24 D. 821, 34 Scot. Jur. 416; Young v. Johnston, June 25, 1783, M. 1141.

No. 127.

June 2, 1875.

Gourlay v. Hodge.

whether in possession of the bankrupts or not, subsequently acquired, and however acquired, would be fulfilment of their obligation.

Then the deliveries which actually were made were under somewhat peculiar circumstances. Various portions of grain are specified in the account, but none of them were in the possession of the bankrupts either at the date of the obligation or at the date of the delivery. They seem to have been acquired for the purpose of fulfilling the obligation. They were bought on credit from various parties, and the price of the different parcels of grain were all payable at dates subsequent to the sequestration. The delivery was made not by actual deliveries of grain, but by giving delivery-orders on persons from whom the grain was bought, or on storekeepers, with whom the sellers of the grain had lodged it.

I do not think the circumstances of the transaction are much disguised by the parties. James Pinkerton junior, one of the partners of the bankrupt firm, says in evidence,—"Prior to May 1874 my father-in-law told me he would not grant us any further accommodation in the way of bills, but that he would help us if we needed it by advancing money against grain to be afterwards delivered. It was in consequence of that I proposed this mode of accommodation on 16th May. It was understood between my father-in-law and me at the time that, in return for the £500, he should receive delivery-orders from us for grain to be consumed by himself in the course of his business. The delivery-orders we gave him were in pursuance of that bargain." It is plain that the object of the transaction was to afford money accommodation to the bankrupts, and that the counterpart of the contract was simply an obligation to pay off the defender by deliveries of grain. Mr Hodge does not express himself in the same way as his son-in-law, but his evidence comes to the same result. "I had intimated to him that I would give him no more accommodation bills, and that at any time I had money beside me I could purchase grain, so far as I pleased, for my horses. My son-in-law did not want accommodation at that time, and did not propose it. He inquired if I stood in need of grain, and said he was a little tight for money for the following day. I agreed to give him £500, and he was to give me grain at the market price as I required it for feeding purposes." In short, it came to this, that, in consideration of an actual payment of £500, the bankrupts undertook to make deliveries of grain to that amount as Hodge should require it in his business. Now, Hodge's business was that of a contractor, and he kept horses for the purposes of his business, and it was for the feeding of these horses that the grain was required. This was the only purpose for which it was required. But we know something about the extent of the business. The consumption was about 9¾ bolls per week, which is ascertained to be about £10, 17s. 4d. in money value. When, therefore, Hodge advanced £500, he must be held to have been buying grain for a whole year, which was entirely contrary to the custom of his business. Anything more unlike a business transaction it is impossible to conceive. But the question is, whether these deliveries of grain were in contravention of the Act 1696 as being in security or satisfaction of a prior debt. I cannot have the least hesitation in saying that they are exactly of that description. The obligation is to make the deliveries, and the deliveries are made in satisfaction of that prior obligation. It will not do to adhere to the exact words of the statute, because the statute has received a great deal of interpretation. Whether you regard this as a personal contract of sale, or as an advance of money with an obligation to grant a security, the result is the same; it is only an obligation to deliver goods, but no specific quantity of goods. It is of as general a kind as if it had been to pay money. Any grain which might be delivered at the option of the seller would be fulfilment of the obligation, and the buyer would have been very glad to get it so as to be secure of his £500. While the security is not specific, the right of the creditor who has advanced the money is not to demand immediate performance of the obligation. On the contrary, the performance here was to be postponed according to the convenience of the debtor. This makes the case fall under the Act 1696, c. 5. I am not going to enter into an exposition of the law, because I did so recently in the case of Stiven v. Scott and Simson. Referring, therefore, to the opinion I gave in that case, I am clearly of opinion that this transaction falls under the Act 1696, and that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and decern in the reduction.

No. 127. June 2, 1875. Gourlay v. Hodge.

LORD DEAS.—I am so entirely of the opinion expressed by your Lordship that it is scarcely necessary that I should say anything. I agree that this was a very anomalous kind of transaction. Upon the face of the letter of 16th May 1874 I do not see how it can be said to have been a loan. The parties may have intended it to be a loan, but there is nothing in the letter to shew that repayment was contemplated. It comes nearer to a contract of sale than to any other nominate contract. But it is certainly not a contract of sale in the ordinary course of business. It is necessary, however, to observe that even in an ordinary contract of sale, if the purchaser thinks proper to pay the price, without getting delivery of the article, he becomes merely a personal creditor in the obligation to deliver. This cannot be more distinctly stated than in the words of Professor Bell:—"Every one who trusts his money or property on a mere personal engagement is a creditor; and there is in legal principle no distinction in the jus ad rem to which alone he trusts, whether the obligation be to pay money or to grant a deed; and bankruptcy, actual or constructive, stops the hand of the debtor from doing any act by which the condition of any one creditor is to be made better at the expense of the rest." While, however, that is the law, there has been what may perhaps be regarded as a relaxation of the strict rule recognised in certain very special circumstances, which will be found to have occurred in combination in each of the following cases:—Gibson v. Forbes, July 9, 1833, 11 S. 916; Taylor v. Farrie, March 8, 1855, 17 D., 639; and Miller's Trustee v. Shield, March 19, 1862, 24 D. 821. But in each of these cases the transaction took place, in the fullest sense, in the ordinary course of business; the right to immediate delivery was absolute; the goods, which formed the subject-matter of the transaction, were specific—distinguishable from everything else in the premises of the custodier—left there temporarily for the mere convenience of the other party, upon an express contract that the goods were held solely for him, so that although bona fide third parties, transacting on the footing of ostensible ownership, might have been safe, the custodier would have committed a fraud if he voluntarily dealt with the goods as a fund of credit, or in any way interfered with them for his own purposes. Such an arrangement may occasionally be so necessary or convenient as to be quite reasonable and legitimate. In the case of wine for instance, which formed the subject-matter of the case of Gibson, the purchaser may not have a cellar, immediately accessible, in which the wine can be safely placed and kept.

But in all these cases the subject-matter of the transaction was fixed and specific. In the case of Gibson a difficulty arose from newer wine being, at a particular period, substituted, by agreement of parties, for the older wine. But that difficulty in law was obviated so soon as it was held in point of fact that the new wine was a mere substitute (for reasons explained) for the old, the quantity being the same, and equally ear-marked as formerly, by being described as the contents of particular bins.

In the case of Taylor v. Farrie the subject-matter of the transaction was likewise specific,—being a certain brick and tile work, with all its appurtenances, at Levenhall, near Musselburgh, along with the lease of the premises. There was a question of fact whether the transaction was for a partnership or a sale, but that was settled by its being found that the transaction was a sale. The rubric of the case, as reported, states the result too generally, by representing it as having been held "that the transference, having been specific implement of an obligation ad factum præstandum, and overtaken beyond the sixty days, was not voluntary or in satisfaction of a prior debt." It is true that expressions of that kind occur in the opinion of the consulted Judges, the authority of which is not to be questioned, but the opinion is to be read in connection with the case in which it was delivered, and that was a case in which the subjects sold were specific, although that is not pointed out otherwise than by stating (which, however, is done distinctly) what the subjects were.

In Miller v. Shield there was some excess in the quantity of 100 tons of guano, which formed the subject-matter of the transaction; but that objection was obviated by holding that, in point of fact, the quantity in the warehouse had been estimated at 100 tons, and that the nature of the transaction was not changed by its turning out unexpectedly to be somewhat more.

But when we examine the present case we find that the material features of these cases are totally awanting. It was impossible that the articles here could be set aside for the defender in the custody of the bankrupts, for the bankrupts had them not. They had not then themselves either purchased or obtained delivery of them. At the outset of the proof "counsel for the defender admitted that the grain specified in cond. 4 was not in possession of the bankrupts at 16th May 1874." That is the date of the letter relied on. And in the minute and answers now lodged we have it distinctly admitted that the purchases were not then made, and of course the delivery-orders ultimately handed to the defender, did not then exist. In his answers to the minute the defender further says,—The defender, when he received the delivery-orders, did not know where or from whom the grain to which they applied had been bought by the bankrupts, or whether it had been paid for by them. But he admits that none of the purchases, so far as they can be traced, have been paid for, and that the sellers (with the single exception of one, who has not been traced) have all been ranked for the prices in the sequestration,—a tolerably significant illustration of how transactions of this sort, if held not to be struck at by the statute, might operate to produce results which the statute was meant to prevent. The Lord Ordinary does not enable us to know whether he had in view any or which of the decided cases. He rests mainly, I think, on there being no fraud on the part of the defender. But while it was, no doubt, an object of the statute 1696 to limit the practicability of frauds, difficult or incapable of detection, an allegation of fraud is not necessary to bring a transaction within that statute. The great object was to prevent undue preferences, and promote equalisation among creditors. It is plain enough, on the face of the evidence of the bankrupt, James Pinker-

No. 127.
June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

ton junior, that he was conscious of insolvency at the time he asked and got the advance of £500 from his father-in-law, the defender. He says,—"I don't think I told him the bank had refused to discount our bills." But the fact was so, whether he told the defender or not, and the latter could not read the terms of the vague and indefinite acknowledgment he accepted for the money without seeing that it imported, to say the least of it, a very unusual and anomalous transaction between parties who stood in the relation they did to each other, calculated, if carried out, to keep him safe at the expense of whomsoever else the bankrupt might choose to subject to the loss.

At all events, the transaction was not one which comes under the category of any of the cases founded on by the defender. It is rather within the principle of the case of Stiven v. Scott and Simson, 30th June 1871, 9 Macph. 923, in which, although the circumstances are different, some of the observations I had occasion to make might, with little change of phraseology, be repeated here.

For these reasons, and those assigned by your Lordship, I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This action of reduction, under the Act 1696, involves a question of some difficulty, and of great importance. Every question touching the equality and impartiality of administration in bankruptcy is important, and more particularly the construction of this statute of 1696 is important.

In the present case, the nature of the transaction, and the circumstances surrounding the transaction complained of, must be carefully kept in view; and in reference to these circumstances we must endeavour to apply the law, construing the statute according to its terms, having regard to the judicial interpretation thereof furnished by the decisions.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender, and has clearly and forcibly explained the grounds of his opinion. After careful study of the authorities and of the Lord Ordinary's reasoning I have been compelled to come to a different conclusion.

I think that the transaction here challenged was in contravention of the Act 1696. The aspect most favourable to the defender in which the case is presented is that of a transaction for prepayment of "wheat, oats, beans, or Indian corn," to be supplied within a month by the bankrupts to the defender to the full value of £500. That sum of £500 was paid by the defender to the bankrupts on 16th May 1874, and the letter founded on, constituting the counter obligation, was then granted on receipt of the money. The price of the grain was to be "the full value," or the best market value, and the supply was to be delivered within one month, and to be procured from any store in Glasgow. These delivery-orders were accordingly given to the amount of £238, 5s., and the grain was to that value delivered accordingly. The whole of this transaction in all its parts, the payment of the £500, the granting of the counter obligation, the delivery-orders, and the actual deliveries of grain, were all within sixty days before bankruptcy. The sequestration was on the 25th June 1874.

I think it important to observe that on the 16th of May 1874 the grain was not in the premises or in the possession of the bankrupts. It was to be procured by them, and might be procured from any store in Glasgow. There was no separation, no specification or appropriation by marking, numbering, storing, or otherwise, of the article to be supplied. The defender says he wanted the oats to feed his horses, and that, in order to secure this, he made a prepayment, and

No. 127.
June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

stipulated for delivery within one month of a supply sufficient for ten months. As the price of what was to be delivered was the market price or full value the defender could have got the supply anywhere. The transaction was not for his benefit; but he, not unnaturally, transacted with the bankrupt, and for the benefit of the bankrupt, who was his son-in-law.

I do not proceed on the imputation or assumption of actual fraud. Fraud is not necessary to sustain a reduction under the Act 1696, and the trustee has not maintained that fraud, as a ground of reduction at common law, has been proved. But, on the other hand, it cannot be overlooked that the transaction originated, not in the defender's need of supply of grain, which could have been easily obtained, but in the bankrupt's need of pecuniary accommodation. It appears that one of the bankrupts being in need of money, and having been refused accommodation, called on the defender, his father-in-law, expressing a wish for assistance by loan or accommodation. The response is found in this transaction. The bankrupt himself states the matter thus:—"Prior to May 1874 my father-in-law told me he would not grant us any further accommodation in the way of bills, but that he would help us, if we needed it, by advancing money against grain to be afterwards delivered. It was in consequence of that I proposed this mode of accommodation on 16th May." The advance was made accordingly, but it is admitted that it was not entered in the defender's books. It was not an ordinary purchase.

A debt was thus constituted. The defender was creditor, and the debtor's obligation was to repay the advance in money's worth by delivery-orders of grain. Every delivery-order on a store in Glasgow for the kinds of grain mentioned in the letter was, when followed by delivery, a repayment pro tanto of the advance, an extinction pro tanto of a prior debt. Had the grain been at the date of the transaction in the possession of the bankrupts, and sold as a lot of grain in his possession, or, had it been even in another store, set apart and identified so as to be susceptible of discriminating recognition as the particular grain to be delivered, a different question would have been raised, but in this case no specific and separated quantity of grain was set aside or was susceptible of distinction and appropriation, as the particular subject of the transaction, as the lot or lots of grain which the defender had purchased and which the bankrupt was bound to deliver. There could indeed be no such specific appropriation, for the grain was procured from time to time by the bankrupts, and till the delivery-orders were given it was entirely at their disposal.

These facts,—1st, that accommodation to the bankrupts, rather than the purchase of grain by the defender, was the purpose and intention of the transaction of 16th May 1874, and that by the advance a prior debt was constituted; 2d, that the stipulated mode of repaying the advance was by giving within a month delivery-orders on any stores in Glasgow; 3d, that the grain was in no manner separated, marked off, or specificated, and that the obligation was general, and the grain remained till delivery entirely under the control and at the disposal of the bankrupts, and that all the orders and the deliveries were within sixty days of bankruptcy; and, 4thly, that there was no contract for immediate delivery, and no right to enforce immediate delivery or delivery earlier than within one month;—are beyond question, and are most important. Viewing them in combination I have arrived at the conclusion that the transaction was truly for the accommodation of the bankrupts, and that the delivery-orders and deliveries were given in contravention of the Act of 1696.

No. 127.

June 2, 1875. Gourlay v. Hodge.

The grain might be procured by the bankrupts, and might be delivered from any store in Glasgow; and accordingly it appears to have been procured from different persons, but not paid for, and the sellers of the grain to the bankrupts are ranking for the price on the sequestrated estate. Thus a new debt has in each case been created, and new creditors have been created, in order to repay to the defender the advance of £500 on 16th May 1874. It appears to me that in order to pay the prior debt to the defender the creditors who supplied the grain were wronged. But all the creditors in the sequestration who have no legal preference are on an equal footing, and therefore the sequestrated estate has been wronged, and the wrong is precisely such as the Act of 1696 strikes at. The object of the statute is equitable, and in accordance with the spirit of our bankrupt laws. It is to prevent preference, and to secure and protect the just administration and equal distribution of the bankrupt estate. It cannot be doubted that the defender was a prior creditor, and that this sum of £500 was a prior debt due by the bankrupts. Nor can it be doubted that the orders for delivery of grain were given in repayment of the debt. It is said that the deliveries were not voluntary, but in fulfilment of an obligation. In a certain sense that is true, for every man is bound to pay his debts, and the payment of debt is always in fulfilment of obligation. But the transference of effects on the eve of bankruptcy to one of many creditors, so as to give to that creditor a preference, cannot, in the face of this statute, be supported merely by the plea that there was an obligation to pay the debt.

The judicial construction of the statute,—that is, the construction put on the statute by decisions of the Court,—is attended with some difficulty. But the sound construction is, in my opinion, according to the views which have been so clearly explained by your Lordship in the chair, and by Lord Deas.

When the bankrupt's obligation to deliver goods in repayment of an advance is general, applicable, it may be, to a particular description of goods, such as wine or grain or iron, but not applicable to any specified and identified goods,—where the party making the advance has no control, no right or power of disposal of the goods, but the entire right of disposal remains with the bankrupt, then there is no defined or specific obligation to deliver the particular goods. They might, in the present case, have been procured anywhere, and were delivered only under a general obligation. Besides this, immediate delivery could not have been enforced. The defender on making the advance could not demand implement even of the general obligation earlier than within one month, and, during that month, the grain remained within the reach and at the disposal of the bankrupt.

On applying one's mind to the construction of this statute, apart from the decisions which have been pronounced, it seems to me difficult to avoid the conclusion that the transaction was in contravention of the Act. The words of the Act support that conclusion, and the intent of the Act was clearly to cut down such a transaction. The difficulty is created by the decisions. But on careful comparison of the decisions in the cases where the transaction was sustained,[1] and the decision in the cases where the transaction was reduced,[2] I arrive at the conclusion that the distinction drawn by Professor Bell is well founded (2 Bell's Coms. 226), and that where the obligation to deliver is general, and not specially applicable to separated or identified goods, and where it is postponed,—not capable of immediate enforcement, but leaving the goods in the interval at the disposal of the bankrupts, then the transaction cannot stand, but is struck at by the Act 1696. The exposition by Mr Bell, which I need not repeat, is, to my mind, very satisfactory, and none of the decisions adverted to, when rightly appreciated with reference to the facts in each case, appear to me to impair the authority of his statement of the law.

[1] Gibson v. Forbes, Taylor v. Farrie, and Miller's Trustee v. Shield, vide supra, 740.

[2] Tod's Trustee v. Union Bank, Dec. 16, 1851, 14 D. 200, 24 Scot. Jur. 87; Stiven v. Scott and Simson, 30th June 1871; and Inglis v. Mansfield, in House of Lords, April 10, 1835, 1 Sh. and M'L. 203, 7 Scot. Jur. 472.

There is no case where a transaction challenged under this statute has been sustained in circumstances like the present.

I have only to add the expression of my adherence to the opinion given by your Lordship in the chair in the case of Stiven v. Scott and Simson, where the authorities were considered and explained, an opinion in which I concurred when it was pronounced, and the reperusal of which I have felt to be most instructive, and I think it conclusive of the present question.

LORD MURE.—I concur in thinking that the transaction here in question was in contravention of the Act 1696, cap. 5, and in coming to this conclusion I do not consider that we are in any respect departing from the rules laid down in the cases of Gibson v. Forbes and Miller's Trustee v. Shield, which have been referred to. In these cases the obligation was specific to deliver the particular goods there in question, which had belonged to the bankrupt at the date of the original transaction, and the property of which was held to have been then transferred. But in this respect the present case is altogether different, for at the date of the obligatory letter the bankrupt does not appear to have had any grain to deliver. The letter, moreover, is rather peculiar in its terms. It distinctly acknowledges receipt of £500 then advanced, and by this the debt is unequivocally incurred, and in order to pay this debt the bankrupt undertakes to give delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for grain to the value of £500. The obligation, therefore, is quite general in its terms. There is no undertaking to deliver any specific parcels or quantity of grain, but it is simply an undertaking on the part of the bankrupt to deliver to the defender by means of orders upon stores in Glasgow any grain he chose to the value of £500 which might come into his hands in the course of his trade. This is, in my opinion, the fair import of the undertaking, as appearing upon the face of the letter of the 16th of May, and this view of the matter is confirmed by the defender's admissions in the answers to the pursuer's minute. From these it appears that none of the grain delivered to the defender was in the possession of the bankrupt on the 16th of May, but had been acquired by him after that date, and was transferred to the defender without having been paid for, while the parties from whom it was purchased are ranked as creditors on the bankrupt estate. Now, if under an obligation of this description no bankruptcy had occurred, it does not appear to me that the creditor could have demanded delivery of any particular parcel or quantity of grain, had the debtor neglected to fulfil his obligation. All that the creditor could have demanded by way of action would have been delivery of grain to the value of £500, with an alternative conclusion for payment of £500 in the event of failure to deliver.

It was in this view, therefore, not imperative on the debtor to deliver any particular grain. It was, on the contrary, optional to him to give delivery-

No. 127.
June 2, 1875.
Gourlay v. Hodge.

orders for whatever grain it might be most convenient for him to dispose of at the time. So that when the orders for delivery of the grain in question were handed over to the defender by the bankrupt, which they were at different dates subsequent to the 16th of May, the delivery of such orders was, in my opinion, a voluntary act on the part of the bankrupt, as regarded that order, done in satisfaction of the debt by him to the defender on the 16th of May, to the prejudice, and in preference of his other creditors, and so struck at by the provisions of the statute.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the deliveries of grain sought to be reduced were made by the bankrupts in satisfaction or further security of a prior debt in preference to other creditors within the meaning of the statute 1696, c. 5: Therefore reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons; and further, in terms of the petitory conclusions, decern and ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £238, 5s., with interest at 5 per cent from 8th June 1874 till payment: Find the defender liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—ROBERT A. BROWN, L.A.—Agents.

No. 128.
June 2, 1875.
Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees.

MRS CHARLOTTE MALCOLM or VEASEY AND HUSBAND, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
WILLIAM MALCOLM AND OTHERS (Malcolm's Trustees), Defenders.—Pearson.

Writ—Testing-Clause.—In a case in which a testator, who died in March 1874, had left a codicil with a defective testing-clause, which had been supplemented after his death, held (rev. judgment of Lord Young) that the deed was probative.

Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), secs. 38 and 39. —Question, how far the provisions of secs. 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, as to the authentication of deeds, have a retrospective effect.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.

THIS action was raised on 1st December 1874 by Mrs Veasey and her husband against the trustees and beneficiaries under the settlement of her uncle, Alexander Malcolm, who died on 14th March 1874, to have it found that the following codicil executed by her father four days before his death was a valid and effectual testamentary writing:—"Codicil to the will of Alexander Malcolm, March 10, 1874.—I, Alexander Malcolm, desire to give my niece, Charlotte Malcolm or Veasey the portion that would have gone to her late sister Barbara, thereby excluding Barbara's son, James Malcolm Jeakes, from any share in my estate. I also desire to give to each of my two maidservants, viz., to Susan Fullarton and to Elizabeth Leckie, the sum of £9, 19s. each. Signed by me in presence of the two witnesses, who have also signed in the presence of each other: That is to say, I have signed these presents, written on this and the preceding page by my wife, Mrs Elizabeth Ash Carter or Malcolm, at my and her residence, Glenmorag, Dunoon, upon the 10th day of March 1874, before these witnesses—Mrs Jane Carter or Burnett, relict of James Burnett Burnett of Monboddo, Kincardineshire, and John Reid, surgeon, Dunoon,—this testing-clause, from the word 'other,' on the eighth line from the top of this page, being written by James Gibson, clerk to Bannatynes, Kirkwood, and M'Jannet, writers, Glasgow. (Signed) ALEX. MALCOLM. Jane Burnett, witness; John Reid, witness, surgeon."

No. 128.
June 2, 1875.
Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees.

It was admitted that the deed, as it stood at the death of the testator, finished with the words "each other," and that it was not holograph of the testator, but was written by his wife, and signed by him on the date, at the place, and before the witnesses as set forth in the testing-clause; that after his death, but before the deed was founded on in action, the trustees allowed the pursuers' agents access to the deed to insert a testing-clause quantum valeret.

The admissions were made on the part of the pursuers without prejudice to their maintaining that it was irrelevant to inquire when the testing-clause was written, seeing that it was now duly tested.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The writing in question is not probative, nor validly tested, and is defective in the solemnities required by law. (2) The writing in question not being holograph of the testator, and having at the date of his death been incomplete and improbative, and the attempted completion thereof having been unauthorised and unwarrantable, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences; assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—It is, I think, a sound general proposition that the succession to a person deceased must be governed by the law as it stood at the time of his death. It is assuredly true with respect to the legal succession of intestates, and it is no less so, in my opinion, with respect to the validity of deeds founded on, whether for the purpose of excluding the legal succession, or of superseding or controlling prior deeds of admitted validity. The principle is, that at the moment of the death of any person leaving property the law recognises rights in others, either according to its own rules of succession ab intestato, or according to those other rules, equally certain and important, which determine the manner in which or the conditions subject to which the legal succession may be superseded. The rights thus recognised may remain unsatisfied for a longer or shorter period according to circumstances, but they exist from the death of the person whose succession is in question, and subsequent legislation will presumably regard them, and in the absence of cogent language to the contrary will be interpreted so as to exempt them from its operation.

"In this case the testator died in March 1874, when the law denied validity to affect succession to any instrument which was neither tested nor holograph. The law, therefore, cast his succession either on his legal heirs, or on those in whose favour those heirs were excluded, by tested or holograph deeds; and it is not disputed that (leaving out of view the instrument on which the pursuer relies) he left tested deeds whereby he effectually disposed of his whole property.

"The first question is, whether or not the instrument founded on by the pursuer is to be regarded as a tested deed. It is admitted, on the one hand, that it was not tested at the maker's death, and, on the other, that it is so now—a testing-clause (though in unusual terms) having been added since his death. It is also admitted that no space was designedly left for a testing-clause, and that the addition made since his death is crowded between the last words of the deed and the subscription in a manner which clearly indicates that it was not contemplated or intended when the subscription was adhibited. The post mortem addition relied on as a testing-clause is in fact such as might have been made to any untested deed, where there was the possibility of inserting it above the subscription.

"I am unable to regard the case as falling within the rule of the cases which sanction the 'filling in' or 'filling up' of a testing-clause after execution. The idea in these cases is the filling up of a blank or of blanks, according to the purpose for which they were obviously or presumably left, and for such an idea there is here no place.

No. 128.

June 2, 1875. Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed. Besides maintaining that the deed was probative under the former law, they founded on secs. 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874.

Argued for the defenders;—The decisions relating to inter vivos deeds were not applicable to mortis causa deeds. If the pursuers' argument was right, that it was irrelevant to allege that the testing-clause had been filled up after the testator's death, it would depend entirely on the person into whose hands the deed came whether it should be made a valid deed or not. Further, this deed was obviously considered to be complete; it was intended to stand or fall as it stood at the date of the testator's death. The after insertion of a testing-clause in such deed was a very different thing from "filling in" a testing-clause, or correcting an error in the clause.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The Lord Ordinary has sustained the defences, and found that the codicil is not a probative instrument. He seems to have proceeded upon two grounds, first, that no blank was left for the filling in of the testing-clause; and, secondly, he is not satisfied that the general rule which sanctions the filling in of the testing-clause after execution is applicable to mortis causa deeds.

I am unable to concur in these grounds. It is well settled, and, indeed, almost a necessary consequence of the requirements of the Act 1681, c. 5, that if there has been no fraud and no error in the filling up of the testing-clause it is no ground of challenge that it has been filled up after the date of signature, or even after the death of the granter of the deed, provided it be complete when produced in judicio, after which it cannot be altered. The testing-clause is a narrative of facts, which can only be written after the deed is signed. When there is more than one party to the deed a certain interval must almost necessarily elapse between the subscription and the attestation of it by the testing-

---

"I entirely disapprove of the law regarding the testing of deeds, as it existed in March 1874, and am glad it has since been reformed, but I must nevertheless recognise rights which arose under the law before it was altered.

"The second question is, whether the pursuer can take benefit to the corresponding prejudice of the other interests represented by the defenders from the provisions of secs. 38 and 39 of the Act of 1874, and I am of opinion that she cannot. I do not mean to decide that these provisions apply only to deeds executed, or coming into operation, subsequent to the Act, but only that they do not destroy rights which arose, and were recognised by the law as existing prior to the Act. If and in so far as retrospective effect can be given to these provisions without conflicting with rights established before the Act—not necessarily by judgment, but in the estimation of the law—I express no opinion against such retrospective effect being allowed." . . .

[1] Authorities.—Statutes 1540, c. 117, 1579, c. 80, 1593, c. 179, 1681, c. 5; Bell on the Testing of Deeds, p. 116, &c.; Menzies' Lectures (3d ed.), p. 123; M. Bell's Lectures, i. p. 221; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, p. 19; Dury and Doig v. Dury, March 11, 1753, F.C. and M. 16,936; Brown, March 11, 1809, F.C.; Bank of Scotland v. Telfer's Creditors, Feb. 17, 1790, F.C. and M. 16,909; Blair v. Earl of Galloway, Nov. 15, 1627, 6 S. 51; Leith Banking Co. v. Walker's Trustees, Jan. 22, 1836, 14 S. 332, 8 Scot. Jur. 163 (reported under name British Linen Co. v. Ker and Johnston and Others); Macleod v. Cuninghame, July 20, 1841, 3 D. 1288, 13 Scot. Jur. 570, aff. August 13, 1846, 5 Bell's App. 210; Shaw v. Shaw, March 6, 1851, 13 D. 877, 23 Scot. Jur. 381; Hill v. Arthur, Dec. 6, 1870, 9 Macph. 223, 43 Scot. Jur. 171.

clause. The law has consequently been thoroughly fixed that the testing-clause may be filled up ex intervallo. No. 128.

June 2, 1875.
Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees.

The whole question was thoroughly discussed in the case of Hill v. Arthur. There the settlement was executed in an hospital, a few hours before the testator's death. Several years after the testator's death the deed was produced in process in the Sheriff-court, the testing-clause being still blank. The deed was borrowed up, the testing-clause filled up, and the deed thereafter returned to the process. The question was, whether the fact of the deed having been produced in process was a bar to the testing-clause being filled up, and we held that it was. But that question would never have arisen if the general rule were not applicable to mortis causa settlements.

I need not go over the decisions, though I may observe that the case of Macleod v. Cuninghame is clear and strong in favour of the pursuer. I shall content myself with referring to two cases cited in Bell on the Testing of Deeds, a valuable treatise, of which the antiquity is not against it, since at the time Mr Bell wrote such questions were more common and at least as well understood as they are at present.

The first case is that of Dury and Doig v. Dury, March 11, 1753, F.C. The granter of the deed had signed it so close to the writing that there was no room for filling up the testing-clause. To correct this the writer erased part of the deed and wrote it in a closer form, but notwithstanding this the testing-clause was crowded in, partly at the side, and partly under the granter's subscription, so that it was clear from inspection that the testing-clause had not been written out till after the subscription of the deed. Lord Kaimes, who reports the case, says that the Court were a good deal divided, and that he gave his own opinion against the validity of the deed, on the ground that what was below the subscription could not be authenticated by it. But the majority of the Court sustained the deed as probative.

The other case is not reported, but is referred to by Mr Bell on p. 119, Arthur and Fullerton v. Marshall. A bond was signed by the principal debtor, and the testing-clause, in so far as he was concerned, was regularly filled up. It was afterwards signed by the two cautioners in presence of two witnesses, but the date and place of signing and the names and designations of the witnesses to the last subscriptions were not filled up. One of the cautioners got possession of the bond, and instantly put it on record. When the creditor came to learn this he went to the keeper of the record, who allowed him to fill up the testing-clause, but there was said to be an error in filling up the date, both as to time and place. The cautioner brought a suspension and reduction of the deed, in which Lord Eskgrove, Ordinary, sustained the bond as a good ground of action, and the Court unanimously adhered. The Lord President observed,—"A testing-clause may be filled up at any time before it be produced in judgment. It may be filled up the day after the parties have subscribed the deed, and, consequently, at any time. The putting of the deed on record was evidently a trick."

These opinions are weighty, and sufficient for the decision of this question. The defenders' counsel drew a distinction in respect to the after filling up of the testing-clause between deeds inter vivos and deeds mortis causa, but I am not aware of any decision which sanctions the distinction.

It is unnecessary to go into the second question raised upon the statute of 1874. I am of opinion that on the law as it stood prior to the coming into operation of the new statute it is not relevant to say that a testing-clause has been filled up ex intervallo, it not being alleged that it was not truly filled up. I am therefore for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and finding that the codicil is probative under the Act 1681, c. 5.

No. 128.
June 2, 1875.
Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred, expressly reserving their opinions on the retrospective effect of sections 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Alter the said interlocutor: Find that the codicil libelled is a probative writ, in terms of the statute 1681, c. 5, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Find the defenders liable in expenses," &c.

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—DEWAR & DEAS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 129.
June 4, 1875.
Webster & Co. v. Cramond Iron Co.

WEBSTER AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—Balfour—Brand.
THE CRAMOND IRON COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—M'Kechnie.

Reparation—Breach of Contract—Specific Damage.—An iron company sold iron pipes to the owner of a cotton mill to be used in the mill, but failed to deliver them timeously. In an action of damages the millowners failed to prove specific pecuniary damage, but proved that they were put to trouble and inconvenience before they could obtain fulfilment of the contract. Held that they were entitled to moderate damages for the trouble and inconvenience.

Observed (per the Lord President) that where a breach of contract is proved, even in respect of time, an award of damages must follow; that if no inconvenience has been suffered the damages will be nominal; but that if trouble and inconvenience have been caused, though no specific damage is proved, the damages will be substantial.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
M.

IN September 1873 Webster and Company, cotton manufacturers, Eaglesham, advertised for piping, without mentioning their names, or the purpose for which the piping was wanted. The Cramond Iron Company replied to the advertisement, stating, inter alia,—"We have also 9 pipes, 48 inches diameter by 9 feet long, flanged, for sale, price £8, 10s. per ton here, or £9, 5s. per ton in trucks at Glasgow. Terms, net cash on delivery to railway. These pipes are as good as new, having been but very little used." A few days afterwards they wrote in another letter,—"The piping is as good as new. The large pipes were used for a turbine wheel." On 23d September Webster and Company purchased, and soon afterwards paid for, 63 feet of the large piping. On 11th November they wrote,—"We are to use the pipes for a turbine." After some delay the piping was sent, but was found to be defective, and sound pipes were not delivered till February 1874.

Webster and Company raised this action against the Cramond Iron Company, claiming £300 damages for the loss which they had sustained by the delay.

They averred that when they advertised for the pipes they wanted them for the purpose of conveying water to a turbine wheel to be used for driving their mills, that it was of importance to them to obtain the piping at the time when they required delivery as their mills were at a stoppage until it was supplied, that they sent intimation to the defenders on 5th November to forward the pipes, and that they had sustained serious loss through the delay.

The defenders averred that "there was no stoppage of the mills caused

No. 129.

June 4, 1875.

Webster & Co. v. Cramond Iron Co.

through the non-delivery of the piping. . . . Even if the piping had been delivered earlier the mills were not in a state to resume working sooner than they did."

A proof was led. It appeared that the defenders had no valid excuse for the delay in delivering the pipes, at least for the period between 25th December and 11th February, and a long correspondence between the parties shewed that the pursuers had a good deal of trouble and annoyance before they succeeded in obtaining delivery, and that the pursuers' mill was stopped during all that time. On the other hand, the following facts were elicited as to the cause of the stoppage of the mill. The mill consisted of two parts, the "main mill" and the "wing." The "main mill" was at first driven by a 45-feet wheel, which broke down on 11th September 1873, and the pursuer resolved to replace it by a turbine wheel. The shafting and gearing of the new wheel was not ready till about the same time as the pipes were delivered. Therefore the "main mill" could not have been worked sooner even if they had been delivered. The "wing" was worked by a smaller wheel, turned by the same stream of water as the large wheel, and could be worked separately from the "main mill." Evidence was adduced for the pursuers to shew that, though they could not work the "wing" safely without pipes to carry off the water, if they had had the pipes they might have worked it.

The Lord Ordinary, on 31st December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders in September 1873 sold to the pursuers certain iron pipes for the use of their cotton-mill at Eaglesham: Finds that said pipes ought to have been all delivered to the pursuers not later than 23d December 1873: Finds that three of said pipes when delivered were cracked and unfit for use, and were known by the defenders to be so: Finds that sound and sufficient pipes were not supplied by the defenders until 7th February 1874, and that, in consequence of the defenders' failure to supply the pipes, the pursuers were unable to work that part of their mill known as the 'wing' from 25th December 1873 to 11th February 1874, and that they have thereby sustained loss, injury, and damage, for which the defenders are responsible: Finds that said damage amounts to the sum of £64 sterling: Ordains the defenders to pay the same to the pursuers, with interest from the 31st day of December 1874 till paid, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses, subject to modification."*

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found, first, that a contract was made between the pursuers and defenders, and secondly that the contract was broken. In both of these findings I concur. It is, however, important to observe that the breach of contract was in respect of time only. The pipes were ultimately delivered in February 1874; and delivery was accepted in performance, though too tardy performance, of the contract. In these circumstances the pursuers are entitled to damages for breach of contract to the extent to which they have sustained damages, but to no greater extent. It lies on them to shew wherein they have sustained damage. That is the point in which this case

* His Lordship's view of the evidence is summarised in the following sentences from his note:—"I think that the stoppage of the 'main mill' between 25th December 1873 and 11th February 1874 was not attributable to the defenders' delay in supplying the pipes. As regards the 'wing,' however, the case appears to me to stand in a different position."

The import of the evidence on this point is stated in the Lord President's opinion.

No. 129.

June 4, 1875.
Webster & Co. v. Cramond Iron Co.

presents some difficulty. The object of the pursuers in ordering the pipes is sufficiently set forth on record. They tell us that they "were in want of a quantity of iron pipes, which they intended to fit up at their mills, for the purpose of conveying water to a turbine wheel to be used for driving their mills, and accordingly they advertised for piping." Further, that "certain negotiations followed, and in the course thereof the defenders represented that the large pipes had been used for a turbine wheel, and that the pursuers could have the piping immediately. It was of importance to the pursuers to obtain the piping at any time required by them, as their mills were at a stoppage until it was supplied and fitted up."

The whole record is framed on the same footing, that the piping was wanted for the specific purpose of conducting water to drive a turbine wheel.

But it turned out in the course of the evidence that the delay which took place in the delivery of the pipes was not the cause which prevented the pursuers from driving their turbine wheel, because there were other things wanting. It came out, however, that there was another wheel on a higher level, and it is now suggested that the pipes might have been made useful in connection with that wheel to work the "wing" of the mill.

Now, in the first place, that idea is not to be found in the record. But it is more important to observe that it must be made out, first, that the pipes would have enabled the pursuers to work the wing; 2d, that they intended to do so; and, 3d, that they could have done it at a profit. Otherwise no damage is shewn. The question whether they could have worked the wing is left in some doubt on the evidence. As to the intention, I have no doubt that there was no such intention. It is entirely an afterthought. Then such evidence as there is goes to shew that the experiment, if tried, would have resulted in loss and not profit. Therefore I am unable to concur in the remaining finding of the Lord Ordinary "that in consequence of the defenders' failure to supply the pipes the pursuers were unable to work that part of the mill known as the wing."

But the question remains, what is to be the verdict, for we are here in the position of a jury. The contract and the breach of it are established. That leads of necessity to an award of damages. It is impossible to say that a contract can be broken even in respect of time without the party being entitled to claim damages—at the lowest, nominal damages. In directing a jury I should have stated that principle, and told them that if they were satisfied that the pursuers were not put to any serious inconvenience they might give the smallest imaginable sum, but if they thought that, though no specific damage had been proved, the pursuers had been put to serious inconvenience and trouble, then their duty was to give something more substantial. This latter view occurs to me as the one which is applicable here. The correspondence shews that this affair caused considerable annoyance and trouble to the pursuers, and I propose to fix the damages at £10.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I think there has been a failure on the part of the defenders to implement their contract. The pipes were not delivered in due time; some of them, I think three of them, were cracked, but they were all delivered and not rejected. If special or actual damage had been proved to have been caused by the failure the defenders would, to that extent, have been liable. But I am of opinion that no such damage has been proved. The pipes were purchased without specification of the purpose for which they were to be used. But it very soon appeared, and it is beyond dispute, that the purchase really was in order to supply the means of working "the main mill" by the "turbine wheel."

No. 129.

June 4, 1875.
Webster & Co. v. Cramond Iron Co.

But the stoppage of the main mill, and the delay in fitting up and working the turbine wheel, was not caused by the delay or the fault of the defenders, and in regard to the claim for damages on that ground I think that no actual damage has been proved. At the same time a breach of contract by the defenders is necessarily a wrong to the pursuers, and a wrong for which some amount of damages may well be claimed. There must have been, to some extent, inconvenience, annoyance, and anxiety, even in regard to the main mill and the turbine wheel. The damage could not have been great, but, failure having been proved, some damage is due.

As to the other ground of damage,—the stoppage and loss of profit from the stoppage of the "wing" mill,—I concur in the opinion of your Lordships. I think that the using the pipes for working the "wing" was not intended, as contemplated, at the date of the transaction. Damage on this ground is not within the record. Damage from loss of such use of the "wing" was not the natural consequence, or the contemplated consequence, of failure to fulfil the contract. I think that Professor Bell's statement of the law (1 Com. 449, 5th ed.) is eminently clear and convincing, and I need not repeat it. Applying that law, I think no damages are due as regards alleged loss of profit by stoppage of the "wing." That ground of damage is an afterthought.

On the whole matter, I think that a small sum of damage, such as your Lordship suggests, should be awarded.

LORD MURE concurred.

A judicial tender of more than £10 had been made by the defenders on 10th July 1874.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that in September 1873 the defenders sold to the pursuers certain pipes for the use of the pursuers' cotton-mills at Eaglesham: Find that the defenders failed timeously to deliver said pipes in terms of the said contract, and that they were not delivered till 7th February 1874: Find that the defenders thus committed a breach of contract to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers: Assess the damages at £10 sterling: Decern against the defenders for the said sum of £10: In respect of the tender, No. 6 of process, find the pursuers entitled to expenses prior to the 10th July 1874, and find the defenders entitled to expenses subsequent to that date."

A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—FINLAY & WILSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 130.

June 5, 1875.
Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

ROBERT FORRESTER AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Guthrie Smith—Johnstone.
THE TRUSTEES AND EXECUTORS OF THE LATE ROBERT ROBSON, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Lorimer.
Et e contra.

Insurance—Partnership—Trust.—Two trading companies obtained, in the name of a person who was a partner of both firms, an advance from an insurance

No. 130.

June 5, 1875. Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

office, repayable by instalments, upon the security of a policy of insurance which they opened on the life of that partner, he being the youngest member of both firms. The policy was payable to the "executors, administrators, and assigns" of the insured, but the premiums were paid by the companies. Upon the death of the insured the contents of the policy were realised, and a large balance remained after deducting the debt still due to the insurance office. Held, in a question between the firms and the executors of the deceased partner, that the proceeds of the policy belonged to the firms.

Trust—Proof—Statute 1696, c. 25—Partnership.—Held (dub. Lord Gifford) that it was competent to prove prout de jure that the right to a policy of insurance, taken in name of the partner of a company, belonged to the company.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

ROBERT FORRESTER, coalmaster in Glasgow, and George Cowie and Sons, coalmasters, Airdrie, brought an action against the testamentary trustees of the late Robert Robson, coalmaster, Glasgow, for declarator that the pursuers, in certain proportions, were entitled to the sum of £3570, 9s. 4d., the proceeds of a policy of insurance on Mr Robson's life, effected with the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association for the sum of £5000, after deducting therefrom the sum of £1429, 10s. 8d., being the balance due to the assurance association of an advance made by them to the firms of Forrester and Robson, coalmasters, Glasgow, and the said George Cowie and Sons, in security of which advance the policy was assigned to the assurance association.

Robson's trustees defended the action on the ground that the contents of the policy belonged to them, and brought a counter action against the pursuers for payment of the balance of £1429, 10s. 8d. retained by the assurance association to meet the debt due to them.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, which established the following facts:—

In 1870 the companies of Forrester and Robson and George Cowie and Sons having occasion to borrow £3500, applied to the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association, who agreed to make the advance on the security of a policy of insurance for £5000 on the life of Robert Robson, the money being repayable by instalments in five years. Robson's life was selected, because, being the youngest member of the two firms, his life was insurable at a lower premium.

The proposal for a loan, and the proposal for a policy of insurance, were in Robson's name alone. The policy was payable to Robson's "executors, administrators, and assigns," and was undistinguishable from one which he might have opened on his life for behoof of his executry; but the proof shewed that it was opened by the two companies to serve as a security for the loan to them. A bond and assignation of the policy in security was granted in favour of the assurance association by Robson and four sureties. The deed contained no obligation to keep up the policy by payment of the premiums, and there was no contract or arrangement among the parties as to what was to be done with the policy when the debt was paid up. The money was advanced by the assurance association in December 1870.

It was proved by the books of Forrester and Robson, and by letters and receipts of that firm, that the two companies of Forrester and Robson and George Cowie and Sons were interested in the loan in the proportions of four-sevenths to the former and three-sevenths to the latter; and in these proportions they paid the interest and premiums, and such of the instalments of principal as had been paid.

The company of Forrester and Robson was dissolved as at 31st December 1872, on the terms specified in an agreement dated 7th March 1873, the import of which was that Robson should retire with a sum of money

No. 130.

June 5, 1875.
Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

and Forrester should take the company property and undertake their obligations. The share of the balance of the debt due to the assurance association by Forrester and Robson was entered in a state of affairs of that firm made up at the time of the dissolution, but the policy was not entered as an asset of the company.

Robson died, aged about thirty, on 13th June 1874, leaving a trust-settlement in favour of the defenders in the principal action.

Upon Robson's death the assurance association consigned the sum contained in the policy, under deduction of the balance due to them on the loan.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The foresaid policy having been effected solely on account and at the expense of the parties interested in said loan and in connection therewith, and having been all along kept up by them or their assignees in the proportions foresaid, they alone or their assignees are entitled to the proceeds thereof in said proportions. (2) The said Robert Robson having, by said agreement of dissolution, transferred to Mr Forrester the whole interest of himself and his firm in said policy, Mr Forrester is entitled to four-sevenths of the proceeds thereof. (3) The said Robert Forrester having, at said dissolution, undertaken the sole responsibility for his firm's share of the balance of said loan, and having subsequent thereto paid such share of the instalments of said loan and interest, and of the premiums of insurance on said policy, as the same respectively fell due, is entitled to said share, being four-sevenths of the proceeds of the policy. (4) There being a balance of said loan and interest remaining due to the assurance association at the death of Mr Robson, the association were only liable under said policy for the difference between said balance and the sum thereby assured, and the pursuers are entitled to declarator of their right to such difference, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The said policy of assurance having been effected by the late Mr Robson on his own life, and the sum thereby assured being made payable to his executors, the pursuers are not entitled to any part of the proceeds thereof, these being the property of the defenders, as executors under Mr Robson's trust-disposition and settlement. (3) The pursuers having had no assurable interest in the late Mr Robson's life, and not being vested in his life policy by any assignation from him, have no right to the contents thereof. (4) In any view the pursuers have no right to said proceeds, except to the extent of the premiums advanced by them on said policy. (5) The pursuers' alleged right to said policy can only be established by the writ of the late Mr Robson.

The Lord Ordinary, having conjoined the actions, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In the action at the instance of Robert Forrester and George Cowie and Sons, repels the defences for Robson's trustees, and finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons; and, in the relative counter action at the instance of Robson's trustees, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders, Robert Forrester and George Cowie and Sons, from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders, Robson's trustees, liable in expenses in both actions," &c.*

---

* OPINION.—(After a narrative of the facts)—"The question is, to whom the policy belongs; and I am of opinion that it belongs to the pursuers in the leading action—viz., Forrester and George Cowie and Sons; and that the defenders have no right to it, or good claim under it. It was opened and kept up by the pursuers at their own expense, and for their own purpose, as a security for the

No. 130.

June 5, 1875. Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

Robson's trustees reclaimed.

Argued for them;—The pursuers must prove that the policy standing in Robson's name was held by him in trust for the two firms, and parole proof to this effect was inadmissible.[1] Even if the proof could be looked at, there was nothing like an arrangement disclosed that the policy was to be the exclusive property of the firms. They had a certain interest in keeping up the policy, in order to protect them against the insurance office calling up the loans. But their interest ended there. Supposing that the debt had been fully paid up while Mr Robson was in life, they could not have kept the policy up as a speculation.[2] It was said that want of insurable interest was an objection which was only competent to the insurance office, but it was an important element in discovering the true nature of the transaction. The parties were not likely to have opened a policy under which it was doubtful whether they would be able to recover. The two firms could not have prevented Mr Robson keeping up the policy for his own benefit. All that they could have claimed would have been reimbursement of the premiums paid by them.

Argued for Forrester and others;—An allegation that a fund standing in the name of an individual belonged to a copartnery of which he was a loan which they obtained from the assurance association. Robson, while a partner of Forrester and Robson, had of course his share of the interest effeiring to that company, but, on the dissolution of the company, when he was paid out and retired in favour of Forrester, the whole of that interest, with the corresponding liability, attached to Forrester alone. Nor do I attach importance to the circumstance that in the state made-up at the time of dissolution the policy is not entered as a company asset, for at that time it had no surrender value, and was of no appreciable value in the market, but was in truth a burden necessary to be borne in connection with the loan.

---

"A life insurance is generally a very expensive kind of security, but it has a speculative element which may possibly (however greatly the chances are against it) render it very profitable to the borrower; for ordinary calculations may be falsified by the premature death of the assured, to the effect of enabling the borrower to pay the debt thereby secured, with the proceeds of a policy on which he has paid only a single premium. If, in the present case, Robson had died immediately after the loan was made and the policy opened, I cannot think it doubtful that the proceeds of the policy would have been applicable in payment of the debt to the exclusive benefit of the borrowers, and that his executors could not have maintained a claim against them on the footing that their debt was in truth paid out of the estate of the deceased, which had passed to them. Then, if the policy was theirs, to the extent of the debt for which they opened and pledged it, I am unable to find a principle for holding that the amount of the debt was the limit of their right, and that anything in excess belonged to others.

"According to the actual facts, the debt, when the policy became payable, had been reduced to £1429, 10s. 8d. I am clearly of opinion that to this extent the policy is available to the pursuers; and being unable to divide the interest in it, either according to the original amount of the debt, or the amount remaining unpaid when it fell due, I am constrained to find that it is entirely the property of the pursuers, and that the defenders have no right in it. It has unexpectedly, and contrary to ordinary calculations, turned out a valuable property, by reason of the premature death of Robson; but, on what I conceive to be sound and established legal principles, I must give the benefit to those who paid for it, although having considerable sympathy with the family whose interests are represented by the defenders; for undoubtedly the premature death of their husband and father was the immediate event which brought unexpected gain to the pursuers."

[1] Stat. 1696, c. 25. [2] Stat. 14 Geo. III. c. 48.

No. 130.
June 5, 1875.
Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

member could be proved prout de jure.[1] But parole proof was not necessary in the present case, the whole material averments of the pursuers being proved by the books of Forrester and Robson, which must be held to be Robson's writ. In regard to the objection founded on the want of insurable interest, it was now well settled that it was sufficient that there should be an insurable interest when the policy was effected.[2] Moreover, the objection was only pleadable by the insurance office.[3]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This belongs to an important class of cases, but after hearing the able argument for the reclaimers I have no doubt that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is entirely right.

If the proof taken is competent it seems to establish beyond doubt that Robson never had any individual interest in the policy. He had an interest as partner of the firm of Forrester and Robson, and also as a partner of the joint adventure constituted by the transaction, but beyond that he had no interest in the policy. He was put forward by the joint intervention of the two firms of Forrester and Robson and George Cowie and Sons. His name was used for the obvious reason that he was the youngest partner of either company. The proposal for a loan was made in his individual name, he giving four other persons as securities. The loan was to be repayable in five years. In his proposal for a loan Robson offers to insure his life. The proposal for a loan was made entirely on behalf of the two companies who wished to borrow the money; and it follows that the proposal for insurance was part of the same loan transaction.

With regard to the competency of the proof, where the allegation is not trust but partnership, the Act 1696 does not apply. The fact that a partner holds on behalf of the company may be proved prout de jure.

I had at first some difficulty as to how far the companies could have kept up the policy as a speculation after the debt was paid. But I am satisfied upon the cases cited that it is sufficient that they had an insurable interest when the policy was opened. It is impossible to maintain that it is necessary to investigate from time to time how far the parties continue to have an insurable interest.

In short, the policy was opened solely for partnership purposes, and it is the sole property of the partners.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur. I have no doubt as to the competency of the proof.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion.

Although many points were raised in the argument two questions only have appeared to me to involve any difficulty.

The first is, whether the Trust Act of 1696 applies to this case, and so excludes all evidence but the writ or oath of the alleged trustee, the late Mr Robson. I concur with your Lordships in opinion that the Trust Act does not apply to this case. It is admitted that Robson was a partner of Forrester and Robson. It is admitted also that the object of the policy was to enable For-

[1] General Assembly of the General Baptist Churches v. Taylor, June 17, 1841, 3 D. 1030, 13 Scot. Jur. 455; see also Lindsay v. Barmcotte, Feb. 19, 1851, 13 D. 718, 23 Scot Jur. 315.

[2] Dalby v. The India and London Assurance Company, Dec. 2, 1854, 15 Scott's Common Bench Rep. 365.

[3] Lindsay v. Barmcotte, supra.

No. 130.

June 5, 1875.
Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees.

rester and Robson, and Cowie and Sons—who, I think, must be taken as joint adventurers with Forrester and Robson in this matter—to obtain a loan. Robson's representatives cannot maintain that because the policy was in his name it was his property. It is clear, I think, that it was not; and, indeed, it was not disputed that it could not be so as long as the purpose for which it was obtained was not fulfilled. I must hold, on the contrary, that the policy was the property of the two firms to the extent of their respective interests in it, and their respective liabilities for the loan. This being so, I cannot hold that the Trust Act applies. The late Mr Robson was not a trustee at all in the sense of that Act. The principle of mandate or agency applied to his position in the matter rather than that of trustee. If I am correct in this, proof prout de jure was admissible, as shewn by the cases which were founded on in the course of the discussion, and, in particular, that of the Baptist Churches v. Taylor, 3 D. 1030; and looking at the whole evidence in the case there can be no doubt that the policy belonged to the two firms, and not to Mr Robson individually.

The other question of any importance in this case is, what is to become of the surplus proceeds of the policy after its original purpose has been satisfied. If we hold that down to Robson's death it belonged to the joint adventurers, it follows that the proceeds of the policy then fell to be divided among the parties to whom it belonged, according to their respective interests therein. It might, no doubt, have been stipulated that after serving the purpose of a security for the loan it was to go to Robson or his representatives, but no such stipulation was made.

I therefore agree in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, and am of opinion that his interlocutor brought under review ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I should have had some difficulty in holding that the Act 1696 was not applicable to this case. I prefer to put my judgment on the ground that the evidence satisfies the Act. I think it is quite sufficiently proved by competent evidence that the policy of assurance, although in the name of Robson alone, really belonged to the firms of Forrester and Robson and Cowie and Son, and was part of their assets. We have, in the first place, the proposal for a loan, which must be read in conjunction with the proposal for an insurance. It is proved by the books of Forrester and Robson, which must be held as Robson's writ, that the loan was a joint adventure, and that the policy was taken out merely as part of the transaction, and to be used as a security for the loan. Now, if the loan was a company matter, it is difficult to see how the policy could be an individual concern. The two formed one transaction, and are really inseparable. Then we have letters and receipts from Forrester and Robson to Cowie, some of them holograph of Robson, asking and acknowledging payment of Cowie's share of the premiums. What had Cowie to do with the premiums if the policy was a separate transaction of Robson's? The documentary evidence also shews that the policy was part of the loan transaction, and was effected and paid for by the company just as the loan itself was.

THE COURT adhered, but of consent found no expenses due.

T. J. GORDON, W.S.—RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—Agents.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE PARISH OF SELKIRK, First Parties.—
Sol.-Gen. Watson—Pearson.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF THE BURGH OF SELKIRK, Second Parties—
D.-F. Clark—Kinnear.

No. 131.

June 5, 1875.

Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

School—School Board—Education Act, 1872, sec. 23.—Where, prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the parish school of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, was situate within the burgh, held that, on separate school boards being elected for the landward district and the burgh, in virtue of the 23d section of that Act, the school became vested in the school board of the landward district, and not in that of the burgh.

THIS special case was brought for the purpose of determining whether, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the old parish school of the parish of Selkirk, together with teacher's house and land attached thereto, or either of them, was vested in and under the management of the school board of the parish of Selkirk, the party of the first part, or of the school board of the burgh of Selkirk, the party of the second part.

2D DIVISION. R.

The case set forth that, prior to the passing of the Act of 1872, the parish of Selkirk was partly landward, and partly burghal, and included the royal burgh of Selkirk. According to the census of 1871 the population of the landward district of the parish was about 1000, and the population of the burgh about 4500.

At an early period, prior to the passing of the statute of 1696, entituled "Act for settling of Schools," there were established within the parish and burgh of Selkirk a grammar or Latin school and an English school. These schools were carried on under one roof, but they were separate schools, and taught by separate teachers. It was to the former of these schools that the question in this case had reference. The latter soon came to be known as the burgh school, and was maintained and managed entirely by the corporation.

The corporation of the burgh of Selkirk, as proprietors of lands within the landward part of the parish, were always amongst the largest heritors of the parish. In the year 1718 a vacancy having occurred in the mastership of the grammar school, the corporation appointed to the vacancy without the consent of the other heritors. The validity of this appointment was disputed in the Court of Session, on the ground that the corporation, as a heritor, had only one vote, and that the appointment was therefore void. The matter was, however, compromised, and an agreement was entered into in 1719 whereby the corporation were, for the future, to be allowed two votes in the appointment of schoolmaster, and were taken bound to pay one-half of the salary of £200 Scots, and to furnish a schoolhouse.

This agreement was acted on by both parties from its date down to the passing of the Education Act of 1872.

The school-house was several times rebuilt, and its site changed, and the cost was always defrayed by the corporation, assisted by a voluntary contribution from the other landward heritors.

The site of the school-house was always within the burgh.

In 1863, greater accommodation being required in both schools, the burgh school, which had hitherto been under the same roof as the parish school, was removed, at the cost of the burgh, to a different site, and the whole of the old building was handed over to the parish school, which was managed and maintained as formerly until the passing of the Act of 1872.

No. 131.

June 5, 1875. Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

This school was, from its foundation down to the date of the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the only parish school of the parish of Selkirk, and it was always treated as falling under the statutory provisions relating to parish schools; and, in particular, under the provisions of the Acts 43 Geo. III., cap. 54, and 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 107, but subject always to the conditions of the agreement of 1719. The school had all along been largely resorted to by the children of persons resident within the burgh, and in a lesser proportion by children of persons residing within the landward district.

In the year 1868, on the application of the schoolmaster of the parish of Selkirk, the heritors provided for him a dwelling-house and garden, in terms of the said Acts 43 Geo. III., cap. 54, and 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 107, which was the house and garden to which the question in this case referred. One-half of the cost was paid by the landward heritors other than the corporation, and the other half by the corporation, in terms of the 13th section of the said Act of 43 Geo. III.

When the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, came into operation a question was raised, whether it had the effect of vesting the parish school and schoolmaster's house above referred to in the school board which had been elected under its provisions for the parish of Selkirk, or in that which had been elected for the burgh.

It was maintained for the first party, the school board of the parish, that the school was the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, and as such was, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, vested in them and under their management, as the school board of the parish of Selkirk, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and, in particular, under the 23d section of that Act.*

It was maintained for the second party, the school board of the burgh, that the school was not and never had been the parish school of the landward district within the meaning of the 23d section, and that the school, with its pertinents, being situated in the burgh of Selkirk, was vested in them and under their management as the burgh school board, in terms of the Act.

Argued for the first parties;—The school in question was a parish school, and admittedly situated in a burgh, but, inasmuch as it was the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, it fell not under the rule contained in the 23d section of the Education Act, but under the exception, and was vested not in the school board of the burgh, but in the school board of the landward district, which was erected into a separate parish under the Act.

Argued for the second parties;—The exception contained in the 23d clause was intended to cover the case of parishes partly landward and partly burghal which were in the position of having two schools, one for the landward the other for the burghal part of the parish. That a parish

* 35 and 36 Vict., c. 62, the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 23, enacted that "the parish and other schools which have been established, and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts (1696, c. 26, 43 Geo. III., c. 54, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 87, and 24 and 25 Vict., c. 107), or any of them, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, or if situated in a burgh, then of the school board of such burgh, unless such parish school is the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, in which case it shall be under the management of the school board of such district from and after the election of such school board."

No. 131.

June 5, 1875.
Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

school should be the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, implied that there should be another parish school as the parish school of the burghal portion. It might well be that the school of the landward district might be built near the burgh, and when the Act, of 1872 came to be applied might be found within the limits of the burgh as fixed by the 9th section,* without being any the less exclusively the parish school of the landward district as it existed before the passing of the Act. It was intended by the exception in section 23 to carry such school to the school board of the new parish; not to carry off from the burgh a school which was the parish school of both the landward and burghal district, and was situated within the burgh.

Besides, the reading contended for by the first parties would leave no school to fall under the rule contained in the 23d section, and if situated in a burgh to become vested in the school board of a burgh. The exception would swallow up the rule. For (1) the recited Acts did not establish burgh schools proper, and therefore the 23d section did not apply to them; and (2) the exception would carry all schools partly landward, partly burghal, though situated in the burgh, to the school board of the landward district.

At advising the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This special case has been presented to us by the school boards of the parish and burgh of Selkirk, who have a question depending between them as to the property of certain school buildings and the teacher's house and land attached thereto, which are situated within the burgh of Selkirk, but which prior to the Education Act of 1872 were used as the parish school of the parish of Selkirk.

The facts of the case are very fully and at the same time fairly stated by the parties, who have shewn both wisdom and moderation in adopting the method of a special case for the determination of their dispute.

It is the opinion of the Court, which I am now to announce, that the school buildings in question belong to the school board of the parish of Selkirk.

I may make this preliminary observation, that I do not think the prior agreements from 1719 down to 1863 in regard to the educational arrangements of the burgh and parish of Selkirk enter much into the decision of the present question. It is admitted that the school was, prior to the passing of the Education Act of 1872, the proper and only parochial school of the parish of Selkirk maintained by the heritors, of whom the burgh was one. The contributions of the burgh under those agreements, though considerable, do not affect its character.

The present question depends mainly upon the construction to be put upon the 23d section of the Education Act, 1872. But in order to arrive at the proper interpretation of that section we must consider the previous sections which lead up to it.

The Act first defines in section 1 the terms "parish" and "burgh."

"Parish" means "any parish which does not wholly consist of a burgh or

* 35 and 36 Vict., c. 62, the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, enacts, sec. 9, that "the area of every such burgh shall, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be the limits within which the municipal, or where there are no municipal, then within which the police assessments thereof are levied."

No. 131.
June 5, 1875.
Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

part of a burgh within the meaning of this Act, and shall include any school district formed under this Act."

"Burgh" signifies (1) any royal burgh, (2) any parliamentary burgh, and (3) certain populous places not falling under the first two heads, and specified in schedule A appended to the Act.

Then the 8th section provides that "within twelve months after the passing of this Act (6th August 1872) a school board shall be elected in and for each and every parish and burgh in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

And the 9th section provides that "the area of a parish shall, for the purposes of this Act, be exclusive of the area of any burgh or part of a burgh situated therein for which a school board is required to be elected, and the area of every such burgh shall, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be the limits within which the municipal, or where there are no municipal, then within which the police assessments thereof are levied."

The effect of these provisions is that there can no longer be a parish, in the sense of the Act, which is partly burghal, partly landward. When at the date of the Act coming into operation a parish had a district partly within the municipal or police boundaries of a burgh, and partly landward, all that lies within the municipal or police boundaries is carried to the new burgh school board, and what remains is handed over to the school board of the parish.

The 23d section provides, in regard to the existing school-houses, that the parish and other schools which have been established and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts, or any of them, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, or, if situated within a burgh, then of the school board of such burgh. That is the general enactment, but there is introduced an exception in these words, "unless such parish school is the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, in which case it shall be under the management of the school board of such district from and after the election of such school board." Now, these are the words which we have to construe. Any ambiguity that there may be arises upon the words "the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal." But it is clear that that expression cannot refer to the time when the question shall arise, because, under the operation of the Act, there can be no such thing as a parish partly landward and partly burghal. The word "parish," therefore, cannot be intended to mean a parish as after the passing of the Act, but as before the passing of the Act. It must in fact have a meaning different from that assigned to it in the interpretation clause. This, I think, will remove any difficulty which might have been felt in construing the section. To bring a school within the exception in clause 23 it is necessary—1st, that it be situated in a burgh; 2d, that prior to the passing of the Act it was the parish school of a parish partly landward and partly burghal; 3d, that it be the parish school of the landward district of such parish when the Act came into operation; and 4th, that it be the school of a district which, under the Act of 1872, comes to be managed by a school board distinct from the burgh school board.

Now, the school in question appears to fulfil all these requirements,—1st, it is situated in a burgh; 2d, prior to 1872 it was the school of a parish partly landward, partly burghal; 3d, it was the parish school of the landward district of that parish when the Act of 1872 came into force; and 4th, it was the school of a district which, after 1872, was to be managed by a school board distinct from the burgh school board. I know of no other description of school which could fulfil the requisites of this exception.

No. 131.

June 5, 1875.

Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

It was indeed maintained in argument that if this was the meaning of the exception there was no meaning left for the principal enactment, and that the construction which we are inclined to put upon the exception would have the effect of rendering the rule nugatory, for there would be no school which could fall under it. The exception would swallow up the rule. But that argument neglects to keep in view the definition of the term "burgh" in the interpretation clause of the Education Act. Several cases may be figured in which schools would fall under the rule in section 23, and not under the exception. For instance, where a school is the school of a parish lying outside a royal burgh, but wholly within the municipal or parliamentary boundary of the burgh, or where it is the school of a parish consisting wholly of a parliamentary burgh or part thereof, or of a parish lying wholly within one of the populous places enumerated in schedule A.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—The Court "are of opinion, and find in answer to the first query that, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the school in question, together with the teacher's house and land attached thereto, is vested in and under the management of the party hereto of the first part as the school board of the parish of Selkirk," &c.

GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—DOW & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 132.

June 5, 1875.

Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, First Party.—M'Laren.
JOHN HOOD AND OTHERS (Charles Kinnear's Trustees), Second Parties.—Adam.

Entail—Trust—Direction to Entail Moveables.—A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees "to settle and secure my lands and estate of K. herein specially before conveyed, and the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house thereof, . . . by deed or deeds of strict entail," to his eldest son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to a series of substitutes. On the testator's death the institute under the entail, maintaining that "plate, paintings, and other plenishing" could not be made the subjects of a valid entail, objected to the trustees going through the form of executing a deed of entail to include them, and demanded that they should be delivered to him in fee-simple. In a special case presented by the institute and the trustees to have the point at issue between them determined, held that the testator's intention being clear, the invalidity of the proposed entail was not so manifest as to entitle the Court, in the absence of the substitute heirs of entail, to refuse effect to the testator's directions, and that the trustees were bound to include "the plate, paintings, and other plenishing" in the deed of entail to be executed by them, leaving the institute to challenge it in a competent process with the proper contradictors.

Question, Whether it could competently be made a condition of a strict entail that the heirs of entail in succession should always possess certain specific moveable subjects.

2D DIVISION. R.

THE late Charles Kinnear of Kinloch, in the county of Fife, who died 9th April 1874, by his trust-disposition and settlement and codicil conveyed to John Hood and others, the parties of the second part to this special case, as trustees, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and directed them, inter alia, "to settle and secure my lands and estate

No. 131.

June 5, 1875. Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

This school was, from its foundation down to the date of the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the only parish school of the parish of Selkirk, and it was always treated as falling under the statutory provisions relating to parish schools; and, in particular, under the provisions of the Acts 43 Geo. III., cap. 54, and 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 107, but subject always to the conditions of the agreement of 1719. The school had all along been largely resorted to by the children of persons resident within the burgh, and in a lesser proportion by children of persons residing within the landward district.

In the year 1868, on the application of the schoolmaster of the parish of Selkirk, the heritors provided for him a dwelling-house and garden, in terms of the said Acts 43 Geo. III., cap. 54, and 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 107, which was the house and garden to which the question in this case referred. One-half of the cost was paid by the landward heritors other than the corporation, and the other half by the corporation, in terms of the 13th section of the said Act of 43 Geo. III.

When the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, came into operation a question was raised, whether it had the effect of vesting the parish school and schoolmaster's house above referred to in the school board which had been elected under its provisions for the parish of Selkirk, or in that which had been elected for the burgh.

It was maintained for the first party, the school board of the parish, that the school was the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, and as such was, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, vested in them and under their management, as the school board of the parish of Selkirk, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and, in particular, under the 23d section of that Act.*

It was maintained for the second party, the school board of the burgh, that the school was not and never had been the parish school of the landward district within the meaning of the 23d section, and that the school, with its pertinents, being situated in the burgh of Selkirk, was vested in them and under their management as the burgh school board, in terms of the Act.

Argued for the first parties;—The school in question was a parish school, and admittedly situated in a burgh, but, inasmuch as it was the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, it fell not under the rule contained in the 23d section of the Education Act, but under the exception, and was vested not in the school board of the burgh, but in the school board of the landward district, which was erected into a separate parish under the Act.

Argued for the second parties;—The exception contained in the 23d clause was intended to cover the case of parishes partly landward and partly burghal which were in the position of having two schools, one for the landward the other for the burghal part of the parish. That a parish school should be the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, implied that there should be another parish school as the parish school of the burghal portion. It might well be that the school of the landward district might be built near the burgh, and when the Act. of 1872 came to be applied might be found within the limits of the burgh as fixed by the 9th section,* without being any the less exclusively the parish school of the landward district as it existed before the passing of the Act. It was intended by the exception in section 23 to carry such school to the school board of the new parish; not to carry off from the burgh a school which was the parish school of both the landward and burghal district, and was situated within the burgh.

* 35 and 36 Vict., c. 62, the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 23, enacted that "the parish and other schools which have been established, and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts (1696, c. 26, 43 Geo. III., c. 54, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 87, and 24 and 25 Vict., c. 107), or any of them, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, or if situated in a burgh, then of the school board of such burgh, unless such parish school is the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, in which case it shall be under the management of the school board of such district from and after the election of such school board."

Besides, the reading contended for by the first parties would leave no school to fall under the rule contained in the 23d section, and if situated in a burgh to become vested in the school board of a burgh. The exception would swallow up the rule. For (1) the recited Acts did not establish burgh schools proper, and therefore the 23d section did not apply to them; and (2) the exception would carry all schools partly landward, partly burghal, though situated in the burgh, to the school board of the landward district.

At advising the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This special case has been presented to us by the school boards of the parish and burgh of Selkirk, who have a question depending between them as to the property of certain school buildings and the teacher's house and land attached thereto, which are situated within the burgh of Selkirk, but which prior to the Education Act of 1872 were used as the parish school of the parish of Selkirk.

The facts of the case are very fully and at the same time fairly stated by the parties, who have shewn both wisdom and moderation in adopting the method of a special case for the determination of their dispute.

It is the opinion of the Court, which I am now to announce, that the school buildings in question belong to the school board of the parish of Selkirk.

I may make this preliminary observation, that I do not think the prior agreements from 1719 down to 1863 in regard to the educational arrangements of the burgh and parish of Selkirk enter much into the decision of the present question. It is admitted that the school was, prior to the passing of the Education Act of 1872, the proper and only parochial school of the parish of Selkirk maintained by the heritors, of whom the burgh was one. The contributions of the burgh under those agreements, though considerable, do not affect its character.

The present question depends mainly upon the construction to be put upon the 23d section of the Education Act, 1872. But in order to arrive at the proper interpretation of that section we must consider the previous sections which lead up to it.

The Act first defines in section 1 the terms "parish" and "burgh."

"Parish" means "any parish which does not wholly consist of a burgh or

---

* 35 and 36 Vict., c. 62, the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, enacts, sec. 9, that "the area of every such burgh shall, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be the limits within which the municipal, or where there are no municipal, then within which the police assessments thereof are levied."

No. 131.
June 5, 1875.
Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

part of a burgh within the meaning of this Act, and shall include any school district formed under this Act."

"Burgh" signifies (1) any royal burgh, (2) any parliamentary burgh, and (3) certain populous places not falling under the first two heads, and specified in schedule A appended to the Act.

Then the 8th section provides that "within twelve months after the passing of this Act (6th August 1872) a school board shall be elected in and for each and every parish and burgh in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

And the 9th section provides that "the area of a parish shall, for the purposes of this Act, be exclusive of the area of any burgh or part of a burgh situated therein for which a school board is required to be elected, and the area of every such burgh shall, for the purposes of this Act, be taken to be the limits within which the municipal, or where there are no municipal, then within which the police assessments thereof are levied."

The effect of these provisions is that there can no longer be a parish, in the sense of the Act, which is partly burghal, partly landward. When at the date of the Act coming into operation a parish had a district partly within the municipal or police boundaries of a burgh, and partly landward, all that lies within the municipal or police boundaries is carried to the new burgh school board, and what remains is handed over to the school board of the parish.

The 23d section provides, in regard to the existing school-houses, that the parish and other schools which have been established and now exist in any parish under the recited Acts, or any of them, together with teachers' houses and land attached thereto, shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish, or, if situated within a burgh, then of the school board of such burgh. That is the general enactment, but there is introduced an exception in these words, "unless such parish school is the parish school of the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal, in which case it shall be under the management of the school board of such district from and after the election of such school board." Now, these are the words which we have to construe. Any ambiguity that there may be arises upon the words "the landward district of a parish partly landward and partly burghal." But it is clear that that expression cannot refer to the time when the question shall arise, because, under the operation of the Act, there can be no such thing as a parish partly landward and partly burghal. The word "parish," therefore, cannot be intended to mean a parish as after the passing of the Act, but as before the passing of the Act. It must in fact have a meaning different from that assigned to it in the interpretation clause. This, I think, will remove any difficulty which might have been felt in construing the section. To bring a school within the exception in clause 23 it is necessary—1st, that it be situated in a burgh; 2d, that prior to the passing of the Act it was the parish school of a parish partly landward and partly burghal; 3d, that it be the parish school of the landward district of such parish when the Act came into operation; and 4th, that it be the school of a district which, under the Act of 1872, comes to be managed by a school board distinct from the burgh school board.

Now, the school in question appears to fulfil all these requirements,—1st, it is situated in a burgh; 2d, prior to 1872 it was the school of a parish partly landward, partly burghal; 3d, it was the parish school of the landward district of that parish when the Act of 1872 came into force; and 4th, it was the school of a district which, after 1872, was to be managed by a school board distinct from the burgh school board. I know of no other description of school which could fulfil the requisites of this exception.

No. 131.

June 5, 1875.

Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board.

It was indeed maintained in argument that if this was the meaning of the exception there was no meaning left for the principal enactment, and that the construction which we are inclined to put upon the exception would have the effect of rendering the rule nugatory, for there would be no school which could fall under it. The exception would swallow up the rule. But that argument neglects to keep in view the definition of the term "burgh" in the interpretation clause of the Education Act. Several cases may be figured in which schools would fall under the rule in section 23, and not under the exception. For instance, where a school is the school of a parish lying outside a royal burgh, but wholly within the municipal or parliamentary boundary of the burgh, or where it is the school of a parish consisting wholly of a parliamentary burgh or part thereof, or of a parish lying wholly within one of the populous places enumerated in schedule A.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—The Court "are of opinion, and find in answer to the first query that, under the provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, the school in question, together with the teacher's house and land attached thereto, is vested in and under the management of the party hereto of the first part as the school board of the parish of Selkirk," &c.

GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—DOW & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 132.

June 5, 1875.

Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, First Party.—M'Laren.
JOHN HOOD AND OTHERS (Charles Kinnear's Trustees), Second Parties.—Adam.

Entail—Trust—Direction to Entail Moveables.—A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees "to settle and secure my lands and estate of K. herein specially before conveyed, and the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house thereof, . . . by deed or deeds of strict entail," to his eldest son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to a series of substitutes. On the testator's death the institute under the entail, maintaining that "plate, paintings, and other plenishing" could not be made the subjects of a valid entail, objected to the trustees going through the form of executing a deed of entail to include them, and demanded that they should be delivered to him in fee-simple. In a special case presented by the institute and the trustees to have the point at issue between them determined, held that the testator's intention being clear, the invalidity of the proposed entail was not so manifest as to entitle the Court, in the absence of the substitute heirs of entail, to refuse effect to the testator's directions, and that the trustees were bound to include "the plate, paintings, and other plenishing" in the deed of entail to be executed by them, leaving the institute to challenge it in a competent process with the proper contradictors.

Question, Whether it could competently be made a condition of a strict entail that the heirs of entail in succession should always possess certain specific moveable subjects.

2D DIVISION. R.

THE late Charles Kinnear of Kinloch, in the county of Fife, who died 9th April 1874, by his trust-disposition and settlement and codicil conveyed to John Hood and others, the parties of the second part to this special case, as trustees, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and directed them, inter alia, "to settle and secure my lands and estate of Kinloch herein specially before conveyed, and the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house thereof, . . . by deed or deeds of strict entail, whereby they shall dispone and convey the same, heritably and irredeemably, to John Boyd Kinnear, my eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to Charles George Hood Kinnear, my second son, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing," &c. There were then specified the different conditions, prohibitions, reservations, and provisions under which the deed of entail was to be granted, including the three cardinal prohibitions against altering the order of succession, alienating, and contracting debt; and the trust-deed then proceeded,—"Which deed of entail to be executed by my trustees shall be so framed as to bind the institute or person in whose favour the same is directly granted as well as the heirs of entail, and shall contain all clauses necessary to render the same a strict, valid, and effectual entail according to law, any special directions as to clauses herein contained in nowise derogating from my trustees' power to amend the same and add new clauses for effectually carrying out my intention and desire."

No. 132.

June 5, 1875. Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

The trustees were proceeding as directed to execute a deed of strict entail of the estate of Kinloch, and they proposed to include, under this deed of entail, the plate, paintings, and other plenishing, in the mansion-house of Kinloch.

To this Mr John Boyd Kinnear, the institute heir of entail, who was the party of the first part to this special case, objected. He maintained that none of the articles just mentioned could competently be made the subjects of a strict entail; and that, in respect that the substitution of heirs to him under the fetters of an entail in the late Mr Kinnear's trust-deed as to the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house of Kinloch was inept, he was entitled to obtain forthwith, from the trustees, the parties hereto of the second part, a conveyance or delivery of these articles in fee-simple.

On the other hand, the trustees maintained that they were directed by the truster, and therefore bound to insert these articles in the deed of entail to be executed by them.

None of the substitute heirs of entail were parties to the special case.

The questions in law submitted to the Court were:—"(1) Whether Mr Boyd Kinnear, the party hereto of the first part, is entitled to obtain forthwith from the trustees, the parties hereto of the second part, a conveyance or delivery of the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house of Kinloch in fee-simple? Or, (2) Whether the trustees are bound to include in the deed of entail to be executed by them not only the heritable subjects which the truster directed to be entailed but also the said plate, paintings, and plenishing?"

Argued for Mr John Boyd Kinnear, the first party;—(1) If the object of the truster could not be carried out effectually, the grantee was entitled to a conveyance in fee-simple, and was not bound to submit to the execution of an abortive deed.[1] (2) An entail of moveables was incompetent under the Act of 1685, and was invalid even inter hæredes.[2] (3) The trustees were, in any view, not entitled to take any other steps to protect the moveables from the acts of the institute and other heirs of entail than merely to include them under the deed of entail.

[1] Gordon v. Gordon's Trustees, March 2, 1866, 4 Macph. 501, 38 Scot. Jur. 232.

[2] Veitch v. Young, May 25, 1808, F.C.; Baillie v. Grant, May 21, 1859, 21 D. 838, 31 Scot. Jur. 465.

No. 132.
June 5, 1875.
Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

They were not entitled to make it a condition of the right of the heir to possession of the heritable estate that he should not dispose of the moveables.

Argued for the trustees, the second parties;—(1) They were specially empowered to insert in the deed of entail to be executed any clauses necessary to render the testator's intention effectual. Without maintaining that an entail of moveables would be effectual, there was no incompetency in making it a condition of holding a heritable estate under a strict entail otherwise valid that the heirs in succession should always retain possession of certain specific moveables. They were, therefore, bound to insert a condition to that effect in the entail to be executed by them, and so to carry out the testator's intention and desire. (2) It might be that an entail of moveables was not protected either by the Act of 1685, or by the Rutherfurd Act. But to speak of an entail of moveables was a misuse of terms. There might, nevertheless, be an obligation on an heir of entail in possession of a proper entailed estate to retain moveables which he would not be entitled to disregard. If he took under the will of a testator he would take subject to any condition the testator chose to impose, and could not retain the estate and disregard the conditions. (3) An entail of moveables, if not good generally, was at least good inter hæredes, and they were therefore bound to execute the deed as directed by the testator valeat quantum.[1] (4) At any rate, to give the first party the benefit of the case of Gordon v. Gordon's Trustees, it was necessary for him to shew that the deed of entail, if executed, would be ex facie invalid, and this he had failed to do.

At advising the opinion of the Court was delivered by LORD NEAVES.—This case belongs to a class involving questions of considerable delicacy. A testator appoints a deed to be executed in favour of certain persons under certain conditions or restrictions. After his death, instead of his intentions being literally carried out, it is proposed by his heir, or other person favoured, that his directions be ignored, and that the intended deed be not executed, on the ground that if his directions were followed they would be unavailing to attain the end he had in view.

That is undoubtedly a position which our law and practice recognises as competent to the heir in certain cases. Gordon of Cluny's case is an example of this. It arose in a different form from the present, because the form of a special case, whether suitable to the occasion or not, was not then authorised, and there was no choice but to try the question by declarator. The testator, Colonel Gordon, had directed his trustees to entail lands to be purchased with the residue of his moveable estate, which was very considerable, and this by deed of strict entail in favour of his two natural sons nominatim, and their heirs whatsoever. The question raised was, whether the testator's directions were to be carried out, or whether the person first favoured was to receive the property at once in fee-simple, upon the ground that no such entail was feasible. It was held that he was entitled to receive the property at once and in fee-simple.

That is precisely what is here demanded by Mr Boyd Kinnear. And we have to consider whether the case of Gordon is a precedent which we ought to follow.

Mr Kinnear asks us, in the first question, whether he is entitled to obtain forth-

[1] Earl of Leven v. Montgomerie, 1683, M. 3217; Maule v. Maule, Dec. 2, 1817, F.C.; Sandford on Entail (ed. 1842), p. 251.

No. 132.
June 5, 1875.
Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

with from the trustees a conveyance or delivery of the plate, paintings, &c., in the mansion-house of Kinloch in fee-simple. If this case were identical with that of Gordon it seems clear that, apart from the question whether the course he has taken is a proper way to raise the question, Mr Kinnear would be entitled to a conveyance or delivery of these things in terms of his demand. But I am of opinion that this case cannot be identified with or assimilated to that of Gordon. Gordon's case turned upon a point which does not find its parallel in the present case. If we are to sanction the disregard of the testator's directions, on the ground that if carried out they would be ineffectual, then we must be satisfied that this is clearly and incontrovertibly the case. If it admits of any doubt the question must be tried in a proper action with the proper contradictors having interest to try it.

In Gordon's case the direction was to execute a deed of strict entail, in terms of the "foresaid Act of the Parliament of Scotland passed in the year 1685, entituled 'Act concerning Tailzies,' of the whole of the foresaid lands so to be purchased as aforesaid, to and in favour of my said eldest son John Gordon, now Captain John Gordon, and his heirs whatsoever; whom failing, to my said youngest son, Charles Gordon, and his heirs whatsoever," &c. What that meant in the case of natural sons I do not very well know. But, apart from that difficulty the Court held that it was in law impossible to make such an entail. Taking an elementary and obvious view of the law, they said that a destination to a person and his heirs "whatsoever" is not an entail. The essential characteristic of an entail is that the natural order of succession should be tailzied or cut off; whereas an entail in favour of a man and his heirs whatsoever would be a direction to preserve the natural order of succession at common law, which is not the course contemplated or authorised by the Act 1685. The Court, therefore, held that the testator's directions were just an attempt to make an entail which would be suicidal, and instead of enforcing the testator's directions to his trustees to make a deed, which, if made, would be a nullity, they ordered the property to be conveyed to the pursuer in fee-simple. The ground of judgment is very clearly stated in the opinion of Lord President M'Neill.

Now, if the present case came up to that of Gordon, I should hold the latter to be a precedent which we might follow. But it cannot be said, in the absence of all those who are interested to object, that the directions of this testator are so self-contradictory and self-destructive that we are entitled to pass them by, and order the property to be conveyed or delivered to the claimant at once in fee-simple. I give no opinion on the question whether or not the directions of the testator could be carried out in such a way as to be effectual. It may be possible to secure moveable property in the way he desired, or it may not. But I do not feel myself called upon to decide that question where the competent parties to try it are not here. It is sufficient to say that the nullity or self-contradiction of the testator's directions is not so clear and so well recognised as to entitle us in this short-hand way to pass by those directions, and do that which would, at any rate, be contrary to his intention.

There have been decisions and dicta which more or less nearly touch the point on its merits, but the current of authority is not so clear as to warrant us in sanctioning the neglect of the testator's directions, and in giving in fee-simple what he desired to be entailed.

If the heir is correct in the view he takes of his right then the executing of the requisite deeds is only postponing for a time those rights. He will suffer no substantial injury from the form being gone through, which, with all parties in the field, we may ultimately find nugatory and null.

No. 132.

June 5, 1875.
Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the first question in the special case should be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

THE COURT was of opinion, and found "that Mr Boyd Kinnear, the party of the first part hereto, is not entitled to obtain from the trustees, the parties hereto of the second part, a conveyance or delivery of the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house of Kinloch, in fee-simple; and that the said trustees are bound to include in the deed of entail to be executed by them not only the heritable subjects which the truster directed to be entailed but also the said plate, paintings, and plenishing, and decern."

MELVILLE & LINDESAY, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

GEORGE PENDREIGH, Petitioner and Appellant.—D.-F. Clark—J. A. Crichton.

No. 133.

June 5, 1875.
Pendreigh.

Bankrupt—Discharge—Preference—Statutes 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 151, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 33, sec. 3.—The 151st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that if a bankrupt shall have been personally concerned in or cognisant of the granting of any preference he shall forfeit all right to a discharge.

In an application by a bankrupt for his discharge, after the lapse of two years from the date of the sequestration, held that the terms of the above section were imperative, and that the Court was bound, ex proprio motu, although there was no appearance for the trustee and creditors, to enforce them.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Midlothian. M.

Vide ante, Carter (Pendreigh's Trustee) v. M'Laren and Co., Oct. 26, 1869, 8 Macph. 64, 42 Scot. Jur. 33, H. of L. May 9, 1871, 9 Macph. H. L. 49, 43 Scot. Jur. 381.

George Pendreigh, whose estates, as an individual and as a partner of the firm of J. and G. Pendreigh, were sequestrated on 16th March 1869, presented, on 27th October 1874, to the Sheriff of Midlothian, a petition for his discharge, under section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

There was produced along with the petition this report of the trustee on the sequestrated estate, Mr Frederick Hayne Carter, C.A.,—"In terms of section 146th of the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' the trustee begs to report that the aforesaid George Pendreigh has, except in one respect, complied with all the provisions of the statute; and, in particular, that he has made a fair discovery and surrender of his estate; that he has attended the diets of examination; and that his bankruptcy has arisen from innocent misfortunes, as well as heavy losses in business, and not from culpable or undue conduct.

"The trustee regrets, however, to report that the said bankrupt was concerned in the granting of preferences to two creditors in the sequestration. See the case of Carter (Pendreigh's Trustee) v. D. M'Laren and Company, 9th May 1871, 9 Macph. (H. of L.) 49."

No appearance was made by the trustee or by any of the creditors.

On 22d January 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) ordered a copy of the proceedings to be transmitted to the Accountant in Bankruptcy "that he may have an opportunity of reporting whether the bankrupt has fraudulently concealed any part of his estates or effects, or whether he has wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions of the Bankrupt Statutes."

The Accountant, on 2d February 1875, reported that "in his opinion, the trustee's report, so far as regards the two points specified in the Sheriff's interlocutor, is correct, and that there is nothing unfavourable to the bankrupt to report on these two heads.

No. 133.

June 5, 1875.
Pendreigh.

"The Accountant begs to draw the Sheriff's attention to the concluding paragraph in the trustee's report on the bankrupt's conduct, in which he reports that the bankrupt was concerned in the granting of preferences to two creditors in the sequestration, and refers to the case of Carter (Pendreigh's Trustee) v. D. M'Laren and Company. The Accountant, however, is of opinion that, even assuming that the bankrupt was concerned in the granting of the preferences above mentioned, it was not an act of fraudulent concealment, such as is referred to in the 3d section of the 'Bankruptcy Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1860.'" [1]

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 5th March 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the trustee reports that the petitioner was concerned in the granting of preferences to two creditors in his sequestration, finds, in terms of the 151st section of the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' [2] that the petitioner has forfeited all right to a discharge: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns." *

---

[1] 23 and 24 Vict. c. 33, sec. 3.—"The said Court, in either Division thereof, or the Lord Ordinary, or the Sheriff, may refuse the application for the discharge of any bankrupt, although two years have elapsed from the date of the sequestration, and although no appearance or opposition shall be made by or on the part of any of the creditors, if it shall appear from the report of the Accountant in Bankruptcy or other sufficient evidence that the bankrupt has fraudulently concealed any part of his estate or effects, or has wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions of 'The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.'"

[2] 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 151.—"If the bankrupt shall have been personally concerned in or cognisant of the granting, giving, or promising any preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration, or in any secret or collusive agreement or transaction as aforesaid, he shall forfeit all right to a discharge, and all benefits under the Act, and such discharge, if granted, either on or without an offer of composition, shall be annulled; and the trustee or any one or more of the creditors may apply by petition to the Lord Ordinary to have such discharge annulled accordingly."

* "NOTE.—The foregoing judgment has been pronounced with regret and with much hesitation. But the terms of the trustee's report, when taken along with the 151st section of the statute, seem to exclude any other result.

"The Bankruptcy Act of 1856 (section 146) makes it imperative to grant a discharge after the lapse of the statutory two years, when no appearance is made to oppose it. That provision has been altered by section 3 of the amending Act of 1860. The Lord Ordinary or Sheriff may refuse, although no appearance or opposition be made, which is the case here, 'if it shall appear from the report of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, or other sufficient evidence, that the bankrupt has (1) fraudulently concealed any part of his estate or effects, or (2) has wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.'

"On the two points remitted to him under the statute of 1860 the Accountant in Bankruptcy entirely absolves the petitioner. There is no fraudulent concealment. There is no wilful failure to comply with any statutory requisite.

"Does the case, then, go back to the statute of 1856, and must the discharge be granted in respect no one appears to oppose? Can the 151st section of that statute be thus shut out altogether, in respect there is no one here to plead it against the petitioner?

"The Sheriff-substitute owns that he was at one time much impressed with this view, as also with the safeguard provided in the final words of section 151 that any creditor may hereafter open up and obtain the annulment of any discharge granted, if he can shew that it is liable to objection under that enactment. It may be pleaded to prevent the discharge, or it may be pleaded to annul the discharge, but it must be pleaded, and there is no one pleading it here, as the petition is unopposed.

"But the Sheriff-substitute has unwillingly come to be of opinion that under section 3 of the later statute he is bound, even in absence of all opposition, to

No. 133.

June 5, 1875.
Pendreigh.

The petitioner appealed under the 170th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.

Argued for him;—After the lapse of two years from the date of the sequestration the bankrupt was entitled, under the provisions of the 146th section of the Act of 1856, to his discharge if no creditor appeared to oppose. He was prepared to make the declaration required by the 147th section, that "he has not granted or promised any preference or security, nor made or promised any payment, nor entered into any secret or collusive agreement or transaction to obtain the concurrence of any creditor to his discharge." The 151st section did not apply, because the bankrupt could not be held to have been "personally concerned in or cognisant of" the granting of the preference founded on. Nor could the provisions of that section be enforced against him under any circumstances unless pleaded by the trustee or an opposing creditor. And lastly, the 3d section of the amending Act of 1860 only authorised the Court ex proprio motu to refuse a petition for discharge after two years have elapsed where it appeared (1) that the bankrupt had fraudulently concealed any part of his estate or effects, or (2) had "wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions" of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Admitting that giving a preference might be held a failure to comply with these provisions, the giving of that preference must be wilful, implying moral delinquency, to entitle the Court under the 3d section of the Act, 1860, to enforce ex proprio motu, and without any opposition on the part of creditors, the provisions of the 151st section of the Act of 1856.

LORD PRESIDENT.—No doubt the 151st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, is a very stringent and hard provision; but we must take it for granted that the Legislature had good reason for enacting it, and must give it effect.

The 150th section is also a severe provision in the case of a creditor who has obtained his preference without fraud. For however much he may be innocent of fraud, and actuated by the desire merely to expedite an arrangement among the body of creditors, still if he comes within the letter of that section he forfeits his debt and the penalty besides.

We were of opinion in the case of Carter v. M'Laren and Co.[1] that the 150th section contained certain words, "if no cause be shewn to the contrary," which enabled us to consider whether the preference was fraudulently obtained or not. But we were set right by the House of Lords,[2] who seem to me to have construed the section very much as if these words were not there at all.

---

determine the question whether or not the bankrupt is in law entitled to obtain his discharge. This question must be determined not merely under the Act of 1860, but under the Act of 1856, of which the force and effect are fully reserved. The trustee reports that the bankrupt has been concerned in granting preferences. Section 151st attaches forfeiture of all right to a discharge as a penalty for that offence. The conclusion seems irresistible.

"In the able argument with which the Sheriff-substitute was favoured, reference was made to the case of Cooper, 5th November 1872 (11 Macph. 38, 45 Scot. Jur. 29.) It was pressed as an anomaly to refuse the discharge here, where there was no moral blame, while in that case a bankrupt convicted of embezzling trust-funds was found entitled to obtain it, mainly on the ground that sufficient expiation had been made by undergoing sentence of three months' imprisonment. The Sheriff-substitute feels that anomaly very strongly. But to Cooper's case the 151st section of the statute did not apply. Here it seems to interpose an inflexible barrier."

[1] October 26, 1869, 8 Macph. 64, 42 Scot. Jur. 33.

[2] May 9, 1871, 9 Macph. H. L. 49, 43 Scot. Jur. 381.

No. 133. June 5, 1876. Pendreigh.

The 151st section is even more absolute and imperative in its terms than the 150th. Its words in fact could not be plainer, and though it bears hardly in the present case I am of opinion that we have no choice but to give it effect.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

WADDELL & M'INTOSH, W.S.—Agents.

No. 134. June 7, 1875. Duke of Montrose v. Earl of Camperdown, &c.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Keir.
THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, Defender.
THE MINISTER OF KILMARONOCK, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour.

Teinds—Sub-valuation—Approbation.—In an action brought in the Teind Court in 1874 for approbation of a report of sub-commissioners dated in 1629, valuing the teinds of certain lands, which merely reported that all parties being summoned and called there compeared the heritor, "and is cōtent that the auld rentall of the said lands of . . . stand in tyme cuming as it is and hes bein, to wit, xij bolls meill, baith for p'sonage and viccarage teynds in cais the titular be yr^wt^ cōtentit." Objection to the report, to the effect that the sub-commissioners had not pronounced any direct finding as to the value of the teinds of the lands, repelled, and decree of approbation pronounced.

Observed (per Lord President) that where an old rental was produced, either by the titular against the heritor, or by the heritor against the titular, the party entitled to object in either case being duly summoned, and not appearing, the sub-commissioners might report the rental as the true value of the teinds.

TEIND COURT. Teind Clerk.

THE Duke of Montrose, as proprietor of lands in the parish of Kilmaronock, raised this action of approbation of the report of the sub-commissioners for valuing the teinds of lands in the Presbytery of Dumbarton, dated 1629-30, against the Earl of Camperdown, as the titular, and the Rev. William B. S. Paterson, minister of the parish.

An objection was raised by the minister to the approbation of the valuation of the lands of Wester and Mid Catter belonging to the Duke.

The report of the sub-commissioners, so far as affects the present question, was as follows:—

"Kilmaronock Paroche.

"Att Dumbartane the third day of September @no Jajvic. and twentie nyne yeiris:

"Conveinit Wm. Tempill of Fulwood c'vnar; Ion Conyghame of Drumquhaskill, &c.

"The qlk. day anent the valuaoun of the trew worth of the lands w^t^in the said parochin of Kilmaronok and shrdme. of Dumbartane In stok @ teynd the heritors being duly subit to haif cōperit and nane cōperand, The sub commissioners c'tinewis the valuaoun of the saids till thair first meitting and ordanes that the haill heritors and titular be subit at the fischalls instance cōforme to the proces.

"At Dumbartane the third of December 1629.

"Convenit Wm Tempill of Fulwod, C'venar, &c.

"The qlk. day p'tiss sūmoundit being callit upoun cōforme to the process:

"Compeirit Thōas Buchanane of Midcattir, lyand within the parochin of Kilmaronok, and is cōtent that the auld rentall of the said lands of Midcattir stand in tyme cūming as it is and hes bein, to wit, xij bolls meill, baith for p'sonage and viccarage teynds in cais the titular be yr^wt^ cōtentit."

. . . . . .

No. 134.

June 7, 1875.
Duke of Montrose v. Earl of Camperdown, &c.

"Att Dumbartane the sevint of Januar 1630,— "Convenit Walter McAulay of Ardincapill, &c.
"The qlk. day all p'tiis being callit upoun cōforme to the proces:
"Compeirit James Lekkie, portioner of Westir Cattir, for himself, and Pat. Lekkie, his broyr, equall portioner wt him of the said lands, and yt the said James for him selff, and in name of his said broyr, Is cōtent that the auld rentall of the saids lands stand in tyme cūming as it is and has bein thir xl yeiris bypast, swa that the titular be cōtentit yrwt, to wit . . . ix bolls meill for the p'sonage teynd yrof wt v merkes of viccarage yeirlie."

. . . . . .

The minister objected to the approbation of the sub-valuation, inasmuch as it did not bear either (1) that proof of the rental or value of the lands or teinds had been led, or (2) that the minister was cited or appeared, or (3) that the titular was contented that the old rental should stand in time coming as it had in time byepast, and inasmuch as (4) the sub-commissioners did not find or declare the quantities of victual and sums of money stated in the old rental to be the value, nor did they report that they were satisfied that these quantities and sums were the value of the teinds of the lands either in respect of the consent of parties or the non-opposition of the titular, or upon any other ground.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was sufficient that the report of the sub-commissioners bore that all parties were called. Neither the titular nor the minister appearing to oppose, they were entitled to accept the old rentals produced as determining the value of the teinds without farther probation.* There could be no doubt that though they did not expressly value the teinds at the amount of the old rental such was their implied intention.[1]

Argued for the minister;—The sub-commissioners had reported in the present case without completing their duty. Having got something towards a judgment in the shape of an old rental they recorded that, but neither pronounced, nor intended to pronounce, any judgment upon the true value of the teinds.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only objection to the validity of this valuation which the minister now insists in is one taken to the form in which the report of the sub-commissioners is made, as far as regards the lands of Mid and Wester Catter. It has been argued for him that neither as to the one nor the other of these lands is there anything that can properly be called a valuation contained in the report of the sub-commissioners but that what is contained in the report having reference to these lands is something altogether different from a valuation.

* The King's letter of February 1628 declared,— "That old rentals shall stand for a valuation when the parties consent or do not object thereto."
This letter the Lords Commissioners, on 22d February 1628, ratified by minute in the following terms:—
"22d February 1628.—Anent old rentals to stand for valuations—
"The Lords ratifies his Majesties letters, whereby it declares that old rentals should stand for valuation if the parties make no opposition."
Further, the Lords Commissioners, by their minute of 2d March 1631, found and declared as follows:—
"2d March 1631.—The Lords sustanes the valuations upon a rentall without probation holden pro confesso."
See Connell, vol. ii., Ap. p. 78, et seq.

[1] Richmond v. Officers of State, July 19, 1871, 9 Macph. 1020, 43 Scot. Jur. 562.

No. 134.

June 7, 1875. Duke of Montrose v. Earl of Camperdown, &c.

Now, the presumption, at all events, is against that contention. For although the sub-commissioners may not have been professional men, skilled in drawing legal documents, they appear to have had a good general notion of what was required of them, and that was to fix in all time coming the value of the teinds of each parcel of lands, and report that to the commissioners. They received directions how they were to proceed in ascertaining this value in the different circumstances that might arise. And among other things that were told them very authoritatively was this—"That old rentals shall stand for a valuation when the parties consent or do not object thereto."—King's letter of February 1628. This was repeated in different words but to the same effect, viz. "that old rentals should stand for a valuation if the parties make no opposition."—Minute of commissioners, 22d February 1828. Another form of this direction is to be found in one of the Acts of the commissioners of date 2d March 1631—"The Lords sustanes the valuations upon a rentall without probation holden pro confesso." I take all this to mean that though no other proof of actual value was brought yet if an old rental was produced and the party entitled to object failed to appear on being duly cited he was to be held confessed. That seems to me to be the result reduced into a rule and acted upon in practice in the commissioners' deliverance of 1631.

Now, there is nothing inconsistent with this in the report which we have regarding these lands of Mid and Wester Catter.

With regard to Mid Catter we have this statement,—"Compeirit Thōas Buchanane of Midcattir, lyand within the parochin of Kilmaronok, and is cōtent that the auld rentall of the said lands of Midcattir stand in tyme cūming as it is and hes bein, to wit, xij bolls meill, baith for p'sonage and viccarage teynds in cais the titular be yr^{wt} cōtentit."

And with regard to Wester Catter we have the statement that James Leckie appeared for himself and his brother portioners in the lands, and "is cōtent that the auld rentall of the said lands stand in tyme cūming as it is and has bein thir xl yeiris bypast, swa that the titular be cōtentit yr^{wt}, to wit, ix bolls meill for the p'sonage teynd y^{r}of w^{t} v merkes of viccarage yeirlie."

Now, we have seen that if an old rental is produced, either by the titular against the heritor, or by the heritor against the titular, the party entitled to object in either case being duly summoned and not appearing, that rental may be reported by the sub-commissioners as the true value of the teinds. That is just what is done here. The rentals, called in one case merely the "auld rentall," and in the other the "auld rentall as it is and has bein this xl years by-past," are produced by the heritors, and the titular being duly summoned opposes nothing to them, and the sub-commissioners therefore report them, in language which seems to be a perfectly distinct expression of what they intended, namely, that the valuation as fixed by the rentals should be the valuation in all time coming.

Apart altogether from the great respect which we have been taught by a recent decision to pay to the merest expression of everything that calls itself a sub-valuation, I should not have had much difficulty in sustaining the language here used as quite sufficient to express the views of the sub-commissioners, provided the document is what it bears to be, viz. their report.

Lord Deas.—The main objection taken to this valuation is, that it was necessary that the sub-commissioners should give their own judgment as to the value, and that here they gave no judgment.

No. 134.

June 7, 1875.

Duke of Montrose v. Earl of Camperdown, &c.

Now, apart from any precedent, I should have been disposed to say that such a judgment might be implied. It would be too strict to hold that it must be set forth expressly that they valued the teinds of each parcel of lands at so much. A clear indication of their opinion of the value is all that could be reasonably required.

But in the case of Richmond[1] we have, I think, a precedent, for unless this doctrine had been sanctioned we could not there have come to the decision which we did. The only difference between that case and this is, that there the titular was present, while here, although summoned, he did not appear. But that does not make a difference which will support the defenders' contention that express words of judgment are required. The presence or absence of the titular does not affect that question. There is quite enough here to indicate the judgment, and I therefore concur with your Lordship in approving of this sub-valuation.

LORD ARDMILLAN, LORD MURE, and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repel the pleas stated for the defender, and ratify, allow, and approve: Find and declare in terms of the conclusions of the libel, but find no expenses due, and decern."

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 135.

June 7, 1875.

Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce.

2D DIVISION.

R.

COL. HAMILTON BRUCE'S TRUSTEES.—Moncreiff—G. Watson.
ANDREW HAMILTON TYNDALL BRUCE, Second Party.—Lee—Low.

Succession—Testament—Legacy—Falsa Demonstratio.—By a holograph codicil the late Col. Hamilton Bruce bequeathed to his son, Mr A. H. T. Bruce, "all the gas companies' shares that were lately bought by me from Mrs T. Bruce's trustees for £300." There were no gas companies' shares purchased by the testator for £300; but he had, about six months before the date of the codicil, purchased from Mrs Bruce's trustees, as one transaction, shares in various gas companies for £798, and some shares in a steelyard for £2. Held that the words "for £300" must be taken as mere falsa demonstratio, and were not used as taxative of the bequest, and consequently that the legatee was entitled to the whole gas shares (but not the steelyard shares), purchased by the testator from Mrs Bruce's trustees.

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 136.

June 11, 1875.

Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

PETER MACBRIDE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Trayner.
HAMILTON AND SON, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Mackintosh.

Contract—Damages—Compensation—Defence.—A tradesman entered into a written contract to furnish and fit up machinery by a certain date. The time was allowed to run out without anything being done, and the tradesman having afterwards completed the work sued for the contract price. The defenders did not dispute the sufficiency of the work, but they averred that another definite time had been verbally substituted for the time originally stipulated, and they resisted payment on the ground that the pursuer had failed to execute the work within the time agreed on, and had thereby occasioned them loss to an amount

[1] Supra, p. 773.

No. 136.
June 11, 1875.
Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

exceeding the sum sued for. Held, on the principle that one party is not entitled to enforce performance of a contract if he has himself violated an express condition thereof, that the defenders were entitled to have their claim of damages liquidated in the action at the pursuer's instance, and set off against the contract price.

Observed that where no time is expressly stipulated within which work is to be completed a claim for damages on the ground that the work was not completed within a reasonable time cannot be pleaded ope exceptionis.

Question, what would have been the result had the definite time expressly stipulated in the original contract been subsequently departed from without the substitution of another definite time.

1st Division. Lord Shand. B.

PETER MACBRIDE, copper and tinplate worker, sued Hamilton and Son, calenderers, Glasgow, for the sum of £475, being the contract price of certain apparatus fitted up by him in the premises of the defenders.

By letter dated 10th July 1873 the pursuer offered to make and fit up for the defenders in their premises in Glasgow a set of steam drying cans with framing, and a double cylinder diagonal steam-engine. The price of the whole was ultimately fixed at £395, and upon 31st October 1873 the defenders accepted the offer in writing, stipulating that the machinery should "be completed and ready for starting by the middle of January 1874, or earlier if possible."

By letters dated 13th and 15th November the parties agreed that an engine of considerably larger dimensions should be substituted for that first contracted for, the price being raised to £475, but no stipulation was made that further time should be given for the execution of the work.

The pursuer averred that he duly made and fitted up the apparatus.

The defenders did not deny that the work had been otherwise duly performed, but they explained that the pursuer failed to fit up the machinery within the time agreed on, or within any reasonable time, and that they suffered loss in consequence to an extent exceeding the amount sued for, and made the following statement;—"More particularly, the pursuer having been bound as aforesaid, under the original agreement, to fit up said machinery by the middle of January 1874, represented to the defenders, towards the end of 1873, that he would be unable to overtake the work by that time. The defenders agreed to allow delay on condition of the work being completed shortly after the time fixed. The pursuer, however, failed to take any steps for beginning the work, and in the month of April the defenders wrote him complaining of the delay, and thereupon a meeting took place between the defenders and pursuer, when an agreement was made to the effect that the defenders should forthwith sell off their old cans and frames, so as to have their premises cleared for the pursuer, and that on getting three days' notice of the time when the premises should be clear the pursuer should proceed to fit up the new machinery, and should have the same completed and ready for working within a fortnight after the premises had been cleared. In pursuance of this arrangement the defenders sold off their old cans and framing, and had their premises cleared for the new machinery upon the 13th May 1874, and on 11th May 1874 intimation was given to the pursuer that the premises would be clear and ready for him on 14th May. The pursuer accordingly took possession of the defenders' premises on or about 14th May, but instead of completing the fitting up of said machinery by 28th May as agreed on, he wrongfully failed to complete the same till the 4th of August, notwithstanding of the repeated complaints by the defenders, made both verbally and in writing, and although he knew and was informed that the defenders' business was being stopped or seriously interfered with, and that the defenders held him liable in damages for their

No. 136.

June 11, 1875.
Madbride v. Hamilton and Son.

loss. The time taken by the pursuer in fitting up said machinery was altogether unreasonable. The whole of that work could, with ordinary diligence, have been completed within a fortnight. The loss sustained by the defenders through the pursuer's said default is not less than £700. The defenders are in course of raising action against the pursuer for said sum." *

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defenders are not entitled to set off their alleged illiquid claim of damages against the pursuer's claim for work done and machinery supplied.

The defenders pleaded;—The pursuer not having duly executed his contract, and the defenders having in consequence sustained loss and damage to an amount in excess of the sum sued for, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary, on 6th April 1875, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the pursuer's third plea in law, and appoints the cause to be enrolled to fix the mode of trial: Reserves all questions of expenses, and allows the pursuer, if so advised, to reclaim against this interlocutor." †

---

* This action of damages was raised by the defenders at the date of lodging their defences, and the record was closed before the present action came on for debate in the Inner-House.

† "NOTE.—In October 1873 the pursuer undertook to make and fit up for the defenders, in their premises in Glasgow, a set of steam drying cans with framing, and a double cylinder diagonal steam engine.

"In accepting the pursuer's offer to execute this work the defenders stipulated in writing that the work 'shall be completed and ready for starting by the middle of January 1874, or earlier if possible.' By letters, dated 13th and 15th November 1873, the parties agreed that an engine of larger dimensions should be substituted for that first contracted for, but no stipulation was made that farther time should be required or given for the execution of the work.

"The pursuer, having completed the work, now sues for the contract price, which is admitted to have been £475. The defenders decline to pay the amount, on the ground that the pursuer failed to execute his contract within the time stipulated, and thereby occasioned them loss and damage to an amount exceeding the sum sued for.

"The question between the parties which was discussed in the procedure-roll is, whether the defenders' claim for loss thus sustained is maintainable as an answer to the pursuer's demand.

"The pursuer maintains that he is entitled to have instant decree, and that the defenders must constitute their claim by a separate action of damages, and cannot maintain it to any extent as a defence to this action. I am of opinion that the defence may be maintained in this case without a counter action, and that consequently the pursuer is not entitled instantly to the decree which he asks.

"The case is not one of mutual debts unconnected with each other, in which the defenders seek to set off a claim of compensation arising out of a totally different transaction from that which is the subject of the pursuer's claim. To that class of cases the statute of 1592, c. 141, applies, but I think that statute has no application to a case like the present.

"The dispute between the parties arises here in reference to their mutual obligations under the same contract; and (1) It seems to be only proper and just that if the pursuer has not fulfilled his contract in all its essentials, and if the defenders have not obtained the advantage for which they stipulated, they should not be bound to pay the pursuer the contract price, but should be entitled to resist payment to the effect of obtaining implement of the obligation in their favour, and if that cannot now be given on the terms arranged then as a substitute the loss and damage they have sustained; and (2) it is desirable in

No. 136. June 11, 1875. Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—While the pursuer's claim was ascertained and undisputed the defenders' counter claim was altogether such cases if possible to avoid the necessity for two actions between the parties where one will serve the purpose.

"The case is distinguishable from the ordinary one of goods sold and delivered, in respect the defenders had to give over their premises to the pursuer for the execution of his contract, and that the work to be executed and services to be performed were such as required a special contract, with sufficient time to enable the particular machinery to be prepared and afterwards fitted up. Time must, I think, be regarded as of the essence of the contract, because the defenders expressly stipulated in the contract that the work should be done by a day fixed. A certain indulgence or relaxation of the stipulation on this subject was apparently given by the defenders; but it appears from their statements, with reference to which no explanation has been given by the pursuer at the adjustment of the record, that the machinery was not fitted up until the 4th of August, notwithstanding repeated complaints and remonstrances regarding the delay, and an intimation that the defender's business was in the meantime stopped or seriously interfered with, and that the pursuer would be held liable in the damages thus resulting. Copies of letters complaining of the delay, dated 14th April, 20th May, 5th and 15th June, and 7th and 11th July 1874, have been produced, confirming these statements. But in the meantime, and with reference to the present question, the statement itself is of importance as shewing that the work was completed in the knowledge on the part of the pursuer that the defenders did not abandon the stipulation for the execution of the work within a certain time beyond any limited indulgence which their actings may be held to have sanctioned, and that although they permitted the work to go on, they did so under notice that a claim to be reimbursed the loss and damage which they were suffering from the non-implement of the contract would be made.

"The case is thus different from that in which goods are furnished or services performed after the stipulated time without notice that the party is held to have committed a breach of contract and a claim intimated and reserved. In a case in which no such notice had been given, and no claim intimated, I should be disposed to hold that the defender was not entitled to resist instant decree by pleading a claim of damages in defence.

"The present case, as presented, is one in which the defenders deny that the pursuer has duly implemented his contract, although it is admitted that if he had done so the sum for which he sues would be the correct amount payable. In one sense the stipulated price or condition is the counterpart of the material supplied and services performed; but the defenders agreed to give the price only for the work done by a certain day, and as time enters essentially into the contract the defence is that the pursuer failed to perform his part, and so is not entitled to decree for the full amount, but only for any sum due after deduction of the amount of the defender's loss, which, in this particular case, is stated to have been greater even than the amount sued for. In this view it is denied on the facts, as appearing from the record, that the pursuer's claim is liquidated. The amount payable is, no doubt, fixed by the contract, if it be assumed that the pursuer's contract was implemented, but this the defenders dispute. The pursuer maintains that having allowed him to perform the work the contract must be taken to have been executed, and the amount due is therefore liquid, and now prestable; but I think this argument is unsound, for the pursuer was substantially in possession of the defenders' premises, and I do not think the defenders were bound at the last moment, and it may be after part of the work had been done, to turn him out, and to enter into a new contract with another person with all the consequent loss, unless they were prepared to allow the pursuer to go on, on the footing of holding the contract as duly executed. Indeed, it is not maintained that the defenders have no claim of damage, but only that their claim cannot be pleaded in defence to this action.

"If the contract had contained a stipulation for a reasonable sum per day by illiquid. Time was not of the essence of the bargain. The only mention of time in the correspondence was the middle of January 1874, and

No. 136.

June 11, 1875.

Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

way of pactional penalty, in the event of delay on the pursuer's part in executing the work, it appears to me the case would have been directly within that of Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335. In that case it is no doubt true the circumstance that the rate of compensation for delay had been settled was mentioned by several of the Judges as entering into their judgments, but it appears to me that the rule should be the same whether the parties have or have not fixed the rate of compensation. A claim is not liquidated until the period of time to which the claim of loss applies has been ascertained, and the defence does not therefore admit of instant verification, even where a rate of pactional penalty has been fixed, any more than the present.

"I think the sound general rule, which may be the subject of exceptions arising from special circumstances, or the special terms of a particular contract, is that in cases of mutual contract a party in defence is entitled to plead and maintain claims in reduction or extinction of a sum due under his obligation, where such claims arise from the failure of the pursuer to fulfil his part of the contract. Claims thus arising were sustained in defence in the cases of Taylor v. Forbes, 2d December 1830, 9 S. 113, 3 Scot. Jur. 67; Stewart v. Campbell, 12th November 1834, 13 S. 7, 7 Scot. Jur. 30, and in the case of Johnston already mentioned, while in the case of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company v. Napier, 10th March 1859, 21 D. 705, 31 Scot. Jur. 350, the Lord President illustrates what appears to me to be the general rule by reference to the case of master and servant, where he expresses the view that a claim for wages may be met by a claim for loss caused by misconduct in the service,—a view acted on in ordinary practice in the Sheriff-courts, where such cases are generally sued.

"In the case of an action for freight, resisted on the ground that the goods carried have been damaged, it is not, I think, so clear in principle as in the present case that the claim may properly be maintained in defence, because the damage is not necessarily the result of carelessness on the part of the carrier, but may arise from inherent defect, or the perils of the sea, and a tedious inquiry with doubtful results may be necessary. In the case of landlord and tenant it has been frequently held that a claim of rent cannot be well met in defence by claims of damage, but I think the explanation is to be found in the fact that the two obligations are not contemporaneous. Where they are so, or where it is plain that the landlord has failed to perform an essential condition of the contract, I am of opinion that a defence may be pleaded in the action at his instance for payment of rent. Thus, if a landlord sued for a year's rent, and the defence were stated that access to the premises could not be and was not obtained until four months after the term of entry, it appears to me the defence claiming a deduction would be properly taken up in the action at his instance. The same principle, I think, applies to the present case.

"The pursuer, in argument, maintained that, in a case of goods sold and delivered, a defence of loss on account of non-performance of the contract by delivery of the goods within the time stipulated would not be competent, and that this case was in no different position.

"For the reason already stated, I think this case materially differs from that now supposed, but I am not prepared to hold that even in such a case the counter claim could not be competently sustained in the action on the contract. If, after a buyer of goods has suffered damage from the seller's delay to supply them within the stipulated time, and has intimated his claim for the loss sustained, and that he is about to buy in goods against the contract in the open market, the other party should still offer to supply the goods, the buyer would, I think, be right in taking them in place of buying from others, and if he did so, under reservation of his claim for loss caused by the seller's delay, I should hold that in that case, as in the present, in an action on the contract for the price, he would be entitled to set up his counter claim for loss caused by the failure of the seller to fulfil the contract in one of its essential particulars.

No. 136.
June 11, 1875.
Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

that had been obviously departed from. After a part of the time had run, the defenders ordered a much larger steam-engine than that contracted for. The result was that the original stipulation as to time must be held to have flown off, leaving the work to be done merely in a reasonable time. The case was thus altogether different from Johnston v. Robertson,[1] where the contract contained an express stipulation that the work should be completed by a specified day, and a sum of liquidated damages was stipulated for in the event of non-completion.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is brought for the recovery of £475, being the contract price of certain machinery and apparatus made and fitted up by the pursuer for the defenders in their premises in Glasgow in the course of last year.

The defence is, that "the pursuer not having duly executed his contract, and the defenders having in consequence sustained loss and damage to an amount in excess of the sum sued for, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor." The defence is founded on an allegation, not that the contract has been unskilfully or insufficiently performed, or that the machinery and apparatus are unfit for the purpose designed, but only that the pursuer has been in fault in the matter of time, and that he did not fit up the machinery and apparatus within the time stipulated in the contract. The amount of damages sustained by the defenders is of course illiquid, but they maintain that they are entitled to have their defence given effect to, and the damages liquidated in this action, because their claim is one arising out of the contract sought to be enforced. The defence takes the form, that the pursuer, who seeks payment under the contract, is not entitled to payment, because he has committed a breach of contract.

On the other hand, the pursuer replies to this by his third plea,—"The defenders are not entitled to set off their alleged illiquid claim of damages against the pursuer's claim for work done and machinery supplied." That plea has been repelled by the Lord Ordinary, who holds that the defenders are entitled to have their damages liquidated in this action, and set off against the contract price, so as to entitle them, if the damages amount to the sum sued for, to absolvitor.

The question whether a claim of this kind can be maintained ope exceptionis is always one of nicety. The general proposition is clear, that where a party seeks to enforce a contract he must shew that he has performed, or been ready to perform, his part of the contract. This, however, was a special contract, though not of an unusual kind. It was not an ordinary sale of goods to be delivered, but a contract to make and fit up machinery in the premises of the employers. If the machinery is good, it would be a very unusual course for the employers to refuse to allow it to be put up in their premises because it was not put up within the time stipulated. Such a course would in general be very inexpedient for both parties. Accordingly it is well understood that if a breach of contract occurs in point of time that gives rise, not to the rejection of the subject, but to a claim of damages for any loss occasioned by the delay. It would be very un-

"I have thought it right to state fully the ground of my judgment in this case, because it raises a point of general importance, and I am not aware of any previous case which has occurred for decision in which the question has arisen so purely as here."

[1] Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335.

No. 136.

June 11, 1875.

Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

desirable to interfere with that established custom, with which we are thoroughly familiar, by resorting to any subtle principle of law.

All this renders the question the more difficult and delicate. In Johnston v. Robertson[1] the employers were found entitled to set off a claim of damages sustained by reason of delay in the execution against the contract price sued for by the contractor. One distinguishing feature of that case was that the damages were liquidated by the contract; for the Court held that the £5 to be paid by the contractor for every week during which the works should remain unfinished, was not meant as a penalty, but a liquidation of the actual loss contemplated as likely to be suffered by the employers in consequence of the delay. But that was only one point in the case, and although it occupies a conspicuous place in the opinions of the Judges, the judgment of the Court, as I understood it, was that the damages, whether liquidated or illiquid, might be set off against the contract price sued for, provided there was breach of an express condition of the contract in point of time. In that case there was a careful and precise stipulation that the building was to be completed, and the keys delivered over by a specified day. There could be no doubt that there was breach of contract in point of time. I think it was the opinion of all the Judges that if there had been no express provision in the contract as to time, and the only complaint of the employers had been that the work was not completed in reasonable time—which is an implied condition in all contracts—that would not have led to the same result, since there would not have been a breach of the particular contract sued on, and the plea would not have been available in the same way against the contractor, that he had not performed his part of the contract, and, therefore, could not recover.

The question comes to be essentially whether an express condition as to time was violated by the contractor, or whether the state of matters, not under the original contract, but as afterwards modified by the conduct of the parties, was merely that the contractor was bound to have the machinery fitted up within a reasonable time. If the contractor was tied down to a particular time by the words of the contract the case comes within the rule of Johnston v. Robertson,[1] but if he was only bound to finish the work in reasonable time the damages for delay must be liquidated in a separate action.

To solve that question, it is necessary to look at the written contract. By the letter of 10th July 1873 the pursuer offers to put up certain steam drying cans, and a double cylinder diagonal steam-engine, particularly described, the whole to be fitted up to the entire satisfaction of the defenders. The price of the cans and framing was £373, and the price of the steam-engine £62, making in all £435. By a subsequent letter of 31st October 1873 this price was diminished by a reduction of £40. Thereupon, by a letter of the same date, the offer was accepted by the defenders. The acceptance is followed by this proviso,—"It is understood that the above shall be completed and ready for starting by the middle of January 1874, or earlier if possible."

I think that is an express stipulation as to time in the contract, and if the case had stood there, and the pursuer had failed to complete the contract by the middle of January, the present defence could have been stated with effect.

On 13th November 1873 the pursuer proposes an alteration on the terms of the contract in regard to the size of the steam-engine, increasing its price from £62 to £142. This suggestion is acted on and accepted by the defenders by their letter of 15th November. In this alteration of the contract nothing was said as to time. If the matter had remained there the original time must still have been held as part of the contract. It is not suggested in the subsequent letters that any additional time was required because the steam-engine was to be of larger size. No additional time was asked or given.

[1] Supra, p. 780.

No. 136. June 11, 1875. Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

The time within which the contract was to be performed ran out without anything being done. Here unquestionably the pursuer was in breach of the contract. If he had fitted up the machinery in February or March of last year it would have been clearly open to the defenders to refuse to pay the contract price without deduction of damages occasioned by the pursuer's breach of contract in point of time. But that is not what happened. The employers gave indulgence in point of time, not expressly, but by submitting to the delay apparently without any intention to make a claim of damages on account of it. If after that any question had been raised, whether the contractor was entitled to demand full payment of the price without submitting to a deduction for delay, a very peculiar question would have been raised, and it might have been plausibly contended that all that could be demanded by the defenders was damages for the work not being done in reasonable time, and that this claim could not be pleaded ope exceptionis.

But, according to the defenders' averments, the matter does not stop there. They allege that there was a new agreement made, which they state thus:—"More particularly, the pursuer having been bound as aforesaid, under the original agreement, to fit up said machinery by the middle of January 1874, represented to the defenders, towards the end of 1873, that he would be unable to overtake the work by that time. The defenders agreed to allow delay, on condition of the work being completed shortly after the time fixed. The pursuer, however, failed to take any steps for beginning the work, and in the month of April the defenders wrote him complaining of the delay, and thereupon a meeting took place between the defenders and pursuer, when an agreement was made to the effect that the defenders should forthwith sell off their old cans and frames, so as to have their premises cleared for the pursuer, and that, on getting three days' notice of the time when the premises should be clear, the pursuer should proceed to fit up the new machinery, and should have the same completed and ready for working within a fortnight after the premises had been cleared. In pursuance of this arrangement, the defenders sold off their old cans and framing, and had their premises cleared for the new machinery upon the 13th May 1874; and on 11th May 1874 intimation was given to the pursuer that the premises would be clear and ready for him on 14th May."

Then they go on to aver the breach of contract:—"The pursuer accordingly took possession of the defenders' premises on or about 14th May; but instead of completing the fitting up of said machinery by 28th May, as agreed on, he wrongfully failed to complete the same till the 4th of August."

This new obligation is more precise than that contained in the original contract. No doubt it was a verbal agreement, but it is not the worse for that, provided it is proved. It comes in place of the original agreement. So the contract now sought to be enforced by the pursuer consists not only of the original written offer and acceptance, but of that offer and acceptance with the letters of November 1873 and the subsequent verbal agreement of April 1874:

No. 136.

June 11, 1875. Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

and unless he can show that he has performed that contract, he is not entitled to recover, or at least he is not entitled to recover the whole amount sued for. That verbal agreement if proved will place the defenders in the same position as the defenders stood in the case of Johnston v. Robertson.

I am, therefore, for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—I agree in much which your Lordship has said; and, at all events, I agree in the result.

If the original written agreement had stood, I should have had no doubt that the pursuer must be held not to have performed his part of the contract, unless he finished the work within the time stipulated, and a claim of damages on account of his failure would have been clearly competent by way of exception to this action. But the parties seem subsequently to have substituted a reasonable time for the definite time originally stipulated. I agree with your Lordship that, if the time had been originally fixed merely as a reasonable time, the claim for damages could not have been pleaded by way of exception, although even in that case I should have been rather disposed to think that as a counter action had been raised, in which there was a closed record, the two cases, being in the same position, might have gone to trial together. It is very much on account of the delay which would otherwise be occasioned that the rule has been established that illiquid counter claims cannot be pleaded by way of exception. The element of delay does not apply to the present case, where the two actions are in the same state of preparation. But it is not necessary to determine that question. For the understanding as to a reasonable time was followed by an agreement, according to the defenders' averment, fixing the time within which the work was to be done. Without saying that a verbal agreement is altogether on the same footing with a written agreement, the important point is, that the whole contract connects together so as to make time an essential element. The original contract as to time was never, indeed, departed from, except conditionally.

Taking these two considerations together,—first, that the two actions are in the same position, and, secondly, that time was of the essence of the contract, I am prepared to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I do not think this case comes strictly under the legal category of compensation. It rather presents itself to my mind as falling under the principle that one of the parties to a mutual contract cannot enforce it against the other if he has violated it himself.

If the contract had borne some specific date for the delivery of the machinery,—that is, for erecting it in the premises of the defenders,—I should have had no doubt that the contractor could not have sued for the contract price, without laying himself open to a claim for damages for delay in fulfilling his contract.

If no specific time for completion had been mentioned in the contract there would have been more difficulty. I am disposed to think that if no time for completion was stipulated, and if it was necessary to go into an inquiry as to what, under all the circumstances, was a reasonable time, then that would have been a different case from the present, and the defender would not have been entitled in such a case to maintain ope exceptionis a claim of damages against the pursuer in respect of unreasonable delay in fulfilling the contract.

No. 136.

June 11, 1875. Macbride v. Hamilton and Son.

Here, however, the case was different. Indulgence or relaxation of the contract in regard to time was granted for a certain reason; but matters were not permitted to rest on that footing, with a stipulation for reasonable time. The defenders have alleged, and undertake to prove, a verbal agreement to the effect that they should displenish their premises and clear out to enable the pursuer to work, and that the pursuer, on getting due notice, should proceed to fit up the new machinery, and should have the same completed within a fortnight after the premises had been cleared. The fortnight from that date is a definite period, substituted for the indefinite period called a reasonable time, which was the intermediate state of the contract. As soon as this agreement was made the defenders had a right to keep the pursuer to the contract.

I think the fact that the counter action has been raised is of little importance, though it furnishes a suitable way of trying the question of damages.

In the first case which I have put, i.e., if the parties had stood on the original contract, in which a definite time was stipulated, no counter action would have been necessary.

In the second case, i.e., if no definite time had been stipulated, I think that a counter action would have been necessary, and that the question of damages, as a set-off against a demand for the price, could not have been tried in this action ope exceptionis.

If the new agreement which has been alleged by the defenders is proved the defenders will be entitled to set off the claim for damages against the pursuer's demand for the contract price.

I concur in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and think we should adhere to his judgment.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not attach the same importance to the fact that the counter action has been raised as Lord Deas appears to do. If this defence is not pleadable ope exceptionis there is no defence to this action, and the pursuer is entitled to instant decree. It will not do to say that the cases are ripe to be tried together, for there would be nothing to be tried in the action on the pursuer's claim.

THE COURT adhered.

FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.—J. & R. D. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

No. 137.

June 11, 1875. Lamont v. Cumming.

NEIL LAMONT, Pursuer.—Asher—Rhind.
DANIEL CUMMING, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Brand.

Common Property—Mutual Gable.—A erected a mutual gable in a burgh, partly on his own ground and partly on that of B, without leaving fireplaces and vents on the side of B's property. Afterwards, when B came to build a house on his ground, he made fireplaces and vents in the gable, and also heightened it. Held that B's operations were not in excess of his rights as joint owner of the gable, no injury to A being alleged.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

THIS was an action by Neil Lamont, spirit-merchant, Renfrew, against Daniel Cumming, flesher there, concluding for declarator that the pursuer was the sole proprietor of the west gable of his house in High Street, Renfrew; or otherwise, that the said gable was a mutual gable betwixt the pursuer's property and the defender's, and in either event that the

No. 137.

June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

defender had "illegally and unwarrantably encroached upon the pursuer's said property, and interfered with said gable by making openings therein to the depth of nearly the whole gable, and resting therein joists of the floors of new buildings in the course of erection by the defender on the ground belonging to him to the west of the pursuer's said property, and by building on and increasing the height of said gable and altering the chimneys therein belonging to the pursuer, and by removing slates from the roof of the pursuer's house adjoining said gable and otherwise."

The defence substantially was that, the gable being mutual, the defender was entitled to use it in the manner complained of for building his own house. It appeared on a proof that the wall was a mutual gable, and the result of the proof otherwise was thus expressed by the Lord Ordinary:—"What he (the defender) seems to have done is this, he has built a two-storey house on part of his ground, and he has inserted some joists in the gable to support the floor of his second storey; he has also turned the recess in the gable into a fireplace, and he has slapped a vent in the gable from that fireplace to the chimney head. And as his house is a few feet higher than the pursuer's, he has raised the height of the gable. In doing so, he had to remove temporarily a few of the slates of the pursuer's roof, but these were carefully replaced. I think it is proved that all the operations have been well executed, and that they have caused no injury or damage to, and that they in no way endanger the safety of the gable, or any other part of the pursuer's property."

The pursuer, previous to this action, had presented an application for interdict in the Sheriff-court, which was dismissed, on the ground, inter alia, that it raised a question of heritable right.

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th January 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is not the sole and exclusive proprietor of, and has not the sole right to and interest in, the west gable of the house belonging to him, situated on the south side of the High Street of Renfrew, and described in the summons: Finds that said gable is a mutual gable, and is the common property of the pursuer as proprietor of said house, and of the defender as proprietor of the subjects adjoining said gable on the west: Therefore decerns and declares in terms of the alternative declaratory conclusion of the summons to that effect: Finds that the operations of the defender complained of in this action were not illegal or unwarrantable: Assoilzies the defender from all the other conclusions of the action, reserving to the pursuer any claim competent to him against the defender for payment of part of the value of said mutual gable, and to the defender his defences thereagainst as accords, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE. . . .—It appears to me that the defender has in no way exceeded his legal rights, and that he was fairly entitled to do what he has done. This is not a case, such as has often occurred, of a conterminous proprietor, or of one of several proprietors of a tenement laid out in flats, making important alterations on a mutual wall or common stair, where these have been originally designed and constructed as part of the conterminous subjects, or of the flatted tenement. Here the pursuer's author has thought fit to build partly on his neighbour's ground and partly on his own a wall as the gable of his own house, but which he knew and intended should afterwards be used as the gable of his neighbour's house when such should be built. But as a gable without joist holes, and without a fireplace and vent, is of little use, and as the first builder has no right to limit his neighbour (unless by paction, which is not here alleged) as to the height to which he shall afterwards carry his house, it would be altogether inequitable to hold that the neighbour, when he came to make use of that gable, should be debarred from making (consistently with safety) all the

No. 137.

June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—In common property neither party is entitled to do anything to the subject without the consent of the other. That was the distinction between common property and common interest.[1] It had never been decided that a mutual gable was an exception to that general rule.[2]

The respondent argued that he was entitled to make any reasonable use of the mutual gable so long as he did no injury to it or to the property of his neighbours.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action is the proprietor of certain subjects in the High Street of Renfrew, and amongst others of a house, the west gable of which is the subject of dispute.

He maintains under this summons, in the first place, that this gable is entirely his own property, built entirely upon his own ground; and, in the second place, and alternatively, that at all events it is a mutual gable, and, on that footing, he asks it to be found that the said gable is a mutual gable between the pursuer's property and the defender's, and in either event that certain operations of the defender are illegal.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the pursuer is not the exclusive proprietor of the gable in question, and in that finding I concur. The question depends a good deal on the evidence as to the boundaries of the two properties. Into this evidence it would be idle for me to go in detail. It is sufficient to say that I am quite satisfied with the result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

We must, therefore, take it that the gable is a mutual gable in the ordinary sense,—that is, that it was originally built according to the time-honoured custom of burghs in Scotland, the resulting rights of the conterminous proprietors being very well established in law. The only question then is, whether the defender's operations were illegal and unwarrantable, or, in terms of the pursuer's plea, in excess of the rights of a mutual owner.

What is alleged against the defender is this, that he has begun to build to the west on his own ground, and has availed himself of the mutual gable; that in doing so he has had to raise the gable, as his own house has been built higher than that of the pursuer's; that he has inserted joists in the mutual gable, and has turned a certain recess which was left in it into a fireplace, and has carried up a flue from it through the wall.

Now, the question comes to be, whether these things were done in excess of the rights of a joint owner. In considering this question, it must be kept in view that the gable in question was built a considerable time ago,—at a time, in fact, when the defender or his predecessors had apparently no expectation of building on their ground to the west. It was built, however, so as to serve as necessary fireplaces, vents, and joist holes, or from raising the wall to a reasonable height. The defender has here done nothing more, and I can see no ground for holding that his operations are illegal, or for ordering the gable to be restored to its original condition. Whether the pursuer may or may not be entitled to claim from the defender any part of the value of the gable of which he has now made use is a question not hujus loci, and the claim is accordingly reserved in the interlocutor."

---

[1] Bell's Prin. 1075-1078, 1086.

[2] Begg v. Jack, Jan. 10, 1874, ante, vol. i. 366; Dow and Gordon v. Harvey, Nov. 9, 1869, 8 Macph. 118, 42 Scot. Jur. 60; Warren v. Marwick, June 13, 1835, 13 S. 944, 7 Scot. Jur. 418.

a mutual gable if and when required. But, viewed as a mutual gable, it was erected in rather a peculiar way by the pursuer's predecessor. While he made fireplaces on his own side of the wall he made none on the other. The only convenience he provided on his neighbour's side of the wall was the recess above mentioned, which has been now utilised as a fireplace, and he made no provision for flues at all. Now, if the proprietor who is last to build is entitled to have a fireplace, or, in fact, to have a use of the gable corresponding to that which is enjoyed by the proprietor who is first to build, then, by some means or other, it is necessary that he should have a fireplace and a vent also.

But the pursuer strongly contends that, according to a general principle of law a mutual gable, being common property, cannot be touched by one owner without the consent of the other. That proposition lies at the foundation of the pursuer's case. It appears to me to be stated much more broadly than the authorities warrant, and indeed, when so stated, to be repugnant both to common sense and everyday practice. When the second builder comes to erect his house, if he constructs it in the ordinary way he must insert joists and drive in dooks for the purpose of supporting the woodwork of the lathing. In that way he necessarily interferes with the substance, the stone and lime, of the gable wall. Therefore the rule contended for by the pursuer cannot be applied absolutely.

But the truth is that a gable is the subject of common property in a somewhat different way from any other thing, in this respect, that when it is originally built the party who builds has the only beneficial enjoyment. The party who comes after has a right in futuro, which is available to him only when he comes to build. That is a very curious position of matters. There may exist a right of common property in one sense even at that time; but it is a different description of right in the one party and in the other as regards the active title and possession. The one uses it as the wall of his house; the other views it in regard to the future as a wall which he will be entitled to use when he comes to build. The first builder is not bound to consult his neighbour when he builds. He is entitled, by the custom of all burghs, to build the wall half on his neighbour's ground. In the ordinary case he does so behind the back of the neighbour. The neighbour does not see how the thing is done, or exercise any control over its execution. He takes it for granted that it will be done in such a way as to afford him requisite accommodation. But if he finds, when he comes to build, that it does not, what is the result? Then, for the first time, the adjoining proprietor exercises any active title, or enters upon any possession or use of the common property; and then, for the first time, the rights of the two parties come to be adjusted. If the second party finds that the wall is so built that it cannot be used for a gable, there must be some remedy, because it has been built half on his ground. He is entitled to have the wall made available for a gable for his house, and if he requires a fireplace and vents, and does not find them, he is entitled to have them.

In what way that right is to be enforced in the ordinary case is a different question. I do not give any opinion as to whether the second builder is entitled to make the alterations at his own hand. Probably if he proceeded to make extensive alterations, however necessary, without communication with the other party, the latter might be entitled to stop such proceedings, because to such subjects the rule is undoubtedly applicable, in re communi melior est conditio prohibentis. But then he must take the attitude of a prohibitor by applying to judicial authority. Here there has been no effectual application for interdict.

No. 137.

June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

The party has waited till the thing was done, and now brings this declarator. Therefore the inquiry is not whether the defender would have been originally entitled to go on with his operations, if the pursuer had interdicted him, but whether the defender has acted in excess of his legal rights as joint owner. Now, it seems to me that the making of a fireplace and a vent in this gable, if it has inflicted no injury on the pursuer, is a matter of right to the defender. That results from the nature of the subject of the common property. There can be no common property in this gable unless there is an equality of rights. But the parties cannot have equality of rights if the one has vents and the other has none. When the second proprietor comes to build that is the time when the mutual rights of parties are adjusted, and it is settled what the second builder is to have.

Therefore I think the defender's right to insert joists, slap out a vent, and make a fireplace, provided no injury is done thereby to the pursuer, is beyond challenge. At the same time I have thought it right to explain the principles on which I have arrived at that result, because, so far as I am aware, there is no express authority on the point.

The same observation applies still more strongly to the only remaining question, whether the builder is entitled to increase the height of the gable. That is a practical question which must very often have arisen, and we see many obvious examples of its having arisen and been decided—gables which have been raised by the owner of the house on one side, while the house on the other side remains of its original height. In such cases the matter has been arranged, because the parties have been reasonable. But it is singular enough that the question has never been raised in a Court of law, and it arises in a very pure form in the present case.

The first builder builds a house of a certain height. After many years the adjoining proprietor comes and wants to build his house higher. It is contended that he cannot do so without giving up the use of the gable which is built half on his ground and building a new one inside. That would be a curious result. It would end in this, that the first builder in a line of street, where there was no restriction in the titles, would settle, for all time coming, the utmost height to which the houses could be built. He would settle it for his next neighbour, and so on to the end of the street the standard of height would transmit against all the builders. Or, suppose a two-storied house was built at one end, and a house of three storeys at the other, as the houses advanced towards each other, what a curious collision there would be. When they came to meet, the house in the middle would have one gable of one height and another of a different height. A rule of law which leads to such results is not to be maintained.

We must follow the undoubted maxim that the owner of the soil is owner a cœlo ad centrum, or rather, we may say in this case, a centro ad cœlum. He is not to be restricted in his ownership by the circumstance that his next neighbour has built a gable wall partly on his ground. Therefore the only mode of reconciling the two rules—the first, that the gable is common property and cannot be interfered with by one party without the consent of the other, the second, that the owner is entitled to raise a building on his property to any height—is to hold, as the Lord Ordinary has done, that the second proprietor may raise the wall to any height to which he wishes to build his own house, always provided that he does not injure the gable or his neighbour's property. There is no ground for saying that injury has been done in this case, and therefore I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary.

No. 137.

June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

LORD DEAS.—I have no doubt that this is a mutual gable, but the debateable question is, whether the one party can heighten it without consent of the other. Reference has been made, in the course of the discussion, to a remark of mine in the case of Begg against Jack, to the effect that the extent of the right of each joint proprietor to make operations upon a mutual gable without consent of the other did not appear to have been made the subject of express decision. That remark has received confirmation in the course of the present argument. It is remarkable, certainly, that so many houses should have been built and afterwards heightened in most of the burghs in Scotland without that question having been raised for decision. But I think the inference to be drawn from that fact is, that the right of each proprietor, within burgh, to make all reasonable uses of the mutual gable has never been seriously doubted. Your Lordship has alluded to the heightening of the houses in the New Town of Edinburgh, and I see that in the case of Alexander v. Stobo (March 3, 1871, 9 Macph. 599). I went pretty fully into the history of some of the principal streets in the New Town of Edinburgh, particularly Princes Street and George Street, in both of which a great proportion of the houses have been heightened since they were originally built. Double gables in these streets are, I am persuaded, all but unknown. The heightening has been far from simultaneous, and if it was understood that each joint proprietor might, if he chose, prevent the other from heightening the mutual gable, there must have been a wonderful universality of neighbourly feeling to account for the objection never having been taken and judicially enforced.

There has been immemorially recognised in the royal burghs of Scotland what is called the law of neighbourhood, or good neighbourhood, with reference to buildings, particularly as to their height, safety, and boundaries, under the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, and, where there is no Dean of Guild, under the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, who, in that case, are vested with all the functions of the Dean of Guild. It is upwards of half a century since I first became personally familiar with instances of this jurisdiction being exercised by the Magistrates where there was no Dean of Guild, and we have both ancient and authoritative confirmation in our institutional writers of this being the law and practice. Thus Bankton, speaking of the Dean of Guild Court, says (iv. 20, 2)—"This Court has likewise the sole jurisdiction in regulating buildings within borrows, whether in repairing or taking down and rebuilding old buildings or erecting new ones." "Without their warrant, obtained upon citation of all parties having interest, no houses within borrow can be built or demolished in whole or in part." And in sec. 7, he adds,—"In some borrows there is no Dean of Guild. In such cases those matters that belong to the Dean of Guild Court are within the cognisance of the Magistrates with advice of the Council, to whose jurisdiction that of the Dean of Guild is understood to be annexed, when by the constitution of the borrow no separate Guild Court is established." Vide also Ersk. i. 4, 24, and ii. 9, 9.

Agreeably to this doctrine it was expressly decided in the case of the Magistrates of Stirling v. the Sheriff, Nov. 1752 (M. 7584), that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild, in all questions of neighbourhood within burgh, is exclusive of that of the Sheriff, and subject only to review of the Supreme Court. Whether it would now be imperative to follow that judgment it is not necessary here to inquire. One reason in favour of it probably was that the Magistrates being entitled, as Bankton observes, to advise with the members of Council, and

No. 137.

June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

the Dean of Guild, in the larger burghs, having, as we know, a council of his own, any deficiency of practical skill in the judicial officers might thus be supplemented from the larger body, in which practical men were always likely to be found. The modern practice, however, in the Sheriff-court and this Court, of obtaining reports from men of skill, would pretty well supply that desideratum, with the advantage of greater judicial experience than can now be found in Burgh Courts, which, within my recollection and that of your Lordships, habitually decided civil suits without limitation of amount, but have now virtually ceased to do so, although the jurisdiction itself has not been abolished.

A mutual gable, it is to be observed, is a very peculiar kind of mutual wall,—very different, for instance, from division walls, so common in this city between back greens; and it will not do to reason from the one to the other. The purpose of these division walls is enclosure merely, without excluding light and air; and for one party to heighten them without consent of the other might very well be deemed, in many circumstances, a violation of the implied contract under which the walls were built, although that matter, no doubt, is seldom left to implication. A mutual gable must be presumed to be intended to serve the purposes of a gable for each of the properties, to bind into it the front and back walls of the houses, to receive the chimneys and flues of each in fair proportion, and to afford supports essential to the interior construction and utility of each of the buildings. In making these particular uses of the gable I can see no principle of restriction except that the one proprietor must not injure the property and rights of the other, nor endanger the mutual property of both. If any other view were adopted the one proprietor could not, without consent of the other, change the position of an interior wall running into the gable, alter or enlarge a fireplace, insert the end of a joist even in the thickest part of the gable, or interfere with it in any way, however beneficial to himself and innocuous to his neighbour.

But the sole reason why I think these uses may be made of the gable is because they are the very purposes for which a mutual gable is intended. It does not follow that either of the joint proprietors can operate upon it for purposes not inherent in its nature,—for instance, to make wall presses, which certainly could not be struck out without mutual consent. Nor do I by any means say that the gable may be raised to whatever height the strength of it will bear, however unusual and invidious that height may be. On the contrary, I think there must always be judicial control in this respect, as well as in other respects, so that nothing may be done but what is fair and reasonable. The discretionary power vested in the Dean of Guild, and consequently in the Magistrates when they come in his place, was very strongly affirmed in the case of Buchanan v. Bell, 15th Nov. 1774, M. 13,178, where a water barge in Glasgow, which was said to have existed for more than forty years, and to be according to a practice common in the city, was nevertheless ordered to be taken down; and the report bears that the Court were of opinion "that although the Dean of Guild can make no arbitrary regulations tending to deprive a person of his property yet he has certainly discretionary powers in the matter of police, and particularly ne opere manufacto aut aliquo immisso urbs deformetur; and the regulation in question fell within these powers in the exercise of which that useful magistrate ought to be supported."

The discretion to limit as well as to permit operations on a mutual gable is an important element in the exercise of jurisdiction in that matter. It has been

No. 137.
June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

immemorially held that wherever the Dean of Guild has jurisdiction he has also a considerable discretion, subject to the control of the Supreme Court, to prevent any one from acting in æmulationem vicini.

The Sheriff has not been in use to exercise over rural tenements the same control which has been immemorially exercised by the burghal Courts over burghal tenements. So that, although many of the considerations suggested as to mutual gables may be common to such gables, whether within or beyond the burghal territory, it does not necessarily follow that either the rights of the parties or the powers of the local Judge are in both cases the same. I wish to be distinctly understood, therefore, as confining my opinion, in the meantime, to such cases as that before us, which is the case of a mutual gable in a royal burgh. There may be much to hear and consider before carrying the doctrine farther.

I have only to add, that if, as the pursuer alleges, the defender proceeded in the present case without judicial authority, I do not doubt that the pursuer, if he had timeously interfered, might have interdicted him till such authority was obtained. But as far as appears the pursuer allowed the defender's operations to be substantially completed before he made any complaint. Even that, however, might not have been conclusive had it been alleged that the operations were either unsafe or injurious. But we have no such allegation in this record, and no such allegation was made at the bar. The question has been argued to us not as one of injury of any kind but as one of abstract right. Taking it so, I am of opinion that the pursuer's contention cannot be given effect to.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have no doubt on the first point raised,—the title to the property. I am satisfied, in concurring with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer is not the sole and exclusive proprietor of the west gable of the house in question, and to that extent the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the action.

But, assuming the gable to be a mutual gable, a question of importance arises, which has been well argued, and which the Court has carefully considered.

On this point, I am of opinion that the use of a mutual gable by operations which, without injury or danger promote its mutuality, is not illegal or unwarrantable, or in excess of rights. In so far as regards the arrangements for vents and fireplaces in the gable, it is, I think, necessary to the mutuality of the wall as between two occupied houses.

The gable would not be mutual in any reasonable meaning of the word unless both parties have the right of laying joists and making adjustments for vents.

A man who builds partly on his neighbour's property a mutual wall builds subject to the eventual mutual enjoyment, the prospect of which alone entitles him to build partly on the property of another. On this part of the case I have no doubt.

The raising of the mutual gable to a greater height is a question rather different.

I think that, if there is injury or danger, or reasonable dread of injury or danger, the party complaining may interpose by craving interdict But there was no interdict here, and no averment of injury or danger. The pursuer claims his right of controlling the height of the next house, and thus of all the other houses.

The judicial authority of the Sheriff or Dean of Guild relates rather to the

No. 137.
June 11, 1875.
Lamont v. Cumming.

mode than the act. The Judge or Magistrate takes care that a right is exercised without injury or peril, and not exercised if there is injury or peril.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair. It rather appears to me that a good deal of the argument for the pursuer has proceeded on a misapprehension of the precise terms of the rule laid down by Mr Bell in the passage in his Principles on which the pursuer mainly relied. It was assumed that Mr Bell had laid it down that where property was common no one party could do anything in the way of alteration unless the other owners consented; but as I read the passage, that is not the true meaning of it. What Mr Bell says is, that "operations on a common wall, which are not necessary, are to be done only by common consent." The words "not necessary" are important, and the inference from them, I think, is that if the operations are alleged to be necessary, and that is disputed, the Courts of law must decide whether they are so or not.

The authorities cited by the pursuer had reference to mutual walls and common passages, but in these cases it does not appear that there was any necessity for heightening the walls or opening doors into the passages. One main object of a mutual gable, however, on the other hand, is to afford means for carrying up the chimneys which may be necessary for the use of the mutual owners, and if one of these owners will not concur in alterations such as those here in question when proposed to be made upon a gable the Courts of law must settle the dispute. And if, as here, no injury can be alleged, then the formation of a chimney in a mutual gable, or altering the height of that gable in so far as necessary for the ordinary uses of a chimney for the joint proprietor's house, will not be put a stop to merely because the other party withholds his consent to it. Nor ought they, in my opinion, to be ordered to be removed, even where there may be grounds for apprehending some injury, where the objecting party has allowed the operations to proceed, and has not had recourse to the proper legal measures for stopping the alteration, till the authority of the Court was interposed. It was upon this latter ground that I proceeded in deciding the case of Cruikshanks,[1] which was affirmed in this Division of the Court, holding that in such circumstances the remedy was that of an action of damages for the injury sustained.

On the question of interdict, I am of opinion that if the pursuer had here applied for one, and could have alleged a relevant case of injury, an interdict might have been granted, at all events until the matters in dispute were settled by the Court. But the pursuer lost that remedy by going to the Sheriff and raising a question of heritable right before him as to the absolute property of the wall, which led to that action being dismissed.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it reserves to the pursuer any claim competent to him against the defender for payment of a part of the value of the said mutual gable, and in place thereof reserve to the pursuer any pecuniary claim competent to him against the defender in respect of his making use of the said mutual gable: Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the defender entitled to additional expenses," &c.

J. & R. A. ROBERTSON, S.S.C.—A. KIRK MACKIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] Not reported.

THOMAS R. BUCHANAN, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Low.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF TULLIALLAN, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Guthrie Smith—Innes.

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

School—Schoolmaster—School Fees—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 62), secs. 48, 53, 55.—The school board of a parish having passed a resolution requiring the schoolmaster, who had been appointed prior to the Education Act, 1872, to collect monthly the school fees, which formed part of his emoluments, and to return a statement of the fees collected quarterly to the treasurer, the schoolmaster raised an action concluding for reduction of the resolution and for declarator that he was not bound to collect the fees, on the ground that by the 53d and 55th sections of the Act it was the duty of the board to collect the fees and pay them to the schoolmaster. Held (by a majority of seven Judges, diss. Lord Deas, aff. judgment of Lord Curriehill), that in accordance with the usage prior to the Act the duty of collecting the fees remained with the schoolmaster,—and the defenders assoilzied.

THIS was an action by T. R. Buchanan, teacher of the parish school of Tulliallan, against the school board of that parish, concluding (1) for reduction of certain minutes of the board, (2) for declarator that the pursuer was not bound to collect the school fees of the parish school, and (3) for payment of £34, 3s. 8d.

1ST DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Ld. Curriehill. M.

The pursuer averred that he had been teacher of the parish school of Tulliallan for twenty-eight years prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872. When the school board was appointed they allowed the fees to remain at the former rates, and the teacher received in addition a salary of £55. In July 1873 the school board intimated to the pursuer that the fees, which had formerly been collected by him, would in future be collected by the clerk. That system, however, was not long continued, and, on 8th January 1874, the board passed the following resolution, which they communicated to the pursuer:—"That on and after 1st February next, Mr Buchanan be required himself to collect the fees every four weeks in advance, commencing on 2d February 1874, rendering quarterly to the treasurer a statement of the fees collected, and of those in arrear." * On 20th February, and again on 20th March, they passed resolutions adhering to the resolution of 8th January. On 31st January they adopted, and communicated to the pursuer, the following resolution:—"That the clerk be instructed to send Mr Buchanan copy of the Board of Education's letter, of date 23d March, and to intimate that the board require him to conform to the resolutions as to the collecting of the fees and keeping of the accounts and registers passed on 8th January last. The clerk is requested to explain to Mr Buchanan that it is not, and never was, the intention of the board that he should prosecute for fees in arrear, but that the board will prosecute those parties whom they think fit." The above four minutes were those of which reduction was sought. The pursuer further averred that he refused to collect the fees unconditionally (which was explained to mean without remuneration), that the defenders had not collected them, and that the fees payable between February and July 1874 amounted to £34, 3s. 8d., and were still due to him.

He pleaded;—(1) Having regard to the provisions of "The Education

* The minute of this date, besides the passage above quoted by the pursuer on record, contained the following paragraph concerning him:—"(2) That Mr Buchanan be required to keep registers and accounts of fees. (3) That Mr Buchanan add to the usual monthly fees 3d per month during January, February, and March, for heating the school, and one halfpenny per month throughout the year for cleaning purposes, and that he pay the sums thus collected to the treasurer, along with the other fees."

No. 138. June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

(Scotland) Act, 1872," the pursuer is not bound to collect the school fees of the parish school of Tulliallan, and it is incompetent and illegal for the defenders to require him to do so. He is therefore entitled to decree of reduction and declarator as libelled. (2) The defenders being justly owing and indebted to the pursuer in the foresaid sum of £34, 3s. 8d., are bound to make payment of the same, with interest.

The defenders substantially admitted the facts as averred by the pursuer, and quoted a letter from the Board of Education approving of the course which they had pursued.

They pleaded;—(2) By statute 43 George III., c. 54, and the usage following thereon, the fees paid by the pupils in a parish school fell to be collected by the teacher, and no contrary provision being contained in the Education Act, the old law in this particular is still unrepealed. (3) In virtue of the powers vested in them by the Education Act, the school board, with the sanction of the Board of Education, was entitled to require the pursuer to collect the fees, and to account to their treasurer. (4) The defenders not having received the fees for the periods in question, and their non-recovery being in no way due to the fault of the defenders, they are not liable.

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the reasons of reduction, assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." *

---

* "NOTE.—The present action arises out of a dispute (of a class which is becoming unfortunately numerous) between the school board of Tulliallan and the parochial schoolmaster of that parish who was in office at the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. I cannot help thinking that the dispute would never have arisen, or at all events might have been easily adjusted out of Court, if the parties had exercised a little mutual forbearance while the new system of national education introduced by the recent statute was being established in the parish. As the parties, however, still keep each other at arms-length, the matter in dispute must be judicially decided. The pursuer was for upwards of a quarter of a century before 1872 the parochial schoolmaster of Tulliallan. The defenders are the school board of that parish, elected in 1873 under the provisions of the Act of 1872. Prior to 1872 the pursuer, as parochial schoolmaster, had a fixed salary, and received for his own use the whole school fees paid by the pupils attending the school. These fees were collected by himself in conformity with the invariable practice in all parish schools. He was, however, under section 18 of the Act 43 George III., cap. 54, obliged to teach gratuitously, or for smaller fees than he was entitled to demand from ordinary pupils, such poor children as should be recommended by the heritors and minister at any parochial meeting. The Act of 1872 transferred from the heritors and the minister to the school board the whole management of the parochial schools; and by repealing the Act 43 George III., freed the schoolmaster from the obligation to teach gratuitously any poor children. And the Act has further made it the duty of the parochial board of the parish to pay out of the poor fund the ordinary and reasonable fees for the elementary education of every child in the parish whose parent is unable from poverty to provide such education. The school board, when appointed, assigned to the pursuer a fixed salary of £55 per annum, and in addition, allowed the fees in his school to remain at their former rates, and to be levied by himself as part of his emoluments. Matters remained on this footing until July 1873, when the school board resolved that the school fees should be collected by their clerk quarterly, and in advance. It does not appear, and indeed it is not alleged, that the board intended by this resolution to take away the fees from the pursuer. On the contrary, the fees were collected by the clerk from 1st July 1873 to 31st January 1874, and were handed over to the pursuer. The school board, however, seem to have found it difficult, if not impracticable, to

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The 55th section of the Act provides that teachers appointed previously to the passing of the Act shall collect the fees satisfactorily by the hands of their officer, and on 8th January 1874 they resolved,—'That on and after 1st February next Mr Buchanan be required himself to collect the fees every four weeks in advance, commencing 2d February 1874, rendering quarterly to the treasurer a statement of the fees collected, and of those in arrear.' The pursuer, founding on the terms of the 53d section of the Act of 1872, which provides that the school fees 'shall be paid to the treasurer of the board,' declined to collect the fees. Some communings took place between the pursuer and a committee of the board, which led to no satisfactory result, and the board, by minutes dated respectively 20th and 31st March 1874, adhered to their resolution of 8th January, that the pursuer should be required to collect the fees. The last of these minutes directs the clerk of the board to explain to the pursuer 'that it is not, and never was, the intention of the board that he should prosecute for fees in arrear, but that the board will prosecute those parties whom they think fit.' All of these resolutions were communicated to the pursuer, who, however, refused and still refuses to collect the fees. The result is, that no fees were collected by anyone for the two quarters beginning respectively on 1st February and 1st May 1874; and the present action has been brought by the pursuer to have the minutes and resolutions of the board reduced and set aside, and whether these are reduced or not, to have the board ordained to pay to him the school fees payable during the two quarters mentioned, with interest thereon. The pursuer maintains that, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1872, he is not bound to collect the school fees; that it is incompetent and illegal for the defenders to require him to do so; and that the defenders are bound to pay to him a sum equal to the amount of the fees which were payable, and which should have been levied during the period referred to. The contention of the pursuer appears to me to be based upon an erroneous construction of the statute, and to be untenable. It is rested mainly, if not altogether, upon the isolated expression in section 53 of the statute quoted by him in condescendence, article 3, viz., that the 'fees shall be paid to the treasurer.' These words are read by the pursuer as meaning that the school fees must be actually collected by the treasurer of the board from the pupils or their parents directly, and that no other person can grant a valid receipt for the fees. These words, however, do not necessarily bear that meaning, and they cannot, as I think, be rightly construed without reading in connection with them not only the whole context of the section in which they occur, but also sections 43, 48, and 55. Section 43, which deals with 'the school fund,' provides that 'there shall be carried to the school fund all moneys received out of moneys provided by Parliament, or raised by way of loan, or otherwise received by the school board for the purposes of that fund, and not by this Act specially appropriated; and any deficiency shall be raised by the school board as provided by this Act.' In section 48, which prescribes the duties of the treasurer, it is not said that this officer is to collect the fees from the scholars, but it is declared to be his duty, inter alia, 'to keep and preserve in a proper book or books an accurate account of the school fund, and of all other property and funds under the administration of the school board, and of the expenditure thereof; and the account of the school fund shall be kept separate from the account of all other property and funds.' By section 53, which deals with the 'school fees,' it is provided that the school board shall, subject to the provisions of section 62 with respect to higher class public schools, 'fix the school fees to be paid for attendance at each school under their management, and such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, and a separate account shall be kept of the amount of the fees derived from each school; and it shall be lawful for the school board, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers of a school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them as the school board shall determine.' And by section 55 it is provided that teachers in office before the passing of the Act 'shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

not be prejudiced by the provisions of the Act.[1] But the minute of 8th January imposed duties upon him which he was not previously bound to perform—for example, to keep an account of the fees. That was a duty laid on the treasurer by the 48th section, and the 53d section provided that the fees should be paid to the treasurer. Though the position of the teacher was not to be worse than before, it is not to be assumed at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively.' By the same section (section 55) it is provided that teachers appointed after the passing of the Act are to hold office during the pleasure of the board, and are to receive such salaries and emoluments as the school board shall think fit. These sections, when rightly construed, appear to me to shew that the intention of the Legislature was—(1) That although the school fees were to form part of the school fund, and to pass through the treasurer's account as a separate item of the fund, they were not necessarily to be collected by the treasurer, and that the requirements of section 53 would be satisfied by the fees being collected by any schoolmaster, old or new, with the sanction and authority of the board, and retained by him as part of his emoluments—he always giving an account to the treasurer of the amount so collected and retained and of the arrear outstanding; and (2) that in the case of teachers in office at the passing of the Act, the school board would fully comply with the provisions of section 55, if they authorised and empowered the teacher to continue to levy that part of his emoluments which consisted of the school fees, in the same way as he was in use to do under the old system. In no better way could the board 'provide' to the teacher that part of his emoluments without prejudicing him with respect thereto. In the present case the teacher is not only not prejudiced in the matter of emolument by being required to collect the fees as formerly, and being allowed to retain the whole for his own use, but he is rather benefited—(1) because he is no longer obliged to teach any pupil gratuitously, fees being now paid for every pupil who attends the school, and attendance being now compulsory; and (2) because, in the event of fees being in arrear, the board, and not the teacher, are to bear the expense of prosecuting defaulting parents. It might perhaps have been more courteous in the board to have explained their views to the pursuer before returning to the old system of collecting the fees, and the resolutions might have been expressed in less imperative terms; but I do not think that the proceedings of the board have been such as to justify the pursuer in the course which he has adopted. I construe the minutes of the board as meaning this,—'We wish you, the teacher, to continue to have the fees as part of your emoluments as heretofore. We have not the facilities for collecting them which you have; but you will collect them and appropriate them in the same way as you used to do before 1872, and we will assist you in case of difficulty with our statutory powers of prosecution; and all that you have to do is to inform our treasurer how much you collect in name of fees, and how much remains in arrear.' This appears to me, not only to be not at variance with the provisions of the Act, but to be in itself a most reasonable proposal; and I cannot see any ground on which the reductive conclusions of the action can be sustained. Nor are the petitory conclusions better founded. The pursuer has chosen to sacrifice his emoluments from the fees to a mistaken feeling of offended dignity, and he must submit to the consequences if he has failed to collect the fees when they were placed by the board within his reach. In conclusion, I have merely to observe that, even if it were to be held that under section 53 of the statute the treasurer of the board, and he alone, can grant a valid receipt to parents for the school fees, the pursuer's case would not thereby be benefited; both because such a difficulty was never suggested in the course of the dispute, and because there is no reason to believe that the defenders, if asked by the pursuer, would have declined to furnish him with receipts signed by the treasurer."

[1] The sections of the Act are quoted infra, p. 798, note.

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

that the Legislature did not intend to improve it by relieving him of the collection of the fees. The propriety of laying that duty upon him is not the same as before, because the fees were formerly his property, now they are not, but are carried to the school fund under the 43d section.[1] They must reach the school fund by the theory of the Act, even though they may afterwards come to the teacher. If it had been his statutory duty to collect the fees, the board could not have displaced him as they did for a time. The intention of the Act was to relieve the teacher from an unsuitable and invidious duty; and the 55th section, while providing that the emoluments of teachers in office prior to the Act should not be prejudiced, expressly enacted that such emoluments should be paid to them by the board.

The defenders argued;—The 55th section gave the teacher all the right he had. Under it his position was left as it had been before. It was the immemorial custom in parish schools that the teacher should collect the fees. The 53d section could not aid the pursuer, unless it was made illegal that the fees should be paid to any other person than the treasurer. But that was not even maintained.

The Court appointed the case to be heard before seven Judges.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer is the schoolmaster of the parish school of Tulliallan. The first conclusion of the summons seeks to reduce certain minutes whereby the school board "resolve that on and after 1st February next the pursuer be required himself to collect the school fees every four weeks in advance, commencing on 2d February 1874, rendering quarterly to the treasurer a statement of the fees collected and of those in arrears."

Then the summons proceeds, that whether the said minutes are reduced or not it ought to be found and declared "that the pursuer is not bound to collect the school fees of the parish school of Tulliallan," and, further, that the defenders should be decerned to make payment to the pursuer of £34, 3s. 8d. That sum represents the school fees which ought to have been collected, and which the pursuer says it was the duty of the defenders to have collected. Therefore the question, and the only question intended to be raised by this summons is, whether the pursuer is bound to collect the school fees. That view of the summons is further supported by the pleas in law. A good deal of reference was made in argument to the terms of some of the minutes, particularly to that of 8th January 1874, according to which a resolution was passed to the effect not only that the pursuer should regularly collect the school fees, but also keep a register and account of the fees, and add to the usual monthly fees certain payments for heating and cleaning the school. It is said that whether he was bound to collect the fees or not, he was not bound to submit to these terms. But I throw aside these specialties, because I do not think that they form any part of the substance of the pursuer's case. The only question raised by the summons, and therefore the only question which we are called on to determine, is the obligation to collect the fees.

Beyond all dispute, prior to the Act of 1872 parish schoolmasters were in use to collect the fees, and that for a plain reason. The fees belonged to themselves. They had the greatest, indeed the only direct interest in collecting them, and, therefore, they were the proper parties to be entrusted with that duty. They had also opportunities and facilities for performing it which no other person could possibly possess. Under the provisions of the Act of 1872 it appears to me that schoolmasters then in office in parish schools were left in the full enjoyment of the school fees as part of their emoluments, and if so, it would seem to follow that they were the proper persons to collect them. No change was made as regards these old schoolmasters and their right to the fees, and as they retained the exclusive right to them the same reasons which operated previously to make them the proper collectors remained undisturbed.

[1] Infra, p. 798, note.

No. 138. June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

Still, the question before us must be solved with reference to the particular clauses of the Act. Several of these have a bearing on this question. The school board have the entire management of the affairs of the school; among other things they are entitled to manage the whole funds, and for the due administration of these they are authorised to appoint a treasurer. The 43d section, which relates to the school fund and the expenses of the board, is the first which requires attention.* The assessment and borrowing clauses immediately follow. Then we come to the 48th section.† The treasurer is thus the keeper of the school fund. And taking these two clauses together we have it provided that the school fund is in his hands, and that everything goes into it which is received by the board for the purposes of the fund, "and not by this Act or otherwise specially appropriated." Then we come to the 53d clause,‡ which relates to fees. Now, a very important question here arises whether the 53d clause can affect the case of a master in office at the time of the passing of the Act. That question cannot be solved without taking into consideration not only the other clauses which I have read, but also the 55th.§ Now, this 55th clause must be construed with

* Sec. 43.—"The expenses of the school board, including those incident to the election thereof (but not including the expenses of any member or candidate), in any parish or burgh under this Act, shall be paid out of the school fund. There shall be carried to the school fund all moneys received out of moneys provided by Parliament or raised by way of loan, or otherwise received by the school board for the purposes of that fund, and not by this Act or otherwise specially appropriated, and any deficiency shall be raised by the school board as provided by this Act."

† Sec. 48.—"Each school board shall, at the first meeting thereof, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be, appoint, during the pleasure of the school board, a fit and proper person, or fit and proper persons, to be treasurer to the school board, with such remuneration as the school board shall see fit, and it shall be the duty of the treasurer to keep and preserve, in a proper book or books, an accurate account of the school fund, and of all other property and funds under the administration of the school board, and of the expenditure thereof."

‡ Sec. 53.—"The school board shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained with respect to higher class public schools, fix the school fees to be paid for attendance at each school under their management, and such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, and a separate account shall be kept of the amount of the fees derived from each school; and it shall be lawful for the school board, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers of a school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them as the school board may determine."

§ Sec. 55.—"Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained regarding the removal of teachers of public schools appointed previously to the passing of this Act, such teachers shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage, secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such school respectively."

No. 138.

June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

reference to the condition of schoolmasters in office in respect of school fees. As I have already said, the fees belonged to them. They were entitled to collect them, and that, certainly, was a privilege, because they could collect them better than anybody else. And if anybody else had done it the master must in some shape have paid commission. He thus both saved money, and had the advantage of being in a position in which he could use means to obtain payment which were not available to anybody else. Therefore the product of the fees would be larger in his hands than if collected in any other way; and in that shape they formed an important part of his emoluments. The 55th section provides that his position as to emoluments is not to be "prejudiced." That is a very strong expression. And the school board is bound to secure, either by payment or provision, that is to say, arrangement or regulations, that he be kept in as favourable a position as he was in before. Now, that is very difficult to reconcile with the view which the pursuer here takes up of the effect of clause 53. He says that clause requires that the fees should be paid to the treasurer; and though it was quite fairly admitted that that did not necessarily mean that the treasurer was to collect them, it was said that it shewed that the money when collected was to be paid over to him, and form part of the school fund, and that the right of the master as regards the fees could only be to obtain payment of them from the treasurer when collected, which it was represented was inconsistent with his being the collector himself.

But it appears to me that according to the true construction of the 53d clause, when taken in connection with the other clauses which I have read, it does not apply to schoolmasters in office at the passing of the Act, and cannot affect their position. It provides that the fees are to be fixed by the board. No doubt it may affect the schoolmaster in that way. But when it goes on to provide that the fees are to be paid to the treasurer, and that a separate account is to be kept of them, and that it shall be lawful for the board, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers the fees directly, or divide them as the board shall determine, it seems to me that we are out of the case of the old schoolmasters. In their case the board have no discretion. The fees are secured to them by section 55, which, being the later enactment, is, at all events, sufficient to overrule section 53. The 53d section says the fees are to be dealt with by the board as they please; they may divide them as they see fit. Can anything be more clearly prejudicial to the emoluments of old schoolmasters than acting on that section? Therefore it is plain that this is just one of those parts of the receipts of the school which for the time is in terms of the 43d section "by this Act otherwise appropriated," and not available for the school fund, while the old schoolmaster is in office.

Now, if the old schoolmaster is thus secured in his fees, as he had them before the Act, and in his right to collect them, is it not almost a necessary consequence that the board are entitled to say,—"During your tenure of office we have nothing to do with the fees. You must collect them as you did before."

On that ground I agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. But I have endeavoured to explain the particular ground upon which my opinion proceeds, because I desire it to be understood that it is in respect of the 55th section in its application to schoolmasters in office at the date of the Act. If this was a question of a new schoolmaster, the 55th section could have no application, and it is needless to discuss what questions would then arise. It is maintained, on the one hand, that the master's duty should be confined to teaching. On the other hand, it is said that it does not matter much what the theory on that point is, because if the new master is ordered to collect the fees, and refuses, the board will dismiss him. I doubt whether the question can be so easily solved. The question may arise, not between the board and the master, but between a majority and a minority of the board. But on that question I give no opinion. I only state my opinion that an old schoolmaster is bound to collect his own fees, as secured to him under section 55.

No. 138.

June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is impossible not to regret the state of the relations between the school board and the schoolmaster which this action discloses. With the exception of the particulars contained in the third requisition in the minute of the school board, to which, inconsiderable as they are, objections may perhaps lie, and which were surrendered by the counsel for the board at the bar, the board have only required the schoolmaster to do what from time immemorial the schoolmasters of Scotland have done, and what the pursuer himself, during his long tenure of office, has been in the habit of doing. I can find little or nothing in the conduct of the board which lays them open to observation. They tried the experiment of collecting the fees themselves, but finding as has been found in other parishes, that this was a cumbrous and inconvenient operation, they have simply reverted to the former practice, and required the schoolmaster to act as he had previously done. I have looked in vain in these proceedings for any reasonable explanation of his refusal, or for any statement of any material interest which he wishes to protect. When pressed in argument he could only suggest two. One was that his time ought to be given solely to the teaching of his school, and that the collection of the fees would interfere with these duties. Considering that during the whole period of his tenure of office he has found no inconvenience arise from the same cause, it is difficult to put much faith in the sincerity of this objection. It appears, however, that he was quite prepared to undertake the duty if what he calls a reasonable arrangement had been come to on that subject, so that it is impossible to regard this ground of complaint as having any substance in it.

The other interest which the pursuer alleges to have been infringed is much of the same character. He suggested at the bar some supposed difficulties in carrying out the wishes of the board, and represented their not unreasonable wish that he should resume a duty so long performed, as if it implied a domiciliary circuit of the whole parish, and an amount of labour which he had never undertaken before. These anticipations seem to me to be entirely imaginary. The fees which the board desire him to collect are the fees which the children bring to the school. As explained by their counsel, the defenders do not expect the schoolmaster to go round the parish, which has never been the practice in Scotland, and still less do they expect him to prosecute for the fees, a proceeding of which I have never heard of even a single example. The board have undertaken any prosecutions which may be required; but these will be against the parents under the compulsory clauses, with which the schoolmaster has nothing to do.

I regard, therefore, the schoolmaster's position in this litigation as entirely unsupported by any substantial interest, and I think he has failed entirely to allege any reasonable ground, as far as his own interest is concerned, for the difficulties which he has raised.

It seems, however, that there is a legal argument, founded on a construction of the clauses of the Education Act, from which it is maintained that it is not lawful for the school boards to require the schoolmaster to collect these fees, and it is on the merits of that legal argument that our present advising takes place.

No. 138.

June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

I must premise the few observations which I intend to make on the construction of the clauses of the statute referred to by one general observation. In a very able address the junior counsel for the pursuer contended that under this statute the schoolmaster had in some sense a position independent of the board—that his function was solely to teach—and that the board had no duty to discharge in regard to his teaching—but were concerned alone in the financial concerns of the school. I heard the argument with surprise; for if there be one thing clear in this important Act of Parliament it is that the school boards are entrusted with a general right and duty of administration over the whole of the educational machinery provided by the statute. They are to ascertain the amount of school accommodation—they are bound to maintain a school in each parish, and keep it efficient—to provide what additional accommodation they may consider to be necessary—to clear out incompetent and inefficient schoolmasters,—and they have all the general powers necessary for the performance of these duties,—and for the greater part their power and discretion is without control. The Government inspector is concerned solely with the Government grant and the terms on which it is given. The board in Edinburgh has no general power of control; and although schoolmasters in office at the date of the Act have certain rights reserved to them in regard to tenure and emoluments, the schoolmasters generally are simply the servants of the ratepayers, represented by the school board, and are necessarily subject to the administration of those for whom they act, and by whom they are appointed and paid. While, therefore, we might interfere in cases which were fraudulent or oppressive, I listened, without assent, to criticisms on the statute founded on misconceptions such as these.

But however critically the statute may be read I am of opinion that the contention of the pursuer derives no support from it.

The clauses on which this contention is founded are the 48th, the 53d, and the 55th sections of the Act. The 48th section authorises the school board to appoint a treasurer, who is to take charge of the funds of the board. The 53d section authorises the school board to fix the school fees, and provides "that such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, and a separate account shall be kept of the amount of the fees derived from each school; and it shall be lawful for the school board, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers of a school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them as the school board shall determine." And the 55th section provides that, subject to the provisions in regard to removals, the teachers appointed previous to the Act "shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively." It is contended that by virtue of the provisions in the 53d section, which provides that the fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, it is not lawful for the board to direct that they shall be paid to any one else.

The simple view which I take of this argument entirely coincides with that presented by your Lordship. Whatever its value might be in the case of a new schoolmaster—a question little likely to occur—it has no relation at all to the case of a schoolmaster in office at the passing of the Act. I have no doubt that the statute did contemplate that the board should relieve the schoolmaster to be afterwards appointed of such secular duties as might interfere with his proper functions; and that it gave the boards power to maintain a staff of officials sufficient to enable them to do so. Whether it gave the schoolmaster any right to question such arrangements as the present is a very different matter. But the reservation in the 55th section clearly qualifies the provisions of the 53d section in any view which can be taken of it. Under that 55th section the schoolmaster's interest in the school fees is reserved entire—he is entitled to their amount, and perhaps, if he chooses, is entitled to collect them as he has been wont to do. The school board are certainly not bound to collect them for him free of charge, his right being to the amount of these fees minus the trouble or cost of collection; and if the schoolmaster can collect them more cheaply himself, or more conveniently, there seems no reason why the school board should not leave them in his hands. In short, as far as an old schoolmaster is concerned, the fund belongs to the schoolmaster, and not to the board, although the board and the schoolmaster may by arrangement agree on a sum to be accepted in lieu of the fees. I therefore think that the 55th section takes the case of an old schoolmaster out of the procedure anticipated in the 53d, a conclusion much strengthened by the last provision of that section, which empowers the school board if they see fit to pay to the teachers of the school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them as the school board shall determine. This provision cannot possibly apply to the case of an old schoolmaster, who might certainly object to any portion of the school fees, or their estimated amount, being paid to any one but himself.

No. 138. June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

Lord Deas.—This is an action of reduction at the instance of the pursuer in his capacity of parish schoolmaster of Tulliallan, the object of which is to reduce and set aside certain resolutions embodied in various minutes of meetings of the school board of the parish, which are said to be unauthorised by the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, and prejudicial to the pursuer's rights and interests under that Act. The summons contains also certain petitory conclusions, but these are not essential to the action of reduction, the conclusions of which fall, in the first instance, to be decided, whatever may become of the petitory conclusions, which might have formed the subject of a separate action, and fall to be separately considered. The pursuer has quite a sufficient interest to insist in the reduction whether the board be held liable to him for past due fees or not.

The resolutions which the pursuer seeks to reduce are embodied in the minute of meeting of 8th January 1874 under three heads, but in substance they are four,—

1. That the pursuer shall collect the school fees (that is, the fees payable by scholars) every four weeks, in advance, and pay them over quarterly to the treasurer of the board.

2. That he shall keep registers and accounts of fees, or (as expressed in the minute of 20th February 1874) "registers and log-book."

3. That he shall render quarterly to the treasurer a statement of the fees collected, and of those in arrear.

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

4. That, along with the usual monthly fees, he shall collect 3d. per month during January, February, and March for heating the school, and one halfpenny per month, throughout the year, for cleaning purposes, and pay the sums so collected to the treasurer along with the other fees. These last words obviously imply that, under the first resolution, the fees themselves are to be so paid over.

The minutes of meeting subsequent to 8th January, so far as sought to be reduced, are merely confirmatory and explanatory of the resolutions embodied in that minute. The minute of 31st March explains "that it is not, and never was, the intention of the board that he (the pursuer) should prosecute for fees in arrear, but that the board will prosecute those parties whom they think fit."

It is avowedly intended that the duties thus imposed upon the pursuer shall be performed by him gratuitously. That being so, the only debateable question appears to me to arise under the first resolution. There has been neither law nor paction referred to for holding the pursuer bound to collect money for heating and cleaning the school. The board might as well have ordered him to pay for the coals, or himself to sweep the school personally or by deputy, as to make collections for these purposes. I think he is entitled to have the resolution as to these items de plano reduced and set aside. A finding to the effect that he is not bound to comply with the resolution is not the remedy appropriate to an action of reduction, and, if the resolution be clearly ultra vires, I know no reason why his remedy should not be given, to this extent, in the usual form, under the reductive conclusions of the summons.

I am disposed to make very much the same observations as to the resolutions requiring the pursuer gratuitously to keep registers and accounts, or "registers and log-book," and to render quarterly accounts to the treasurer of the fees collected and of those in arrear. These duties infer labour not incumbent on, nor performed by, him anterior to the Education Act—not laid upon him by that Act—and for the exaction of which, without remuneration, neither law nor paction can be pleaded.

The debateable question, however, remains—Is the pursuer bound gratuitously to collect the school fees and hand them over quarterly to the treasurer? I am disposed to think that he is not. The defenders themselves did not think he was till recently, for they appointed the clerk to the board to collect the fees, and he did so for the half year ending 31st January 1874. But I do not rest upon this, but on the terms of the statute, the policy of which, I think, was that, beyond receiving his emoluments from the board, the schoolmaster should, in future, have nothing to do with money matters at all—that he should devote his time and attention exclusively to teaching, and that all financial matters should be in the hands of the board. There may have been many good reasons for this connected with the new system of compulsory education, and compulsory exaction of payment for that education from all classes alike without fear or favour; but into these reasons I do not inquire, because the statute, I think, has said that this is to be so, and that is enough.

There may possibly be a distinction, as regards the present question, between old and new schoolmasters—that is, schoolmasters who held, and still hold, their offices ad vitam aut culpam, and those appointed since the passing of the Act. But if there be so, the position of the old schoolmasters must be in that respect exceptional, and I do not see how we can, judicially and satisfactorily, deal with the exception without first considering,—although, it may be, not absolutely deciding,—the construction of the Act as to parish schoolmasters generally.

No. 138.

June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

The interpretation clause bears:—"'Parish school' shall include any school established under the recited Acts, or any of them, and any school established under this Act by the school board of a parish, or which is by this Act vested in and placed under the management of the school board of a parish." The subsequent sections of the Act place the property and management of all parish schools in the school board of the parish, and the property and management of all burgh schools in the school board of the burgh.

The schoolmasters of all schools under the management of the school board are throughout designated by the common term "the teachers," and wherever nothing is said to the contrary it is clear enough that the words "the teachers" include the schoolmasters of the parish schools, old and new.

The 43d section of the Act bears that the expenses of the school board shall be paid out of the school fund. "There shall be carried to the school fund all moneys received out of moneys provided by Parliament, or raised by way of loan, or otherwise received by the school board for the purposes of that fund, and not by this Act otherwise specially appropriated, and any deficiency shall be raised by the school board as provided by the Act."

The 44th section provides for assessing and laying on a "school rate" to meet any deficiency of the school fund.

The 48th section provides for the appointment of a treasurer, "with such remuneration as the school board shall see fit," who is to keep an accurate account of the school fund, and of the expenditure thereof, separate from his account of the other property and funds, and once a year to transmit an account, shewing all receipts and payments, to the accountant of the Board of Education for audit.

By section 52 the school board "may appoint a clerk or clerks, and other necessary officers," "and may assign them such salaries or remuneration as they think fit." There is no restriction as to the duties which such clerk or clerks may be directed to perform.

Then section 53 provides that the school board shall fix the fees "to be paid for attendance at each school under their management, and such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, and a separate account shall be kept of the amount of the fees derived from each school; and it shall be lawful for the school board, if they see fit, to pay to the teachers of a school the fees derived from such school, and to divide the same among them as the school board shall determine."

A subsequent clause may possibly, as I have already suggested, make an exception from this enactment. But the enactment itself is quite general. It applies to the fees paid for attendance at all schools under the management of the board, and it is absolute that all such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the board, who is to keep a separate account of the fees derived from each school. The power of the board to pay or not to pay over the fees derived from each school to the teacher of that school, as they see fit, is also absolute, as well as the power to divide the fees equally or unequally (so I read the clause) among the different teachers where there are more than one. Similar provisions occur in section 62 (sub-section 3) as to burgh schools. The enforcement of the payment of the school fees under section 70 is also committed to the board, and nothing is said anywhere of enforcement of payment by the schoolmaster, either by refusing to teach the children of defaulters or otherwise.

These enactments seem to me to be inconsistent with the supposition that it is either the right or the duty of the teacher of any of the schools under the management of the school board to collect the school fees and pay them over to the board, otherwise than by the authority of the board on the one hand, and the consent of the teacher on the other. For any of the teachers collecting the fees and putting them into their own pockets I can find no authority whatever. The board may or may not pay over the fees to the particular teacher as they think fit, or they may pay him by salary without reference to the fees, provided the salary fully covers the amount. But, unless by mutual arrangement, the teachers generally seem to me neither entitled nor bound to interfere with the collection.

Is there then an exception introduced by section 55 in the case of old schoolmasters? I am unable so to construe the clause. It provides that teachers appointed previously to the passing of the Act "shall not, with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act, be prejudiced by any of the provisions herein contained, and such emoluments and retiring allowances shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively."

Now, I cannot see how the pursuer is to be prejudiced in his emoluments by having the school fees collected for him in place of collecting them himself. He may be so far better by being saved that trouble, but he cannot be worse. I do not think the fact that under the old system he collected the fees, and put them in his own pocket, subject to no further trouble and to no accounting, affects the present question. The statutes then in force, viz., the Acts 1696, 43 Geo. III. c. 54, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 87, and 24 and 25 Vict. c. 107, are out and out repealed. The old system is swept away, and a new system, altogether different, introduced into its place. The rights and duties of parties under the new system are to be looked for in the Education Statute, and I do not find in that statute any duty laid on the pursuer to collect those fees, which admittedly must go into the school fund, and to keep books, registers, and accounts without any remuneration for his time, trouble, and responsibility, simply because the statute says he is not to be prejudiced in his emoluments. The "other duties not relating to teaching," referred to in section 76, are obviously certain duties imposed on schoolmasters by the Militia Acts and certain Railway Acts, &c., and that section has no bearing on this case.

My conclusion, therefore, is in favour of decree of reduction of the resolutions complained of, and that parties should then be heard upon the petitory conclusions, which have not yet been entered upon.

LORD NEAVES concurred with the Lord President and the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I regret that yet another litigation has arisen in the administration of the Education Act. I regret still more the spirit in which this dispute has originated, a spirit obvious enough on the face of the proceedings before us; and I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that mutual forbearance might have prevented this dispute. It is a bad public example, and a bad omen to the cause of education, that such a difference could not be settled without a lawsuit. But it is now here. The pursuer has forced the question into Court, and we must dispose of it. We have had the advantage of hearing very able arguments.

No. 138.

June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

Mr Buchanan is the parochial schoolmaster of Tulliallan. He was appointed many years before the passing of the Act of 1872; he was well aware of the use and wont of Scotland in regard to the collecting of school fees, and, as the Lord Ordinary truly says, "the fees were collected by himself in conformity with the invariable practice in all parish schools." The question raised here is, whether he shall, as formerly, collect the fees for himself, or whether, on his being directed by the school board to collect them, he is entitled to refuse to do so, and to demand that the school board shall collect the fees for him?

His claim as pursuer in this action is in the character and in respect of the alleged rights of a pre-appointed teacher—a teacher appointed before the Act of 1872. It is with this claim of his, as an old teacher, that we alone have to deal. We have no other case before us. The case of a teacher appointed after the passing of the Act may be or may not be quite the same. I give no opinion on that case. On the one hand, the provisions of the statute in regard to fees and emoluments are not in all respects quite the same. On the other hand, these newly appointed teachers hold their appointments during the pleasure of the school board; and in that case it is not likely that any question such as the present could be raised, since the school board have a compulsitor by which they could enforce obedience to any lawful direction.

I agree with the Lord President in his construction of the 55th section of the statute, and I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk in his remarks on the relation of the 55th to the 53d section. By that 55th section the teachers who had been previously appointed are protected from prejudice caused by provisions of the Act with respect to "tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured to or enjoyed by them at the passing of this Act." Three grounds or sources of security are here mentioned, viz., "law, contract, or usage," prior to the Act. It is not pleaded that there is any law, as distinguished from usage, ruling this question, and conferring a right of enjoying fees without collecting them. Nor is it pleaded that there was any contract in respect of which this teacher was before the passing of the Act entitled to have these school fees collected for him and not by him. Nothing of the kind is suggested. On the contrary, collection by himself had been according to his own experience and practice. Therefore there remains only, as the source of his security for fees, "usage,"—the use and wont of Scotland, and it may be also the local usage in the particular parish. Now, it is beyond question, that the collecting of school fees by the teacher was, for a very long time before the passing of this Act, according to the use and wont of Scotland, and in this parish the pursuer, as parochial teacher, did himself collect the fees for more than a quarter of a century prior to 1872.

His own statement on the record is that when he was appointed under the new Act the board allowed the fees to remain as formerly, and awarded to him a fixed salary of £55 per annum in addition to the fees. It thus appears that when the pursuer entered on his tenure of office under the new Act he did so on the footing of retaining his right to emoluments, apart from the fixed salary awarded, as they stood upon the use and wont of Scotland, and on the usage in the parish of Tulliallan. That usage, general and local, was his security for his emoluments, and the measure of his claim under the 55th section, if by the provisions of the Act he should be prejudiced therein.

It is very plain, and it was so specially represented by the pursuer, that the cost or the trouble of collecting fees is of the nature of a deduction from the fees which he receives—a burden on the benefit of receiving them. To get the fees which the pursuer must take the trouble of collecting is less advantageous, and was stated by him to be less advantageous, than to receive the fees collected by another. But if I am correct in holding that the ground and measure of the pursuer's right to the fees rests on usage, and if his own collecting of the fees for himself is according to the usage, and part of the usage, then the 55th section and 53d section read together can give him no right to insist that the fees which he has hitherto collected for himself shall now be collected by the board for him, or, in other words, can give him no right to insist that the cost or trouble of collection, great or small, shall be borne, not by himself, but by another, that is, shall be added to the emolument sanctioned by usage.

I may here explain (as I think there has been some misunderstanding on the subject) that the collecting, which the board has required, means only the receiving the fees from the children or their parents in the old manner, according to use and wont, viz., at the school. Nothing more was ever done by any teacher. Nothing more was desired, or directed, or meant to be desired or directed by the school board. Nothing more was suggested by the counsel on either side as within the meaning of the resolution complained of. The board state on record that they "resolved to revert to the old way." They were not introducing a new plan, but returning to the old way; and beyond all doubt the old way was for the teacher to collect the fees in or at the school from the pupils or others who came to pay them.

As I read the 55th section, the school board are bound to give the teacher such emoluments as shall secure him from prejudice according to his right by usage at the date of the Act. But the collection is left to rest on the prior usage. If the fees are collected by the board or by another than the teacher that would be to that extent a departure from the previous usage, and these fees, or their amount, must be handed to the teacher. If withheld or diminished he is prejudiced. If the fees are collected by the teacher, the amount thereof, as matter of book-keeping, enters the account of the school fund. Practically, if he paid that amount when collected to the school board the board would hand it back to him, according to their agreement that he should enjoy the fees. A memorandum of the sum collected satisfies the requirement as to book-keeping. The circuitous procedure of first handing the fees to the board and then receiving them back is avoided, or may be avoided, by allowing the teacher to collect and retain them.

This arrangement for the collection, surely not unreasonable or inequitable, or unfavourable to the interests of the teacher, is, in my opinion, within the province, and the power, and the ordinary management or administration, of the school board. I think they were entitled so to arrange it.

An application for advice was made very naturally and properly by the school board to the Board of Education for Scotland at Edinburgh, and the pursuer having directed the attention of the school board to the provisions of the 53d section of the Education Act, that subject was brought under the notice of the Board of Education. The letter of the Rev. Dr Taylor, secretary to the Board of Education, is printed in this record. Of course the opinion of the Board of Education does not authoritatively dispose of a legal question between the school board and the teacher; and accordingly the Board of Education explain that they do not attempt to do so. But the views of the Board of Education—a body competent to judge of a matter within administrative

No. 138.

June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

working, and a body free from the local prejudice which may be supposed to actuate one or both of the sections of the local board,—are not without importance. The opinion of the Edinburgh board is thus stated :—"The words in section 53, 'such fees shall be paid to the treasurer of the school board,' do not refer to the process of collecting fees, but to the carrying of them into the school fund, in order that a complete and accurate account may be kept of all the cash transactions of each school. The board do not consider that there is anything in the Act to interfere with the 'use and wont,' according to which the fees in the public schools of Scotland have been collected by the schoolmasters." I think the view taken by the Edinburgh Board of Education of the 53d section is judicious and appropriate. There are no express provisions in the statute in regard to the mode of collecting, or to the fixing of the person bound to collect, school fees; and the mere use in the 53d section of the words "paid to the treasurer of the board" cannot be read as a statutory direction that the treasurer shall collect. If the person who collects pays the fees to the treasurer, that meets and satisfies the clause. Reading the 53d section in connection with the 43d, 48th, and especially the 55th sections, I have arrived at the same conclusion as that expressed in this letter,—the same as that explained by the Lord Ordinary. In my opinion the purpose of these sections is not to direct the mode of collection, or to fetter the discretion of the school board, but to secure the formation and administration of a "school fund." Now, the administration of that fund, and the collection of that fund, is part of the management of the school, and is in the hands of the school board for the purposes of the Act. Whether it may be a better arrangement that the collection shall be by the teacher, or shall be by the treasurer of the board, is a question which cannot be disposed of by inflexible rule, for it may depend on circumstances. In this case I see no reason to doubt the decision arrived at. But it is a question for the discretion of the board. With that discretion we cannot interfere. We are not required, I think we are not entitled, to exercise our own discretion on a matter within the province and the administration and the discretion of the school board. I think it is our duty to decline to interfere, and our duty to leave the school board to exercise their own discretion, for the parish schools are by the statute "vested in" and placed "under the management of the school board."

Accordingly, on the leading question now before us, I am of opinion that the matter embraced and disposed of in the resolutions complained of by the pursuer is within the sphere of ordinary management and administration by the school board, and that this Court should not interfere unless the resolution of the school board is clearly ultra vires and contrary to law. I am further of opinion that this resolution of 8th January 1874, with the subsequent resolutions adhering thereto, is not ultra vires, and not contrary to law, and that the pursuer is not entitled to decree of reduction as concluded for. There is no real importance in the question raised in this action. But very grave and important interests are involved in the interference of this Court with the administration of the school board in such a matter. If, in a matter where the management and the discretion is by statute given to the school board, every offended teacher in whom irritation is kindled, or to whom irritation is supplied, were encouraged to rush into Court with an action of reduction, the consequences would be very serious.

There are some trifling sums for heating and cleaning the school in regard to which I do not think that we have sufficient materials for judging whether they were exigible according to usage, and whether they were collected by the teacher according to usage prior to the date of the Act. I understood the Solicitor-General to say that on the part of the board he did not press this point, and I was glad to hear that statement, as I think that this part of the resolution is wisely departed from.

I have therefore only to add that, subject to some slight modification in regard to the matter last mentioned, I concur in the opinion of the Lord President, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ORMIDALE.—Were it not for the difference of opinion in the Court I could not have entertained any doubt that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in this case is well founded. And, with all due deference, I cannot help thinking that it is only by giving way to an unnecessarily narrow and literal construction of a single expression in the Education Act that any other conclusion can be arrived at.

The question is, whether the school board of Tulliallan are entitled to insist in the pursuer, the schoolmaster of that parish, receiving the fees tendered to him by the scholars attending his school, and accounting for them to the treasurer of the board. I have used the expression "receiving" the fees paid by the scholars in place of the word "collecting," as the latter might be liable to misconstruction, although the true meaning of the board has been, I have no doubt, all along perfectly well understood by the pursuer to be, not that he should go about the parish insisting on payment of the fees from the scholars or their parents or others, and still less that he should be at any trouble or expense in enforcing payment of the fees, but merely that he should receive and account for such of the fees as may have been received by him at the school. I have also used the word "accounting" for the fees in place of saying "paying" them over with one hand to the treasurer of the board, and then with the other taking them back from that functionary, as I cannot imagine that any such circuitous proceeding was ever contemplated.

Having regard to these explanations, and the concession which I understand the board to be quite ready to make in any form the Court may desire, that they will not require the pursuer to receive the dues for cleaning, or to take any trouble in reference to securing the services of a person to attend to the cleaning and heating of the school, as mentioned in their minute of 8th January 1874, I must own my inability to see how the proceedings of the board are in any respect objectionable, or can be fairly complained of or resisted by the schoolmaster.

It is true that the pursuer was schoolmaster of the parish of Tulliallan for many years prior to the passing of the Education Act, and that consequently he is entitled to the benefit of the 55th section thereof, which provides that "with respect to tenure of office, emoluments, or retiring allowance, as by law, contract, or usage secured or enjoyed by him at the passing of this Act," he is not to be prejudiced. But by the minutes of the school board complained of I am unable to see how the pursuer can be prejudiced to any extent or in any way whatever. That he will be prejudiced with respect to his tenure of office, or retiring allowance, has not been and could not possibly be said, as the minutes referred to have no relation to his tenure of or removal from office. Neither do I understand that the pursuer complains that his emoluments have been or will be to any extent or in any way prejudiced by these minutes, and he makes no such complaint in the record. On the contrary, he expressly says at the conclusion of the first article of his statement of facts that the school board have "allowed the fees in his school to remain at their former rates," and that in addition to these he has a fixed salary of £55 a-year.

No. 138. June 11, 1875. Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

It being clear, therefore, that the pursuer can derive no support in this action from the 55th section of the Act, the question is narrowed to the 53d section, which is that on which the pursuer mainly if not exclusively relies. It is no doubt enacted by the latter section that the school board shall fix the school fees; and that the same "shall be paid to the treasurer of the board," and this is the statutory expression to which I referred at the outset as creating the only possible difficulty in the case. Founding on the 53d section of the Act, the pursuer has argued that school boards are not entitled to require him to collect or receive the school fees of his scholars, and that it would be illegal for him to do so, seeing that the statute expressly provides that the fees shall be paid to the treasurer. But this, as I have already said, is, in my apprehension, a very narrow and far too literal a construction of the statutory words, and one which cannot, I think, be supported by any show of reason. On this point I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary. The statute does not, even in words, provide that the fees are to be paid to the treasurer by the scholars themselves. It does not, indeed, specify by whom the payments are to be made to the treasurer,—that, as well as other minutiæ, being, as might be expected, left for the regulation of the school board, so far as any regulation might be necessary. This being so, what else, consistently with good sense and reason, could the school board have done than to require the pursuer, as schoolmaster, to take from the children attending his school their fees, and keep a note or record of his receipts? In requiring him to do this the board did not impose any new duty or trouble on the schoolmaster to which he had not all along been previously subjected. On the contrary, it may well be suggested that his trouble in regard to his scholars' fees has been considerably lightened, for until the passing of the Education Act he undoubtedly was himself obliged to collect, and enforce if necessary, payment of the fees, or submit to their loss and go without them, while now he has only to receive what the scholars are ready to pay, leaving the board to compel attendance of defaulting scholars, and in that way to enforce payment under and in terms of the compulsory powers of the statute. So far, therefore, from the complainer being prejudiced by the proceedings of the board complained of, it is manifest that he must be considerably benefited, for he will be entirely relieved from the disagreeable, troublesome, and expensive duty of enforcing at his own instance payment of the school fees. Nor can it avail the pursuer anything to say that the trouble he formerly had in collecting and enforcing payment of his fees was taken on his own account, so far as taken at all, while now the comparatively trifling portion of the trouble to which he will still be subjected will be taken by him on behalf of the board, for any such reasoning as this proceeds on an obvious fallacy. The school fees formerly collected and received by the pursuer were no doubt appropriated by him as his own, but so also will still be all the school fees that may be paid. Neither can it with truth be said by the pursuer that he will be subjected to any new hardship by being obliged to enter in a book or register, to be furnished to him, the payments that may be made by the scholars, in order that the school board may always know who have, and who have not paid, for such a note in some form must always have been kept by him.

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

The only other question that remains for consideration is, whether it was within the competency or power of the school board to regulate, so far as regulation was necessary, the very small matters of detail about which the pursuer has raised the present dispute. Of this I am unable to entertain any doubt. By the 23d section of the Education Act it is provided that all the schools in the parish "shall be vested in and be under the management of the school board of such parish," which shall, with respect to the school management, "and generally with respect to all powers, obligations, and duties, in regard to such schools now vested in or incumbent on the heritors qualified according to the existing law, and the minister of the parish, supersede and come in place of such heritors and minister." And, again, by the 76th section of the Act the duties imposed upon the schoolmaster of a parish by previous statutes, "and any other duties not relating to teaching, which according to any law or statute in force at the date of the passing of this Act are imposed upon the schoolmaster of a parish, shall be performed by the schoolmaster of the parish in office at the date of the passing of this Act, so long as he continues to be teacher of a public school in the parish." Keeping these statutory enactments in view, and also bearing in mind that prior to the passing of the Act it was, beyond all question, the duty, according to the invariable practice of the parish schoolmaster, to collect his fees, I must repeat that I am unable to see how it can be reasonably maintained that the school board have exceeded their powers by the proceedings complained of. That they have not done so appears to be clear, as well on a consideration of the statutory provisions as on the broad, and, as I think, indisputable ground, that the pursuer has not been required to do anything more than what is naturally and fairly incidental, on the one hand, to his position of schoolmaster, and, on the other hand, to the position of the school board, as having the management and control both of him and the school. It does not, indeed, seem to be disputed on the part of the pursuer that it was within the competency and power of the school board to do all they did. All he says is that they were not entitled to do what they did "unconditionally," but what he means by that he has not stated in the record.

On the grounds, and for the reasons I have now adverted to, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded and ought to be adhered to, with the explanation, or a finding, if thought the preferable mode, to be inserted in the interlocutor of adherence, that the pursuer is only to receive the school fees that may be paid to him by the scholars attending his school, at the same time entering in the appropriate book or books to be furnished to him for the purpose by the school board the payments so received by him, and the names of the scholars by or for whom such payments have been made. And, if thought in the least necessary, the interlocutor of the Court adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor may also contain an explanation or finding to the effect that the pursuer is not to be at any trouble in regard to the heating or cleaning of the school, and that the receipts, if any, which he may require to give his scholars for the fees paid by them shall be furnished by the school board or their treasurer. With some such explanations or findings as these the pursuer will be saved from all risks of any undue burden being laid upon him.

LORD MURE.—I have felt this case, as I understand all your Lordships have done, to be one of considerable difficulty and importance, and my opinion has fluctuated during the consideration of it. When the case came before us in the

No. 138.
June 11, 1875.
Buchanan v. Tulliallan School Board.

First Division of the Court the minute of 8th January was defended to its full extent. It contains three distinct resolutions for regulating the duties to be imposed on the schoolmaster, first, as to collecting the ordinary school fees; second, as to keeping a register; and thirdly, as to his charging and drawing from the scholars small sums for cleaning and heating the school. In the view I took of the position of schoolmasters appointed before the passing of the Education Act of 1872, it appeared to me that the third at least of these resolutions went beyond what the board were entitled to impose upon the pursuer. And if the minute of the 8th of January had still been defended in its entirety I should not have been able to concur in holding that the defence to this action ought to be sustained.

But I understand that all that your Lordship proposes is to negative the declaratory conclusions of the summons, that the pursuer is not bound to collect the fees, and that we are not by our judgment to express any opinion on the other matters contained in the minute of 8th January. The effect of the proposed judgment, therefore, as I understand it, will be to decide that schoolmasters who were in office at the date of the Act of 1872 are to collect the school fees as they had been in the habit of doing, and it appears to me that, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, that is fair and reasonable, because the policy of the Act as pointed out, more particularly in the 55th section, seems to be that these schoolmasters should be maintained in substantially the same position in the matter of emoluments as they were before it was passed. And as the collecting of the school fees is a duty which parish schoolmasters have discharged from time immemorial, I think it was fairly within the power of the board to say to the pursuer that he should continue to discharge that duty, drawing the fees as heretofore, with such additional salary as might be assigned to him by the board, but not of less amount than that which he had been in use to receive. In the argument before the Court of seven Judges I understood from what fell from the Solicitor-General that the defence of the resolutions of the 8th of January was not insisted in to any further extent, and that all that was to be required of the pursuer was that he should take payment of the fees when brought to the school, monthly, in advance, according to his previous custom. I am prepared to concur in a judgment to that extent.

There was some difference of opinion as to whether the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought not to be altered to the effect of limiting the judgment to decree of absolvitor from the declaratory conclusion. Lord Ormidale and Lord Mure were in favour of such a modification. But ultimately

THE COURT adhered.

J. & J. TURNBULL, W.S.—KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 139.
June 12, 1875.
Graham v. Borthwick.

W. GRAHAM (Inspector of Poor of Hoddam), Pursuer.—Lancaster.
C. BORTHWICK (Inspector of Poor of Middlebie), Defender.—R. Johnstone.
D. CLAPPERTON (Inspector of Poor of Annan), Defender.—Crichton.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfriesshire.
M.

Expenses—Proof—Deposition to lie in retentis.—In an action in the Sheriff-court of Dumfriesshire by the inspector of poor of Hoddam against the inspectors of Middlebie and Annan for advances made to a pauper, on the motion of the second defender the evidence of a witness, Mrs Wheeler, aged 74, was allowed to be taken on commission to lie in retentis. She resided at Plymouth and was brought to Dumfries, accompanied by her husband (as she was unable to travel alone), and there her deposition was taken. The case afterwards proceeded to proof before the Sheriff, and Mrs Wheeler was examined as a witness, and gave very material evidence for the parish of Annan. The case came before the Court of Session on appeal, and the parish of Annan was ultimately successful.

No. 139.
June 12, 1875.
Graham v. Borthwick.

The Auditor disallowed the expense of her first examination, which amounted to upwards of £50. The inspector of Annan objected to his report.[1]

Held that the expense ought to be allowed to the amount which would have been incurred if the deposition to lie in retentis had been taken at Plymouth without sending agents there, and remit to the Auditor accordingly.

Observed that there is no absolute rule on the subject.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—WM. STEELE, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM DONALD, Pursuer.—Scott—M'Kechnie.
THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark.

No. 140.
June 12, 1875.
Donald v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

Process—Issue—Counter Issue.—In an action of damages for personal injury against the proprietors of a ferry the defenders were allowed to take a counter issue of contributory negligence, in respect that the pursuer did not object, but observed that the defence might have been proved without a counter issue, and that a counter issue in such cases was not usual in practice.

THIS was an action of damages for personal injury raised in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire by William Donald, Govan, against the trustees of the Clyde navigation. The Sheriff-substitute (Clark) having appointed a diet of proof the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session with a view to jury trial. He proposed this issue,—"Whether, in consequence of the insufficiency of a chain or chains used by the defenders in connection with their ferry between Partick and Govan, or of the improper or insecure fastening thereof, the pursuer, while travelling as a passenger by said ferry on or about 28th May 1872, was seriously injured in his person, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" The defenders proposed to take the following counter issue,—"Whether the said injuries were caused, or materially contributed to, by the fault of the pursuer?"

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

The pursuer did not oppose.

The defence as stated on record was mainly (1) that the chain was broken in consequence of a steamer, the "Vivid," passing too rapidly; (2) that the pursuer was standing in an improper place.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In practice we have not found a counter issue necessary in cases of this kind. The only question is, whether we shall allow the defenders to take one on their motion. There being no objection on the part of the pursuer, and no chance of prejudice to him, I am inclined to allow the defenders to take the issue. But I must not be understood to say that the former practice has been erroneous, or that such an issue is necessary.

[1] The following authorities were quoted by the parties:—Colquhoun v. Mackay, May 28, 1829, 1 D. and A. 100; Napier v. Campbell, March 7, 1843, 5 D. 858, 15 Scot. Jur. 357; Maclaine v. Cooper, Feb. 4, 1846, 8 D. 429; Couper v. Cullen, June 27, 1874, ante, vol. i. 1101.

No. 140. June 12, 1875. Donald v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

LORD DEAS.—The practice since the Judicature Act has been not to have a counter issue in cases of this kind. I think that ought to be continued. The settlement of the issues is the act of the Court, and not of the parties. I see no reason for departing from the usual practice in this case. If, however, the issue is given, it ought distinctly to appear that it is so in respect of no objection.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I think the defence might have been proved without a counter issue. Still, that is not, in my opinion, conclusive against allowing it. The fact alleged is relevant, and important. If the defenders desire to have a counter issue with the object of bringing their plea on the fact more distinctly before the jury, I think they are entitled to have it. I throw no doubt on the correctness of the former practice. There is no decision against the competency of a counter issue such as this, and here it is proposed by the defenders and not objected to by the pursuer.

LORD MURE.—This is rather a nice question. I cannot concur in the opinion which has been indicated by one of your Lordships, to the effect that wherever there is a special point raised in defence, which a defender wishes to bring prominently before the jury, he is entitled to a counter issue. In this case there is another special defence founded upon,—the conduct of the "Vivid" steamer in approaching the ferry at too rapid a pace. But I think it would be a dangerous rule to act upon, that because the jury might not deliberately apply their minds to that point there should be a counter issue regarding it. The defence of contributory negligence, however, is perhaps a more special matter; and as it is stated that it has sometimes been found difficult to get juries to consider that question, and the pursuer in this case does not object to the issue proposed by the defenders, I think the issue may be allowed, but only in respect of the consent of the pursuer.

THE COURT allowed the counter issue.

JOHN WRIGHT & JOHNSTON, L.A.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 141. June 15, 1875. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

ALLAN M'DOUGALL, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Guthrie Smith.
HUGH M'DOUGALL AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.

Writ—Attested Deeds—Statutes 1593, c. 179, and 1681, c. 5.—Held that the Act 1681, c. 5, did not require the insertion in the testing-clause of probative deeds of the names of the subscribing witnesses, but only of such a designation as, along with their subscriptions, was sufficient for identification.

A deed contained the following testing-clause:—"In witness whereof, . . . before these witnesses, John M'Corquodale, schoolmaster in the island of Seil, and Allexr. Dow, Residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane. (Signed) JOHN M'DOUGALL. John M'Corquodale, witness; Alexr. Dow, witness."

The letters printed in italics were written on erased portions of the deed. Held, in an action raised before 1st October 1874, the date when the Conveyancing Act, 1874, came into operation, that what was written on erasure must be regarded pro non scripto, but that the person whose Christian name was given as "Allex." and who was designed as "residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane," was shewn without going beyond the deed to be the subscribing witness, Alexr. Dow, and therefore, that the deed was duly tested.

No. 141.
June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.
2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.

THIS action was raised on 29th June 1874 by Allan M'Dougall of Ardincaple, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that a bond of tailzie, bearing to be granted by John M'Dougall of Arncaple, dated 23d June 1758, was null and void, and that the pursuer as heir-male of line and at law of the said John M'Dougall, had right in fee-simple to the lands of Ardincaple.

The defenders called were persons alleging themselves to be substitute heirs of entail under the destination contained in the bond of tailzie.

The testing-clause of the bond of tailzie was as follows:—"In witness whereof, these presents are wrote on this and the seven preceding pages of stampt paper, by Charles Mackenzie, clerk to William Budge, Writer to the Signet, and subscribed by me at Carbane, the twenty-third day of June one thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight years, before these witnesses, John M'Corquodale, schoolmaster in the island of Seil, and Allexr. Dow, *R*esidenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane. JOHN M'DOUGALL. John M'Corquodale, witness; Alexr. Dow, witness."

The pursuer averred that the letter "r" of the word "Allexr.," the whole of the word "Dow," and a portion of the letter "R" of the word "Residenter" in the testing-clause, were written on an erasure, or superinduced over other words. He therefore maintained that the said word and letters must be held pro non scriptis, and that the deed was, consequently, not duly attested according to law, and was void and null.

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th January 1875, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the letter 'r' of the word 'Allexr.,' the surname 'Dow,' and the letter 'R' at the beginning of the word 'Residenter' in the testing-clause of the bond of tailzie bearing to be granted by the now deceased John M'Dougall of Arncaple, dated the 23d day of June, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies the 10th, and in the books of Council and Session the 16th days of August, all in the year 1758, mentioned in the conclusions of the summons, have been superinduced on an erasure: Finds that the said letter and words so superinduced must be presumed to have been written after the said deed had been signed and completed, and must be taken pro non scripto: Finds, therefore, that the said deed contains in the body thereof the designation of one witness only, and was at its date, and now is, null, by virtue of the statute 1681, chapter 5," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—The question raised in the present action must be decided without reference to the provisions of section 39 of the recent Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the action having been raised in June 1874, while the statute, which did not come into operation till 1st October, contains (section 68) a saving clause as to all depending actions.

"From an inspection of the bond of tailzie of 1758, which forms the subject of the action, I am satisfied that the word 'Dow' and the letter 'r' of the word 'Allexr.' which precedes it, and the letter 'R' at the beginning of the word 'Residenter' following, have been written on the deed after erasure; and, accordingly, I have not thought it necessary to order a proof of the pursuer's averments on this subject. A careful inspection of the deed in good light must, I think, lead to this conclusion. Enough of the original writing on the surface of the paper on which the superinduced word and letters are now found remains to lead to the inference that, in place of the superinduced word and letters, the word 'Alexander' had originally been written. The clause in this way seems, as originally written, to have omitted any surname of the second witness. To supply this defect the last part of the word 'Alexander,' consisting of the letters 'ander,' has been erased, as appears from the surface of the paper by looking along it, and on the erased surface there has been superinduced—(1) the letter

No. 141. The defenders reclaimed.

June 15, 1875. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall. The authorities referred to are fully examined in the Lord Ordinary's note, and in the opinions of the Judges.

'r' to complete the word 'Allexr.'; (2) the surname 'Dow'; and (3) the small letter 'r' beginning the word residenter has been converted into a capital letter. If there were any doubt as to the erasure, there certainly can be none I think as to the superinduction, and the legal effect of vitiation in either way is the same. The part of the deed vitiated, whether the vitiations have arisen from the erasure and superinduction, or superinduction on writing below, must be read pro non scripto.—Gollan, July 23, 1863, 1 Macph., H. L. 66, 35 Scot. Jur. 641; Munro v. Johnstone, 18th December 1868, 7 Macph. 250, 41 Scot. Jur. 153; and Hamilton v. Menteath, 1st December 1824, 3 S. (N. E.) 245.

"Assuming that the word and letters above mentioned are to be held pro non scripto, it follows that the testing-clause contains only the name and designation of one witness. It must be assumed that the superinduced word and letters were added after the deed was completed; and in the absence of the word and letters which have been superinduced the name of the alleged witness has not been mentioned in the deed.

"The Act 1681, chapter 5, provides, inter alia,—'That only subscribing witnesses in writs to be subscribed by any partie hereafter shall be probative, and not the witnesses insert not subscribing; and that all such writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writter and witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by condescending upon the writter or the designation of the writter and witnesses;' and after certain other provisions the statute concludes, 'and that in all the said cases the witnesses be designed in the body of the writ, instrument, or execution respective, otherwise the same shall be null, and make no faith in judgment or outwith.'

"The effect of this provision was to render it necessary, under pain of nullity of the deed, that not only should the witnesses subscribe, but that they should be designed in the body of the deed or testing-clause. In the present case only one witness is named and designed, omitting the erased words and letters. The designation of another person is also given, but no name, or at least no surname. It appears to me in these circumstances that the deed does not fulfil the requirements of the statute, and that it is therefore a nullity.

"It is maintained by the defenders that under the statute it is not necessary that the subscribing witnesses should be named in the body of the deed, but that it is sufficient if they be there designed, as the names may be properly ascertained by a reference to the signatures of the witnesses appended to the deed. The first answer made to this contention is that the statute, in requiring the designations of the witnesses to be given in the testing-clause by necessary implication requires the names to be also there stated, because the names are truly necessary to the designation. The statute places the writer and witnesses in the same position. Both must be designed, and it is evident that in the case of the writer the name must be given; and it rather appears to me that it is essential that, in like manner, the names of the witnesses should be recorded. This view is supported by the decisions in the case of Douglas, Heron, and Co. v. Clerk, 1787, Mor. 16,908, and Abercromby v. Innes, 15th July 1707, Mor. 17,022, in both of which deeds were found to be null because of errors in the Christian name of the witness as given in the testing-clause, although the designation was in terms which correctly applied to the person who signed as witness. It is farther against the defenders' view that it should be left to the accident of the form in which a witness may sign whether his Christian name should appear in the deed or not. In many cases the witnesses sign their Christian names, and even a second name, by initials merely, and it is only in the testing-clause that the proper name and designation of the witness is to be found. But apart from this view, and even supposing it could be held under the statute that the designation of a witness, without his name, given in the testing-clause, would be sufficient, at least it must be apparent from the clause that the designation applies to the subscribing witness. Thus the testing-clause

At advising,— No. 141.

June 15, 1875. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action of reduction brought for the purpose of setting aside a bond of tailzie, dated in 1758, on the ground that it was not might bear that the deed had been signed 'before the two subscribing witnesses, both clerks to A B, solicitor in Edinburgh.' In such a case it might be maintained that the deed contained the designations of the two witnesses who were identified as subscribing it, and that their names could be ascertained from their subscriptions. In the present case there is nothing to identify the designation of the second witness with Alexander Dow who subscribed the deed as a witness. The testing-clause does not profess to design any one who subscribes, and may refer to one who had seen the deed signed but had not himself subscribed it as a witness. There is nothing to identify the designation with a subscribing witness, and so the subscribing witnesses are not designed.

"I am not aware that any case substantially the same as the present has occurred; but the unvarying practice, in conformity with the statute, has been to give the names and designations of the witnesses in the testing-clause, a practice with which the deed in question professes but fails to comply, and this practice strongly shews that the specification in the testing-clause has been always deemed essential. In two cases deeds have been sustained in which the testing-clause did not expressly bear that the parties mentioned were witnesses, but in both cases the witnesses who subscribed were named and fully designed in the testing-clause, and it was evident that the only purpose for which their names there occurred was to designate them as witnesses.—Doig v. Kerr, 1741, Mor. 16,900, and Wemyss v. Hay, 5th June 1821, 1 S. (N. E.), 51. In these cases there was a compliance with the provisions of the statute in giving what is here wanting, the names and designations of the witnesses. In the case of Gibson v. Walker, 16th June 1809, F. C., affirmed 2 Dow's Appeals, 270, the deed was held to be null because the signature of the witness was written on an erasure, although his name and designation were given in the testing-clause.

"Holding the effect of the statute to be clear, the only difficulty I have felt in the case has arisen from the case of Morton v. Hunters, 10th December 1828, 7 S. 172. From the report of that case it appears that one of the several objections to the instrument of sasine was that the name of one of the witnesses was written on an erasure in the body of the instrument, but it is added, 'it was subscribed by him, and it was not alleged that he had not been present.'

"The report bears that the Court 'disregarded the objection as to the witness,' and no more notice of the subject occurs in the discussion of the case. What was the particular ground on which the Court proceeded, or whether this particular objection was strongly pressed, does not appear. It may be that from an inspection of the deed the Court was satisfied that no erasure had occurred, or the view may have been adopted that in the case of instruments of sasine, which depended for their validity on their being recorded immediately after their date, and where the record supplied a check against alterations, the same strict rules in regard to vitiations were not held to apply. There is an obvious distinction between such instruments and ordinary deeds, in this respect, that the witnesses, at least down to the statute of 1845, did not, as in the ordinary case, attest the execution of the instrument, but subscribed as witnesses, testifying that the acts referred to in the instrument had been done. Various writers have referred to the indulgence shewn by the Court to irregularities occurring in these instruments. Professor Menzies states (last edition, p. 578), 'the Court will not interfere with an instrument of sasine on account of obvious blunders, inaccuracies, or ungrammatical expressions in the body or in the notary's docquet, provided it contain effectual attestation that the essential things were done, and this may be assumed as a principle under the new form as well as the old. We shall not occupy time in citing numerous cases.' In the case of Douglas v. Chalmers, being one of a series of cases reported by Tait, 5 Brown's Sup. 588, the reporter adds the following note,—'In all the above cases the Lords proceeded upon this principle that when it appeared ex facie of the instrument duly executed and authenticated in terms of law. It is alleged by the pursuer that in the testing-clause of the deed what purports to be the surname of one of the instrumentary witnesses, and one letter of the abbreviation of his Christian name, is written on an erasure, whence he deduces the conclusion, to which the Lord Ordinary has given effect, that the bond is vitiated in essentialibus, and is devoid of the solemnities required by the Act 1681, c. 5.

No. 141. June 15, 1875. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

Of the existence of the alleged erasure, and the extent of it, there is substantially no dispute. The full text of the testing-clause is as follows:—"In witness whereof these presents are wrote on this and the seven preceding pages of stampt paper by Charles Mackenzie, clerk to William Budge, writer to the signet, and subscribed by me at Carbane the 23d day of June 1758 years, before these witnesses, John M'Corquodale, schoolmaster in the island of Seil, and Allexr.

---

that the thing was done, and that sasine was in reality given, blunders or mistakes in extending the instrument ought not to annul the sasine, and accordingly in many cases sasines labouring under defects have been sustained both by the Court of Session and House of Peers, which at a more early period of our law, especially before the introducing the Register of Sasines, would not have been sustained.' There is a similar note by the editor at page 227 of the second edition of Bell's Treatise on Completing the Title.

"This favour to instruments of sasine is probably the explanation of the decision in the case of Hunter, and a reference to the session papers shews that much reliance was placed on the fact that the deed as recorded in the Register of Sasines corresponded with the deed challenged. In the answer on this point reliance was placed on the fact that it was not alleged 'that any alteration had been made upon the instrument since it was completed and sent to the record.' I do not think that the decision in the case of Hunter can be held as nullifying the words of the statute with reference to a deed which witnesses have signed in order to attest its execution by the granter. The subscribing witnesses must be designed in the testing-clause.

"Assuming that the statute applies, and that the deed must be held to have been null after it was completed, in consequence of the want of mention in the deed of the name and designation of one of the witnesses, it was not maintained by the defenders that anything that has since occurred could make the deed valid now.

"Apart from the provisions of the recent Conveyancing Act, it seems to follow from the decision in the case of Sheppard v. Cheyne's Trustees, 6 D., 464, and 6 Bell's Appeals, 153, that neither the lapse of time nor the completion of titles and possession which has followed on the bond of tailzie can prevent effect being given to the challenge now made. In that case Lord Chancellor Cottenham, after stating the reasons for holding the deed of entail to be null on account of the erasures it contained, proceeds,—'But if there was in truth no disposition, no conveyance (for this is the effect of the vitiation of the deed), it is not easy to understand how there could be a ratification. To give effect to this supposed ratification would in fact be not to ratify, but to make a disposition for the granter—a disposition which he himself had not made.'

"These words apply expressly to the present case. Assuming the bond of tailzie to have been null under the statute, no ratification of it by making up titles or possession could make it valid or effectual. It wants the requisites of a deed, and being null, such actings as have followed on it cannot rear it up into an effectual instrument. It is admitted that the pursuer is heir of line of the granter of the alleged deed, who was proprietor of the estate in question. This being so, he seems to be entitled now to take up the estates, on the footing that they were not well disponed by the bond of tailzie, and are still in hæreditate jacente of the alleged granter of that deed. Looking to the nature of the question, and the necessity, for the sake of the pursuer's title, to have the present question tried in a litigated cause, I do not think the case one in which expenses should be given."

Dow, residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane." The name "Dow," the final "r" of the abbreviation "Allexr.," and the initial "r" of the following word "residenter," are unquestionably written on the erased portion of the instrument.

Thus three questions arise.

1. What is the import of the words used in the testing-clause, as affected by the erasure?

As to this matter, I agree with the Lord Ordinary. We must read the clause as if the word and letters in question were left blank. We are not to supply anything to fill the vacant place, but to read the part of the clause which is not vitiated as if the clause itself contained nothing else. That part of the testing-clause, therefore, must be read as follows,—" before these witnesses, John M'Corquodale, schoolmaster in the island of Seil, and Allex residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane." The partial erasure of the initial letter of "residenter" does not affect the sense, and is of no importance. The second instrumentary witness is therefore not named—at least not fully or effectually named—in the testing-clause.

2. The second question is, Is this clause vitiated and erased in essentialibus; is it an essential requisite to render the deed effectual that the instrumentary witnesses should be named, as well as designed, in the testing-clause?

I am of opinion that the insertion of the names of the instrumentary witnesses in the testing-clause is not a solemnity required by law, and that there is no Act of the Legislature, and no judicial decision, on the authority of which we can affix the penalty of nullity to the omission. It is true, that the usual style of such clauses sets forth the names as well as the designations of the instrumentary witnesses, that it has been the custom of conveyancers to insert them, and that their teaching has prescribed this form as the safest, most distinct, and simplest mode of pointing out the person whose designation follows. But we must look to the statutes to find what matters are essential in this respect. The question is not now mooted for the first time, and although it has never been decided, I have formed a clear opinion that neither the letter nor the policy of the Act 1681, c. 5, made the naming of the instrumentary witnesses in the testing-clause essential to the validity of a deed, but that it is sufficient if they be designed therein.

The course of Scottish legislation in the execution and authentication of deeds was very simple. I have no intention of going over the statutes, which were fully commented on from the bar, and are familiar. As writing became more common, attestation by sealing was disused. The Act 1540, c. 117, seems by its words to make the subscription of attesting witnesses essential; but neither this statute, nor that of 1579, c. 80, although they from time to time were so construed, enacted in express words that this should be so. Neither was it customary to design the witnesses named, but not subscribing, in the body of the deed. The first statute which contained any peremptory provision in regard to the execution of deeds was that of 1593, in regard to the writer of the instrument, as to whom it was enacted that "all original charters, contracts, and all other writs and evidents to be made hereafter, sall make special mention in the hinder end thereof, before the inserting of the witnesses therein, of the name, surname, and particular remaining place, diocese, and other denomination of the writer of the bodies of the foresaid original writs and evidents, otherways the same to make no faith in judgment nor outwith the same in time coming."

No. 141.

June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

So stood the law in 1681; and the statute passed in that year had in regard to witnesses two objects, and two only,—the first, to make their subscription essential; and the second, to make it necessary to design them in the body of the writ, at the hinder end, as the Act 1579 expresses it. The contrast in the language employed in the Act 1593, in regard to the writer of the deed, and that used respecting witnesses in that of 1681, is very significant. The Act of 1681 enacts that only subscribing witnesses shall in future be probative, and that "writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writer and witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by a condescendence." The naming of the writer was essential, because otherwise he could not be known. The name of the witnesses appeared from their subscription, and therefore all that was necessary was so to design them as that they might be known and discovered. Mr Robert Bell, in his treatise on the Testing of Deeds (p. 39) has pointed out with considerable acuteness that these provisions were not intended so much to regulate the authentication of deeds as to provide, by the subscription of witnesses, for a practical aid to their memory, in case the deed should be challenged, and by their designation to afford a ready means by which they might be identified and traced.

On the words, therefore, of the Act 1681, I should have little hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the statutory nullity applied only to the absence of the designations of the witnesses. I am confirmed in that view by the opinion expressed by the writer I have already referred to, who is the only commentator who has discussed this question. His remarks are full and interesting, and although as a lecturer on conveyancing he directs the practitioner to name as well as to design the witnesses in the testing-clause, he indicates a very clear opinion that the omission of their names is not a statutory nullity. Lord Stair, with his usual accuracy, says,—"By a late statute, Parl. 1681, c. 5, writs, after that statute, prove not, unless the witnesses subscribe and be designed," (iv. 42-3). One or two of our writers have assumed that the witnesses should be named in the testing-clause, but none of them have discussed the question.

There are only two cases which throw light on this question, but both are instructive. They are the cases of Doig, 9th January 1741, M. 16,900, and that of Wemyss v. Hay, 5th June 1821, F. C. They were both of the same character. The persons whose names appeared as subscribing witnesses were named and designed in the testing-clause, but the clause did not bear that the deed was subscribed before them, or mention that they were witnesses in any way. I have looked at the session papers in Wemyss' case, in which these questions, and in particular the case of Doig, are largely discussed. The deed was ultimately sustained in both these cases, although as far as usage or practice was concerned the omission was as flagrant as that of the names of the witnesses.

Thirdly, assuming that it is not essential to mention the names of the subscribing witnesses in the testing-clause, it is beyond all doubt necessary that they be designed. Now, although here some one, whose name was intended to occupy the blank in the deed, is sufficiently designed as residenter in Carbane, and tutor or guardian to John M'Dougall's children, the question arises, whether it clearly appears that the person so designed is the instrumentary witness. It is here that the difficulty of the case rests.

Now, had there been any substantial variance between what appears of the witness's name in the testing-clause, and the signature to the deed, the case

No. 141.

June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

would have been ruled by a long series of authorities, which settle that an error in the name of the witness designed, or a variance between the name in the testing-clause and the name subscribed, is fatal, for then the designation is made to apply to some one other than the subscribing witness; and here it may be contended that the subscribing witness is not "Allex." but "Alexr." Dow, who may be a different person. The view is plausible, and not without aid from some of the decided cases. But, on the whole, I think it is too strained and technical. Holding the erased part of the deed to be left blank, I think it clear that the word "Allex." is, and was intended to be, the Christian name of the second instrumentary witness, whose surname is omitted; that it accurately corresponds in sound with the actual signature; that there is thus identity between the person designed and the person subscribing, and that, without having recourse to conjecture or inference, it sufficiently appears that Alexr. Dow, the instrumentary witness, is designed as residenter in Carbane, and tutor or guardian to John M'Dougall's children. The case, in this respect, differs by contrast from that of Callander.[1]

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—This case is one of nicety and difficulty, and all the more that notwithstanding the numerous decisions which have been given in regard to the execution and testing of deeds none of them appear to be exactly in point.

The Lord Ordinary has correctly stated the circumstances in which the disputed question has occurred, and both parties were agreed as to them. The deed of entail, called a bond of tailzie, is dated the 23d of June, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies the 16th of August 1758. It is not said, and there is no reason for supposing, that there has been any tampering with the deed after it was recorded; and since then, down to the raising of the present action in June of last year, it appears to have been held and acted upon as in all respects valid and unobjectionable. It has not, however, been maintained by the defenders that the objection now taken to the regularity of the testing-clause of the deed, if good in itself, is barred by lapse of time or for any other reason. The question, therefore, to be determined is, whether the objection relied on by the pursuer is so formidable and unanswerable in itself as to be fatal to the deed.

The testing-clause is set out in the 12th article of the pursuer's condescendence. It will be seen that there is inserted in it the name and designation of the writer of the deed, the place where it was executed, the number of pages on which it is written, and that it was subscribed before and in presence of witnesses. The clause also bears, as it now stands, that the deed was subscribed by the granter before and in presence of two witnesses, whose names and designations are stated in the ordinary way. But it is alleged by the pursuer that the name of the witness Alexr. Dow is vitiated, excepting the first part of the first name, by being either erased or superinduced in such a way as to destroy its authenticity; and accordingly that the name of one of the two witnesses requisite to the due execution of the deed must, in respect of the decisions in the case of Gollan and the other cases referred to in the note of the Lord Ordinary, be held pro non scripto, and, if so, that this is a fatal objection to the [1] Callander v. Callander's Trustees, Dec. 17, 1863, 2 Macph. 291, 36 Scot. Jur. 140.

No. 141.

June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

validity of the deed. On the other hand, however, it must be kept in view that the deed bears not only the subscription, in due and ordinary form, of the granter, but also the subscriptions of "John M'Corquodale, witness," and "Alexr. Dow, witness." As regards John M'Corquodale, no objection has been taken to the way in which his name and designation are inserted in the testing-clause, which is, so far, therefore, free from any irregularity. And as regards the other witness, Alexander Dow, although his name, except Alexr., being vitiated by erasure or superinduction, must be held not to be in the testing-clause, the designation as there inserted,—"residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane,"—is not vitiated in any way; and that this designation must be held to apply to the subscribing witness Alexr. Dow, is, I think, abundantly clear. It cannot possibly be held to apply to the other witness M'Corquodale, for his designation is otherwise given in the testing-clause, and neither can it, I think, be fairly or reasonably held to apply to any one else but Alexr. Dow, seeing that he subscribes the deed, and adds to his subscription "witness." It might be different if the effect of the vitiated words in the testing-clause was to entitle the pursuer to read anything he pleased in their place, even to the destruction of the deed, but in reference to any contention like that, the Lord Chancellor observed, in the case of Gollan, cited by the Lord Ordinary, that "such a proposition is, in my judgment, unsupported either by principle or authority." The only, and utmost effect, therefore, of the vitiation which here occurs, is to cause the vitiated words to be held pro non scriptis.

Assuming, then, that the bond of tailzie in question bears in the testing-clause, taken in connection with the subscriptions, all the requisites of a deed regularly executed and authenticated, the pursuer's objection to its validity cannot be entertained, but, on the contrary, must, in my opinion, fall to be repelled.

But it was argued, and this was in reality the sole point attempted to be made by the pursuer, that it is a statutory injunction, under the sanction of nullity, that the names and designations of the witnesses, as well as of the writer of the deed, must be inserted in the testing-clause. I am not satisfied that this is so. Without going over all the old Scots Acts relating to the execution and authentication of deeds, I believe I am correct in saying that those having any material bearing on the present question, and which were chiefly, if not exclusively relied on, by the pursuer, were the Acts 1593, cap. 179, and 1681, cap. 5. The former decerns and declares that deeds "sall make special mention in the hinder end thereof, before the inserting of the witnesses therein, of the name, surname, and particular remaining place, diocese, and other denomination of the writer of the body of the foresaid original writs and evidents; otherwise the same to make na faith in judgment or outwith in time cuming." There is here, it will be observed, a clear distinction drawn between the writer of a deed and the witnesses to it. As to the former, special mention must be made of his name, surname, and designation, under the sanction of nullity. But as to the witnesses it is merely assumed that they are also to appear, in some form or other, in the hinder end of the deed, after the names and designations of the writer. But how this is to be done, or whether the designations merely, or the names as well as the designation of the witnesses are to be inserted, is not stated; nor has the sanction of nullity of the deed, declared in reference to the want of the name, surname, and particular designation of the writer, any application to the witnesses. It was argued, however, that any obscurity or defect in this respect in the Act 1593 is cleared up and supplied by the subsequent Act of 1681, which declares that "all writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writer and witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by condescending upon the writer, or the designation of the writer and witnesses." But here, as in the Act of 1593, a distinction necessarily arises between the writer of the deed and the witnesses, for although both are apparently put on the same footing it neither is nor can be so in reality, for while no designation of the writer can be given without mentioning also his name, seeing that his name could not be otherwise discovered, and therefore a designation without application to any individual would be obviously worthless, the matter is quite different as regards the witnesses, seeing that a testing-clause, although it makes no mention of their names, would be perfectly good and unobjectionable. If, for example, it bears that the deed was executed before "the witnesses subscribing, both advocates in Edinburgh," the testing-clause would in this way, although it did not contain the names but merely the designations of the witnesses, leaving their names to be seen in their subscriptions, be perfectly unobjectionable. Accordingly, the Act 1681 cannot be held to refer, so far as the witnesses are concerned, to anything more than their designation.

It may be said, no doubt, that in the present instance there is no express allusion in the testing-clause to the witnesses subscribing, and therefore that as regards the subscribing witness Alexr. Dow, the connection between him and the designation, "residenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian of the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane," does not exist. But it appears to me that this is a view of the matter which cannot be entertained, and that on a fair and reasonable construction of the Act 1681 it must be held that the designation which has just been quoted, seeing that it could not apply to the witness John M'Corquodale, who is otherwise well designed, must be held to apply to the other witness who subscribes himself "Alexr. Dow, witness," and to no one else.

If the view I have now explained be correct it follows that the objection taken by the pursuer to the bond of tailzie in question is ill-founded. And this is a result which I think is sufficiently supported by the authority of Mr Bell in his well known lectures on the Testing of Deeds, published in 1795. He says (p. 77 of his work), in reference to the Act 1681, and what it requires to be inserted in the testing-clause, "that it is not the name of the witness which is required and the want of it which is declared to be a nullity; the Act understands that the witness is to subscribe, and it therefore requires no more than his designation, and you will observe that the Act speaks in a way very different of the writer and of the witnesses. It says the defect 'shall not be suppliable by condescending on the writer, or on the designation of the writer and witnesses.' The reason is obvious; without the name of the writer, his designation could give no information; whereas the designations of the witnesses, joined to their subscriptions, prove fully what the Act meant to establish. We should therefore be apt to infer that in these cases where the designation may be given without naming the witnesses, the want of the names in the testing-clause will be no nullity; and that where the true designation is given, and the witnesses have actually subscribed, an error in the name of the witness as inserted in the testing-clause ought not to prove fatal to the deed." That it is only the designations of the witnesses which the Act 1681 requires to be inserted in the testing-clause, and that there is a distinction in this respect between them and the writer of a deed, appears to me also to be illustrated by the cases of Doig v. Kerr, 9th January 1741 (Mor. 16,900), and Wemyss v. Hay, 5th June 1821 (1 Sh. 47), the judgment of this Court in the latter of which was affirmed by the House of Lords, 26th April 1825 (1 Wilson and Shaw, p. 141). In these two cases an objection to the authentication of a deed to the effect that the testing-clause, although it contained in the end of it the names and designations of two persons, did not state that these two persons were witnesses to the execution of the deed, or what they had to do with it, was repelled, in respect that this defect was sufficiently cleared up by a reference to the signatures of the persons who signed the deed as witnesses, and who appeared to be the same persons as those named in the testing-clause. The cases of Douglas, Heron, and Company v. Clerk, and Abercromby v. Innes, referred to in the note of the Lord Ordinary, do not appear to me to be in point at all, for in both of these cases the testing-clause and the subscriptions of the witnesses were not only not reconcileable, but positively contradictory. The case, again, of Gibson v. Walker, also referred to by the Lord Ordinary, not only materially differs in its circumstances from the present, but was decided very much on the ground that the deed there in question had been fraudulently tampered with after its execution. I agree, however, with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that little aid is to be derived from the case of Morton v. Hunters, although its tendency appears to me to be rather in favour than otherwise of the defender's contention.

No. 141.

June 15, 1875. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

With these explanations, and on the ground that the designation in the testing-clause, "residenter in Carbane," &c., is sufficiently connected with Alexr. Dow, who signs the deed as a subscribing witness, and as in this way the deed in question contains all that the Act 1681, cap. 5, requires for its authentication, I am for altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in this case, and in place thereof for repelling the reasons of reduction and assoilzieing the defenders.

Lord Gifford.—I have come, though not without difficulty, to be of opinion that the view taken by the Lord Ordinary is too strict, and I think that neither the words of the statute of 1681, and the other statutes which prescribe the requisites necessary for the authentication of deeds, nor the principles fixed by decided cases, compel us to hold that the deed before us is vitiated in substantialibus, and therefore null.

It is observed by the Lord Ordinary, and I think the observation well founded, that no case has yet occurred substantially the same as the present. No case has been cited, and I am not aware of any case in which the question now for decision was really raised, so that, numerous as the decisions have been upon these old statutes, we are now to decide, apparently for the first time, whether it is necessary, under pain of nullity, to insert in the testing-clause of a probative deed the full names as well as the designations of the instrumentary witnesses.

The question arises in the present case from the circumstance about which there is no dispute, that the surname and part of the Christian name of the second instrumentary witness are written upon an erasure. The fact of erasure and of superinduction upon the erased portion of paper is admitted, and, indeed, is evident from inspection of the deed itself, and the question is, What is the legal effect of this erasure?

Now, in the first place, I think the rule is sufficiently established by the

No. 141.
June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

authorities, some of which are cited by the Lord Ordinary, that words or parts of words written on an erasure are simply to be held pro non scriptis. At least this is the general rule, for there may be exceptions, as in the case of very extensive erasures, which might alter the whole nature of the deed; but the general rule, I think, applies here. It was suggested that the Court are entitled or bound to fill up the erased portion with any possible words, or to imagine and insert words which, had they stood where the erasure is, would have vitiated the deed,—for example, in the present case, to suppose that where the name "Dow" now stands on the erasure some other name such as Tod or Smith were inserted; and this of course would vitiate the deed. I am of opinion, however, that this is far too malignant a proceeding to be adopted as a rule of law. Of course, if fraudulent vitiation is alleged and proved, the deed may always be cut down as in a reduction, but it is quite a strict enough rule in cases like the present to hold all words on erasures pro non scriptis.

Applying this rule, the testing-clause runs thus:—"Before these witnesses, John M'Corquodale, schoolmaster in the island of Seil, and Allex esidenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane." The signature of the second witness is "Alexr. Dow, witness." The question is, Is the statement in the testing-clause enough in reference to the second instrumentary witness? I think it is.

The leading statute is 1681, cap. 5, which contains the enactment cited. It provides that "writs to be subscribed hereafter, wherein the writer and the witnesses are not designed, shall be null, and are not suppliable by condescending upon the writer, or the designation of the writer and witnesses." The previous statute (1593, cap. 179), had required the insertion of the "name, surname, and particular remaining place, diocese, and other denomination of the writer of the body of the foresaid original writs and evidents." Now, I think it clear, even taking the Act 1681 alone, still more taking it in connection with the previous Act of 1593, that the writer of the deed, and the witnesses thereto, are dealt with in a very different manner. In the case of the writer, he must be named by name and surname as well as designed, but the witnesses, who, under the statute, must always be subscribing witnesses, only require to be designed. And the reason is clear, for the mere designation of the writer, whose name nowhere appears, would do little or nothing towards pointing him out, but if the designations of the subscribing witnesses are given, then both their names and designations are disclosed upon the very face of the deed. The statute seems very carefully expressed, so as to make nothing a statutory requisite but what is absolutely necessary, and we are not to multiply statutory requisites the want of which is to infer nullity by mere implication. On this point I entirely adopt the reasoning of Mr Robert Bell in his lectures on the Testing of Deeds, a book of the very highest authority in conveyancing, even if the writer had merely given his opinion, but I think his reasons are really unanswerable. Mr Bell's opinion seems to be confirmed by the passage in Stair (iv. 42, 19), where he says, speaking of the Acts in question, that the name of the writer, and the designations of the witnesses, are de substantialibus. Other and later conveyancing authorities were referred to, who seem to place writer and witnesses in the same category, so that the names as well as the designations of both should be inserted in the testing-clause. But besides the observation that these conveyancers were pointing out the safe and proper course to be adopted, and were not considering what would be the barest possible compliance with the statutes, I think it quite clear that none of them had the present question in view. None of them take up the question as Mr Robert Bell does, and none of them in the slightest indicate that either his reasoning or his opinion were unsound.

No. 141.
June 15, 1875.
M'Dougall v. M'Dougall.

The Lord Ordinary seems to concede that the mere insertion of the names is not inter essentialia as a solemnity as in the case he puts, where the testing-clause bore that the deed was signed "before the two subscribing witnesses, both clerks to A B, solicitor in Edinburgh." I do not doubt that such a testing-clause would be quite sufficient, although the names of the witnesses could only be learned by looking at their subscriptions, and if this be true, it really is enough for the decision of the present case; for although we had a very ingenious argument to the contrary, it seems to me to be quite plain that the witness who is insert in the testing-clause as "Allex esidenter in Carbane, tutor or guardian to the children of John M'Dougall, tacksman of Carbane," can be no other than the witness who subscribes Alexr. Dow. The other witness is quite clear, because he is both named and designed, and I think it a most forced and violent reading—indeed, as I said before, a malignant reading—to hold that the "Alexr." who signs as a witness is a different person from the Allex. who is designed in the testing-clause. Indeed, in one view, he is both named and designed in the testing-clause. His Christian name is given, though not his surname, and I do not think it matters that his Christian name is given in a contracted form, especially when it happens that this is the very same contracted form in which he signs.

I need hardly add that in the present question, which relates to mere formalities of authentication, we are noway bound by any analogy drawn from the strict rules of interpreting an entail. The deed happens to be an entail, but in the present question we deal with it as if it had been an ordinary disposition, or an ordinary agreement. It is plain also that all questions as to challenging or impugning the deed as false are left entire. We only deal here with its ex facie regularity. I am, therefore, for sustaining the deed in point of law, and this leads to absolvitor from the present action.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Alter the said interlocutor, repel the reasons of reduction, assoilzie the defenders from the action, and find them entitled to expenses."

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—PATRICK S. BEVERIDGE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 142.
June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

GAVIN, EARL OF BREADALBANE AND HOLLAND, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Kinnear.

GEORGE AULDJO JAMIESON (Judicial Factor on the Trust-Estate of John, second Marquis of Breadalbane), Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

Minerals—Precious metals—Act 1592, c. 31.—A proprietor of lands obtained from the Crown, in terms of the Act 1592, c. 31, a separate charter of the mines of gold, silver, and other metals and minerals in the lands. He subsequently executed an entail of the lands, without mention of the mines and minerals. Held that the mines and minerals were brought under the entail as parts and pertinents of the lands.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
R.

THE Earl of Breadalbane (the pursuer) succeeded to the estates of Breadalbane on the death of his father, the sixth Earl, in 1871, and made up titles thereto as heir of taillie and provision to his father, under an entail executed by the third Earl in 1775. He subsequently disentailed the estates under the authority of the Court of Session.

No. 142.
June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

The heir of entail in possession of the estates immediately before the pursuer's father was John fifth Earl and second Marquis of Breadalbane, who died in 1862, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 26th November 1847, by which he conveyed to trustees all and sundry lands, estates, mines, leases, and heritable subjects then belonging, or which should belong to him, in fee-simple, at the time of his decease. These trustees having all failed, the defender, Mr G. A. Jamieson, was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate of the Marquis. The lands and estates forming the earldom having been held by the Marquis under the fetters of a strict entail, passed to the pursuer's father as the next heir of entail, and now belonged to the pursuer, but Mr Jamieson maintained that the mines and minerals within the said estates were not entailed, and that they formed part of the fee-simple estates of the Marquis, now vested in him as factor, and he accordingly intimated to the pursuer that he intended forthwith to enter upon the lands forming the original earldom of Breadalbane, and to open up and work the mines and minerals therein.

The pursuer, on 23d March 1874, raised the present action against Mr Jamieson, as judicial factor, for reduction of the titles under which the defender claimed the mines and minerals, and for declarator of his own right to these subjects.

The following facts appeared from the titles produced, and the admissions of parties:—In 1704 John first Earl of Breadalbane executed an entail of the lands and earldom of Breadalbane, comprehending the lands, baronies, &c. as therein described, in favour of his son and grandson, and the heirs-male of their bodies successivé, whom failing, to the other heirs of entail therein specified, whom failing, to persons to be nominated by him.

In 1742 John Lord Glenorchy, grandson of the entailer, who stood infeft in the fee of the lands and earldom embraced in the entail of 1704 (his father, the liferenter, being still alive) obtained from the Crown a charter of the mines and minerals within the estate. The previous titles contained no express grant of mines and minerals.

The charter proceeded on the Act 1592, c. 31,—"For furthering of the Kingis cōmoditie be the mynes and metallis,"* and by it the Crown granted in feu-farm to John Lord Glenorchy and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the other heirs-male of taillie and provision under the titles and infeftments of the estate, and their assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the mines of gold, silver, lead, copper, tin, and other metals and minerals whatsoever which were or might be found within the said estate, for a reddendo of one-tenth of the produce thereof. Upon this charter Lord Glenorchy was infeft.

Upon the death of his father in 1752 Lord Glenorchy succeeded to the title as third Earl.

In 1775 the third Earl, in order more fully to carry out his grandfather's intentions, and to secure that the lands might always go along with the peerage, executed a new entail of the lands embraced in the entail of 1704, and of certain lands which he held in fee-simple.

The deed contained a very full enumeration of the various subjects conveyed, and their parts and pertinents, "together with all right, title, interest, claim of right, property and possession, petitor and possessor, which I, my predecessors and authors, or heirs and successors, had, have, or anywise may have claim or pretend to the lands, earldom, baronies, and other heritages before disponed, or to any part or portion thereof;" but mines and minerals were neither expressly conveyed nor expressly reserved.

* See the Lord Ordinary's note, infra, pp. 829, 830.

No. 142.
June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

Since 1775 the successive heirs made up titles under the entail of 1775.

In 1845 the second Marquis, who succeeded in 1834, procured himself served heir of taillie and provision to the third Earl in the metals and minerals granted by the crown-charter of 1742, and was in 1849 infeft therein upon a precept from Chancery.

In 1851, in order to make his title ex facie a fee-simple one, he resigned the said metals and minerals in the hands of the Crown, and obtained a charter of resignation in favour of himself and his own nearest heirs and disponees whomsoever, upon which he was infeft.

After the death of the second Marquis his trustees, and subsequently the judicial factor, completed titles to the said metals and minerals.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being proprietor of the mines and minerals within his lands contained in the foresaid entail of 1704, the writs and titles whereby the defender pretends to have right thereto ought to be reduced and set aside. (2) John Lord Glenorchy acquired no right to the said mines and others by the crown-charter thereof in his favour in 1742, in respect that the said mines and others were not at the date thereof the property of the Crown, but were held by him as parts of the lands and earldom of Breadalbane under the foresaid entail of 1704. (3) Assuming that the charter of 1742 operated as a valid conveyance to John Lord Glenorchy of the mines and minerals within his estate in Scotland, the lands forming the said estate having been disponed and conveyed by him by the entail of 1775 to the pursuer and his predecessors, without reservation of the said mines and minerals, the said mines and minerals are now held by the pursuer as parts of the said lands in virtue of that entail, and writs following thereon. (4) The title to the said mines and others professed to have been made up in virtue of the said crown-charter, and writs following thereon, is null and void, in respect that none of the said writs contain a sufficient specification or description of the subjects of which infeftment is alleged to be given.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the pursuer has not by virtue of his titles any right to the mines and minerals in question. (3) The defender ought to be assoilzied, in respect that by virtue of the said crown-charter of 1742, and writs following thereupon, he has right to the said mines and minerals. (4) At all events the defender has, by virtue of the said crown-charter and subsequent writs, right to the whole mines within the said lands, of gold, silver, and lead of such fineness that three halfpennies of silver may be fined out of the pound of lead, and he is entitled to decree of absolvitor as regards such mines.

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th February 1875, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the pursuer has the sole and exclusive right to the mines of gold, silver, lead, copper, and tin, and of other metals and minerals, within the lands and earldom of Breadalbane, and the other lands and estates formerly belonging to John Lord Glenorchy, afterwards third Earl of Breadalbane, and to possess and enjoy the same under and in virtue of his rights and titles to the said lands and earldom of Breadalbane and others, and decerns: Reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, except in so far as the same are directed against the crown-charter in favour of the said John Lord Glenorchy, and his heirs therein mentioned, dated on or about 1st March 1742, and the sasine following thereon, being the writs first and second sought to be reduced, and, as regards these writs, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender, George Auldjo Jamieson, as judicial factor on the trust-estate of the late Most Honourable John second Marquis of Breadalbane liable in expenses to the pursuer," &c.* No. 142.

June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

* "NOTE.— . . . . I. The first question to be considered is, whether and how far a proprietor of lands has right to the mines and metals within the same, apart from any express grant thereof from the Crown? The general rule of law is, that a grant of land confers upon the proprietor right to everything in and upon and connected with the lands a centro usque ad cœlum. The rule, however, is subject to exceptions, and in all crown-grants of land certain royal rights, termed regalia, are presumed to be reserved by the Crown, unless expressly conveyed. And among these royal rights, or regalia minora, mines of gold and silver are enumerated by all the institutional writers as being excepted. It is apparently owing to feudal custom that in other countries any right in the Crown to such subjects was ever recognised. But in Scotland the right seems to rest entirely upon statute. The Act. 1424, c. 12, provides, 'gif any mine of gold or silver be founden in ony lordis landes of the realme, and it may be prooved that three halfe pennies of silver may be fined out of the pound of lead, the Lordis of Parliament consentis that sik mine be the kingis, as is usual of other realmes.' This statute, which is apparently the original Act of Annexation of mines, does not expressly confer upon the Crown a right to any mines and metals, except gold mines, and mines of lead producing a certain quantity of silver; and it farther seems to confine the royal right within those limits which custom had assigned to the sovereigns of other kingdoms.

In 1592, however, another Act of the Scottish Parliament was passed with reference to mines and metals, which it is necessary to examine with some care, because, in consequence of it not having been printed, its existence appears to have been unknown to Craig, Lord Stair, and Sir George Mackenzie, all of whom comment upon the earlier statute.

The Act 1592, c. 31, is of considerable length, and appears to have been passed mainly for the purpose of promoting the search for and working of the precious metals in Scotland, and of securing to the Crown the regular payment of the royal duty therefor. From the preamble of the Act it appears to have been the practice of the Crown to let to adventurers,—for the most part foreigners,—the whole mines and metals in the country for payment to the treasury of a tenth of the proceeds by way of rent. This was apparently found to be an unsatisfactory method of proceeding, and to tend rather to the discouragement than the promotion of mining in the country, and accordingly the Act of 1592 proceeds upon the subsumption that on the one hand an officer should be appointed, to be termed the Master of the Metals, part of whose duty should be to look after the working of the mines throughout the country, and to attend to His Majesty's interest, while, on the other hand, the mines and metals which had been previously part of the annexed property of the Crown, and therefore inalienable without the consent of Parliament, should be dissolved from the Crown and made alienable by way of feu-disposition to be granted by the Crown in favour of the heritors of the lands for payment of every tenth penny of the proceeds.

"The words of dissolution are as follows:—'And als oure souerane uilling that all his Maiesties liegis quha will tak on hand to discouer and work the saidis mynis may have reasonable proffite and recompence of thair panis [and] a sufficient securitie maid to thame of thair awin mynis within thair awin landis: And als vnderstanding that the dewtie of the said mynis qlk baith of the common law and conseutude obseruit be vther foreñ princes properlie pertenis to the prince extendis onlie to the tent part fre thairfor o' said souerane lord with auise of his estaittis in parliament hes dissoluit the saidis mynis and mettallis in sa far as thay war part of his propertie anext or ony wyis to the effect the same may be sett in feu for augmentation of oure said soueraine lordis rentall: And statutis and ordanis that it sal be lesum to his heines and his successouris w' auise of the thesaurare and of the said Mr. of the Mettallis coniunctlie and for reasonable compositioun to sett in feu ferme to every Erle, Lord, Barroun, and vther frehalder w'in this realme all and quhatsumeuir mynis of

No. 142. The defender reclaimed. At advising,—

June 16, 1875. Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

LORD NEAVES.—This case relates to a part of the law which does not often come before us. The question is whether those minerals, which at one period gould, siluer, copper, leid, tin, and vther quhatsumeuir mettallis or mineralis qlk is or may be found within thair awin landis and heritages, with power to thame to seik and discouer, lauboure and work, the saidis mettallis and minerallis, and to sell, dispone, or sett the mynis thairof in takkis or feu w' consent alwyis of the said thesaurare and maister of the mettallis coniunctlie in maner foirsaid to vthers thair subtenants at thair pleasure as thair proper gudis and heretage: . . . . Payand thairfore zeirlie, the saidis Erlis, Lordis, Barounis, and vtheris quha sall accept the saidis feuis as said is, to oure souerane Lord and his thesaurare, thair factouris and suitors in thair name, the just tent part of all and haill the said gould, silver, copper, leid, tin, and vtheris minerallis qlk salbe found and gottin zeirlie w'in thair saidis landis and heritageis vpoun the ground quhair the same salbe found in sic vre and qualitie as the sam sal be gottin out of the erth frelie but ony deductioun.'

"There is a farther provision in the Act that in case of any mines being sufficiently discovered to be within any of the lands pertaining to any subject of the realm, and the lord of the ground sufficiently advertised thereof, and lawfully required to work the same himself before a notary and four witnesses as effeirs, if he refuses or delays the space of three months thereafter, 'then and in that cace it salbe lesum to o' said souerane lord to set the same in few or tak or utherwyis caus work the same or to mak right thairof to any uther persone at his grace pleasure, that be the wilfull refuiss or delay of the awnar of the ground his grace and his cuntrie be not defraudit of the comoditie of the said myne, and oure souerane lord, wt. auise foirsaid of the Parliament, declaris that this Act of dissolution salbe perpetuall to last for all tyme cuming.'

"The right and interest of the Scottish Crown in mines and metals thus depends entirely upon and is regulated by the Acts of 1424 and 1592. But as only the former of these statutes appears to have been known to the earlier institutional writers, this circumstance must not be lost sight of in considering the dicta of these writers upon this matter. Craig says (l. 1, dieg. 16, sec. 36),—'Argentariæ potestas publica est, et a solo principe concedi potest; in qua publicam fidem necesse est aliquando sequi. . . . Ego tamen per argentariam argenti fodinas potius intelligo, et idem maxima pars feudistarum sentit, quos legerim.' 'Nam metallorum fodinas omnes ad principem pertinere certum est. Sunt tamen qui putant metallorum aliorum ab auro & argento fodinas non ad Regem pertinere, sed ad dominos fundi, præstando canonem pro eis; & nisi vox hæc de argenti fodinis intelligatur, nulla earum inter hæc Regalia erit mentio, quæ tamen omissa præsumi non potest. Nam omnium gentium omniumque ætatum consensu fodinas omnes auri, argenti, æris, stanni, plumbi & similium publici juris esse & in patrimonio principis numerari comprobatur: neque vocis a prima significatione declinatio quempiam movere debet, cum sciamus neque semper eandem significationem neque etymologiam aut formationem Latinis vocibus post corruptionem Latinæ linguæ mansisse. Quod si argentaria argenti fodinam significet idem & in reliquis metallicis fodinis intelligi debet, frequens enim est in jure sub majoribus minora comprehendi.' And in a later part of his treatise he says (l. ii. d. 8, sec. 21), 'Auri, argenti, æris, plumbi fodinæ ad feudatarium non pertinent, sed ad Regem et inter Regalia numerantur. Ferrifodinas privatorum esse censeo, quod rari ex iis sint fructus, neque sine maximo impendio colligantur.'

"Lord Stair, in treating of those things which the law reserves as regalia, says (2, 3, sec. 60), 'the superior may have them from the king either expressly in a tenement holden of the king, or tacitly where lands are erected by the king to him in a barony or any higher dignity, whereby many of these regalia are comprehended, baronia being nomen universitatis; yet that will not comprehend all, as first mines and minerals of gold and silver, or lead of that fineness that three half-pennies of silver may be fined out of the pound of lead, which mines are

No. 142.

June 16, 1875.

Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

of our history were annexed to the Crown, and which as between the Crown and the subject are still dealt with in a peculiar manner, can be carried by a general conveyance of the lands when they have been once vested in the owner of the soil.

declared to belong to the king wherever they can be found.—(Parl. 1424, c. 12.) But mines of iron, copper, and lead of less fineness belong to the proprietor, and are not accounted with us regalia, though in some other countries they be.'

"And Sir George Mackenzie observes, upon the Act 1424, c. 12, that 'it has been doubted whether lead, copper, or tin belong to the king or the heritor; but the king is in possession of disponing upon these also, and when he dispones them in a novodamus even to the heritor he reserves a tenth part to be paid into his exchequer, and his Majesty has granted general gifts of all copper mines.' He then refers to the passage from Craig already quoted (l. 1, d. 2, sec. 36), and in commenting upon that he expresses his own opinion to be that a grant of gold and silver mines alone would not include copper and tin, all of which he seems inclined to regard as regalia.

"It appears to me that the definition given by Lord Stair of the right of the Crown to mines and metals under the Act 1424 is that which ought to be preferred. It does not extend the right beyond the limits expressed in the Act, and it has been substantially adopted by the more recent institutional writers, viz., Erskine and Bankton. Before these later authors wrote, however, the unprinted Act, 1592, had become known, and both of them refer to it in treating of this matter.

"Mr Erskine, after referring to the Act 1424, says (2, 6, sec. 16),—'It appears by an unprinted Act in 1592, mentioned in the list of unprinted Acts of that year, No. 12, that not only mines of gold and silver, but of tin, copper, and lead, had been formerly annexed to the Crown, and so not alienable without consent of Parliament, but they are by that statute dissolved from the Crown, and it is made lawful to the king to set in feu-farm, not to any of his subjects indiscriminately, but to the baron or other freeholder of the ground, all metals or minerals that may be found within his own lands on payment of a tenth part to the king, without any deduction of charges, and in case the freeholder should refuse to work them the king may then, and then only, either cause work them for his own use or feu them to others.'

"Bankton, in treating of the same matter, says (2, 3, sec. 107), 'Regalia that may be communicated to subjects, whether of old included in baronies or regalities or not, require a special grant from the sovereign to transmit them;' and he then says (ib. sec. 109),—'Mines of gold and silver are inter regalia, and were not comprehended in the erection of lands into a barony or regality. These are esteemed silver mines where three half-pennies of silver can be fined out of the pound of lead.—(Parl. 1424, c. 12.) For the improvement of such mines the privilege is granted to the heritor of the ground to work them and take the profits to himself, paying a certain consideration to the king; and if he does not lay hold on the privilege the same encouragement may be granted to others, by feus or long leases from the Crown. The statute (dated 5th June 1592) in this behalf is not contained among our Acts of Parliament, and was unprinted and little known till of late. The benefit is not only given to the vassals of the Crown but to all other heritors; so that the subject superior can claim no interest in it, but only the proprietor of the lands; and on his default any other to whom the king shall please to confer it.'

"Now, it appears to me, that if Stair's definition of the interest of the Crown in mines and metals is, as I think it is, the soundest and most in accordance with the Act 1424, considerable aid may be thence derived in interpreting the Act of 1592. The object of the latter Act certainly was not to confer upon the Crown any new or higher right than it previously possessed; and if under the Act 1424, which has been shewn to be the only title of the Crown to mines and metals in Scotland, the right was restricted to gold and silver mines, or, what is the same thing, to gold mines and lead mines capable of producing three half-

No. 142.

June 16, 1875. Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

By the Act of 1592 the Crown has the power of feuing such minerals to the owner of the soil, or, if he fails to work them, of making them a separate estate, so as to secure the working of the minerals for the public benefit and for the patrimonial interest of the Crown in the lordship or reddendo exigible for them.

pennies of silver out of the pound of lead, it seems to follow that although mines of copper, tin, and other metals are all mentioned in the Act 1592 as if they were in the same position as gold and silver mines, the right of the Crown was not thereby extended beyond the right given by the Act 1424. In short, I think that the Act 1592 should be read as simply dissolving from the Crown such mines and metals as had previously been validly annexed, and were therefore inalienable without the consent of Parliament. The result is that mines and metals other than gold and silver mines and lead mines containing the quantity of silver already mentioned, are not reserved to the Crown as regalia, but pass to the vassal with the grant of the lands as partes soli. In so far therefore as the estates of the pursuer, the Earl of Breadalbane, contain mines and metals other than gold and silver and fine lead, it is clear that the pursuer must prevail in this action, and that if the pursuer is not himself in right of the crown-charter of 1742, that charter, and in any view the subsequent titles, founded on by the defender, must be set aside if, and in so far as, the same may be held to embrace anything not strictly falling under the head of regalia.

"II. This, however, is not sufficient to decide the whole questions raised in the present action, one of which relates to the extent to which a right to gold and silver mines is conferred upon the Crown by the Act 1424. The pursuer maintains that the King of Scotland was by that Act to have right to the mines and metals in the lands of the subject, to the same extent as, but to no further extent than, the sovereigns of other countries had right to the mines and metals in the lands of their subjects. And he maintains that the extent of that right is clearly defined in the Act 1592, where it is said that the 'dewties of the said mynis qlk baith of the cōmoun law and consuetude obseruit be uther forēn princes properlie pertenis to the prince extendis onlie to the tent part fre.'

"The pursuer contends that the only right which foreign sovereigns, and therefore the King of Scotland, had to mines and metals was a right to a tenth part of the produce, and that the mines and metals, under burden of that tenth, belonged to the proprietor of the lands at common law as partes soli. I think, however, that this is not the sound construction of the statute. The passage just recited occurs as introductory to that part of the statute in which the mines and metals are dissolved from the property of the Crown and are allowed to be feued out; and the reference to the duty as being 'the tent part fre' was simply made for the purpose of fixing that as the fair and usual return which the king and other monarchs should receive from mines which instead of being wrought by themselves are granted in feu to their subjects. In short, gold and silver mines until so feued out are the property of the Crown, and when feued out the reddendo is to be a tenth part of the free produce.

"III. But another and much more important question remains behind, and that is, Whether, and how far the king, by granting to his subject the mines and metals within that subject's lands by a grant in feu-farm for payment of a feu-duty, reunited the mines and metals with the lands themselves so completely as to render it unnecessary for a separate title thereto being afterwards completed by the vassal to these subjects?

"This is a question of very great difficulty; and after the best consideration which I have been able to give to it I have come to be of opinion that such a grant does not necessarily or ipso jure effect the consolidation of the mines and metals with the lands themselves. On the contrary, they may remain separata tenementa, and held on separate titles, and for payment of a separate reddendo, and they may, therefore, be the subject of separate conveyance or transmission. It appears to me, however, that the question is to be solved mainly by ascertaining the intention of the vassal in taking the crown-grant. Such intention, if not expressed, may be gathered by implication. And if it shall appear in any

No. 142.

June 16, 1875.

Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

In this case the minerals were granted in 1742 to a member of the noble family of Breadalbane, and came thus to be held along with the lands. I am case that the granter, by taking the charter, really intended to consolidate the mines and metals with his lands, and if he has not afterwards done anything to indicate any change of intention I am inclined to think that his successors, in taking the lands, will be held as taking and as entitled to take the mines and metals also. I arrive at this result by considering (1) that but for the express provisions of the Act 1424 mines of gold and silver, and of fine lead, would all have passed in a grant of land from the Crown to the vassal as partes soli, although not expressed; and (2) that the Act 1592, besides declaring the dissolution to be perpetual, makes it lawful for the king to feu to every lord, baron, and other landholder, and to none other, all mines and metals, &c., within their own lands. This statute has been the subject of judicial decision, and it has been held (1) that the Crown is not merely entitled, but is bound, when required, to give to each subject a grant of the minerals within his own lands—(Earl of Hopetoun v. Officers of State, 4th May 1750, M. 13,527); (2) that the right to demand such a grant is not restricted to freeholders who are immediate vassals of the Crown, but extends and belongs to all proprietors of land, freeholders, though holding of subject superiors—(Duke of Argyll v. Murray, Dec. 7, 1739, M. 13,526—see also Elchies, voce Regalia, No. 3); and (3) that, where such a grant has once been made, a subsequent adjudication of the lands, without mention of mines and metals, is held to carry the mines, &c., in preference to a subsequent adjudication of the lands with express mention of the mines and metals—(Ochterlony v. Earl of Selkirk, Nov. 28, 1755, M. 164.) This is an instructive case. Sir Alexander Murray of Stanhope appears to have obtained from the Crown, in terms of the Act of 1592, grants of the mines and metals in his lands of Ardnamurchan and in Peeblesshire. The case of the Duke of Argyll, above mentioned, had reference to the mines in Ardnamurchan. The case of Ochterlony dealt with the mines in Peeblesshire. Several creditors of Sir Alexander adjudged his Peeblesshire estates. The first adjudger, the Earl of Selkirk, simply adjudged the lands. Ochterlony, another creditor, subsequently adjudged both lands and mines. In a competition the question occurred whether the mines were carried by the adjudication which mentioned the lands only. Ochterlony, who was the last adjudger, and who had adjudged both the lands and the mines, pleaded that, in respect of the separate charter of the mines, the lands and mines were held under separate titles, and must be separately adjudged. But the Earl of Selkirk, who was the first adjudger, and who had simply adjudged the lands, pleaded that, 'by the Act 1592, the proprietor of lands may demand a charter of mines, and he alone may work them; he cannot work them after the lands have been adjudged from him. Unless, therefore, the adjudication of lands carry the mines, the grant of the mines must become ineffectual, and the intention of the Act 1592 be frustrated.

"'The Lords found that the adjudication of the lands comprehended the mines.'

"The rationale of this judgment appears to me to be that, in the general case, a grant of mines from the Crown in favour of the proprietor of the lands in which the mines are situated has the effect of reuniting the mines and the lands, so that the whole will pass to the successor of the grantee by any conveyance, voluntary or judicial, in which the mines are not expressly excepted, unless perhaps where the grantee has himself made a previous separate conveyance of the mines to another. If I am right in this view it follows that if Lord Glenorchy, after obtaining the charter of the mines of the earldom in 1742, made a general conveyance of the earldom without excepting the mines, the whole estate, including the mines, must have been carried by that conveyance, no separate conveyance of the mines having ever been made by his Lordship. But, farther, the foregoing narrative of the titles shews that in 1775 Lord Glenorchy (who had then become third Earl of Breadalbane) executed a new deed of entail in favour of himself and the substitute heirs of entail, by which he conveyed to the heirs

No. 142.
June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

of opinion that when once vested in the proprietor of the soil they were carried by a general conveyance of the lands with pertinents, and without any express mention of the minerals. I see no good reason why they might not pass with the lands if such was the intention, or if a contrary intention did not appear. But we are not here left without guidance. The case of Ochterlony seems to me to be conclusive. That was a stronger case than the present. It was a competition of diligence. One creditor simply adjudged the lands, and afterwards another creditor adjudged the lands and minerals. If the minerals had constituted a separate estate the creditor who attached them as such would have been preferred to the other. The Court, however, preferred the first adjudger, on account of the priority in date of his adjudication, thereby holding that a general adjudication of the lands was sufficient to attach the minerals. A decree of adjudication is nothing more or less than a judicial disposition. It confers, no doubt, only a personal right, but that right can be feudalised by means of a charter of adjudication. I do not therefore see how the authority of that case can be got over.

The present is by no means a favourable case for applying a different rule. A person who gets a grant of the minerals in his capacity of proprietor of the lands is not in a favourable position for saying that he will separate them from the lands which he holds under an entail, and deal with them as he pleases, and as a fee-simple estate.

I am of opinion, on these grounds, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

---

of entail not only the original lands and earldom of Breadalbane, but all the estates then belonging to him, with all their parts and pertinents. Now, when the narrative of that deed of entail is carefully considered I think that the conclusion is inevitable, not only that the Earl did not mean to except the mines, but that he believed that in executing that deed he was settling upon himself and his heirs of entail the old lands and earldom, and all his subsequently acquired estates, and also all the accessory rights which he had acquired to any of these estates, including the mines and metals. The deed of entail was executed in 1775, after the date of the decision in the case of Ochterlony; and I think that the whole tenor of the deed shews (1) that it was with the view of carrying out his grandfather's intentions of enlarging and consolidating the family possessions that Lord Glenorchy had applied for and obtained from the Crown this grant of the mines and metals within his estate in 1742, and (2) that he believed he was entailing, in 1775, not only the lands of the whole earldom and the lands subsequently acquired by himself, but also every right, title, and interest of whatever kind which he then had in the estate, and amongst these I think he must be held to have had in view the mines and minerals. On the whole matter, therefore, I think that both by the law as laid down in the case of Ochterlony, and by the intention of the entailer as described by the entail of 1775, the mines and metals in the lands and earldom of Breadalbane must be dealt with as parts and pertinents of the lands and earldom, and as having been brought under the entail. And, if so, it follows that the title expede by the second Marquess to the mines and metals in 1845, not being a title as heir of entail under the tailzie of 1775, was inept, and must, with all the subsequent titles, including that expede by the defender, be now reduced and set aside. If this be the sound view of the title, it follows that the pursuer must prevail, not only in the declaratory conclusions of the summons, but also in the reductive conclusions, to the extent now indicated. I have therefore given decree in terms of that conclusion. It seems unnecessary, and indeed out of place, to reduce the original charter and sasine of 1742, because, if I am right, these deeds are the foundation of the pursuer's own title to the mines and metals." . . . .

No. 142.
June 16, 1875.
Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. I think it unnecessary to enter into many of the matters dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in his learned and elaborate note. It is unnecessary to determine whether gold and silver mines are carried from the Crown without an express grant, because the Lord Breadalbane of the day did obtain an express grant in 1742. And afterwards in 1775, when he stood, beyond all doubt, owner of the minerals referred to, he executed a new entail of his lands.

It is true that in this new entail he makes no express mention of minerals, but on the principles given effect to in the case of Ochterlony, cited by the Lord Ordinary, I think it clear that the minerals in dispute must be held to have passed with the lands. The only answer that seemed to be attempted for the defender to this view of the matter was that, looking to the terms of the entail of 1775, the minerals must be held to have been intentionally omitted. But as the lands are conveyed in the fullest terms, with parts and pertinents, and all right, title, interest, &c. which the granter had, I rather think that, on the principle of the case of Ochterlony, there would require to have been a positive exclusion of the minerals to prevent them being carried.

On these grounds, and without going into farther detail, I concur in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case is one of some difficulty, but I have come, without hesitation, to be of opinion that the decision in the case of Ochterlony is conclusive. In that case the proprietor stood precisely in the same position as Lord Breadalbane did in 1775. One of his creditors adjudged the lands without mentioning the minerals. Another afterwards specially adjudged the crown grant. The Court preferred the first adjudger, holding that the judicial conveyance of the lands implied in the adjudication was sufficient to carry the minerals. It has been suggested that the judgment might have proceeded on the ground that the decree of adjudication in general terms was a sufficient warrant for a charter containing a specific grant. But I cannot conceive that a judicial conveyance, where intention is of no effect, should be more liberally construed than a voluntary conveyance, in construing which intention is a main element.

I have also come to be of opinion that the judgment in the case of Ochterlony was well founded, and that on sufficiently obvious principles. This matter of the Crown's right in gold and silver mines is of considerable historical interest. Previous to the statute of 1592 such minerals were part of the annexed property of the Crown, and could not pass by charter of barony, or in any other way. It is proved by the preamble of the Act of 1592, and it is historically true, that the Crown made use of this right by giving tacks of the mines chiefly to foreigners. I find in the statistical account of the parish of Crawford, in which the Leadhills lie, that the mines there had been let to foreigners previous to 1592, and that a good deal of jealousy prevailed in consequence. I believe there are papers in the Advocates' Library upon the subject, and that the dissatisfaction occasioned by this mode of dealing with the mines led to the passing of the Act of 1592. That statute authorised the Crown to set the minerals in feu to the owner of the land, and only in the event of the owner refusing or delaying to work the minerals to feu them to others.

All this shews that this is a very peculiar right on the part of the Crown. Although it is a jus regale, it is difficult to see how the principle of a separate feudal estate could be applied. As the proprietor of the lands had the right to the ordinary minerals, and as the gold, silver, and fine lead could only be worked along with the ordinary minerals, the Crown's right really resolved itself into one of lordship. I am therefore of opinion that whenever the owner of the soil, who alone could receive the right in the first instance, obtained a grant under the Act of 1592, the property of the minerals became absorbed in his right to the land, burdened only with the real right of the Crown to the lordship.

No. 142. June 16, 1875. Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson.

On the whole matter, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD GIFFORD was absent at the debate.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 143. June 16, 1875. Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

THOMAS BRUMBY JOHNSTON, Pursuer.—Fraser—Trayner.
SIR CHARLES WENTWORTH DILKE, AND OTHERS, Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Lancaster—J. P. B. Robertson.

Reparation—Slander—Literary Criticism—Innuendo—Excess of Damages.—An atlas was published, entitled "The Edinburgh Educational Atlas of Modern Geography, with complete index, by W. & A. K. Johnston" (being the firm under which the publisher carried on business). A review of the atlas appeared in a journal, which, after adverting to Dr Livingstone's high opinion of the geographical acumen of A. Keith Johnston, a deceased member of the firm, and of his son who bore the same name, proceeded,—"The atlas now before us, though bearing the name of A. Keith Johnston, is the work of neither the primus nor the secundus of that name, for the son is no longer connected with the house established by his late father, ... and not merely from the present work, but from others which have lately come to our notice, we regret to observe unmistakeable signs of the absence of that true geographical acumen which Livingstone so justly lauded." The review then went into a severe criticism of the atlas in detail.

The publisher of the atlas brought an action of damages against the proprietor of the journal for slander, and averred that the article represented that he (the pursuer) had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued, as the work of A. Keith Johnston, an atlas which was not the work of either the first or the second of that name, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas. An issue was adjusted and sent to a jury, who found for the pursuer, with £1275 of damages.

On a motion for a new trial, on the grounds (1) that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and (2) that the damages were excessive, the Court refused to disturb the verdict on the first ground, holding that the innuendo was sufficiently supported by evidence to make it not unreasonable for the jury to find for the pursuer, but intimated that, unless the pursuer accepted £100, they would grant a new trial on the ground of excess of damages. The pursuer having consented to take £100, a new trial was refused.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk), that if the critic, instead of stating as a matter of fact that the atlas was not the work of either the father or the son, and making that statement of fact the explanation of the inaccuracies which were found in it, had said that, looking to the abounding errors in the atlas, it could not be the work of these experienced men, the innuendo could not have been maintained.

2D DIVISION. Jury Cause. R.

THIS was an action by Thomas Brumby Johnston, geographer, publisher, and engraver, carrying on business in Edinburgh under the firm name of W. & A. K. Johnston, against Sir Charles W. Dilke and others, proprietors and publishers of the "Athenæum" newspaper, concluding for £5000 damages for slander.

The alleged slander was contained in a review which appeared in the

No. 143.
June 16, 1875.
Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

"Athenæum" of 11th July 1874 of an atlas published by the pursuer, entitled "The Edinburgh Educational Atlas of Modern Geography, with complete index, by W. & A. K. Johnston."

The article complained of commenced,—"The number of the 'Proceedings' of the Royal Geographical Society just published contains a letter from Dr Livingstone to Sir Henry Rawlinson, in which the great traveller says:—'It was gratifying to find that, though my letters disappeared, Keith Johnston secundus, as he ought to be called, had, with the true geographical acumen of my lamented friend, Keith Johnston primus, conjectured that the drainage (from Lake Bangweolo) went to the north-west, as I found it, and not to the Congo, as I often feared.'

"The atlas now before us, though bearing the name of A. Keith Johnston, is the work of neither the primus nor the secundus of that name, for the son is no longer connected with the house established by his late father, the merited reputation of which he was so well qualified to maintain, but is gone to seek his fortune in Paraguay. And not merely from the present work, but from others which have lately come to our notice, we regret to observe unmistakeable signs of the absence of that 'true geographical acumen' which Livingstone so justly lauded.

"This 'Educational Atlas,' though nicely got up, and in this and in other respects following the traditions of the firm under whose name it appears, is scarcely a work likely to maintain the special character of that firm, it being one that might have been prepared at the work-table of any map-maker of ordinary ability. We are far from saying that in its maps of the known portions of the globe it contains any material errors or omissions, or that the general execution and finishing of the work are deficient; but the engraving, though artistically, or rather mechanically good, is so delicate and faint, and the maps are so overcrowded with names, as to render them indistinct and difficult of reference—the first essential, as it appears to us, in an 'educational' atlas." . . .

The reviewer then went into a detailed and severe criticism of the atlas, and concluded,—"On the whole, we miss in this atlas the presence of the master mind, which, in both father and son, gave to the house of W. and A. K. Johnston the character it has so long enjoyed, but we fear is now losing, in the world of science."

The pursuer averred;—"The said article was of and concerning the pursuer and his said firm of W. and A. K. Johnston, and was intended to represent, and does represent, that the pursuer and his said firm had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued, as the work of A. Keith Johnston, an atlas which was not the work either of A. Keith Johnston the first or A. Keith Johnston the second, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas; that the said atlas was a grossly unskilful work, and not useful as an educational work; and that the pursuer and his present firm of W. and A. K. Johnston were no longer capable of producing good and useful atlases or geographical works."

The case was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury upon the following issues:—"It being admitted that in the number of the 'Athenæum' newspaper published by the defenders on 11th July 1874 the article printed in the schedule appended hereto appeared;—(1) Whether the said article was of and concerning the pursuer and his firm of W. and A. K. Johnston, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer and his said firm had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued as the work of A. Keith Johnston an atlas which was not the work either of A. Keith Johnston the first or A. Keith Johnston the second, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer: (2) Whether the said article was of and concerning the pursuer and his said firm of W. and A. K. Johnston, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer and his present firm of W. and A. K. Johnston were no longer capable of producing good and useful atlases or geographical works, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer."

No. 143. June 16, 1875. Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

The defenders took no counter issue.

It was proved that the plates which were used for the "Educational Atlas" were revised by A. Keith Johnston the second before he went to Paraguay.

Only one witness stated that he had, in reading the article in the "Athenæum," put upon it the meaning innuendoed by the pursuer in the first issue.

The jury found for the pursuer on the first issue, with £1275 of damages, and for the defenders upon the second issue.

The defenders moved for a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

The Court having granted the rule, parties were heard.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Having presided at the trial of this case I may as well, before your Lordships deliver your opinions upon the question before the Court, state the impression which the evidence made on my mind, on the first ground on which the motion is based for a new trial, viz., that the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

The issue relates to a long and elaborate article upon the subject of a geographical publication, and it contains a variety of matters which the pursuer felt to be injurious to him. The two issues which were granted by the Lord Ordinary—I assume after discussion—were those that are now before the Court. The whole sting of the issues is in the innuendo attributed to the article as a whole. That the article is of and concerning the pursuer is quite certain. That some of the statements contained in it are untrue is also certain; but the real question brought before the jury was, whether the article bore the innuendo which is appended to and forms part of the issues that were approved of and sent to trial. Now, my Lords, I do not think that, although an issue is adjusted containing an innuendo which the pursuer undertakes to prove, it is beyond the power of the presiding Judge, looking to the evidence and to the import of the language said to have been used, to say to the jury that no case has been presented to them which would justify that innuendo, and that the words will not bear it. But, on the other hand, when an issue is sent to a jury, and there are no collateral circumstances founded on to modify the natural meaning of the words, it appears to me that, prima facie at all events, it is a matter for the consideration of the jury. In this case I find that these two issues had been carefully adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, and that he had expressed his views in a note which he added to his judgment.

In regard to the second issue, which puts to the jury whether the article represented that the pursuer and his present firm of W. and A. K. Johnston "were no longer capable of producing good and useful atlases or geographical works," my impression was that that was altogether a forced and fanciful construction to be put upon the article. It would require very strong words indeed to deduce that result from anything that could be said upon such a work. But

No. 143.

June 16, 1875.
Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

I did not think it necessary to withdraw that from the jury. I told the jury that was my impression on the evidence, and they accordingly adopted or coincided in the view that I expressed.

In regard to the first issue, the matter was considerably more perplexing, because it contains a very complex innuendo containing various elements, all of which it was necessary that the pursuer should maintain and establish,—"That the pursuer and his said firm had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued as the work of A. Keith Johnston an atlas which was not the work either of A. Keith Johnston the first or A. Keith Johnston the second, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas."

The question that arose for the jury was, whether the article meant all those things. Now, my Lords, if the article had simply said that, looking to the nature of this atlas and its abounding errors, the critic came to the conclusion that it could not be the work of the experienced geographers who had been in use to make the maps of A. K. Johnston, I do not know that there would have been much of a case to send to the jury. At all events, it would have been impossible to maintain it on the footing of this innuendo. Probably a critic is entitled to say, if he gives the grounds on which he says it, "I assume from the excessive carelessness of the work which we are criticising that it cannot be the production of the experienced men whose works we have been accustomed to receive." That, at all events, would have been a very different case. But that is not the statement contained in the article in any view of it; for the statement is that as a matter of fact, although the work bears the name of A. Keith Johnston, it is not the work of either the first or the second of that name. And the reason why the critic says it is not the work of either the first or the second A. Keith Johnston is not the inaccuracy which he finds in the work itself, but the fact that the son is no longer connected with the house established by his late father, "the merited reputation of which he was so well qualified to maintain, but has gone to seek his fortune in Paraguay." And, therefore, the kind of case which was suggested of a mere inference from the nature of the work itself is entirely out of this question. And it is very important in this discussion to keep that in mind. Whether the allegation be true or false, injurious or not injurious, the allegation is, that in point of fact it is not the work of either the father or the son, and the reason is that the son has ceased to be connected with the firm. In regard to the inaccuracy, so far is that from being the ground on which that statement of fact is made, the statement of fact is made to be the explanation of the inaccuracies which are found in it. That the statement was false was clearly proved, and that is not in dispute. It was a statement which the proprietors or publishers of the "Athenæum" could not fail to know to be at least derogatory to the reputation of the firm, because they say so in so many words, and that is the whole gist of the article. It turned out to be false, and I regretted at the time, and I regret still, that having made a statement in point of fact which they knew to be injurious, and which turned out to be false, the editors of this very distinguished publication should not at once have said,—"We are very sorry that we were misled in that matter." Probably if they had done so we should have heard no more of this case.

But then came the question, assuming the statement that it was not the work of A. Keith Johnston the first or the second, as represented in the article, whether the article represented that the pursuer and his said firm had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued as the work of A. Keith

No. 143.

June 16, 1875.
Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

Johnston the first or the second an atlas which was not the work of these parties, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas? Now, to pass for a moment from the purpose of deceiving the public, it appeared to me that there was evidence to go to the jury that the article meant to represent the maps as the work of persons not skilled in making an atlas,—that is to say, not eminently skilled. That they could make a map is of course assumed in the article itself, for it is assumed that this map might be made by a map-maker of ordinary ability. But the reference to the "true geographical acumen" which occurred two or three times in this article—in the second paragraph, in the last, and especially in the fourth paragraph, where they say that "the present cartographer has not the geographical acumen to follow out his own conclusion by erasing the words 'Sources of the Nile'"—I think entitled the jury to judge for themselves, and to affirm that part of the issue, if they were satisfied on the subject.

But the last point, and by far the most difficult point in the inquiry, was, whether the article meant to say that the pursuer, by putting the name of the firm upon the book, intended to deceive the public. I think the critic did mean to say that the public were deceived, or would be so but for his caution, for he says that the work before us, though bearing the name of A. Keith Johnston, is the work of neither the primus nor the secundus—that is to say, that the public would naturally have expected that it was the work of one or other of them, but that in point of fact it was not. Now, whether that was said with the intention of representing that by putting that name upon the book the firm intended to lead the public to believe what was contrary to the fact,—that it was the work of the old hands, and not of new,—was the question which the jury had to consider. I think that a strong inference to draw from the words, and so I told the jury. But I am not in a position to say that it is not an inference which they were entitled to draw. I cannot say that it is contrary to the evidence. I might not myself have drawn the inference, but my opinion is that the jury having had the whole case before them, and having heard the whole evidence such as it was—into which I do not think it necessary to go—it was not very strong of its class, but there was a certain amount of it—I am not prepared to say that the jury, having found that, went contrary to the evidence in so finding. And therefore I was satisfied with this part of the verdict as it was returned, and I would not be disposed to have this investigation over again before a fresh jury.

In regard to the matter of damages, I must fairly say that I think there was no justification and no foundation for the amount of damages which the jury gave. I may perhaps take some blame myself that I did not make any observations to the jury upon that subject, led mainly by the fact which was stated by Mr Fraser yesterday, that he appealed to the jury mainly for a vindication of the character of this work, and very much on the ground that the defenders had made no expression of regret for the mistake in point of fact which had been made. The jury have fixed the damages at £1275. As I have said, I think that is entirely without evidence, and accordingly it appears to me that if that verdict is to be taken as it is, it would be impossible for us to avoid giving a new trial on that ground, which is quite a sufficient ground. But I think we are quite entitled to take the course of putting it to the pursuer to accept a reasonable sum—what we consider reasonable—in name of damages; and if he is willing to do that, and to allow the verdict to be modified to that extent, then I think there will be no necessity for any new trial.

No. 143.

June 16, 1875.
Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

LORD NEAVES.—I do not go into the question whether the innuendo was made out, for this reason, that it does not appear that your Lordship was asked to say that the language used in the article was not capable of the meaning which the jury put upon it.

But I think the jury have strained matters very much, and have been carried away by the severity of the criticism, which was quite allowable, whether right or wrong. In a question between "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," or Scotch geographers and English critics, I do not see why a harsh and keen article should not be considered within the province of the critics. It has been so considered, and I presume will continue to be so, and not without good reason. The jury were no doubt carried away by thinking the pursuer assailed unjustly. I consider the amount of damages grossly excessive, and utterly unsupported by the evidence—I would almost use the word "outrageous"—but at all events they are quite unjustifiable in any view.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—The only question of difficulty which I have found in this case is, whether there was or was not evidence to go to the jury to support the innuendo in the first issue. I do not remember any case where an innuendo so complicated and difficult as this was supported by evidence so slender; and very little more would have induced me to say that the verdict was against evidence, and that a new trial must be granted on that ground alone.

But I feel that I am not in a very favourable position to come to that conclusion, and I concur mainly in consequence of the impression which the evidence has made upon your Lordship, who tried the case,—a matter to which I give the greatest possible effect. Therefore, upon the first ground on which a rule is moved for, I think we cannot grant a new trial.

As to the amount of damages, I quite concur in the observations of your Lordships. This is a verdict which, to use the expression of an old Judge, would make people hold up their hands in astonishment. There is not a particle of evidence which could possibly justify such an award of damages, and I am driven to ask on what grounds can the jury have proceeded. I think we have the means of getting at the grounds which may have misled the jury, for the sting of the article complained of is not so much in the innuendo which is put in the first issue as in the sharpness and severity of the criticism which the article contains. I can quite understand that the jury would find great difficulty in discriminating between the damage which was done by an allegation against the Johnstons, that they had put on the title-page something calculated to mislead the public as to the authorship of the atlas, and the injury which was inflicted by the very severe criticism indulged in against the maps themselves. The jury must have failed to distinguish between damages for the criticism, which they were not entitled to give the pursuer, and any very moderate damages which they might be entitled to give upon the footing that the article accused the pursuer of having misled the public as to the authorship of the maps. And therefore I consider, with your Lordships, that unless a very different amount is accepted we must grant a new trial on the second ground.

Fraser, for the pursuer;—In regard to the amount of damages I am authorised by the pursuer to state that he leaves himself entirely in the hands of the Court.

No. 143.
June 16, 1875. Johnston v. Dilke, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Then we are of opinion that £100 would have been a reasonable amount of damages, and that nothing beyond that ought to have been given. And, therefore, if the pursuer is willing to accept £100, we shall refuse the rule.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel, in respect that the pursuer consents that the amount of damages found by the verdict of the jury shall be reduced to £100, discharge the rule, and find the defenders entitled to expenses in connection with the application for a rule, which modify to one-half of the taxed amount," &c.

UPON a motion by the pursuer to apply the verdict, this interlocutor was pronounced on 25th June 1875:—"On the motion of the pursuer, apply the verdict of the jury in this cause, and decern against the defender for the sum of £100 of damages, and find the pursuer entitled to expenses, including the expenses of the trial, with the exception of the expenses in connection with the application for a rule, already disposed of."

KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 144.
June 18, 1875. Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION, Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Asher.
BARCLAY, CURLE, AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Alison.

Ship—Collision—Reparation—Compulsory Pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 388.—To entitle the owners of a ship, under the charge of a licensed pilot, where such pilotage is compulsory, to the benefit of the provision of the statute which exempts them from liability when a collision has occurred by the fault of the pilot, it lies on them to prove that it was occasioned solely by the pilot, and that there was no contributory fault on the part of the ship or master or crew.

Circumstances in which held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the owners had discharged this onus.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. R.

ON 17th February 1873 the new steamer "Colina," built by Barclay, Curle, and Company, which was about 320 feet long, and 2000 tons registered burden, sailed down the Clyde from Glasgow on her trial trip, and was returning up the river on 19th February, when about a quarter to five in the afternoon, the light being good and the weather clear, she ran into a dredger belonging to the trustees of the Clyde Navigation, moored on the south side of the river near Dalmuir, struck the dredger in the stern, and sank her.

At the date of the collision the "Colina" had not been taken over by the purchasers, and was still in the custody of the builders.

The present action was raised by the trustees of the Clyde Navigation against Barclay, Curle, and Company for £6000, as the damage sustained by them in consequence of the sinking of the dredger by the "Colina," through the fault, as the pursuers alleged, of the defenders and their servants.

The defenders, besides maintaining that the collision was not caused by their fault, pleaded;—(3) Separatim, the collision having been occasioned by the fault or incapacity of a duly licensed or qualified pilot acting in charge of the steamer within a district where pilotage was compulsory by law the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

No. 144.

June 18, 1875.
Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

Section 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, enacts,—"No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law."

It was not disputed that Luke Skelly, a pilot duly licensed by the Clyde Pilot Board, was, at the time of the collision, in charge of the "Colina," and that the collision occurred within a district where the employment of a pilot licensed by the board was compulsory.

The facts disclosed in the proof were shortly as follows:—The dredger had been moored in the same place for about a week before the collision, and was seen by the pilot when the steamer went down the river two days before. Close on each side of the dredger a barge was moored. The distance from the outside barge to the north bank was about 260 feet, and the distance from the inside barge to the south bank was about 70 feet, the breadth of the river being about 410 feet. It was proved that it was impossible for the "Colina" to pass up the river between the inside barge and the south bank, the only fairway for navigation being to the north of the outside barge. About 700 yards or more below where the dredger was moored the river takes a bend, but for that distance the river runs in a straight line.

The pilot saw the dredger as soon as he came round the bend. When about 400 or 500 yards from the dredger, and when the head of the "Colina" was pointing straight up the fairway, which lay to the north of the outside barge, Skelly gave the order to port the helm, to clear a small boat which was in the way on the north side. The helm was kept at port until the steamer got within about 100 yards of the dredger, at which time her bow was in a line with the dredger, or a little to the south of it. When the pilot's attention was called to the fact that the telegraph indicator shewed that the helm was at port, he got into a state of great agitation, and telegraphed to have the helm put to starboard, and immediately after hard-a-starboard, with the view of avoiding the south bank and getting the vessel's head into the fairway to the north of the dredger and barges, so as to avoid a collision with them, but that was impossible at the speed the "Colina" was going. Mr Ferguson, a partner of the defenders' firm, who was on board, said to the pilot, "You had better let her take the bank." The pilot did not hear Mr Ferguson's suggestion, or at all events did not adopt it. The witnesses—except Skelly—were all of opinion that the only way in which a collision could have been avoided when the pilot discovered the position of the "Colina," and that her helm was at port, was by continuing that course, and running the "Colina" into the south bank, which was soft and would not have injured the vessel.

After giving the order "hard-a-starboard," Skelly, finding that the vessel did not answer the helm sufficiently soon, gave the order to stop, and reverse the engines, which was done. The "Colina" had two tugs, one attached to the bow and the other to the stern. The hawser of the bow tug had the effect of assisting the starboard helm. Immediately after the engines were reversed Skelly cried out to the bow tug to slip the hawser. This order was not heard by the men on board the tug in consequence of the noise of the steam. Skelly then ran forward and repeated the order, and the tug threw off the hawser. Skelly stated in his evidence,—"Had the tug been cast loose when I first gave the order I think the vessel would have gone clear of the dredger and run on the south bank." But the other witnesses who were examined on this point considered that even when the order to throw off the hawser was first given it was too late to avoid a collision, seeing that the action of the helm was neutralised by the reversing of the engines. Skelly further stated in his evidence,—"I had no officer beside me to help me in signalling to the tug. On the first occasion I whistled and cried out to the tug, but in addition I waved my hand on the second occasion. There would be about half a minute between the time I called out and the time the rope was sprung. I did not ask assistance from any of the ship's officers. I did not require any assistance in signalling to the tug."

No. 144.

June 18, 1875. Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

The bye-laws for the regulation of vessels on the Firth of Clyde provide,—"Section 1. All steam-vessels must be supplied with a captain or sailing-master, who shall be an experienced seaman; and must also be manned with a sufficient number of able-bodied and experienced seamen, for the safe navigation of the vessel, under a penalty not exceeding £5 for each offence: And no passenger-steamboat shall be manned with less than a master, two deckmen, and a steersman (who may be a pilot), exclusive of the engineer, firemen, and steward, under the like penalty."

The officers and crew on board the "Colina," on her trial trip, had been provisionally engaged by the purchasers. The officers were not in the employment of the defenders, to whom the vessel still belonged, and had no regular commissions, but were there to see that the pilot's orders were obeyed, according to the custom in trial trips. The master was not taking an active charge, but the first and second officers were discharging their duties as such, although Durie, the first officer, in his evidence disclaimed any responsibility. The bye-law above quoted was not strictly complied with, but the result of the evidence on the whole was that there were plenty of men to do the work, and the pilot himself stated that all his orders, except the order to throw off the hawser, were promptly obeyed.

The pursuers maintained that it was not sufficient for the defenders to shew that there was fault on the part of the pilot, but they must exclude the possibility of contributory fault on the part of the master and crew, and they founded on two points in particular as fixing liability on the defenders,—first, that the vessel was not manned in terms of the bye-law; and, second, that if the order to throw off the hawser had been obeyed when it was first given the collision might have been averted.

The Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

The pursuers reclaimed.

---

* "NOTE.— . . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the collision was occasioned by the sole fault of Luke Skelly, the pilot in charge of the 'Colina,' and that there was no defect or insufficiency in the 'Colina,' and no fault on the part of her crew, which in any way contributed to the collision. The Lord Ordinary is aware that it has been decided in England that, in order to free the owners under the clause of 'the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,' founded on by them, the owners must prove that the injury was occasioned solely by the fault of the pilot; and that, if the injury is occasioned by the joint fault of the pilot and crew, or by the fault of the pilot coupled with insufficiency in the vessel, the owners are liable—The London and Edinburgh Shipping Company ('The Iona'), 18th February 1867, 1 Law Reports, P. C. Appeals, 426; The Owners of The 'Velasquez,' 4th July 1867, ib. 494; Pollok, 24th June 1851, 7 Moore's P. C. Reports, 427; Rodrigues, 3d June 1854, 10 Hurlestone and Gordon, 110; Trask, 30th July 1863, 2 Moore's Reports, N. S., 260. The Lord Ordinary concurs in the principles laid down in these cases, and has given effect to these principles in deciding the present action."

At advising,— No. 144.

June 18, 1875. Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The sum at stake in this case is large, and it involves questions of great importance in regard to the rules of navigation.

The "Colina" is a first-class steamer of the largest size. She was built by Barclay, Curle, and Company, and had not been taken off the hands of the builders when the accident occurred which has given rise to this action. She went down the Clyde on 17th February 1873 under charge of a Clyde pilot on her trial trip, and was returning on the 19th, when she struck a dredger moored in the river, and sank her. This action is raised by the Clyde Navigation Trustees against Barclay, Curle, and Company. The plea in defence is that although the vessel was the property of the defenders they are not responsible, the accident having occurred at a time when the vessel was in charge of a duly qualified pilot, within a district where the employment of a pilot is compulsory, and they found upon the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this defence, and assoilzied the defenders. I am entirely satisfied with the reasoning by which his Lordship has reached this conclusion, but as the case is important I shall shortly state my views.

Although under the statute there is an express provision that if the fault or incapacity of the pilot is the cause of the accident the owner and master are not to be responsible, yet it has been held that the burden is laid upon the owner or master of shewing not only that the pilot was in fault, but that the master and crew were not in fault, and that there is no reasonable ground for saying that, if the master and crew had acted otherwise than they did, the accident would not have occurred. Some observations have been made in the English cases to which we have been referred to the effect that the owners must exclude the possibility of the master or crew having contributed to the accident. Such expressions are rather figurative than strictly judicial. I should prefer to state the law to be that it is not enough for the owners to shew that the damage arose through the fault of the pilot, if there is reasonable room for saying that there was contributory fault on the part of the master or crew.

The question here is, did the damage arise from the fault or incapacity of the pilot, and if it did, was there fault on the part of the master or crew which contributed to the result?

It is said that the owners must be responsible, because they have not complied with the bye-laws of the Clyde Pilot Board, which require "that all steam-vessels must be supplied with a captain or sailing-master who shall be an experienced seaman, and must also be manned with a sufficient number of able-bodied and experienced seamen for the safe navigation of the vessel." It is said that the "Colina" was not supplied with a captain or sailing-master, or with a sufficient crew. The vessel was still the property of Barclay, Curle, and Company, and she was manned on this her trial trip by officers and men who had no regular commission, but were there for the purpose of the trial trip. It is said that this is not sufficient compliance with the bye-law. I think it was a slovenly state of matters, and not one to be commended. It may be quite true, and I think it is proved, that the complement of officers and men was quite sufficient, although the captain and other officers say that they were only there as amateurs. I take it, however, as proved that there were plenty of hands to do the work, and that the work was reasonably well done. But to send a vessel for a trial trip in such a place as the Clyde, with no one on board who can say that he was responsible, is not to my mind a proper compliance with the regulation, and if the case had turned on this, I should say that the provision had not been complied with.

No. 144.

June 18, 1875.

Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

But the question is solely whether the accident happened through the fault of the pilot, who was master of the vessel for the time being, and if it did, whether there was any fault on the part of the owners or owners' servants which contributed to the result.

Now, there is not the smallest doubt as to the cause of the collision. It was simply that the pilot kept the helm too long to port after he had given the order to port the helm in order to clear a small boat which was in the way on the north side, some distance farther down the river; and after he found that the vessel was going into the south shore, instead of running her aground, which was the only chance of avoiding a collision with the dredger, he put the helm hard to starboard, which had not the effect of clearing the dredger. The pilot does not deny this. He says the vessel gave a sheer to the southward; but the real truth is, that he had kept the helm longer at port than he supposed. For the moment he forgot that the helm was at port, and when he discovered it, he got into great agitation, and instantly called out to put the helm to starboard.

The cause of the accident is thus beyond a doubt. The question then is, whether the master or crew, or any defect connected with the ship, contributed to the damage. I am at a loss to find any trace of such contributory fault. If the orders of the pilot had not been obeyed, if there were not sufficient men to obey the orders, it would have been a very serious matter, all the more so from the state of the authority of the officers and crew; but there is no trace of this in the evidence. Every order was promptly obeyed, and the pilot himself says so most positively.

It is suggested that there was not a proper look-out. But the pilot knew that the dredger was there. He had seen it on the 17th as he went down, and it is proved that he saw it as soon as they came round the bend of the river. Moreover, Durie went forward and blew the whistle when they came in sight, and no question is even asked as to the look-out. There is no pretence for saying that the accident happened in consequence of the dredger not being duly seen, and the pilot himself says there was plenty of room to clear her.

It is further suggested that there was a short period in which the accident might have been averted if there had been more men on board. The "Colina" had two tugs attached to her, one at the stern and one at the bows, and the hawser of the bow tug, to a certain extent, assisted the helm when put to starboard. A minute or two before the collision the pilot changed his mind, and although he did not countermand the order to starboard the helm he seemed to think that he could still run into the shore and so avoid striking the dredger by taking it on the port tack, and accordingly he called to the tug to throw off the hawser. The tug did not at first obey, not having heard the order, and then the pilot ran to the end of the bridge and called out loudly. They did hear, and they threw off the hawser. It is suggested that if there had been the proper compliment of men, and if they had been discharging their duty, there might have been some one to hear and repeat the order to throw off the hawser when it was first given, and so the vessel might possibly have got to the south side of the dredger. But the pilot himself distinctly says that he was not in want of any assistance. I cannot come to the conclusion that if any one else had been there he would have done better. But if the rope had been cast off that moment

No. 144.
June 18, 1875.
Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

it was hopeless to have avoided the collision, for this simple reason, that the order to reverse had been given before the order to cast off the hawser. The helm was still to starboard, and at the moment the first order was given to throw off the hawser the vessel was only sixty yards from the dredger, a distance which would be traversed, at the rate the vessel was going, in thirty or forty seconds.

It is said that there was no one in charge of the vessel at all. Theoretically that might be so, but practically it was not. Mr Ferguson, one of the owners, says that the first and second officers were in charge. "Durie was practically in command after the pilot, and under Durie was the second mate." Durie disclaims responsibility, but he does not dispute the fact that he was discharging the duty of first officer.

Upon the whole evidence I am of opinion that the vessel was quite sufficiently manned for the purpose of navigation; that the orders of the pilot were immediately and promptly obeyed; and that it was owing to his mistake in the navigation, and to that alone, that the collision took place. Under these circumstances I see no ground for excluding the provisions of the Act of Parliament, which provide that, in such circumstances, the owner or master should not be responsible.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur. It is quite plain that the leading fault which caused the accident was on the part of the pilot. But if there is room for holding that something wrong on the part of the master or crew contributed to the result the defenders will still be liable. This rule must be applied in a reasonable sense. We are not to set our imaginations wild in search of something done or left undone by the master or crew which might possibly have altered the result. I cannot find that anything was done or left undone by the master and crew which could reasonably be said to have contributed to the accident.

I do not wish to give any encouragement to the idea that a ship requires to be less efficiently manned on her trial trip than at any other time. I do not think, however, that it has been made out upon the evidence that the ship was not fully officered and manned.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the opinions of your Lordships and of the Lord Ordinary.

On the occasion when the collision in question took place, the "Colina" had a pilot on board, as she was bound to have by law. He, and he alone, was entitled to direct the course of the vessel. But there was also a duty upon the owners, or those in possession of the ship. They were bound to have an efficient master and crew on board for the purpose, among others, of keeping a look out and promptly carrying into effect the orders of the pilot. The defenders, accordingly, aver in the first article of their statement of facts, that the "Colina" "was, at and prior to the collision, tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and officered, and in every way fitted for the navigation of the Clyde."

It would be hard, no doubt, upon the defenders, to be made responsible for the fault of the pilot, whom they were compelled by law to employ; and to relieve them so far the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, provides that "no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." The defenders, however, were not exempt from all charge or responsibility. The law on this point has been stated by Sir Richard Kindersley in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a recent case of a collision, as follows:[1]—"In construing these Acts it has been established as a principle that in order to entitle the owners to the benefit of exemption from liability thereby provided they must prove that the damage for which it is sought to make them liable was occasioned exclusively by the default of the pilot. It is not enough for them to prove that there was fault or negligence in the pilot; they must prove to the satisfaction of the Court which has to try the question that there was no fault whatever on the part of the officers and crew of the vessel, or any of them, which might have been, in any degree, conducive to the damage." I admit that we are not to found upon every expression in the opinion of a Judge, however eminent, in its strictest literal sense; and I do not say that I differ from the reasonable view of the principle taken by your Lordships. Still the principle is established, not only by the passage in the judgment which I have just quoted, but in that of many others to be found in the reports, to the effect that the onus lies upon the owners, not only to shew that there was fault in the pilot, and in him alone, but also that they or their servants, or others for whom they are answerable, did not by negligence, or, indeed, any act of omission or commission, contribute to the collision and consequent damage.

No. 144.

June 18, 1875.
Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

I do not think that anything turns on the circumstance that when the collision in question occurred the vessel was on her trial trip, and in regard to this I understand both your Lordships agree with me. Indeed a steamer or other vessel on her trial trip may require a larger and more efficient and vigilant crew than when fairly afloat, more especially when the trip takes place in a crowded river like the Clyde, while as yet the ship's powers and mode of working are unknown. All the more skill, efficiency, and vigilance are therefore required, I should think, on such an occasion, to avoid danger.

The question is whether there was any blame in relation to the collision we are now considering attributable to the defenders, or, to put it more correctly, have they shewn that there was none, and that the fault was solely and entirely that of the pilot. That there was fault on the part of the pilot I concur with both your Lordships in thinking to be free from doubt; but I cannot concur with your Lordships in holding that there was no contributory fault on the part of the defenders or their servants, and still less in thinking that they have satisfied the onus which was upon them of shewing there was not.

In the first place, I must consider what was the state of the vessel in regard to officers and crew when the collision took place. The defenders were bound to have an efficient crew, officers, and master or captain. A pilot would be very useless unless there were persons on board promptly to carry out his orders, and to aid him by keeping a vigilant look-out. Now, the evidence shews that there was not the full complement of officers and crew on board, and those that were on board, so far, at least, as the officers are concerned, appear to have been present as idlers or amateurs rather than in the discharge of duty. In short, the evidence shews that the "Colina" was, as regards her officers and crew, in a very deplorable condition, so much so that it is not the least surprising that an accident occurred. This goes far, I think, to increase the onus on the defenders of shewing that there was no contributory fault on their part.

[1] "The Iona," Feb. 18, 1867, L. R. 1 Privy Council App., see p. 432.

There are two points on which I think they have not satisfied the onus which was upon them,—first, in regard to throwing off or slipping the hawser of the tug; and, secondly, in regard to keeping a good look-out and giving the necessary warnings to the pilot.

With regard to the first point, it does not require much knowledge of navigation to see the importance of slipping the hawser of the tug the moment the pilot gave an order to that effect. Gordon, the master of one of the barges moored alongside the dredger, says,—"If the tug had not pulled her (the 'Colina') to the north, she would not have struck the dredger, and I believe she would have run into the south bank below the dredger, and clear of both dredger and barges." The witnesses John Macdonald and James Barrie (the masters of the dredger and of the other barge) gave evidence to the same effect. There were two ways of slipping the hawser which connected the tug with the "Colina." It might have been slipped from the tug, or it might have been slipped or cut if necessary from the "Colina" herself. Skelly, the pilot, says, in the course of his evidence,—"When I saw the 'Colina' was not coming round to her starboard helm I cried to the bow tug to slip her hawser. I did so in order to let the 'Colina' run upon the south bank and keep clear of the dredger as a last resource. The 'Colina' would have been none the worse of going upon the bank, which was a soft one, and she would not have run foul of the dredger. My order was not obeyed immediately, because the noise of the paddles and the steam prevented the people in the tug from hearing me. Accordingly I whistled, and signalled to the tug by hand to spring the rope, which was then done. Had the tug been cast loose when I first gave the order I think the vessel would have gone clear of the dredger, and run on the south bank." Here the state of the "Colina" as regards her officers and crew comes to be of great importance. Had the master been at his post, in place of idling and smoking his cigar, the hawser might have been cut and the collision avoided. But there appears to have been no master or any one else to assist in that matter. Skelly, the pilot, expressly says,—"I had no officer beside me to help in signalling to the tug."

With regard, again, to the look-out, I have not been able to find any witness who says that there was a man stationed to keep a look-out at all; and no such man has been examined as a witness. I agree, however, with your Lordships that the pilot appears to have seen the dredger in plenty of time. But I cannot hold that this is enough to exonerate the defenders. The pilot's attention is necessarily directed to other matters as well as keeping a look-out, and there ought to have been a man or men stationed on the forecastle or bows for the purpose of looking out and reporting every danger ahead. The case of the "Iona," in which Sir Richard Kindersley delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, is very instructive on this point. The circumstances were very similar to the present case. The "Iona" ran down a barge in broad daylight just as here. The pilot saw the barge 300 yards off just as here; and yet it was held that the owners of the "Iona" were liable, in respect that the master and crew had failed to keep a good look-out.

In these circumstances, into the minute details of which it is unnecessary to enter, I am of opinion that in respect of want of promptitude in seeing that the order of the pilot to throw off the tug was carried into effect, and failure to keep

No. 144.

June 18, 1875. Trustees of the Clyde Navigation. v. Barclay, Curle, and Co.

a proper look-out, the defenders have failed to exonerate themselves; and I am therefore of opinion that in place of being assoilzied, they ought to be subjected in liability to the pursuers for the damage sustained by them in consequence of the collision.

LORD GIFFORD was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—FRASERS, STODART, & MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 145.

June 26, 1875. Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

MRS JESSIE RANKIN OR STURROCK, First Party.—J. A. Crichton.
RANKIN'S TRUSTEES, Second Parties.—Fraser.

Trust-Settlement—Condition in Restraint of Marriage.—A truster directed that a part of the profits of his business, which was to be carried on by his trustees after his death, should be paid to his daughters, "but in the event of any of my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate," in which all his children were to participate. Held that the bequest was intended as a provision for the truster's unmarried daughters so long as they remained unmarried, and that the limitation was not invalid as a condition in restraint of marriage, and that a daughter who was married at the date of the settlement had no interest in the bequest.

Observations on the English rules as to conditions in restraint of marriage attached to bequests.

2D DIVISION. I.

DAVID RANKIN, wine merchant, Kilmarnock, died on 8th October 1873, leaving a trust-deed dated 17th February 1872. He was survived by his second wife, Janet Tod Guthrie or Rankin, and two sons—John Buchanan Rankin and Guthrie Rankin; and three daughters—Eliza Smith Rankin, Jane Mackay Rankin, and Jessie Rankin or Sturrock, of his first marriage, and seven children of his second marriage.

The fourth provision of his trust-deed was as follows:—"Fourth, In order that the full benefit may be obtained from my means, invested in my business as a wine and spirit merchant, &c., in Kilmarnock and elsewhere, carried on under the firm of William Rankin and Son, and for the better maintenance of my widow and children, it is my desire that the business be carried on for some time by the said John Buchanan Rankin and Guthrie Rankin, and James Blair (presently a partner in the business), under the supervision of my said trustees, and for that purpose I authorise and empower my trustees to allow whatever capital I may have invested in the business at the date of my decease to remain therein; and my trustees will allow suitable salaries to the said John Buchanan Rankin, Guthrie Rankin, and James Blair, for their management; and it is my desire that my trustees shall, while the business is so carried on, cause half-yearly balances to be made up in the months of February and August in each year, and to be vouched and docqueted, and shall report the same to the beneficiaries hereinafter named, and on the annual profits being ascertained my trustees shall dispose of the share thereof belonging to me as follows, viz.:—They shall pay over one-third thereof to the said Janet Tod Guthrie or Rankin, one-third thereof to my daughters Eliza Smith Rankin, Jane Mackay Rankin, and Jessie Rankin, equally among them, and the survivors and survivor of them, but in the event of any of my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate; and they shall hand over the remaining third to the said Janet Tod Guthrie or Rankin to be expended by her for the use and behoof of the younger children of our family until they shall severally attain majority, and thereafter the said third of my share of profits shall fall into the residue of my estate."

No. 145.

June 26, 1875. Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

With regard to the residue of her estate the truster directed that, on the death of his widow, "they (the trustees) shall divide and pay over one-third thereof to and among my whole daughters by both marriages, equally among them, share and share alike, payable on their severally attaining majority or being married; and shall pay over and divide the remaining two-thirds of my said means and estate to and among my whole children, equally among them, share and share alike, payable to my sons on their severally attaining majority, and to my daughters on their severally attaining majority or being married."

His daughter, Jessie Rankin, was married to John Sturrock junior on 21st December 1871, during the lifetime of and with the consent of her father, and before the date of the execution of the settlement. At her marriage she got an outfit from her father of the value of £150.

The first balance of the business, which had been carried on by the trustees, was struck at 31st January 1875. Mrs Sturrock claimed a share of the one-third of the profits directed in the settlement to be paid to the truster's daughters. The trustees resisted the claim, on the ground that it was provided in the deed as above quoted, and that "in the event of any of my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate." A special case was prepared setting forth the above facts—Mrs Sturrock being the first party and the trustees the second parties thereto.

Mrs Sturrock contended that the condition, being in restraint of marriage, was illegal, and therefore that no lapse had taken place. She further contended, that supposing it were not illegal upon that ground, it was inapplicable to her, because she was married, not merely before the truster's death, but before the execution of the trust-disposition and settlement. On the other hand, the trustees contended that the condition upon which the legacy was to be paid was valid and not illegal; that the object of the truster was to secure an income to unmarried daughters of the first marriage by giving them one-third of the truster's share of profits, he assuming that any married daughter would be supported by her husband, and that there was nothing illegal in her father making such a distribution of the income from his estate among his daughters.

The question for opinion and judgment was whether the party of the first part was entitled to claim a share of the one-third of the profit from the business.

Argued for Mrs Sturrock;—(1) The clause founded on by the trustees amounted to an absolute prohibition to marry, and as such was illegal,[1] and must be held pro non scripto. (2) In this case the daughter was clearly entitled to her share, because she was married at the time of the execution of the deed, and was named in it as a person who was to take.

Argued for the trustees;—(1) The rules which prevailed in England as to conditions were no part of the law of Scotland, and were looked on with disfavour even by English lawyers.[2] (2) The true construction of the deed was that a married daughter would not presumably require the temporary assistance till division, while unmarried ones would.

---

[1] Bellairs v. Bellairs, July 3 and 16, 1874, L. R., 18 Equity, 510; Allen v. Jackson, March 22, 1875, L. R., 19 Equity, 631.

[2] Stackpole v. Beaumont, April 14, 1796, 3 Vesey, 88—Lord Chanc. Loughborough, and Master of Rolls (Jessel), in Bellairs, supra; Bulloch v. Bennet, June 12, 1855, 7 De Gex, M'N., and Gordon, 283; West v. Kerr, Dec. 22, 1854,

No. 145. At advising,—

June 26, 1875. Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question in this case arises under the trust-disposition and settlement of David Rankin, who was a wine-merchant in Kilmarnock, and the clause under which the dispute occurs is to the following effect:—After other provisions have been made, the truster provides, in the fourth place, that in order to the better maintenance of his widow and children his business shall be carried on under the supervision of the trustees, and his capital left in the business; and that when the annual balance of profits has been struck, "they shall pay over one-third thereof to" his widow, "one-third thereof to" his three daughters "equally among them; . . . . but in the event of any my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate." The residuary clause of the deed provides that one-third of his whole estate shall be divided among his daughters, and the remaining two-thirds among his whole children.

The share or fund which is the subject of the present special case is one-third of one-third of the profits accrued since the date of the truster's death in 1873. It is maintained by the first party, Mrs Sturrock, that that amount belongs to her, and we had an able argument as to how far a condition in restraint of marriage is to be held pro non scripto. If it were necessary to decide that general question I should go entirely along with the argument submitted for the trustees. It is not the law of this country, as it is in England, that where such a condition diminishes the interest of the beneficiary in the legacy it is to be held pro non scripto. That rule, along with its various qualifications, such as the distinction between the effect of conditions precedent and conditions subsequent, and the different results which follow if the legacy be from personalty or from realty or mixed estates, and the difference between limitations on the legatee's right and conditions attached to it, form no part of our law, and has been much regretted by jurists in the sister country, as may be gathered from the remarks made by many of them in the cases cited to us, and particularly those of Master of the Rolls Jessel, in the recent case of Bellairs.[1] Whatever may have been the early law in this country any such rules have been repudiated altogether now.

In the ordinary case it is not the law of Scotland that a testator may not attach to any of his gifts such conditions as regards the marriage of the legatee as may seem reasonable. It is not necessary to go farther for authority on this point than the case of Kidd v. Kidds, where that doctrine was recognised. But this is not a case where that point is raised at all. The question is relative to a fund which is realised by the labour of the trustees out of the capital of the trust-estate, and the testator has directed what the trustees are to do with the money so obtained. Mrs Sturrock wishes to get a share of this fund, but the deed has distinctly said she is not to have it. On what ground she can rest her claim I fail to see. She never had a right to a share of this fund, so she can suffer no forfeiture. No restraint has been put upon her, for she was married before the death of the testator; so whatever may be the principles of law with regard to such restraint they do not apply to this case. We 6 Irish Jur. 141—Lord Chanc. Brady; Kidd v. Kidds, Dec. 10, 1863, 2 Macph. 227, 36 Scot. Jur. 525.

[1] Supra, p. 851, note 1.

No. 145.

June 26, 1875.
Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

are asked to ordain the trustees to pay a sum of money to a person who is expressly excluded in the deed.

I think that the whole argument for Mrs Sturrock proceeded on a misconception of the English cases. What is meant by the distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent in such cases is fully explained by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Davis v. Angel, June 6, 1862, 6 Law Times, 850.

In this case there never was a gift to Mrs Sturrock at all, and she never lost anything under this provision of the settlement. We must answer the question in favour of the trustees, and to the effect that Mrs Sturrock is entitled to no share of this fund.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that the somewhat arbitrary and fanciful rules which obtain in England form no part of our law.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I was desirous, before this case was decided, to have had an opportunity of examining the case of Bellairs, which was cited by one of the parties as being in point. I have had that opportunity, and am now quite satisfied, in accordance with the views of your Lordships, that it cannot be looked upon as a precedent to govern the present case.

The circumstances of the two cases are essentially different. In Bellairs' case the Master of the Rolls proceeds, and the report shews that the judgment was founded on the principle that the condition which formed the turning point was a condition subsequent and not a condition precedent. Indeed, I gather from the report that if it had been a condition precedent the judgment would have been different. If we consider the present case by that rule there can be no doubt that the condition here was a condition precedent, because the bequest never vested. In Bellairs' case it did vest, and was then made the subject of a condition that, in the event of the marriage of the legatee, it should be forfeited, which is quite different from the terms of the bequest in the present case.

But, independently of that circumstance, and supposing the case of Bellairs was precisely similar to the present, I am not satisfied that it should control our decision now. It is clear that a variety of distinctions exist in the law of England in reference to matters of this kind of which there is no trace in our law at all. There is a distinction, for instance, that the rule given effect to in Bellairs' case does not apply to heritage, and other distinctions of a like nature which do not exist in our law. Besides, the Master of the Rolls himself states in Bellairs' case his opinion of the unreasonableness of the principle he gave effect to, and says he would have decided differently had it not been for some prior decision in another case which he held to govern him but which need not govern us.

On the whole I am clearly of the same opinion as your Lordships; and if it were necessary that we should have authority for our judgment we have it in the case of Kidd v. Kidds. It would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the rule contended for, on the strength of Bellairs' case, were held to prevail, as it would, I fear, endanger the stability of many family arrangements and settlements.

The only other question raised was as to the construction of the terms of the bequest, independently altogether of the principles with which I have hitherto dealt. It was suggested that, according to the terms of the bequest, the restriction could have no application to Mrs Sturrock, because at the time of the execution of the settlement she was already married; and if it was desired to exclude her as a married daughter, why was the bequest not made to the other two unmarried ones only? In answer to that I have to say that it is probable Mr Rankin may have contemplated that, when the bequest came to vest, that Mrs Sturrock might have become a widow, and then, in that contingency, that he wished her to participate in his bounty. That question, however, is not before us now for determination, and I am not to be understood as giving any opinion upon it. It is enough that, in reference to the only point we have to decide, the fair construction of the terms of the bequest support the views we have taken of it.

No. 145.

June 26, 1875.
Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

Lord Gifford.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Under this settlement, in reference to Mrs Sturrock, there is no question at all of condition in restraint of marriage. That is not the category under which the case falls. The only question is, what was the true meaning and intention of the testator, and has he effectually expressed his intention? As I read the clause the testator contemplated that his widow and children would or might require maintenance and support after his death. He expressly declares that he is making provision "for the better maintenance of my widow and children," and then he proceeds to direct his business to be carried on for their behoof. I think that the true meaning of the clause is in substance this:—"My daughters are to be maintained out of a portion of the profits of my business until they marry, when it is to be presumed they will no longer require it." It is said, however, that the provision involves a forfeiture in the event of marriage, and is thus illegal. I do not think it does. The word "lapse" simply means cease; and when there is such a cessation from payment the amount so ceasing to be paid is to go to increase the residue which is to be divided among all the children.

I do not think we have in Scotland, what seems unfortunately to exist in England, the rule that in the construction of a mortis causa settlement the validity and effect of a provision may depend upon the mere form of expression, so that the same provision if made in one form is good and in another bad.

If I follow aright the English cases which have been cited to us they seem to shew that if a father provides an annuity to his unmarried daughter "till her marriage," or "while she is unmarried," this provision will receive effect; but if he provide the very same annuity to his unmarried daughter, and declare that she shall forfeit it on her marriage, then the provision of forfeiture will be ineffectual, and the annuity will continue for life. I think it clear that this is not the law of Scotland. With us provisions, especially provisions of a will or settlement, receive effect not according to form or expression, but according to their true meaning, if that can be discovered from the words used. All settlements must be construed by us in accordance with the intention of the testator, and it would be very unfortunate if such technical rules as seem to exist in England were to be allowed to govern the construction of deeds like that before us.

I think the provision in this deed is not a condition in restraint of marriage, but simply a provision for unmarried daughters, who, in the view of the testator, had no other means of support; and if this be so there is an end to the question, even if it were such a condition. However, I agree with the argument for the trustees that none of the English rules exist in our law.

On both grounds I think Mrs Sturrock's claim a bad one.

No. 145.

June 26, 1875.
Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees.

A further strong argument arises from the fact that she was married before the death of the testator, and could not be restrained; but I have already given sufficient grounds for my concurrence in the proposed judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . . are of opinion and find that the party of the first part is not entitled to claim a share of the one-third of the profit from the business of William Rankin and Son which has now been declared by the last balance-sheet, and find it unnecessary to answer the rest of the question: Find no expenses due to either party, and decern."

DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 146.

July 2, 1875.
Renwick v. Von Rotberg.

JAMES RENWICK, Pursuer and Appellant.—Moncreiff.
F. VON ROTBERG, Defender and Respondent.—Thoms.

Reparation—Injury by Dog—Culpa.—In order to render the owner of a dog liable for culpably and negligently allowing it to bite one of the lieges it is not necessary to prove that the dog ever bit any person before; it is enough to shew that the owner had some reason to believe that the animal might do mischief in the circumstances in which it was placed.

A dog was put up for sale at an auction, but was not sold. The auctioneer thereupon requested the owner, who was present, to take the dog away. He did not immediately comply with this request, and the dog was meanwhile tied up to a wall of the auction mart, where he bit a boy who was passing. Held that the custody of the dog had reverted to the owner, and that there being sufficient proof that he knew the dog to be of a ferocious nature he was liable in damages.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Midlothian and Haddington. I.

THIS was an action of damages raised before the Sheriff-court of Midlothian by James Renwick, as administrator-in-law of his pupil son, James Renwick junior, against F. Von Rotberg, on account of injuries sustained by the pursuer's said son from a bite by a dog belonging to the defender.

The pursuer averred that the dog, a large Spanish bloodhound, was dangerous to the lieges, or at least of a ferocious disposition, and known by the defender to be so, but that he had nevertheless failed to take proper precautions to prevent the dog injuring the lieges.

The following facts were proved:—On 23d September 1874 the defender brought his dog to Messrs Moir's establishment to be sold at an auction. The dog was put up for sale, but no one bid the reserve price. The auctioneer then told the defender, who was present, to remove the dog, and bring him back next Wednesday. He did not, however, comply with this request, being engaged in conversation. One of the servants in the establishment then tied the dog to a wall with a chain about a yard and a half long. About ten minutes after, young Renwick, who happened to be sent to the auction to fetch his father, was passing within reach of the dog, when he was seized by him and severely bitten.

Two veterinary surgeons—one Professor Williams—deponed that Spanish bloodhounds are naturally of a ferocious character.

A lamplighter, who lighted the lamps in the lane where the dog was kept, stated that whenever he went to light or extinguish the lamp the dog made a rush at him, but as there was a wall between them the dog could do him no harm. He added, that the defender on one occasion said to him, "You need not be afraid of the dog, it will not harm you. If you call it by his name, he will not harm anybody."

No. 146.

July 2, 1875.
Renwick v. Von Rotberg.

It was proved that the dog had once attempted to worry another dog, but there was no evidence that he had actually attacked a person.

The defender swore that the dog had been always perfectly quiet, and to corroborate the statement adduced his maid-servant, who said that she was not the least afraid of the dog.

The auctioneer, Riddell, deponed that when the defender came to him about the sale of the dog the defender said, "what a valuable watch dog he would be to any one who needed such an animal, for he would allow no stranger to come near the place," and mentioned that he was of a ferocious nature. The defender denied that he said that the dog was ferocious.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the dog was not in his custody at the time of the accident.

The Sheriff (Davidson) adhered on appeal, on the further ground that it was not proved that the dog was of fierce and dangerous habits.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the appellant;—In the case of a dog of this breed, whose natural ferocity was sufficiently proved, it was not necessary to prove that the dog had actually bitten another person before it bit the pursuer's son. Much less evidence was required to establish the owner's knowledge that it was dangerous than in the case of an animal of a naturally gentle disposition.[1]

For the respondent the under-noted cases were cited.[2]

LORD NEAVES.—The ground on which the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defender has been practically abandoned. The moment the dog was taken out of the catalogue the custody returned to the defender.

This is not the case of an animal of native growth and well-known tendencies. The dog was a Spanish bloodhound. Professor Williams tells us that these dogs are naturally of a ferocious character. There is sufficient corroboration that this dog was ferocious in the lamplighter's evidence. The defender told him that he need not be afraid of the dog,—"If you call him by his name, he will not harm anybody." Unfortunately his name was not generally known, so that that spell could not be applied.

We must recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, independently of the evidence of Professor Williams, which is necessarily of a somewhat speculative character, it is sufficiently proved by what the defender himself said to Riddell that he believed that this dog might be dangerous if brought into a concourse of people.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is clear that after the lot had been passed for the day the custody returned to the defender, who was on the spot, and was told to take his dog away.

As regards the other ground of defence it may be that unless the owner has some reason to believe that the animal may do mischief in the position in which he is placed he is not liable. But if Riddell, the auctioneer, is to be believed,

---

[1] Brown v. Stewart, June 26, 1824, 3 S. 157 (N. E. 127); Worth v. Gilling, Nov. 2, 1866, L. R. 2 C. P. 1; Hudson v. Roberts, June 4, 1851, 6 W. H. and G. 697, 20 L. J., N. S., Ex. 299.

[2] Fleming v. Orr, April 3, 1855, 2 M'Q. 14, 27 Scot. Jur. 364; Clark v. Armstrong, July 11, 1862, 24 D. 1315, 34 Scot. Jur. 640.

No. 146.
July 2, 1875.
Renwick v. Von Rotberg.

the defender not only thought, but said, that the dog was of a ferocious nature. The defender denies this, but I am rather inclined to believe the auctioneer, who is not a party to the action.

The Sheriff says that "it does not detract from the harmless character" of the dog "that it did not like the proceedings of the lamplighter. The objection to him was reasonable, for his approaches were of a somewhat suspicious appearance, and no doubt the dog considered it had the daily merit of repelling him." The Sheriff seems to look upon bona fides on the part of the dog as conferring a sort of privilege on the owner. Perhaps the dog bit the boy in bona fide, but I am afraid we cannot sustain that defence.

On both grounds I think the pursuer is entitled to prevail.

LORD GIFFORD was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the dog in question belonging to the respondent (defender in the inferior Court), was of a dangerous and ferocious nature, and that he was known to be so by the respondent; and that the respondent warned the auctioneer, on the occasion of the sale libelled, that the dog was ferocious: Find that on the day libelled the dog was exposed for sale but was not sold, and that the auctioneer thereupon desired the respondent to take the dog away, and bring him back on the next Wednesday; that the respondent, instead of complying with this requisition, permitted the dog to be tied up to the wall of the building by a strapper in the establishment of Messrs Moir, and that while so tied up he attacked James Renwick junior, the pupil son of the appellant (pursuer in the inferior Court), and severely injured him: Find that the dog was at that time in the custody of the respondent (defender), and that he is liable in reparation to the appellant, as father and administrator-in-law of his said pupil son accordingly, and assess the damages at the sum of £25: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment appealed against, and decern against the respondent for payment to the appellant, as administrator-in-law foresaid, of the said sum of £25: Find the respondent liable in expenses in both Courts," &c.

BOYD, MACDONALD, & LOWSON, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

WILLIAM HARRISON AND HENRY HARRISON, Suspenders.—D.-F. Clark—Asher—Mackintosh.
THE ANDERSTON FOUNDRY COMPANY, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

Patent—Jury Trial—Process.—Observed that in a question of infringement of patent the objection that the patent is bad in law is always open at the trial as an answer to the pursuer's issue of infringement, and the Judge at the trial, if he is satisfied, on the true construction of the specification, that the patent is bad in law, ought to state his opinion in law to that effect to the jury, and direct them to find a verdict for the defenders.

Patent—Specification.—The specification of a patent for the invention of "improvements in looms for weaving" set forth that the invention consisted "in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle-

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics requiring two, three, or more shuttle-boxes and shuttles in each set." The specification proceeded to describe in detail, with reference to accompanying drawings (1) a complete shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, and (2) a complete pattern mechanism, but no part of either was claimed or described as new, nor was any part disclaimed as old. The specification concluded by claiming—"First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism generally for actuating the shuttle-boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

Opinion (per cur.), that the patent was not a valid patent for improvements, in respect that it did not describe the improvements and define the novelty otherwise and in a more specific form than by the general description of the entire machines, and failed to limit the patentee's claim to the specific improvements invented by him.

Observed (per Lord President) that a new combination of old parts to produce a new result, or to produce a known result in a more useful and beneficial way, may be a good subject-matter of a patent, but only under the conditions that the combination shall be claimed as a combination, and be so described as to shew intelligibly what is the novelty, and what the merit of the invention.

1st Division. Presiding Judge, Lord Gifford. B.

Vide supra, p. 122.

William and Henry Harrison, engineers at Blackburn, in Lancashire, brought this note of suspension and interdict against the respondents, the Anderston Foundry Company of Glasgow, to restrain them from infringing letters-patent for the invention of "improvements in looms for weaving" obtained by Quintin and James Whyte of Glasgow in 1868, and assigned by them to the suspenders in 1871, "and, in particular, from making, vending, or using any mechanism or mode or arrangement of mechanism for actuating the shuttle-boxes of power-looms for weaving striped, checked, or other ornamental or figured fabric, constructed in the manner described in the said letters-patent and specification, or constructed in manner substantially the same, and from making, using, or vending any power-loom for weaving such fabrics constructed with or embracing such mechanism, or mode, or arrangement of mechanism foresaid, and from further or otherwise infringing the said letters-patent."

The suspenders alleged that in manufacturing and selling power-looms fitted with mechanism for actuating the shuttle-boxes made according to a patent obtained by Mr M'Ilwham, their (the respondents') manager in 1869, the respondents were infringing their patent of 1868.

In defence the respondents stated,—(Stat. 1) "Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, in whose favour the letters-patent libelled on were granted, were not the first and true inventors of the alleged invention described in the said letters-patent and specification, and the said invention was not first published in Great Britain by the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, or either of them. The said alleged invention was published, and was publicly known and used in Great Britain prior to the date of the said letters-patent." (Stat. 2) "Inventions or contrivances similar to, or substantially the same with the alleged invention described in the letters-patent founded on by the complainers were described and disclosed in"—(Here followed a list of patents, those of most importance being (1) a patent obtained in 1853 by Matthew Andrew Muir, one of the partners of the Anderston Foundry Company, and worked by them to a small extent; (2) a patent obtained in 1856 by James M'Ilwham, manager of the Anderston Foundry Company, and largely worked by them; (3) a patent obtained in 1861 by John Hirst junior and James Hollingworth, but never worked; and (4) a patent obtained in 1862 by Thomas Knowles and others, and worked to some extent in England). (Stat. 3) "The alleged invention specified and described in the letters-patent and specifications libelled on was publicly used in Great Britain prior to the date of the said letters-patent in the following amongst other instances."—(Here followed the names of a number of manufacturing firms in England and Scotland). (Stat. 4) "The alleged invention claimed in the final specification of the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte does not constitute any manner of improvement upon looms for weaving as previously known and used, and it is not useful, beneficial, or advantageous to the public." . . . . (Stat. 5) "The said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, in the said letters-patent, specification, and drawings, do not sufficiently distinguish between what was old, or was in use and known at and prior to the date of the said letters-patent, and what is new or what is claimed to be their invention. Further, the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte claim as new, inventions and contrivances which were old and well known at the date of the said patent."

The respondents pleaded;—2. The alleged letters-patent founded on by the complainers are null and void or invalid, in respect—(1) The said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte were not the first and true inventors of the alleged invention described in the letters-patent and specification; (2) the alleged invention was publicly known prior to the date of the letters-patent; (3) the alleged invention was publicly used prior to the date of the letters-patent; (4) the said alleged invention is of no public utility; (5) the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, in the specification and relative drawings, do not sufficiently distinguish between what is old and not claimed by them, and what is alleged to be new and claimed by them. 3. Even assuming the said letters-patent to be in all respects valid, the prayer of the note should be refused, in respect the respondents have not infringed the said letters-patent.

The following description will explain the specification in the suspenders' patent for "improvement in looms for weaving":—In the old hand-loom the shuttle was shot at first by the hand of the weaver, and afterwards by a blow from a weapon called the pick or pick stick. When the weaver required to change the colour of his warp-thread he merely laid down the shuttle he was using at the time in a box attached to the side of the loom, and took out the new shuttle which he placed on the shuttle-race.

When the power-loom came to be introduced it was necessary to provide a mechanism for changing the shuttles without the intervention of the weaver. This was done by attaching to the end of a vertical rod, called the spear, a box composed of a number of compartments or cells, open at each end, and placed directly one above the other, the cells being just large enough to receive each a shuttle, the number of compartments or cells in the shuttle-box varying with the number of shuttles desired to be used. This shuttle-box was so placed at the side of the loom that it presented one open end of its compartments or cells to the shuttle-race, and the other to the pick stick (which in the power-loom was worked by the machinery), the shuttle projecting just sufficiently for its end to receive the blow of the pick-stick. The shuttle-box was moved up and down at the end of the spear so as to present the proper shuttle to the shuttle-race at each pick.

The mechanism by which this result was attained consisted of two parts, first, that which moved or "actuated" the spear with the shuttle-box attached; and, second, that which guided or controlled the motion of

No. 147.

July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

the shuttle-box according to the pattern required. The former was called "the shuttle-box moving mechanism," the latter "the pattern mechanism."

In the early attempts of inventors to attain this result, the shuttle-box was raised by the application of direct force, or, as it was said, "by positive motion," but it was allowed to fall by the mere force of gravity. This, which was called the "drop-box" mechanism, was found to answer sufficiently well in the large looms used for the manufacture of heavy goods, where a low speed of 40 to 50 picks a minute was all that was required. But in looms made for weaving the lighter fabrics, where a high rate of speed could be attained, even up to 130 and 140 picks per minute, it was found that the action of gravity was not sufficiently rapid to bring down the shuttle-box soon enough to ensure exactness in working. Inventors therefore applied themselves to devise some means of attaining greater rapidity without loss of exactness. Positive motion was then applied to lower as well as to raise the shuttle-box, and a means was also sought to check the motion of the shuttle-box, so as to insure that it neither rose too far nor fell too low, but presented the proper shuttle to the race with an exactness that avoided all jarring of the parts of the loom.

The suspenders' patent was for an invention having this end in view. It was described in the specification thus:—"Our said invention consists in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle-boxes of looms, for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics, requiring two, three, or more shuttle-boxes and shuttles in each set."—(Here followed a detailed description of the various parts of the machine as delineated on the drawings and marked with numbers from 1 up to 62, whereof from 1 to 29 belonged to the shuttle-box moving mechanism; 30 to 35 to the connection between it and the pattern mechanism; and 36 to 62 to the pattern mechanism). "Although the new check shuttle-box moving mechanism (numbers 1 to 29) has, so far, been only shewn and described as applied to a three shuttle-box loom it is equally applicable for working a four, five, or six shuttle-box, and it can be worked with the pattern mechanism of check looms now in use where these are in a good state and of a suitable construction and only the shuttle-box moving mechanism required, and many of the improvements in the pattern mechanism, numbers 30 to 62, may be applied to other pattern barrels and mechanism heretofore or now in use for check shuttle-boxes. . . . Having thus particularly described the nature of our said invention, and the manner in which the same is or may be performed, we have to state that we do not restrict ourselves to the precise details herein described or delineated, but what we believe to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to us by the hereinbefore in part recited letters-patent is,—

"First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism as herein distinguished, generally for actuating the shuttle-boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings or any mere modification thereof.

"Second, the construction and use of duplex depressers for actuating a lever connected to the shuttle-box of a power-loom, so as to shift and set or bring these to rest by a positive motion taken or derived from one of its main shafts, whether the lateral acting position of the depressers is determined by simply bringing it to rest on the pattern pins in the improved manner herein distinguished or by the 'positive' motion of the pins in turning the barrel, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings or any mere modification thereof.

"Third, the construction and use of a reversing pattern barrel with many annular rows of pattern pin holes, having a setting or pattern lever traversed across these holes intermittently by pins in the barrel for regulating or setting the actual moving mechanism of power-loom shuttle-boxes, whether the pattern pins used actually move the pattern or setting lever or only form a rest therefor, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings or any mere modification thereof.

"Fourth, the construction and use of pattern barrels with simple resting pins only for determining the position of the pattern lever and depressers of the actual shuttle-box moving mechanism of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

The case was tried before Lord Gifford and a jury on 22d March to 2d April 1875 upon these issues, in which the suspenders were pursuers:—"It being admitted that Quintin Whyte and John Whyte, of the city of Glasgow, obtained the letters-patent, No. 6 of process, dated 29th October 1868, and sealed 19th March 1869, and filed the specification, of which No. 7 of process is a certified printed copy, and that the said letters-patent were assigned to the pursuers by assignation, dated 30th September 1871—Whether, from the 29th October 1868 to the 19th September 1874, or during part of said period, and during the currency of the said letters-patent, the defenders did, at their works at Anderston, Glasgow, wrongfully, and in contravention of the said letters-patent, use the invention described in said-letters patent and specification? or, (1) Whether the said Quintin Whyte and John Whyte are not the first and true inventors of the invention described in the said letters-patent and relative specification? (2) Whether the invention described in the said letters-patent and specification was publicly used in the United Kingdom prior to the date of the said letters-patent? (3) Whether the invention described in the said letters-patent and specification is not practically useful for the purposes therein set forth?"

The jury, by a majority, returned a verdict for the suspenders on all the issues.

Certain exceptions were taken by the respondents (defenders in the issues) to the directions of the presiding Judge, which were thus set forth in the bill of exceptions:—

"After evidence for both parties had been closed and their respective counsel had addressed the jury Lord Gifford charged the said jury, and in the course of his address, inter alia, directed them as follows, viz:—

"With reference to the first claim in the specification of Messrs Whyte:—'(1) That according to the sound and true construction of Messrs Whyte's specification the patentees claimed as their invention the mechanical combination and arrangements both of pattern mechanism and of mechanism for shifting and holding the shuttle-boxes described in the specification; and if any distinct, material, and essential parts of that combination and arrangement were not new in their application to such mechanism at the date of the patent, and not being disclaimed, then the patent was void, and the jury must find for the defenders.'

"With reference to the second claim:—'(2) If the jury were of opinion that the use of duplex pressers or depressers actuating a lever so as to shift and set the shuttle-boxes—that is, both to move them and bring them to rest by a positive motion—was not new at the date of the patent of Messrs Whyte, then the patent was void, and the jury must find for the defenders.'

No. 147. July 2, 1875. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

"With reference to the third and fourth claims:—'(3) If the jury are of opinion that the pattern barrel and relative mechanism described in Messrs Whyte's specification was not new at the date of their patent, then the patent was void, and the jury must find for the defenders.'

"The pursuers' counsel thereupon asked Lord Gifford to give the following direction viz.,—'That in order to the infringement of the said letters-patent it is not necessary that the defenders construct and use duplex depressers having a lateral action, as described in the second claim of the specification, but that it is sufficient if the defenders construct and use a mechanism in which the steps, as shewn in the specification and drawings are transferred from the depressers to the shuttle-box lever, if the jury are satisfied on the evidence that such mechanism is a mere modification of the mechanism referred to in the said claim, and described in the specification and drawings.'

"Which direction his Lordship gave.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted. (First exception).

"The counsel for the defenders then asked Lord Gifford to give the following directions to the jury, viz.:—

"'(1) That if the first claim be not for the parts of the mechanism therein mentioned, but only for a combination, the letters-patent are void, and the defenders are entitled to a verdict in respect that the specification and relative drawings describe the mechanism of a pattern motion and shuttle-box motion considered as a whole, without distinguishing the improvements made thereon by the patentees.'

"Which direction his Lordship refused to give in the terms asked, but with special reference to the direction he had already given.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted. (Second exception).

"'(2) That if the jury are satisfied in point of fact that any part or parts of the combination or arrangement embraced in the first claim were new in their application to pattern or shuttle-box mechanism at the date of the letters-patent the patent is void, and the defenders are entitled to a verdict in respect that the patentees have failed to distinguish between those parts which are new and those which are old.'

"Which direction his Lordship refused to give in the terms asked, but under the same reference to the direction he had already given.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted. (Third exception).

"'(6) That if the second claim be for a combination, and not for parts of the mechanism therein mentioned, the letters-patent are void, and the defenders are entitled to a verdict in respect that in the specification and drawings the patentees have described the combination as a whole, without distinguishing the improvements made thereon.'

"Which direction his Lordship refused to give as asked, but again explained to the jury the necessity of disclaiming essential parts of the mechanism not new.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted. (Seventh exception).

"'(7) That if the jury are satisfied in point of fact that any part or parts of the mechanism claimed in the second claim were new in their application to shuttle-box mechanism at the date of the patent the letters-patent are void, and the defenders are entitled to a verdict, in respect that the patentees have failed to distinguish between those parts which are new and those parts which are old.'

"Which direction his Lordship refused to give in the terms asked, but under the like explanation.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted. (Eighth exception).

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

"'(8) That if the jury are satisfied in point of fact that any part or parts of the mechanism claimed in the second claim were new in their application to shuttle-box mechanism at the date of the patent, the said claim must be limited to the particular combination in the particular manner described in the specification and drawings, in respect that the patentees have failed to distinguish between those parts which are old and those which are new.'

"Which direction his Lordship refused to give, under the like explanation.

"Whereupon counsel for the defenders excepted." (Ninth exception).

The respondents at the same time moved for a new trial.

It was arranged that counsel should be heard both on the rule and on the bill of exceptions at the same time.

Argued for the respondents, the Anderston Foundry Company;—(1) The patentee in his first claim claimed the construction of the parts and the arrangement of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism as therein distinguished. Now, that was not a claim for a combination.

[LORD PRESIDENT.—Can you be heard to argue that under your bill of exceptions? Lord Gifford's first ruling was not excepted to. If the ruling is good, and the jury did not attend to it, then you may be heard to object. If they did attend to it, whether it is good or bad, you can have nothing to say. But if the ruling is bad, and the jury disregarded it, can we open up the verdict without an exception having been taken?]

The respondents were entitled to shew that the ruling was bad, and that the jury disregarded it, and yet did not themselves put a proper construction upon the claim. Now, the ruling was bad, because this first claim was not for a combination; it was for the construction of the parts of a machine and for their arrangement. There was no hint of a new combination of parts, themselves either new or old, to form this machine. The Judge was therefore wrong in the ruling which he gave. But then the jury did not follow him. If they had followed him it was impossible for them, on the evidence, to hold that every "distinct, material, and essential" part of the patentee's alleged invention was new. Having then disregarded the ruling that was given, they had also failed to put the proper construction on the claim for themselves, namely, that this was a claim for the construction of the parts of a machine, and for their arrangement,—a claim, in fact, for a machine and its individual parts. Had they put that construction upon it, they could not, on the evidence, have arrived at the verdict at which they did. But (2) taking Lord Gifford's first ruling, that the first claim in the patent was for a mechanical combination, to be sound, then the law applicable to it was this—not that if any merely mechanical parts of the machine were old the patent was void, but that if any distinct features of the combination, not being mere mechanical parts, were not new in their application to such mechanism, then the patent was void. Such, it was understood, was the rule of law intended to be laid down by Lord Gifford.[1] Now, along with this first [1] Carpenter v. Smith, 1841, Webster's Patent Cases, 530; Haworth v. Hardcastle, 1834, Webster's Pat. Ca. 480; Templeton v. Macfarlanes, Feb. 23, 1848, 10 D. 796, 20 Scot. Jur. 263, and H. of L. June 27, 1848, 1 Clark and Fin. 595, 20 Scot. Jur. 518.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

ruling must be taken the second and third exceptions. These two propositions flowed directly from the obligation incumbent upon a patentee when he claimed the invention of a new combination, to make it clear what gave it its special virtue as a combination—what differentiated it from any other combination—what was essential to its usefulness and to its novelty—what was new and what was old in it—in order that the public might know what they could use without infringing his patent.[1] That recognised obligation upon the patentee led to the first and second rulings asked by the respondents, and contained in their second and third exceptions, as well as to the ruling actually given. They should have been added to give effect to it. They were not by any means the same thing. The ruling contained in the second exception was a pure statement of law. The ruling given by Lord Gifford and the ruling contained in the third exception followed from it, but assumed certain facts to have been proved. The respondents were therefore entitled to complain of the refusal to give these two rulings asked for by them. But (3) taking Lord Gifford's first ruling as sufficient by itself, the respondents were entitled to a verdict. The evidence was overwhelming to the effect that all the important parts of the machine had previously existed in one or other combination,—nay, had all previously existed in the same combination,—for the same end. The jury had therefore gone contrary to evidence in finding for the suspenders. The same might be said even more strongly on the second claim in the specification, and on Lord Gifford's second ruling with regard to it. Both the first and the second claims had been anticipated. (4) The suspenders had failed to prove infringement, and the jury had gone contrary to the evidence in finding for them on the issue of infringement.

Argued for the suspenders, William and Henry Harrison;—(1) The specification set out by disclosing the leading features of the invention. It was said to consist in new or improved and most efficient modes of actuating, and in arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of compound shuttle-boxes of looms,—the method and the means of carrying out the method to attain the desired result. The specification then proceeded to point out that there were two main parts of the patented mechanism, 1st, the shuttle-box moving mechanism, and second, the pattern mechanism. There then followed a detailed description of the minor parts of both main parts, and then the claims were stated. The first claim was for a combination of the parts composing these two main parts of the mechanism. The respondents had misread this claim. They had treated it as if it were a claim for the construction of the parts, and for the arrangement of the parts of the pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, as therein distinguished. But it was not so. It was truly for the construction of the pattern mechanism, &c. and for the arrangement of the parts of the pattern mechanism, &c. It did not claim any particular part of either combination, but it claimed each combination as a whole. "Construction" meant putting together, not formation,—the putting together by arranging the subordinate parts already described to form the two main parts or combinations. The second claim was a special claim for the combination of [1] Macfarlane v. Price, 1816, 1 Starkie, 199; Hill v. Thompson, 3 Merivale, 622, Webster's Pat. Ca. 235; see also dictum of Lord Eldon in this case, quoted in Crane v. Price, 1842, Webster's Pat. Ca. 409; Foxwell v. Bostock, 1864, 4 De Gex, Jones, and Smith, see Lord Westbury's opinion, at p. 309.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

parts forming the shuttle-box moving mechanism. The third claim in the same way was a special claim for the combination of parts forming the pattern mechanism; and the fourth claim was for a particular modification of the pattern mechanism. Now (2), founding on certain English cases, the most recent and important of which was Foxwell v. Bostock,[1] the respondents had contended that the patent, if for a combination, was bad on the very face of the specification, because it did not specially distinguish the novelty of the invention,—did not say wherein the combination differed from previous combinations. But admitting that it was in many cases necessary to differentiate, that did not prevent a claim to a combination as new, the component parts of which were old. Nor was it necessary to state pointedly that the claim was merely for the combination, and to disclaim the several subordinate parts. Here the arrangement was claimed as the novelty, and it was not necessary to say wherein that arrangement differed from other arrangements. Being a new and improved arrangement, it was claimed as an invention. The rule laid down by Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock was not an absolute rule applicable to every patent, but only to the kind of case he was dealing with. It had been so read in subsequent cases,[2] and was not inconsistent with the earlier cases, many of which were much more in point here.[3] The result of them all was that a patent was to be construed in accordance with what the specification disclosed. A patent was not therefore necessarily void for not stating that certain parts were new and certain parts old. It was quite possible to have a good claim, as here, for a new and improved combination or arrangement of parts, all of them old, provided it were shewn that they had never before been used in conjunction,—that there had never before been substantially the same arrangement or combination of them. (3) The respondents had failed on the evidence to shew that any substantially the same combination had been in prior public use. All they had succeeded in shewing was that the individual parts, or some of them, had been also parts of prior inventions. But that was not sufficient. (4) Infringement had been satisfactorily proved. The respondents' machine was just substantially a similar combination of similar parts, colourably varied here and there by the use of mechanical equivalents, so as to make it look to the eye of an unskilled person a different machine. (5) The only exceptions which were now pressed were the second and third. The Judge was right to withhold the first direction asked, on which refusal the second exception was taken, because it was putting to the jury a question which it was for the Judge to answer. It was putting to the jury to construe the specification and say whether it claimed the parts or the combination. The direction asked was simply to the effect that the specification was void in law. If that were so, it was for the Judge to withdraw the case from the jury, and not to give them directions. The second direction asked was merely a repetition of that which the Judge himself had already given, and so was rightly refused. The exceptions therefore should be disallowed, and the verdict should stand.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case was tried before Lord Gifford and a jury at the

[1] Vide supra, p. 864, note.

[2] Parkes v. Stevens, June 4, 1869, L. R. 8 Equit. Ca. 358, Nov. 12, 1869, L. R. 5 Chan. Ap. 36; Murray v. Clayton, May 6, 1872, L. R. 7 Chan. Ap. 570.

[3] Cornish v. Keene, Jan. 30, 1837, 3 Bing. N. C. 570; Lister v. Leather, Feb. 23, 1858, 8 El. and Black. 1004; Newton v. Grand Junction Ry. Co. May 4, 1850, 5 Welsby, Hurl., and Gordon, 331; Sellars v. Dickinson, May 4, 1850, 5 Welsby, Hurl., and Gordon, 312; Templeton v. Macfarlanes, supra, p. 863, note.

No. 147. July 2, 1875. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

sittings of the First Division after last winter session. Besides the pursuers' issue of infringement there were issues for the defenders bringing before the jury allegations of prior publication of the invention, of prior public use, and of inutility. The jury found for the pursuers on all the issues. The defenders have presented a bill of exceptions, and have also obtained a rule on the pursuers to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted on the ground of the verdict being against evidence. With the assent of both parties we appointed counsel to be heard on the bill of exceptions and the rule for a new trial at the same time; and although it is necessary to pronounce a separate interlocutor on each it will be convenient that we should give our opinions on both at once—discriminating, however, between the grounds of judgment applicable to the one and the other.

Among the various questions which have been argued before us, under the bill of exceptions and the rule taken together, that which naturally occurs as first in order is the inquiry, what is the subject-matter of the patent—wherein consists the novelty and merit of the patentees' invention?

The title of the patent, "Improvements in Looms for Weaving," is so general and vague as to afford no available information, and the same may be said of the first paragraph in the specification:—"Our said invention consists in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle-boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics, requiring two, three, or more shuttle-boxes and shuttles in each set." For, though this paragraph shews that "the actuating the set or sets of compound or multiple shuttle-boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics, requiring two, three, or more shuttle-boxes and shuttles in each set," is the matter with which the invention is concerned, this gives no information that is not afterwards more distinctly given, viz. that the parts of the power-loom to which the invention is applicable are (1) the shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, and (2) the pattern mechanism. The specification then proceeds to describe a complete shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, and a complete pattern mechanism; but in neither the one description nor the other is any part claimed or described as new, nor is any part disclaimed or characterised as old. The patentees, however, state that their improved shuttle-box mechanism may be used with old and unimproved pattern mechanism, and their improved pattern mechanism may be in like manner used with old and unimproved shuttle-box moving mechanism.

There being, therefore, no means from the introductory part of the specification, or from the detailed description to which I have referred, of discovering wherein the invention consists, or what is the novelty which the patentees claim, the reader is necessarily driven to the four different heads of the claim, to ascertain what is the new and useful invention which the patentees undertake and are bound to publish to the world by their specification, or, in other words, what it is that they desire to prohibit all the world but themselves from using without their license.

The first head of the claim is for "the construction"—(reads claim, quoted supra, p. 860).

This is not very clearly expressed, but I am prepared to give the patentees the fullest indulgence, and, indeed, to adopt what I understand to be their own interpretation. There is no claim for a combination of pattern mechanism and

No. 147.

July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

shuttle-box moving mechanism, for these are claimed "as herein distinguished," i.e., distinguished from one another. There is no statement that any part or parts of either mechanism are new, or that any part or parts are old or disclaimed. There is no statement that the combination of specified parts of either mechanism is new. The claim is simply for the construction of the pattern mechanism, and the arrangement of its parts in the new and improved manner described in the specification and shewn in the accompanying drawings, and for the construction of the shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, and the arrangement of its parts in the new and improved manner described in the specification and shewn in the accompanying drawings. Now, each of these mechanisms is described in the specification and shewn in the drawings as a whole, and thus the claim is in effect for the two entire machines, without even an attempt to state in what the novelty of either the one or the other consists.

The pursuers contend that this is a claim for a combination of old things, the combination alone being new, and that such a combination is in law a good subject-matter of a patent. No doubt a new combination of old parts to produce a new result, or produce a known result in a more useful and beneficial way, may be a good subject-matter, but only under the conditions that the combination shall be claimed as a combination, and be so described as to shew intelligibly what is the novelty and what the merit of the invention, so that all the world may have the benefit of the publication, and so that every one may know what he is to avoid as patented in dealing with such mechanism. In this respect the first head of the claim clearly fails. There is no discovery or explanation of the novelty. On the contrary, the claim is simply in each case for the whole machine, as shewn in the drawings and described in the specification.

The patent is therefore, in my opinion, void in law, in respect of its claiming too much; for the vice under which the first head of the claim thus labours is, on well known principles of patent law, sufficient to void the whole.

The defence founded on this legal objection to the patent could not have been disposed of before trial, because there is so much technical language employed in the specification that the Court could not safely apply their minds to its construction without the evidence of experts to explain that technical language, or without some knowledge of the mechanism of power-looms. But the objection that the patent is bad in law is always open at the trial as an answer to the pursuers' issue of infringement, and the Judge at the trial, if he is satisfied, on the true construction of the specification, that the patent is bad in law, ought to state his opinion in law to that effect to the jury, and direct them to find a verdict for the defenders. Lord Gifford did not follow this course in the present case, and that leads me to consider, in the next place, what are the questions raised by the bill of exceptions.

The first, second, and third directions given by his Lordship are not excepted to by the defenders, and are sound, on the assumption that the patent is not on the face of it void in law. Neither, on the same assumption, does there appear to me to be any serious objection to the direction challenged by the defenders' first objection.

The other exceptions taken by the defenders are entirely against the refusal of the presiding Judge to give the jury certain directions demanded by the defenders themselves. I am of opinion that not one of the propositions which Lord Gifford was asked to adopt and state to the jury as a direction in law was calculated to instruct the jury, or lead them to a right result. On the contrary,

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

it appears to me that the effect of them would have been misleading. The defenders nowhere ask his Lordship to tell the jury that the patent is void in law, and that they must find a verdict for the defenders. If they had done so, either his Lordship would have complied with their request, or if he refused, they would have had an exception which I should have been prepared to sustain. But being of opinion that the patent is void in law, I find it impossible to sustain any of the negative exceptions, for that would be in effect deciding that at the next trial the presiding Judge ought to direct the jury in terms of one or more of the directions which Lord Gifford refused to give. This is of course out of the question, if I be right in holding that the only proper direction to be given is that the patent is void in law, and that on that ground there must be a verdict for the defenders.

For these reasons, I am for disallowing the exceptions.

But it becomes necessary also to consider the case as presented to us on the evidence under the rule for a new trial, for it is only by this means, so far as I can see, that the defenders can obtain the remedy of a new trial, which, in consequence of the way in which they dealt with the law at the last trial, is the only remedy open to them.

In dealing with this branch of the case, it must be assumed that the patent is not void in law on the mere construction of the specification, or, in other words, the specification must be read as if the first head of the claim were not there at all, and as if the entire claim were to be found in the second, third, and fourth heads of the specification.

The second head of the claim relates to the improved shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, the use of which by the defenders constitutes the alleged infringement of the patent.

This head of the claim is not liable to any legal objection on the mere construction of the specification, if what is claimed be new, and the invention of the patentees. It is a claim for "the construction and use of duplex depressers for actuating a lever connected to the shuttle-box of a power-loom, so as to shift and set or bring these to rest by a positive motion taken or derived from one of its main shafts, whether the lateral acting position of the depressers is determined by simply bringing it to rest on the pattern pins in the improved manner herein distinguished, or by the 'positive' motion of the pins in turning the barrel, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described, and shewn in the accompanying drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

This claim comprehends (1) the use of duplex depressers,—or, as they are called elsewhere in the specification, pressers,—for of course it would not substantially alter the machine to turn it upside down, seeing that the motion of these pressers is positive, and not depending at all on gravitation; (2) the pressers also must act together, or, as the witnesses well express it, in partnership; (3) they are used for actuating a lever connected with the shuttle-box of a power-loom; (4) the effect of their joint action is to "shift and set,"—that is to say, when one of the pressers has pressed one arm of the lever, so as to shift the shuttle-box connected with it, the other presser, in the moment that the shifting motion is complete, meets the other arm of the lever and stops it, so as to make the shuttle-box in its new position perfectly steady; (5) this joint action of the pressers in shifting and setting is produced by two separate motions, one a positive motion, derived from one of the main shafts, and the other a motion derived from the pattern mechanism.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

Is this, then, a novel mechanism for the purpose of shifting and setting the shuttle-box of a power-loom? The answer on the evidence, I think, must be that none of the parts of what is described in this second head of the claim is new, nor is the combination of them new.

It appears to me that the specification of Hirst and Hollingworth's patent, filed 11th September 1861, seven years before the date of the pursuers' patent, discloses and describes substantially the same thing that is here claimed. They have got duplex pressers acting upwards instead of downwards (an immaterial variation, for the reason already stated), acting in partnership, for actuating the lever connected with the shuttle-box—acting so as to shift and set (the only difference being, that instead of steps on the pressers there are studs on the lever), their joint action being produced by two separate motions, one a positive motion derived from one of the main shafts, and the other derived from the pattern mechanism. It would be idle in giving judgment on a question of this kind to examine the precise words of Hirst and Hollingworth's specification. The nature of their invention is best seen in the model No. 64, which demonstrates to my mind the substantial identity of the two machines. Upon the evidence bearing on this patent of Hirst and Hollingworth I think the jury ought to have returned a verdict for the defenders on the first issue for the defenders, and their verdict, in so far as it finds for the pursuers on that issue is against the whole weight of the evidence.

Again, in the year 1862, Thomas Knowles and others obtained a patent for certain "improvements in looms for weaving," the specification of which is said to contain a description of an invention which is an anticipation of the pursuers'. This I am not prepared to affirm, though the two inventions or alleged inventions come very near one another. But this Thomas Knowles is proved to have manufactured and sold 100 machines according to the model No. 66 of process some years before the date of the pursuers' patent. Now, this model No. 66 is said to differ materially from the description in Knowles' specification. But if machines made according to model 66 were made and sold before the date of the pursuers' patent, and are substantially identical in principle and construction with the pursuers' machine, as described in the second head of the claim, then that will be in law prior use of the patent invention sufficient to invalidate the crown grant. The fact of the manufacture and sale and use of machines conform to model 66 being clearly proved, the only remaining question is whether they are substantially identical with the pursuers' shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism.

The skilled witnesses for the defenders are all clear in the affirmative, and even some of the witnesses for the pursuers are generally unable to resist the same conclusion. Mr Collier, the leading expert examined by the pursuers, while anxious to shew that model 66 differs in essential particulars from Knowles' specification, admits that "the model is in accordance with the pursuers' patent." And, again, he says "in a machine the model would be an infringement of the pursuers' patent." And, again, "this model, No. 66, is within the principle of the pursuers' patent."

Independently of this evidence, a comparison of the model 66 with the pursuers' machine 59 is quite enough to enable the Court to pronounce that the two are substantially identical.

There is thus, in my opinion, clear evidence of prior use of the patent invention, and the consequence must be that the verdict of the jury, in so far as it finds for the pursuers on the defenders' second issue, is against the evidence.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

It is a matter of course that if the verdict of the jury ought to have been for the defenders on the defenders' first and second issues (the issues of prior published invention and prior use), then the verdict ought to have been for the defenders on the pursuers' issue of infringement also, for there can be no infringement of patent right where the patent is invalid for want of novelty.

The result is, that the rule for a new trial must be made absolute.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In this very complicated and important case we have before us a bill of exceptions, and we have also a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict for the pursuers was against evidence. The verdict was by a majority of the jury, and it cannot be questioned that the evidence on which they pronounced their verdict was, as regards the facts, and more especially as regards the skilled testimony, conflicting. In judging of the evidence we must bear in mind the legal principles applicable to the facts.

The patent founded on by the pursuers is supported on its specification without any amendment. There have been no disclaimers, and it must be construed as it stands. The construction of the specification, as distinguished from its sufficiency when construed, is for the Court. We must read and construe it fairly, not with severity of criticism against the claimant—quite the contrary,—but with firm enforcement of the requirements of clear and honest disclosure.

So construing this specification, I cannot read the first claim as a claim for the invention of a combination only. There might be such a claim, but we have it not here. It is possible to claim as an invention an entirely new combination of parts not in themselves new; and in such a case, the improvement by new combination being clearly explained, the want of novelty in some of the parts, or even in all the parts, will not make void the patent, since it is only taken for new combination. But in such a case, where the combination alone is claimed, it is, in my opinion, the duty of the claimant to state plainly in his specification that he does claim no more than the combination as his invention. He must make it manifest that he claims as new—as original, as the subject of his patent—a combination only, so as to exclude and disclaim the parts—the materials or elements of the combination. I do not mean that the word "only" or "exclusively" must be used; there are no voces signatæ which must be always employed. But the plain meaning and scope of the claim must be clearly brought out. This is well explained by Lord President Colonsay in the case of Morton v. Middleton, 20th March 1863,[1] and is recognised as law in several other decisions. The specification before us I have found it impossible on fair construction so to read as to arrive at any other conclusion than that there is here no claim for the invention of a new combination exclusive of novelty in the parts combined. In arriving at this conclusion I use no subtlety or severity of criticism. I take the words in their plain meaning. It is the duty of the claimant to bring out clearly the nature of his improvement and the limits of his alleged invention; and, reading this specification with reference to that plain duty resting on the claimant, I am convinced that this is not a claim for a combination only—in other words, that the parts or materials of combination are not disclaimed or excluded from the claim of invention. The machine is claimed in whole as a new invention. No part is excepted from the

[1] 1 Macph. 718, 35 Scot. Jur. 542.

No. 147.

July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

claim of the specification, and the particular nature of the improvement said to be new is not explained.

If this be the true reading of the specification, then I am of opinion that, in the event of its being admitted or ascertained that the parts or materials of combination are not new, the patent is not valid. There is no disclaimer. No distinction is taken between the new and the old parts of the machine. No one part is, in this claim, set forth as novel, while others are old. If, therefore, this is not a claim for combination only, it must be a claim for the invention or new application of all the parts constituting in combination the machine claimed.

In point of law I think it is well settled, both in England and in Scotland, that where, in a claim not limited to combination only, there is no distinction stated discriminating between the parts of the machine claimed as new and the parts of the machine recognised as old, then the patent is void, if any substantial part of that machine is old, and is not excepted or disclaimed. It is not necessary for me to refer again to the authorities on the subject, which are most instructive and satisfactory. Your Lordship has already explained them, and the decision of Lord Chancellor Westbury in the case of Foxwell v. Bostock, in 1864, is, in my opinion, conclusive on this part of the case. (Reads from vol. iv. De Gex, Jones, and Smith, p. 311.) In Scotland the case of Templeton, though the circumstances are different, is, as regards the principle of construction and of decision, to the same effect.

Taking this view of the specification and of the first claim I am of opinion that the patent founded on by the pursuers cannot be enforced.

But the motion for new trial is before us, and I am further of opinion, in regard to the second claim, that the verdict of the jury on the first and second issues for the defenders, on which the verdict is for the pursuers of the action, is contrary to the evidence.

I think that on this evidence the pursuers were not the true inventors. The invention was anticipated and made public by the specification and patent of Messrs Hirst and Hollingworth in 1861. It appears to me that a careful comparison of the two machines, viz., the pursuers' machine constructed from their specification, and the machine constructed from the specification of Hirst and Hollingworth, must be made, and I think the comparison leads to the result—at least it has led me to the result—that they are truly the same—the same in the very particulars which are set forth as giving originality.

I do not think that any sufficient grounds for distinguishing between them have been supported either by evidence or by argument. Everything set forth in the second claim in the pursuers' specification is to be found in the machine constructed from the specification of Hirst and Hollingworth. It is, however, said that the invention of Hirst and Hollingworth was not used, probably in consequence of other machines of superior manufacture having been brought into the market or into competition. But the specification explains the invention of Hirst and Hollingworth, and, when followed by letters-patent, was a proclamation of the invention; and we are not now considering a plea of prior public use, but of anticipation and publication. I think it impossible to dispute that the specification by Hirst and Hollingworth afforded the information required for constructing the machine, which is the very counterpart of that which is claimed by the pursuers as their original invention. We have thus on the evidence before us proof of anticipation and prior publication, which ought to have satisfied the jury, and that is quite sufficient to sustain the objection taken to the enforcement of the pursuers' patent. In negativing the first issue for the defenders I am accordingly of opinion that the verdict of the jury is contrary to evidence.

No. 147.

July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

In like manner, I am of opinion that the machine patented by Knowles in 1862 is also so entirely identical with the pursuers' machine, that, if publicly used, that prior public use is a fatal objection to the validity of the pursuers' patent.

I do not think that on the evidence before us there is any reasonable doubt that Knowles' patent machine is in substance and in action the same as the pursuers'. I think it possesses all the peculiar properties and forces and applications of power which are set forth in the pursuers' specification, and which we see in the pursuers' patent machine.

I have read all the evidence with great care, and have come to the conclusion that in Knowles' machine, as in No. 66, we have "duplex pressers or depressers" for actuating a lever connected to the shuttle-box of a power-loom, so as to shift and set them by a positive motion taken from one of the main shafts. We have the steps under the government of the pattern mechanism, and we have the position of the depressers determined by bringing them to rest on the pattern pin. In these particulars the invention, and the machine of Knowles, machine No. 66, corresponds almost exactly with that of the pursuers, any varieties which appear being merely modifications or equivalents. The invention is really the same; the machine is substantially the same.

Now, there is no doubt that Knowles' machine was publicly used. It was sold for use, and put to use, and that is enough; for it is quite settled law that public use does not mean use by the public, but means use in public, as distinguished from use in secrecy. It is open use, not hidden use.

On this second issue for the defenders I also think that the verdict of the jury for the pursuers of the action is contrary to evidence.

I need not enter on the question of proof of infringement, on which, if it stood alone, there might be difficulty. If the patent is invalid, and if the pursuers are not the true inventors, and if there has been prior use, that is sufficient.

Although I have expressed my opinion that the patent of the pursuers is exposed to fatal objection in consequence of defective and misleading specification, yet I agree with your Lordships that the particular exceptions here taken to the directions of the Judge who tried the cause do not satisfactorily bring out the nature of this objection. None of the exceptions correctly or adequately present the point of law on which the invalidity of the patent rests. It is therefore sufficient for us, having indicated our opinion on the patent for the guidance of the parties, to set aside this verdict as contrary to evidence.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordships on both the important questions raised in this case, and I have only to add, that, after repeated perusal of the pursuers' specification, I have been unable to find in it any sufficient disclosure of the nature of the invention. There is no distinct description or statement of what the improved invention is, separate from the description of the manner in which the machine claimed, and its component parts, are to be put together. And although that description may be sufficient to enable a workman of ordinary skill to practise the invention so as to effect the contemplated result, the specification is, I think, altogether insufficient as a compliance with another important legal requisite of a patent—viz., that it should shew persons who read the specification what part of the mechanism they may adopt and what they must avoid adopting, if they would not infringe the patent. Now, in this latter respect the patent here in question is, in my opinion, defective, and therefore void in law; for it does not indicate where the improvement lies, or in what it consists, and is therefore open to the serious objections which are so clearly and forcibly explained by Lord Westbury in deciding the case of Foxwell v. Bostock, referred to in the argument. The patent is for an improved piece of mechanism, or an improved combination and arrangement of machinery; and the specification and relative drawings exhibit and describe the entire machine which embodies the improvement. But this description, to use the words of Lord Westbury, "does not distinguish the improvement, and thereby renders it undiscoverable, except upon a minute comparison and collation of all existing combinations, with the new combination that is claimed; and a specification so framed is, I think, bad in law, for it has the effect of concealing rather than disclosing the nature of the invention."

As regards the motion for a new trial, I agree with your Lordship that the verdict is wrong as to both the first and second issues for the defenders; for the patent and relative specification of Hirst and Hollingworth appear to me to be substantially an anticipation of the pursuers' claim, while the evidence is conclusive as to the public prior use of a machine professing to be made after the model of Knowles' specification, which the pursuers' leading witness, Mr Collier, says "is just the pursuers' patent, in regard to raising and stopping at equidistant points. In a machine the model would be an infringement of the pursuers' patent." And there is other evidence to the same effect.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur in the opinion which has been delivered by your Lordship, and in the judgment proposed. I would content myself with a silent concurrence were it not that I happened to be the Judge before whom the case was tried; and it may not be unsuitable that I should make one or two observations on the points now before us, and give some explanations as to the course which the case took at the trial.

Though the case is very complicated and difficult in detail, and although at the trial a great many questions were raised and submitted to the jury, we are now relieved of many of these questions, and of the difficulties connected therewith. Questions of great nicety and difficulty, however, are still left, and on these we have had the benefit of a very full and a very able argument. I think that there are now before us substantially but two points,—the first, a simple question of law—simple, however, not in any degree in the sense of being easy, but only in respect that it is unmixed with disputed facts; the second, a pure question of fact.

The first question is, whether the patent is or is not invalid in point of law?

The second question is, whether the verdict is against evidence?

As to the first question, it appears to me that the validity of this patent, in point of law, turns entirely on the first claim in the specification. Had that first claim not been stated I think there would have been no valid legal objection to the other claims,—I mean no valid legal objection to these claims as stated, and apart altogether from questions of previous use or previous publication of the invention claimed. It is the first claim which endangers the whole specification. And the objection arises in this way, that the patentees have not in that first claim, or in any part of their specification, complied with the conditions on which alone they are entitled to protection. The absolute and indispensible condition of the patent and monopoly claimed by the patentees is that they must disclose the nature of their invention, and the manner in which it is to be performed. While they have done the latter with great minuteness they have failed in their first claim, or anywhere else, to state what their invention is; for I am not able to find in any other part of the specification a satisfactory account of what the invention truly is, or of the elements or parts in which the invention of the patentees truly consists.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

It is only another way of stating this objection to say that the patentees have failed to distinguish in their specification what is new and what is old in the mechanism described—have failed to point out what parts of the mechanism are claimed as new, and the parts which, though equally described in the detailed description, are yet admittedly not new, but have long been in use. The patentees must disclose this in order that the public may know what it is they are prohibited from using. If they fail to disclose this distinctly and intelligibly the law most justly denies them the monopoly which it otherwise confers. Hard words were used at the trial as to the conduct of the defenders here. They were said to have pirated the patentees' invention, and to have robbed them, or rather their assignees, of its fruits. But it must not be forgotten that there may occur a piracy in a patentee's own specification quite as bad as any committed against him. If he claims more than he has invented—if he claims as his own what was known before, and what was not his but was the property of the public or of a prior patentee, then he himself becomes the pirate, and takes or attempts to take a monopoly of what really was the common property of the public.

The question in law is, then, have the patentees sufficiently described what their invention truly is. The specification first describes, in great detail and with great minuteness, the whole of the shuttle-box shifting mechanism, and then at the end they proceed to state specifically what they claim in what are known as the claiming clauses of the specification. As introductory to the claims or claiming clauses in this specification the patentees say,—"Having thus particularly described the nature of our said invention, and the manner in which the same is or may be performed, we have to state that we do not restrict ourselves to the precise details herein described or delineated, but what we believe to be novel and original, and therefore claim as the invention secured to us," is "first, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism as herein distinguished, generally for actuating the shuttle-boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described." Now, this is simply a claim for the whole machine, and I think it follows, from what has been already said, that the only hope of a patentee who makes such a claim as this is to shew that the whole machine and every part and feature of it is new. I can imagine that he might succeed in the case of the first machine introduced to effect an entirely new object, as was the sewing-machine when first invented. The inventor of the first sewing-machine might very well say, "I claim the whole machine as new; not the parts of it, wheels, rods, and levers, but the machine itself. There never was a sewing-machine before; it is all new, and it does what was never done before." This might well be quite valid and effectual, but it is different when a man comes to claim a patent avowedly for an improvement upon a constituent part of a well known machine—for an improvement, in fact, in mere mechanism. In such a case the patentee must tell wherein the improvement consists, for the improvement is the invention and not the whole machine.

No. 147.

July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v.
Anderston
Foundry Co.

Now, the patentees here have not only failed to tell the public what they truly claim as their invention, but they have even failed to tell the jury at the trial, or the Court during the recent argument, what the really novel features of their invention are. They have called witnesses to speak to this question, but each one points to something different from the other. What is this but just trying to do by means of the testimony of skilled witnesses what they ought to have done in their specification. They should have said what they claimed and what they disclaimed, and then we should have been able to determine whether their disclaimer was sufficient, and whether their claim was good. But instead of that they claim the whole, and take their chance of a jury holding that there were really novelties in the machine. Some of the jury might hold that one thing was new, and some that another thing was new,—but yet they would unite in finding for the pursuers. But this will not do. The patentees themselves must tell what is new, and if they claim too much the patent goes. Any other rule would be contrary to the spirit of that law, the protection of which the pursuers seek, and contrary to the equitable right of the public.

This is still more strongly brought out by the second claim, for after claiming the whole machine they claim four or five separate features of it. If I could have read the statement in the second claim as a departure from the first claim, if I could hold the second as a disclaimer of the first claim, as if the patentees had said we do not claim the machine generally, but only the following features of it, then this might do. But I cannot so read the claim. The first claim is not a disclaimer, it is a primary and substantive claim, and if it is bad it will destroy the whole patent. Now, the observations of the Judges in several of the English cases seem to me very applicable here. They are to the effect that wherever the machine is old, and the claim truly for improvements in mechanism, the claim must not be made by describing the whole machine, but by specifying what the improvements are. As Lord Westbury says, it is the improvement that is the novelty, and unless we can find what the improvement is we cannot sustain a patent simply for an improved manufacture.

Here, then, the whole machine being described and claimed, whereas it is sought in evidence to make the invention consist merely in certain features of the machine as described, the patent must, I think, be held bad in law.

This would be sufficient for the determination of the case, but I wish to add some explanation as to the course which the case took at the trial, and of my reason for leaving the case to the jury.

At the close of the pursuers' evidence, and when it was apparent that the validity of the patent in point of law was open to serious question, I expected, or half expected, that this question of law, clearly rising on the pursuers' own case, would in some form or other be raised by the defenders. I half expected that the defenders would move me to hold the patent bad in law, and direct the jury to find for the defenders. And I should have been glad to have had a discussion on that point before the case proceeded farther. But no such motion was made, and having perfect confidence in the ability and discretion of the counsel who had charge of the defenders' case, and at the same time feeling great distrust of my own judgment on a question of difficulty not raised and not argued by the parties, I did not think it my duty ex proprio motu to take and sustain an objection which was not raised by the defenders themselves. The result would have been most serious if I had done otherwise and been found to be wrong by this Court. The whole trial would have been abortive, and the whole expense of it would have been lost. By that time the expense of the trial and of the defenders' witnesses had substantially been incurred, and I thought that any pure legal question as to the validity of the patent would not be injured, but might be better brought out by the whole evidence being exhausted. I therefore thought it the safest plan to allow the trial to proceed. Besides, I thought I saw a legitimate object which the defenders had in withholding this objection, and which I shall mention immediately.

No. 147.
July 2, 1875.
Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co.

The case was then concluded in the ordinary way, and each party claimed a verdict from the jury, and still no hint was given of any objection to the patent as bad in law, apart from the counter issues of want of novelty and want of utility on which a verdict was asked. I then charged the jury, and only then arose for the first time a series of questions of law, raised by both parties, on the form of directions which I was asked to give to the jury. But even then no direct motion was made to withdraw the case from the jury altogether. Instead of that I was asked by the defenders to give a number of directions which I refused to give, and which form the subject of the bill of exceptions now to be disposed of by the Court. In reference to these directions I have not altered my opinion in the least. I should again refuse them were I to preside at a new trial.

Now, I may say I am even glad that the defenders took the course they did, because it will, I think, conclude the case once for all. The reason which the defenders had for allowing the trial to proceed, or one of their reasons, I presume, was that they felt they had such a very strong case on prior disclosure and prior use that they wished a verdict upon their counter issues, and that of course they could not obtain if the case were withdrawn from the jury altogether. Still farther, if the defenders had taken their objections to the validity of the first claim and I had sustained it, and if the Court had affirmed my judgment, then the pursuers might simply have proceeded to enter a disclaimer, and to lop down their specification and claims to proper dimensions. We should then have had, or might have had, a fresh accusation of infringement and a fresh trial. But as the case has been conducted, we have had it fully tried on the counter issues, and while we find the patent bad in law, we are also of opinion that, even if it is not bad in law, the verdict is contrary to evidence in point of fact, and there is no encouragement to the patentees to disclaim, because, unless they have very different evidence to submit from that laid before the jury, they must fail on the question of fact of prior disclosure and prior use. I also venture to think that even the legal question of the validity of the patent has had beneficial light thrown upon it by the defenders' evidence. I should have been sorry, even on the legal question, to have been without the assistance afforded by the evidence of Mr Bramwell and the other witnesses for the defenders. On this ground also, I am glad that the case proceeded before the jury, and that I did not withdraw it altogether at the close of the pursuers' case.

THESE interlocutors were pronounced :—

"Disallow the exceptions, and find no expenses due in the discussion thereon."

"Having heard the counsel for the parties on the rule granted to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted, make the rule absolute, set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial, reserving the expenses of the trial."

HAMILTON, KINNEAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

ANGUS MACKINTOSH, Pursuer.—Fraser—Campbell Smith.
THOMAS GRAHAM WEIR, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

No. 148.

July 3, 1875.
Mackintosh v. Weir.

Reparation—Res Judicata—Lunatic.—A person who had been confined in a lunatic asylum raised an action of damages against, inter alios, the medical men who granted the certificate on which the warrant for his confinement proceeded. Upon an issue "whether . . . the defenders did wrongfully and without due inquiry and examination grant the certificate, . . . the pursuer not being then insane, nor in such a state of mental derangement as to require confinement in a lunatic asylum, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer," the jury found that the pursuer was insane at the date in question, and that he was justifiably sent to and confined in an asylum. The verdict was applied, and the defenders assoilzied.

The pursuer subsequently raised an action against one of the medical men, founded on the granting of the certificate, and concluding for damages for slander. Held that the action was excluded exceptione rei judicatæ, in respect that the pursuer was attempting to try over again the question which had been decided in the former action, viz., whether or not the certificate was justifiably granted, and that the general claim of damages made and decided upon in the former action included a claim for reparation for injury to character concluded for in the present action.

Penalty—Lunatic—Statute 55 Geo. III., c. 69, secs. 8 and 19.—The statutory penalty of £50, to which a medical man is liable who grants a certificate of lunacy without due inquiry, cannot be sued for by the injured party.

Slander—Witness—Privilege.—In an action against a medical man for alleged wrongful granting of a certificate that the pursuer was insane the defender was examined as a witness for the pursuer. Held that the privilege of a witness under such circumstances was absolute, and that an action of damages for slander, founded on what the defender stated in evidence, could not be made relevant by any allegation of malice.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

IN June 1852 a petition was presented to the Sheriff of Midlothian for warrant to remove Mr Angus Mackintosh of Holme to Saughtonhall Lunatic Asylum, with a relative certificate signed by George Glover, surgeon, and Thomas Graham Weir, M.D., by which they declared, on soul and conscience, "that from our own personal observation, and from the report of credible witnesses, we believe the foresaid Angus Mackintosh of Holme to be in such a state of mental derangement as to require confinement in an asylum."

The Sheriff having granted warrant as craved Mr Mackintosh was removed to Saughtonhall Asylum and confined therein.

In 1858 Mr Mackintosh brought an action of damages against Mr Hugh Fraser, W.S., the agent who prepared the petition, and also against Mr Glover and Dr Weir, concluding for £10,000 as damages and solatium for having been confined as a lunatic, he being then sane.

The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury in July 1859, the issue directed against the medical men being as follows:—"Whether, on or about the 12th day of June 1852 the defenders, George Glover and Thomas Graham Weir, did wrongfully and without due inquiry and examination grant the certificate of which No. 29 of process is a copy, the pursuer not being then insane, nor in such a state of mental derangement as to require confinement in a lunatic asylum, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The jury returned a unanimous verdict that the pursuer was insane on the morning of 12th June 1852, and that he was justifiably sent to and detained and confined in Saughtonhall Asylum, and therefore unanimously found for the defenders.

The pursuer moved for a new trial, which was refused.[1] The verdict was applied, and the defenders assoilzied on 27th January 1860.

[1] Mackintosh v. Fraser and Others, Jan. 20, 1860, 22 D. 421, 32 Scot. Jur. 187.

No. 148.

July 8, 1875. Mackintosh v. Weir.

An appeal by the pursuer to the House of Lords against these interlocutors was dismissed.[1]

On 27th January 1875 the present action was raised by Mr Mackintosh against Dr Weir.

The conclusions of the summons were for declarator,—"First, that a medical certificate or other writing was signed, on or about the 12th day of June 1852, by the defender, and George Glover, surgeon, which asserted or stated that from the defender's own personal observation, and from the report of credible witnesses, he believed the pursuer to be in such a state of mental derangement as to require confinement in an asylum, and which imported or implied that acts done or committed by the pursuer had been personally observed by the defender, or that alleged facts had been reported to him on credible testimony which afforded reasonable and probable cause for believing the pursuer to be a furious or fatuous person, or lunatic, and a person proper to be incarcerated in a madhouse under the provisions of the Acts 55th George the Third, chapter 69, 9th George the Fourth, chapter 34, and 4th and 5th Victoria, chapter 60; secondly, That no such acts or alleged facts as aforesaid had ever been observed by, or reported to the defender; and, thirdly, that, therefore, the said medical certificate was and is false and slanderous;" and, further, for "payment to the pursuer of the sum of £20,000 sterling in name of damages and as a solatium for slander in the premises, as also to make payment in such manner as the Court may direct of a penalty of £50 sterling, and the expenses of recovering the same, in terms of the said Act 55th George Third, chapter 69."[2]

In his condescendence the pursuer founded his claim of damages for slander (1) upon the granting of the certificate of insanity; (2) upon statements made falsely, calumniously, and maliciously by the defender in July 1859 when examined as a witness in the trial of the action at the instance of the pursuer against Mr Fraser, Mr Glover, and the present defender (Cond. 5.); (3) upon statements made falsely, calumniously, and maliciously by the defender when examined as a witness in the trial of an action at the instance of the pursuer against Drs Smith and Lowe, the keepers of Saughtonhall Asylum (Cond. 6).[3]

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—3. The defender having contravened the Act 55 George III., cap. 69, ought to be ordained to make payment of the penalty therein provided, with expenses. 4. Although the procurator-fiscal is entitled and required to sue for said penalty, this does not exclude on his failure the title to sue of the pursuer; the penalty

[1] Mackintosh v. Fraser and Others, April 20, 1863, 1 Macph., H. L. 37, 35 Scot. Jur. 457.

[2] 55 Geo. III. c. 69, sec. 8,—"If any medical person shall sign or give any . . . certificate or report, without having carefully visited and examined the person to whom it relates, and without having endeavoured to ascertain in a proper manner, by such examination and otherwise, that such person is a furious or fatuous person or lunatic, and proper to be confined in a house for the reception of such persons, every such medical person shall forfeit and pay for such offence or neglect the sum of £50, and the expenses of recovering the same."

Sec. 19 enacts, "That it shall and may be lawful for the procurator-fiscal of every county or stewardry where any house for the reception and the care or confinement of furious or fatuous persons or lunatics is situated, and he is hereby required to enforce the due execution of this Act, and to sue for and recover all penalties or forfeitures granted by this Act, by action or complaint before the Court of Session, or the Sheriff or Steward's Court: Provided always that such action or complaint shall be brought within twelve calendar months after the offence shall have been committed, or the penalty incurred."

[3] See Mackintosh v. Smith and Lowe, June 22, 1864, 2 Macph. 1261, 36 Scot. Jur. 631, aff. March 9, 1865, 3 Macph., H. L. 6, 37 Scot. Jur. 318.

No. 148.

July 8, 1875.
Mackintosh v. Weir.

for the wrongful act is absolutely imposed, and any one having a substantial interest may sue for its imposition and recovery, and the limitation of the period of suing is applicable merely to the procurator-fiscal. 5. The plea of res judicata is not maintainable as a defence against any of the conclusions of the present action, because these conclusions have not been embraced in any previous action; separatim, it is not maintainable, in respect that the present action concludes for the infliction of the statutory penalty, which has never been sued for in any Court.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—1. The action is excluded exceptione rei judicatæ, at least it is so excluded, in so far as founded upon the defender's granting the said certificate. 2. The pursuer's statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. 3. In so far as directed to recover the statutory penalty sued for, the action cannot be maintained, in respect that (1) the pursuer has no title to sue for the said penalty, and (2) the time limited for suing for the same has long ago expired.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th May 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, and more especially on the first, second, and third pleas in law for the defender, and considered the debate, productions, and whole process, Finds, in the first place, that the pursuer has no title to sue for the statutory penalty of £50 concluded for in the summons; and, separatim, that the time within which the said penalty could competently be sued for has long ago expired: Finds, in the second place, that the action, in so far as it is founded on, as well as in so far as it concludes for reparation for injury alleged to have been sustained by the granting of the certificate, which is the subject-matter of the first, second, and third conclusions of the summons, is excluded exceptione rei judicatæ: And finds, in the third place, that the conclusion for damages, in so far as founded (1) on the evidence given by the defender at the trial referred to in article V. of the condescendence, and (2) on the evidence given by the defender at the trial referred to in article VI. of the condescendence, is not supported by statements relevant and sufficient to sustain said conclusion: Therefore sustains the third plea in law, and also, to the extent foresaid, sustains the first and second pleas in law for the defender: Dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—. . . . . The sufficiency of the grounds of action has been argued with great earnestness and ability, but in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary that argument was inconclusive, and the action, therefore, has been at once dismissed.

"Three things are complained of by the pursuer. The first is the granting of the certificate referred to in the three first conclusions of the summons. The second is the evidence given by the defender, referred to in article 5 of the condescendence, and the third is the evidence given by the defender at the trial referred to in article 6 of the condescendence. The first of these things, it is necessary to add, is on the present occasion made the subject of a double claim. What is first claimed is a statutory penalty of £50, and there is next claimed a portion of the £20,000 of damages 'in the premises,' concluded for in the present action.

"(1) As to the statutory penalty, the Lord Ordinary considers that the case is quite free from difficulty. The statute referred to (54 Geo. III., c. 69) authorises the penalty to be sued for by the procurator-fiscal, but confers no title on the person said to have been wronged or on any private party. The rule that, in such circumstances, the pursuer or prosecutor designated by the statute has the only instance, is, as the Lord Ordinary understands, firmly fixed. The imposition of the penalty, the provisions for its recovery, the use for which it is to be applied, and the time within which the suit must be brought, are all the creatures of the statute. Everything must be carried out in the way enacted. Common law rules or considerations of expediency need not be

No. 148. The pursuer reclaimed.

July 3, 1875. Mackintosh v. Weir.

Argued for the pursuer;—The plea of res judicata was not applicable, the former action being laid upon personal injury, and the present on appealed to as reasons for supplying something which has not been provided, because the statute is the only code, and gives no warrant for any procedure not sanctioned by its enactments. The circumstances (1) that the procurator-fiscal is the only party authorised to sue, and (2) that the penalty when recovered is to fall into the rogue money of the county, the Lord Ordinary thinks, conclusively shew that the penalty in question cannot be sued for by the pursuer. It is hardly necessary to say anything as to the effect of the lapse of time upon the title to sue asserted by the pursuer. He admits that had the present action been raised by the procurator-fiscal it must have been thrown out as too late, the statute providing that the penalty in question could not be recovered unless sued for within a year after it had been incurred. But it is said that this condition does not affect any other pursuer or prosecutor than the procurator-fiscal, and in one aspect of the thing there is truth in this statement. The procurator-fiscal, and he alone, is rendered subject to the condition, but this only upon the assumption that he is the only pursuer or prosecutor entitled to recover. The recovery of the penalty is the thing that is barred. The protection of the alleged wrongdoer against long delayed actions is the end to be accomplished, and the idea that a private party assuming that at any time he might sue, can sue at a period when suit by the procurator-fiscal would be precluded, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be too extravagant to be seriously urged on the consideration of the Court.

"2. The plea of res judicata, so far as regards the ground of action, rested upon the granting of the certificate referred to in the three first conclusions of the summons, is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, fully supported by the facts admitted on the record. The thing complained of, according to the plain meaning of the conclusions of the summons, is the granting of that certificate; but this has already been made the ground of an action between the present pursuer and the present defender, in which final judgment was pronounced. This is concisely proved by the issue printed in article 7 of the defender's statement, page 14 of this record. That trial resulted in a verdict for the defender, and that verdict having been applied, became the ground of a judgment by which the defender was assoilzied. How, after this, can the same question be submitted of new for the decision of the Court? Judgment once given is given once for all, and it would be hard to conceive a case in which the plea of res judicata could be more clearly established.

"3. The other matters of complaint for which damages are claimed are set forth in articles 5 and 6 of the condescendence. These also, the defender contended, are barred by the plea of res judicata, but the Lord Ordinary has been unable to adopt this conclusion. The plea of res judicata is in itself a technical plea, or, at any rate, is a plea to which effect is given only on certain well recognised conditions, of which one is that the thing alleged to be barred as a ground of action has, as a ground of a former action, already been decided. Now, the statements complained of on the present occasion were not the grounds of any former action; and consequently to them, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, the plea of res judicata cannot be applied. The result of the first litigation, however, between the pursuer and the defender is not wholly immaterial in this part of the present case. What is complained of are statements made by the defender as a witness. These the pursuer admits to be privileged; and so malice must be proved before liability against the defender could be established. Malice, consequently, is alleged, but has it been relevantly libelled? The Lord Ordinary thinks that it has not. The mere use of the word 'malice' or the word 'maliciously,' is not in every case enough. It is often necessary that, so to speak, the use of the word should be justified by averments, which, if proved, will afford reasonable ground for the imputation. Here the epithet 'maliciously' is, so far as the present point is concerned, all which is put upon record, and yet the present, more than most cases, is a case in which more was required, because the slander complained of, and the uttering of which is ascribed to

No. 148.

July 3, 1875.
Mackintosh v. Weir.

slander.[1] Statements made by a witness were actionable, if malice was averred.[2]

Counsel for the defender were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The substance of this action is precisely the same as that begun in 1858. There is no difference except that the phraseology is somewhat varied. The pursuer was confined in a lunatic asylum upon a certificate granted by the defender and another medical man. The pursuer raised an action against the defender and others, in which the thing put in issue was sanity or insanity, or at all events, whether Dr Weir was justified in granting the certificate which he did. The pursuer now proposes to try the question whether he was sane at the date of granting the certificate, and whether the defender can render a sufficient reason for saying that he was insane, after the Court and the jury have decided that he was insane, and that he was justifiably sent to the lunatic asylum.

It is said that the present action is laid upon slander, whereas the former action was laid upon the personal confinement. This is a difference in words, but without a shadow of substance. In the former action reparation was sought, including to the full everything which the pursuer could recover in the present action. If he had been found sane the damages which he would have recovered would have included injury to credit and feelings. So far then as the conclusions of the actions there is not the slightest difference between the two, except that those of the present action are more limited.

We are not put to discuss questions which have arisen in some of the cases in the books, where, for instance, it has been held that a decision in a criminal cause is not necessarily res judicata in a civil cause. Here there is a complete and absolute identity between the two actions; and, therefore, I have no hesitation in adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor upon this point.

As to the other ground of action, where a party is put into the witness-box in an action against himself, and there maintains his ground, I hope there is no doubt at all upon the point. The House of Lords has recently decided under less favourable circumstances than the present that no action will lie for statements thus made in the witness-box.[3]

LORD NEAVES.—The former action concluded for reparation in every possible way in which reparation could be sought. It is not necessary for a party to state all the grounds of damage. It is enough to state "to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer," and the jury will consider all the grounds of damage. The pursuer could there have proved everything that he suffered in feelings, character, credit, &c. He put it to the jury,—"Was I sane or insane?" For it is no injury to a man to say that he is insane if he is really insane. The whole basis of that action was the question of sanity or insanity. The jury, pro-malice, consists of a statement which has been found to be true by the two juries before whom the evidence complained of, as set forth in articles 5 and 6 of the condescendence, was given by the defender. In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary considers that the plea of irrelevancy must be sustained.

"The result of all is, that the action has been dismissed."

[1] (On res judicata)—Gillespie v. Russell, June 26, 1857, 19 D. 897, 29 Scot. Jur. 415; Robertson v. Melville, Feb. 24, 1860, 22 D. 893, 32 Scot. Jur. 375.

[2] Watson v. Burnet, Feb. 8, 1862, 24 D. 494, 34 Scot. Jur. 359; see also Macfarlane and Cleghorn on Issues, p. 82.

[3] Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, June 28, 1875, L. R. 7, E. and I. App.

No. 148. July 3, 1875. Mackintosh v. Weir.

ceeding with their inquiry in a very business-like manner, found that the pursuer was insane, and that the doctor who had been called in to perform a public duty had only discharged that duty in certifying that the pursuer was insane. The whole claim of damages thus fell to the ground. To say that the pursuer did not go to the jury on the slander is perfectly extravagant.

With regard to the statements by Dr Weir as a witness, the case cited by the pursuer is not in point, even if it had gone to a final decision. There the person had put himself into the box, and was therefore not under compulsion to speak.

With regard to the penalty here claimed, it is impossible to contend that the party injured is entitled to recover a statutory penalty unless that is declared in the statute. It is not intended for his pecuniary benefit at all. It is imposed for the public interest, and is due to the Queen, if Parliament has made no other provision for its disposal. The injured person has no right to penalties. Reparation is his right, which can neither be supplemented nor superseded by a penalty.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion.

With regard to the point whether there is any ground of action against the defender in respect of the statements made by him as a witness I think that the Lord Ordinary's ground is somewhat too narrow. I should prefer to say that the privilege of a witness in such circumstances is absolute.

THE COURT adhered.

P. H. CAMERON, S.S.C.—JOHN T. MOWBRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 149. July 6, 1875. Jackson v. M'Iver.

THOMAS JACKSON (Mackenzie's Trustee), Appellant.—Balfour—M'Kechnie.
JOHN M'IVER, Respondent.—Kinnear—Trayner.

Bankrupt—Ranking—Blank Bill—Cautioner—Accommodation Bill.—A lent B £300 and at the same time took in security from B a blank bill stamp for £2000, signed by him and indorsed by four other persons, A being in the knowledge that no relation of debtor and creditor subsisted between B and the indorsers. B not having paid the £300, and one of the indorsers having become bankrupt, A, who had filled up the blank stamp as a note for £2000, claimed to rank on the bankrupt indorser's estate for that amount till the dividends should amount to £300.

Held that the bankrupt indorser was in reality only a cautioner, and that A was only entitled to rank on his estate for the £300 actually lent to B.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness. I.

THE following narrative of the facts of this case is taken from the opinion of Lord Gifford :—

"This is an appeal by the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Mackenzie, draper, Inverness, against a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of Inverness, ordaining the appellant as trustee upon Alexander Mackenzie's sequestrated estate to admit the claim of the respondent, John M'Iver, as a creditor of the said Alexander Mackenzie for the sum of £2000, and to rank the respondent for that amount, but only to the effect of the respondent receiving payment of £300, to which extent the respondent restricts his claim. . . .

"The present respondent, John M'Iver, claims to be a creditor on the estate of the bankrupt Alexander Mackenzie "for the sum of £2000 contained in a promissory-note dated 11th May 1874," of which the respondent, John M'Iver, is the holder. This promissory-note is granted by Donald Mackay, manufacturer in Inverness, in favour of four parties or firms, and by the note, ex facie as it now stands, Donald Mackay promises, fifty days after date, to pay to these four parties, or order, the sum of £2000, value received. The payees or promisees are (1) Munro and Company, (2) Alexander Mackenzie, the present bankrupt, (3) Turnbull and Company, and (4) William Mackenzie. The note bears to be blank indorsed by these four parties, and the present respondent, Mr M'Iver, produces the note, and claims to be onerous holder. Sequestration of Alexander Mackenzie's estate was awarded on 23d June 1874 during the currency of the note. The note is produced by Mr M'Iver with an affidavit in which he depones that the bankrupt Alexander M'Kenzie is now, and was at the date of his sequestration, indebted to the respondent in the sum of £2000 contained in the said promissory-note; but he goes on to explain that the said promissory-note for £2000 was indorsed to him only in security of £300 contained in another promissory-note of the same date (11th May 1874) granted to the deponent by the said Donald Mackay, the original promissor in the large note, and he restricts his ranking to the effect of drawing full payment of the sum of £300.

No. 149.

July 6, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Iver.

"As the respondent, Mr M'Iver, was ex facie onerous holder of the note for £2000, want of value or other objections could only be proved by his writ or oath, and, accordingly, in the proceedings before the Sheriff, the trustee on Alexander Mackenzie's estate referred the whole cause to Mr M'Iver's oath. We have his deposition before us, and in that deposition alone we must find the facts of the case. The deposition, however, is quite candid, and there can be no real dispute as to what the facts truly are.

"It appears from the deposition that about 11th May 1874 Donald Mackay applied to the respondent M'Iver to assist him in raising money. Mackay brought with him a blank bill stamp with four indorsements on it, and he asked the respondent M'Iver to sign it as an additional indorser. This blank bill stamp is now the note claimed on for £2000. Mackay's object was, by means of the respondent's indorsation along with the four other names already indorsed, to raise money by discounting the note, the same being filled up as a bill or note for £2000 or for some smaller sum; and he in substance explained this to the respondent. The stamp would carry £2000. The respondent M'Iver refused to sign the blank stamp or to pledge his credit for any such sum, but he ultimately agreed to lend Mackay £300, provided he received security therefor. Both parties, Mackay and M'Iver, adjourned to the Commercial Bank with a view to carrying out the transaction, and in order to obtain the advice of the bank agent, Mr Fraser, who was also the respondent's agent. The whole matter was explained to Mr Fraser, and the first proposal seems to have been that the bank should discount the note which it was proposed to fill up for £2000. Fraser, as bank agent, refused to do this, and then the proposal was reverted to that the respondent M'Iver should lend Donald Mackay £300. It was found that Mackay had no security to offer for this £300 excepting the blank bill with the four indorsements, and ultimately on the security of this blank bill stamp M'Iver took Mackay's promissory-note for £300, dated 11th May 1874, which he indorsed back to Mackay, who got cash for it over the bank counter. In security of this bill for £300 Mackay delivered to M'Iver the blank bill stamp for £2000, putting his name on the face of it as promissor, but without filling it up for any sum or in any way, and in this state M'Iver received it as security and left it with the bank agent to keep for him unfilled up.

No. 149.
July 6, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Iver.

"The £300 note fell due on the 14th June 1874 and was dishonoured by Mackay. The respondent M'Iver had to retire it, and thereby was and is the undoubted creditor of Mackay for £300 and interest. M'Iver got back the bill stamp still blank from Fraser and took it to his law-agent, Mr Macandrew, instructing that gentleman to 'protect my interests.' The respondent gave no specific instructions to Mr Macandrew, but simply gave him the blank bill stamp with the four blank indorsements, with a general order to protect his, M'Iver's, interests. In pursuance of these general instructions, it appears that Macandrew, the respondent's agent, did fill up the blank bill stamp for the sum of £2000, making Mackay the promissor, and inserting the names of the four indorsers as the promissees. It does not appear when the blank stamp was so filled up, but it must have been after the 14th June and before 24th August. It was after Mackay had dishonoured the £300 bill, and before the claim in Mackenzie's sequestration. It was filled up by Macandrew as the respondent's agent, and of course this is just the same as if it had been filled up by the respondent himself. The affidavit and claim in Mackenzie's sequestration followed, and the question now is—is the respondent entitled to rank on Alexander Mackenzie's estate for the full sum of £2000 in order that the respondent may draw dividends to the full amount of £300, which admittedly was his sole and only debt."

Thomas Jackson, the trustee on Mackenzie's estate, rejected the claim, and M'Iver appealed to the Sheriff.

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair), on 10th May 1875, pronounced this deliverance:—"Finds that the oath is negative of the reference: Finds further, in point of fact, that the bill in question was given to the appellant in satisfaction, not of a prior debt, nor in preference to other creditors of the bankrupt, but of an instant cash payment, and as a novum debitum arising within sixty days before bankruptcy: Finds in law that the Act 1696, c. 5, does not apply to the present case: Therefore recalls the deliverance appealed against, and remits to the respondent, the said Thomas Jackson, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the bankrupt, Alexander Mackenzie, draper, High Street, Inverness, sole partner of the firm of Mackenzie Brothers, drapers there, to admit the appellant's claim, and to rank him upon the said sequestrated estate in terms of his claim, and decerns."

The trustee appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

At advising,—

LORD GIFFORD.—(After the above narrative of the facts)—I am of opinion that the respondent, on the proved facts of the case, is not entitled to rank on Alexander Mackenzie's estate for £2000, but only £300, being the full sum which the respondent actually advanced.

I think it is proved by the respondent's oath that he knew that the four indorsers of the blank stamp, of whom the bankrupt was one, had not given any money to Donald Mackay, the proposed promissor in the note. They were not Mackay's creditors to any extent, but had merely lent him their names by indorsing the blank stamp in order that he might raise money thereon. This is perfectly apparent upon the oath—Mackay brought the blank stamp unfilled up, and his proposal was that the respondent should subscribe with the other indorsers so as to enable him, Mackay, the better to raise money. At that time there was no real debt between Mackay and the four indorsers. There was only a mandate enabling Mackay to raise money by filling up and discounting the blank stamp. Now, if Mackay had got £2000 from the respondent, and there-

No. 149.
July 6, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Iver.

upon the bill had been filled up for that sum, there is no doubt the indorser, as well as Mackay, would have been liable to the respondent for the sum so advanced. But this was not what was done. The respondent only lent £300 to Mackay, and it was only in security of this £300 that he received the blank stamp. The legal result is, that the indorsers of the blank stamp became cautioners or securities to the respondent for the £300 he had lent Mackay. That was their legal relation and position—nothing more. No doubt they signed a blank obligation carrying £2000, and gave Mackay a mandate to make it a bill for that amount, which would have been good in the hands of any bona fide holder. And if £2000 had been raised upon it they would have been liable for that full sum, but as only £300 was raised they were cautioners for that limited amount and for no more. The moment the respondent admits, as he was bound to do, that he only lent £300, and that he got the indorsers' names as security therefor, that moment he fixes the liability of the indorsers as simple cautioners for the sum lent, and for nothing else. It is just as if the indorsers had said to Mackay—we will be cautioners for you either to the bank or to anybody else for whatever sum you can raise not exceeding £2000; and this being fairly communicated to the creditor who advanced the money he cannot hold them liable for more than the sum he actually lent. A mere cautioner, who is admittedly nothing else than a cautioner, can never be liable for a larger sum than was due by the principal debtor. Cautionry is an accessory obligation, and the accessory can never be bound for more than the principal. Cautioners in a cash credit bond, admitted to be such, or holding a back-letter, can never be liable for more than the balance due by the principal, although the bond ex facie may be for a much larger amount. In short, whenever it is admitted, or is shewn by competent evidence, that a personal obligant (for I am dealing with the case only of personal obligation) is merely cautioner for another, and this to the knowledge of the creditor, then the creditor cannot claim from the cautioner or rank upon his estate for a larger sum than was due by the principal debtor.

The fallacy of the very ingenious argument submitted for the respondent lay in not distinguishing between the personal obligation of a cautioner and a real debt or real subject assigned in security. If there had been a real debt of £2000 due by the four indorsers to Mackay, and if this debt had been assigned to the respondent, he being in bona fide and believing it to be a debt and taking the £2000 bill and debt in security of the £300 which he lent, then the case would have been wholly different. The respondent would have been out and out assignee to the debt which formed the subject of the security, just as if the security had been a policy of insurance which might be for a sum ten times the loan advanced on it. In such a case the creditor would be entitled to recover the full debt or the full sum in the policy as absolute assignee, subject only to a liability to account to his debtor, the cedent. It is quite otherwise with the mere personal obligation of a cautioner brought home to the knowledge of the creditor as such,—that is, as mere cautioner at the time the debt is contracted. In such a case I know no instance where the cautioner was held liable to the creditor in a larger sum than that due to the creditor by the principal debtor.

So far as regards the proposed ranking for £2000 is concerned, therefore, I think it must be disallowed and restricted to a ranking for £300, the only real debt, but the respondent will be entitled to a ranking for this limited sum of £300 against the estates of each of the co-obligants. The trustee was wrong

No. 149.
July 6, 1875.
Jackson v. M'Iver.

in rejecting the claim altogether—the Sheriff-substitute has erred in admitting a ranking for too large a sum.

The grounds of judgment which I have above indicated are different from those taken by the trustee in his deliverance, and from those pleaded by the trustee before the Sheriff-substitute. I do not think that the statute 1621 or the statute 1696 have any relation whatever to the present case. There is no question of conjunct or confident parties holding gratuitous deeds from the bankrupt struck at by the Act 1621—there is no question of a security given for a prior debt contrary to the Act 1696—there is no room for the plea of fraud at common law—and these are the points which seem to have exclusively occupied the attention of parties in the Court below. But the sole question really is, is it proved that the respondent took these indorsers as simple cautioners for the £300, the only sum lent, and if so, for what sum is he entitled to rank on their respective estates? He cannot rank on these estates for a larger sum than he could have required them actually to pay had Mackay been the only party insolvent.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I also concur, and in support of the views expressed by Lord Gifford in favour of the proposed judgment I may refer to the case of Peek Brothers, &c. v. Fleming, 16th November 1849, 12 D. 122 (21 Scot. Jur. 566), which is almost exactly in point.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal, alter the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, and remit to the said trustee to rank the claim of the said John M'Iver to the effect of his receiving a dividend on the sum of £300, with interest thereon from the 14th day of June 1874: Find no expenses due to or by either of the parties, and decern."

G. & H. CAIRNS, W.S.—IRONS & ROBERTS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 150.
July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

WILLIAM GIBB, Pursuer and Appellant.—Macdonald—Lang.
J. AND J. CROMBIE, Defenders and Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Jameson.

Reparation—Personal Injury—Culpa—Factory Acts, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 54, sec. 1, 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, sec. 21, and 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, sec. 4—Contributory Negligence—Young Person.—A lad between seventeen and eighteen, while employed at night work in a factory, was injured by the belt of a teasing machine, at which he was working, slipping off the drum and catching his arm. The body of the machine was boxed in, but the belt and lower pulley were not fenced. In an action of damages by the lad against his employers, laid on breach of the Factory Acts, which forbid the employment of persons under eighteen at night work, or at unfenced machinery, the defences were (1) that the defenders had been induced by the pursuer's representations that he was above eighteen to engage him as an adult, and had paid him adult's wages; and (2) that the accident occurred through the pursuer's own fault. Held, after a proof, that the defenders had not used sufficient diligence to ascertain the pursuer's age before they employed him at night work; that the machine was not duly fenced in terms of the statutes; and that the defenders had failed to prove contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, and accordingly that the de-

No. 150.

July 6, 1875.

Gibb v. Crombie.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen and Kincardine.

I.

fenders, having been guilty of a double breach of the Factory Acts, were liable to the pursuer in damages.

Question, how far misrepresentation of his age by the pursuer, or contributory negligence on his part, would have barred his claim, had they been proved.

THIS action was raised on 13th February 1874 in the Sheriff-court of Aberdeenshire by William Gibb, with consent of his father as his administrator-in-law, against J. and J. Crombie, manufacturers, Grandholm, for damages for an accident which occurred to the pursuer, while in the defenders' employment, about five o'clock on the morning of 2d April 1873.

The condescendence set forth that on 2d April 1873 the pursuer, being then seventeen and a half years of age, and therefore a young person within the meaning of the Factory Acts,* was working at a wool teasing machine in the defenders' works, which was not securely fenced in terms of the Factory Acts,† and was otherwise defective, when the driving belt of the fan flew off the pulley, and caught the pursuer, by which his right arm was so severely injured that it had to be amputated.

A further ground of liability was maintained against the defenders, viz. that the accident occurred while the pursuer was employed at night work contrary to the provisions of the Factory Labour Amendment Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. c. 54) sec. 1, which forbids the employment of young persons between six at night and six in the morning.

The defenders did not dispute that their mill was a factory within the meaning of the Factory Acts, but they stated the following defences:—(1) That the pursuer, when he applied to them for employment, represented himself to be eighteen years of age, and that on the faith of these representations they engaged him and paid him as an adult; (2) that they had made sufficient arrangements for keeping the machinery in good order, and given the command of all necessary materials for that purpose to properly qualified persons; (3) that the accident happened through the pursuer's own fault in laying hold of some part of the machine and gearing while in motion, contrary to his instructions.

A proof was taken, of which the result was shortly as follows:—Mr Richard Brooks, the defenders' mill manager, deponed:—"I remember pursuer applying for employment. He and Benjamin Ross came to my house and asked for night work. I asked their age. They smiled, and said eighteen."

The pursuer and Ross denied that Mr Brooks had put any question

---

* By the 73d section of the Factory Regulation Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 15), the words "'young person' shall be taken to mean a person of the age of thirteen years, and under the age of eighteen years."

† By the 21st section of the Factory Regulation Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. c. 15), it is, inter alia, provided that "every part of a steam-engine and water-wheel, and every hoist or teagle near to which children or young persons are liable to pass or be employed, and all parts of the mill-gearing in a factory, shall be securely fenced."

By the 4th section of the Factory Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 38), it is enacted that the above quoted section, "so far as the same refers to the mill-gearing, shall apply only to those parts thereof with which children and young persons and women are liable to come in contact, either in passing or in their ordinary occupation in the factory."

The fencing of driving straps is specially dealt with by the Factory Acts,—the inspector being empowered to direct any driving strap or band which, in his opinion, is dangerous, to be fenced, and in the event of a difference of opinion between him and the mill-owner, whether it is necessary and possible to do so, the question is referred to arbitration—7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, sections 43, 60, and 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, section 6.

No. 150.

July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

about age, and another lad named Mitchell stated that he heard the conversation, and that nothing was asked or said about age.

The pursuer was set to work on the night shift, and had been in the defenders' employment about four weeks before the accident.

Mr John Crombie junior, one of the defenders, deponed:—"I recollect ordering muster of night shift. I had passed the night shift one night, and thought some of them looked under the age. Next morning I ordered them before me, and they came in the afternoon. This was a few days before the accident. I don't recollect the particular individuals who came. I think I recollect Ross, but I don't recollect pursuer. Brooks brought them in one by one. I asked all whose appearance made it necessary what their age was—all about whom there could be the slightest doubt. There was one, at least, if not more, discharged in consequence."

Mr Brooks' evidence as to this inspection was as follows:—"I ordered the night shift to the office shortly before the accident. Mr John Crombie jun. told me to do so, because he thought some did not look the age. Gibb and Ross came down among the others. I took them one by one to Mr John Crombie jun. He asked Gibb if he was eighteen, and pursuer said Yes, and he said that would do. Pursuer left. I also took Ross in, and Mr Crombie told me he was to leave."

The pursuer stated with reference to this occasion:—"I was only asked if I was working in the teasing room at night. I said, Yes; and nothing more was said. I don't know why I was wanted down."

It was proved that young persons employed by day got from 7s. to 10s. a-week, whereas the pursuer received 15s.

The body of the machine at which the accident occurred was boxed in. The fan belt and lower pulley were not fenced. Several of the defenders' witnesses stated that it was not the practice to fence the fan belts of such machines, and that fencing the belt would be so inconvenient as to make it practically impossible.

No one was present when the accident occurred. The pursuer stated:—"I was oiling the fan, and as I was going back from doing so the belt sprang and took me, and, before I knew where I was, had my right arm round the drum. The belt snapped then, and I got free." He denied that he was touching the strap at the time, and attributed the accident to the bad state of the bushes into which the fan fitted.

The defenders adduced several mill-managers and others, who stated that, in their opinion, the accident could not have happened in the way described by the pursuer, and that unless the pursuer had been tampering with the belt it could not have caught his arm.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson), on 4th December 1874, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that at the time the injury libelled was sustained the pursuer was a young person within the meaning of the Factory Acts, and was employed in breach of their provisions by the defenders at night work, and at unfenced machinery: Finds that the injury happened in consequence of his being so employed: Finds that the defenders have failed to prove that the pursuer was so employed through his own fault, or that his own negligence contributed to the accident: Finds therefore that the defenders are liable in damages; modifies the same to the sum of £100 sterling, and decerns for said sum against the defenders: Finds the defenders liable in expenses."

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), who, on 16th February 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that it is not proved that the injuries of the minor pursuer were caused by any want of fencing or

No. 150.

July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

other defect in the machine in question for which the defenders are responsible; and in respect it appears that they had used all due diligence to enforce the provisions of the Factory Acts, they are not liable to the pursuer or his father for his being employed at night work under eighteen years of age, contrary to the requirements of said Acts: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—With the consent of the parties the Sheriff went to the defenders' mill to see the machine at which the accident occurred. It is a teaser of the description usually found in woollen factories, standing by itself in a part of the building specially devoted to this kind of work, with abundance of room for the person in charge to move about. In accordance with the usual arrangement, the body of the machine, which is its most dangerous part, is all boxed in, and a slide opens and shuts at the end where it is fed and discharged.

"The fan which blows away the dust from the wool in the process of teasing is driven by a belt at the side, passing round the drum; and it was this belt which caused the accident. The pursuer says he had been oiling the fan and was in the act of returning when the belt sprang, caught his right arm, and before he knew where he was had it round the drum. He is the only witness to the occurrence, and it is not easy to understand how the accident could have happened in the way described; for, first, there was no need for his being so close to it; and, second, the strap of the upper pulley which passes round the axle of the drum and is on the outside of the fan strap, must necessarily have acted as a fence in keeping the latter in its place in the event of its slipping off. The more likely explanation is, that the strap having slipped, the pursuer was trying to put it on, without first stopping the machine, which it is admitted was contrary to orders, and indeed would be a most dangerous proceeding. If this is how it happened, there is plainly an end of the case; for, all question of fencing apart, a master is not liable to a workman himself for the consequences of his own folly, at least when he possesses the intelligence which may be supposed to be possessed by a lad of eighteen. While the Factory Acts make fencing in certain circumstances a matter of statutory obligation, the omission of which both subjects the offender to penalties, and entitles the injured person to redress, it has been laid down in each of the three kingdoms 'that the action must be subject to the rules of common law, and one of these is, that a want of ordinary care, or wilful misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, is an answer to the claim,'—Caswell v. Worth, January 18, 1856, 25 L. J. Q. B. 121, and 5 El. and Bl. 849; Traills v. Small and Boase, July 4, 1873, 11 Macph. 888, 45 Scot. Jur. 540, and an Irish case, M'Cracken v. Dargan, 1 Ir. Jurist, N. S. 404.

"The pursuer, however, denies that he was touching the strap at the time, and a large body of evidence has been led on the question whether anything could have been done by the defenders to prevent such an occurrence as the pursuer says did happen on the occasion. As regards the mill-gearing, meaning thereby the train of toothed wheels at the upper part of the side of the machine, any further protection was evidently unnecessary, because they are practically out of anybody's reach; and although, no doubt, the term as defined by the Act of 1844, section 73, must be held to include every 'wheel, drum, or pulley' by which motion is communicated from the moving power to the different parts of the machinery, two observations fall to be made on the provisions of the statute relating to fencing. In the first place, these parts of the gearing only now require to be fenced 'with which children, young persons, and women are liable to come in contact either in passing or in their ordinary occupation in the factory'—19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, sec. 4. In the second place, so far as the Sheriff is aware, the term has never been held to apply to belting. That is specially dealt with in the Act, the inspector being empowered to direct any driving strap or band which, in his opinion, is dangerous, to be fenced, and in the event of a difference of opinion between him and the mill-owner, whether it is necessary and possible to do so, the question is referred to arbitration—7 and

No. 150.

July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

In the course of the argument for him it was maintained that, even if it were held to be proved that the pursuer had said that he was eighteen, there was not necessarily any deception on his part, as in popular language that might mean that he was in his eighteenth year.

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—The decision of this case turns very much on the view that may be taken of the bearing and effect in some particulars of the Factory Acts.

It is proved that the pursuer was under eighteen years of age when he entered the defender's employment and was set to work by them in their mills, and it is not disputed that the accident occurred within the time defined by the Factory Acts as night work.

The first question raised by the defenders is, whether they were so deceived by the pursuer in regard to his age at the time they engaged him as to deprive him of the benefit of the pleas which might be otherwise available to him

---

8 Vict. c. 15, sections 43, 60, and 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, section 6. Now, it is abundantly proved that the risk of injury from young persons coming in contact with the strap in question never occurred to any one; that in similar establishments it is not customary to have any special protection at this part of the machine, and no instance is mentioned of any factory inspector having deemed it his duty to interfere. Upon these facts the Sheriff has no difficulty in holding that the guarding of the fan belt is not made matter of statutory obligation; and as regards the alleged liability of the belt to slip off from the looseness of the bushes, the pursuer has entirely failed to shew that any defects which may have arisen from wear and tear were directly connected with the accident.

"The remaining ground of action pleaded for the pursuer is, that the accident having happened at night the defenders took the risk of it, because the pursuer, being under eighteen, ought not to have been allowed into the mill after six P.M. It seems to be a sufficient answer that he was employed as an adult, at an adult's wages, and in the belief that he was an adult in point of fact. The pursuer came asking night work from another work where he had been working on the night shift. Young persons employed by day get from 7s. to 10s. a-week, adults by night 14s. and upwards; and the pursuer received 15s. While, therefore, his motive for passing himself off as being four or five months older than he really was is intelligible, it is impossible to understand what object the defenders had to gain by wilfully breaking the law. Mr Brooks says, that he expressly asked him his age before he was engaged. This the pursuer denies; but it is not disputed that the question was repeated in a different but much more formal manner sometime after he had obtained admission to the defenders' mill. Having reason to suspect that some of the night hands were under age they caused a general muster to be made, and the whole being passed through Mr Crombie's room, every one about whose age there could be a doubt was expressly asked the question. That the examination was particular is proved by the fact that it resulted in a number of dismissals, including the pursuer's companion, Ross, who succeeded along with him in passing Brooks at the time of the engagement. At the above muster the pursuer again denies that he was asked his age, but if the question were not put in so many words he must have quite well understood the object of the proceeding, and that to be found out meant being turned out. A factory hand of eighteen is far too intelligent not to understand that. To give him damages for having successfully eluded detection on that occasion, notwithstanding that the defenders were doing their best to comply with the law, on the ground, forsooth, that 'young persons' like him required protection against themselves, and that this was the object of the factory legislation, would be bringing the matter to a point which is in violation of the plainest equity, and never could have been contemplated."

No. 150.
July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

under the Factory Acts. After a careful examination of the evidence I have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for such a defence. The pursuer denies that he was asked his age when he was engaged, and in this he is corroborated by the witnesses Benjamin Ross and John Mitchell, who were present on the occasion. On the other hand, Mr Brooks, the defenders' manager, makes this statement,—"I remember pursuer applying for employment. He and Benjamin Ross came to my house and asked for night work. I asked their age. They smiled, and said eighteen." What was this but practically saying, "Oh, we had better say eighteen, and let there be no more about it." Mr John Crombie junior, one of the defenders, also says that, having some suspicion as to the age of those employed in the night shift, he directed the young men to be paraded before him for inspection. They were accordingly passed in review before him, but he cannot undertake to say whether the pursuer was one of them or not. Brooks, however, says he was there, that Mr Crombie "asked Gibb if he was eighteen, and pursuer said yes, and he said that would do." Such is the whole evidence founded on by the defenders in support of their plea of deception by the pursuer. But, keeping in view the testimony of the witnesses Ross and Mitchell, I cannot hold that there is sufficient evidence to establish that there was any deception at all. And if I am correct in this, it is unnecessary to deal with the question whether, if it had been otherwise, a good plea might not have arisen to the defenders. The spirit as well as the terms of the statutes appear to import an absolute prohibition against employment of children and persons under eighteen years of age at night work in factories of a certain description. I fear that if it were held enough to exoner the owners or occupiers of such factories for a young person seeking employment to say with a smile that he was above eighteen, the object of the Acts would be entirely defeated. But it is sufficient for the present case that it is not proved that any proper inquiry was made by the defenders as to the pursuer's age, or that he practised any deceit upon them in regard to that matter.

And that it was illegal for the defenders to employ the pursuer, a young person under eighteen years of age, at night work, cannot be disputed. This itself gives the pursuer a claim to damages although there was nothing more in the case. For the defenders' plea, that they had made sufficient arrangements for keeping the machinery in good order, and given the command of all necessary materials for that purpose to properly qualified persons, cannot avail them, if I am right in holding that they had no right to employ the pursuer at all at night work in their mill.

The defenders committed another violation of the statutes in not having the machinery, where the pursuer was at work, and had occasion to pass, duly fenced, as required by the Acts. It rather appears that the belt which was the immediate cause of the injury did not require to be fenced. But the fan shaft and lower pulley did require to be fenced, and if they had been fenced the fair inference is that the belt would not have detached itself, and the accident would not have occurred.

Upon these two grounds, therefore, the employment of the pursuer at night work at all, and the non-fencing of the machine at which he was set to work, it appears to me that the defenders are liable in reparation to him.

The defence which the Sheriff has apparently given effect to is contributory fault. But, first, I can see no evidence of that, it being mere conjecture on the part of the learned Sheriff that the lad had been tampering with the strap.

No. 150.
July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

And, secondly, although I assume that any person, young or old, provided he is of sufficient intelligence to know what he is about, who wantonly and wilfully thrusts his arm into machinery, is not entitled to damages, there is no evidence whatever in the present case that the pursuer so acted. Such a defence would require to be well supported by the facts before it could be entertained against the plain policy of the Factory Acts, which were intended to afford a protection to young persons against the carelessness and inexperience incidental to their age. In other words, the object of these Acts is to protect children and young persons against themselves.

On the grounds I have now adverted to, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff ought to be recalled, and that of the Sheriff-substitute restored. With regard to the amount of damages, it was not suggested that the sum fixed by the Sheriff-substitute is excessive, and I see no reason for thinking that it is.

Lord Neaves.—I concur. I do not say that under certain circumstances a defence may not arise that the employer has been so excusably deceived as to the age of a young person, by a forged certificate of birth for instance, as to make it right that he should be exempt from liability for violating the law, which he had no intention of doing. But where the fact is proved that the accident happened to a person under eighteen during the night shift, it lies upon the employer to justify what he did, and this on clear grounds. I do not think that has been done here. The examination as to age was so cursory as to suggest a doubt whether it was not gone through as a matter of form. At all events, it was not such as to convince me that every care was taken which ought to have been taken.

The object of these Factory Acts is to protect young persons against themselves. There is a strong temptation to overstate their age when the difference in wages is so great, and the employer must be on his guard to prevent that temptation from operating.

Although I do not deny that there may be contributory misconduct on the part of a young person, which will disentitle him from recovering, I do not think that contributory negligence is a sufficient defence in such a case as the present. The object of the statute is to prevent the bodies and minds of young persons from being kept too long on the stretch. I cannot therefore make them liable for negligence which may be the result of that over tension of the faculties which it is the object of the statute to prevent.

There is no proof here of any such strong deception as would have deceived a careful and conscientious inquirer; and there is nothing else in the case sufficient to exonerate the defenders.

Lord Gifford concurred.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur. I am not prepared to say—and I understand all your Lordships made the same reservation—that if a lad of seventeen and a-half fraudulently induces his employers, after due inquiry, to believe that he is over eighteen, he can recover. Here there is no such case. The employers were put on their inquiry, and were guilty of gross negligence in not ascertaining his age.

On the point whether contributory negligence would be sufficient to bar the claim, I also wish to reserve my opinion. It is clear that no contributory negligence has been proved.

No. 150.

July 6, 1875.
Gibb v. Crombie.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal: Find that at the time the injury complained of was sustained the appellant, William Gibb (pursuer), was a young person within the meaning of the Factory Acts, and was employed in breach of their provisions by the respondents (defenders) at night work, and at unfenced machinery: Find that the injury happened in consequence of his being so employed: Find that the respondents have failed to prove that the appellant was so employed through his own fault, or that his own misconduct or negligence contributed to the accident: Find, therefore, that the respondents are liable in damages, and modify the same to the sum of £100 sterling: Therefore recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against, and decern against the respondents for payment to the appellant and his administrator-in-law of the said sum of £100: Find the respondents liable in expenses in this Court and in the Sheriff-court," &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—ADAM & SANG, W.S.—Agents.

No. 151.

July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

REV. ROBERT SHAW HUTTON AND OTHERS (the Minister, Kirk-Session, and Session-Clerk of the Parish of Cambusnethan), Pursuers.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.
REV. ALEXANDER HARPER AND OTHERS (the Minister, Kirk-Session, and Session-Clerk of the Quoad Sacra Parish of Wishaw), Defenders.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Gloag.

Church—Parish Quoad Sacra—Marriage—Proclamation of Banns.—Held that the proclamation of banns was prescribed by the Church as a preliminary to the celebration of marriage in facie ecclesiæ, and that such proclamation was one of the functions and duties of the office of minister of a church erected into a parish church under the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, for the district attached thereto as a parish quoad sacra.

2D DIVISION, with three consulted Judges. Ld. Mackenzie.

THE question raised in this action was whether the minister and kirk-session of a quoad sacra parish, erected under the provisions contained in the 8th section of the statute 7 and 8 Victoria, chapter 44, were entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages within such church for the district designated and attached thereto.

The present action was raised by the Rev. R. S. Hutton, the minister of the parish of Cambusnethan, and other members of the kirk-session of that parish, and the session-clerk, "against the Rev. Alexander Harper, M.A., minister of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, and others, constituting or claiming to constitute the kirk-session of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, and John Mackenzie, distiller at Wishaw, clerk to the kirk-session of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw," concluding for declarator "that the defenders are not, and that none of them is entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages in the church of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, or to cause or permit proclamations of banns of marriages to be made in the said church, or to demand, exact, or receive dues or fees in respect of such proclamations made in the said church, and that proclamations of the banns of marriages made in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw have not been and are not legal or valid, but are on the contrary illegal and invalid;" and to have the defenders interdicted "from making proclamations of banns of marriages in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, and from causing or permitting proclamations of the banns of marriages to be made in the said church, as also from demanding, exacting, or receiving dues or fees in respect of proclamations of banns of marriages made or to be made in the said church."

No. 151. July 7, 1875. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

The pursuers stated, in support of these conclusions—(Cond. 1) "In the year 1855 a district of the parish of Cambusnethan was erected into a parish quoad sacra tantum, under the name of the Church and Parish of Wishaw, in virtue of the provisions of the Act 7th and 8th Vict. cap. 44. The defender the Rev. Alexander Harper is the minister; the defender John Mackenzie is the session-clerk; and the other defenders are, along with the said Rev. Alexander Harper, the constituent members of the kirk-session of the said quoad sacra parish." (Cond. 4) "The defender John Mackenzie has recently, by the instructions, as the pursuers believe and aver, or at least with the sanction and assent of the other defenders, begun to make proclamations of the banns of marriages in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, and to exact and receive dues or fees for so doing." (Cond. 5) "The making of such proclamations in the church of the said quoad sacra parish, and the exaction and receipt of fees therefor, were and are illegal, incompetent, and unauthorised, and were and are to the loss and injury of the pursuers, or at least of the said William Grierson as session-clerk foresaid, as well as of the lieges who are induced to rely upon the said illegal and inept proclamations as valid proclamations of the banns of their marriages. The proclamations of banns which have been and are being made in the church of the said quoad sacra parish would otherwise have been and would be made in the parish church of Cambusnethan, and the pursuers, or at least the said William Grierson as session-clerk, would have received and would receive dues and fees in respect thereof, of which they have been and are, or he has been, is, and will be deprived by the said proclamations being made in the church of the said quoad sacra parish."

The pursuers pleaded;—The defenders are not entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, or to permit such proclamations to be made in the said church, and in respect that they have been and are making such proclamations and exacting such dues or fees, the pursuers are entitled to have decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for.

The defenders admitted the 1st and 4th articles of the condescendence, and pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction, in respect the proclamation of banns is not a civil but an ecclesiastical institution. (2) The pursuers have not set forth, and do not possess any right or title to insist in the present action. (3) Separatim, The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, in respect the parish of Wishaw was regularly erected as a quoad sacra parish in virtue of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44; and the defenders, as the kirk-session thereof, are entitled to continue the practice of proclamations of banns in the church of said parish as hitherto.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th January 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns that the defenders are not entitled to make proclamations of banns of marriages in the church of the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw, or to cause or permit proclamations of banns of marriages to be made in the said church, or to demand, exact, or receive dues or fees in respect of such proclamations made in the said church, and that proclamations of the banns of marriages in the church of the said quoad sacra parish of Wishaw are not legal or valid, but are, on the contrary, illegal and invalid: Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the defenders in terms of the conclusion of interdict, and decerns," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . . Although publication of banns was first introduced by

The defenders reclaimed. No. 151.

July 7, 1875. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

the Lateran Council of 1216, and was afterwards confirmed by the canons of our Provincial Councils in 1242 and 1269, it became, on the Reformation, part of the common law of Scotland. It is one of the requisites of a regular marriage, which is a civil contract. Since the Reformation publication of banns has had, as Lord Jeffrey remarks in the case of M'Donald v. Campbell, March 1836, Jurist, ix. p. 5, more of a civil than of a religious character. And although by the Act of Assembly 1638, sess. 23, c. 21, marriage was prohibited without proclamation of banns, 'except the presbyterie in some necessarie exigents dispense therewith,' yet the Presbyterian clergy, as Mr Erskine states (i. 6, 10), have not exercised such dispensation since the Revolution.

"Various provisions have been made by statute with reference to proclamation of banns. By the Act 1661, c. 34, all persons having their ordinary residences within this kingdom are prohibited from marrying others within England or Ireland, 'without proclamation of banns here in Scotland, and against the order and constitution of this Church or Kingdom,' under the penalties therein specified, one-half whereof belong to the Crown and the other half to the parish or parishes where the married parties resided, 'which pains, corporal and pecunial, shall no wayes be prejudicial to or derogat from the order and censures of the kirks to be inflicted against the delinquents.' By the Act 10 Anne, chapter 7, Episcopal ministers are empowered to celebrate the marriage of persons whose banns have been duly published three several Lord's-days in the Episcopal congregations which the two parties frequent, and in the churches to which they belong as parishioners, and the ministers of the parish churches are thereby obliged to publish the said banns; and by the statute 4 and 5 William IV., chapter 28, it is declared to be lawful to all persons in Scotland, after due proclamation of banns, there to be married by priests or ministers not of the Established Church, and also for such priests or ministers to celebrate marriages. It is thought that no valid change on the present law could be made by the General Assembly with reference to the proclamation of banns, and that such change could only be made by legislative enactment. Proclamation of banns must therefore be held to be much more of a civil than of a sacred character.

"The defenders maintained that it is provided by the statute 7 and 8 Victoria, chapter 44, section 8, that the ministers and elders of a quoad sacra parish shall 'have and enjoy the status and all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland,' and that the power to proclaim banns is one of the rights and privileges of such parish ministers and elders. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders are mistaken in this. It is, he thinks, no part of a parish minister's or an elder's duty to make proclamation of banns. It is the duty of the session-clerk of the parish to do so, or to get this done by the precentor. The proper legal evidence of such proclamation is a certificate signed by the clerk of the kirk-session of the parish, and a certificate under his hands that the banns were duly published cannot be traversed by proof that all the three proclamations were made on the same day —(Ersk. i. 6, 10). The session-clerk and precentor are not quoad sacra officials. The proclamation is not done during divine service, but before it begins; and it is not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, a religious but a civil act. That the defenders attach an erroneous meaning to the words of the statute above quoted is shewn by the provisions of the 13th section of the statute, which empowers the Lords of Council and Session to erect a Gaelic church and congregation into a separate parish, 'although the members of such congregation be scattered, and no territorial district may be assigned to such parish exclusively,' and provides that it shall be lawful for the minister or ministers and elders of such parish 'to have and enjoy the status, all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister or parish ministers and elders of the Church of Scotland.'

"Mr Erskine (ii. 10, 64) states that, 'by annexing quoad sacra is understood that the inhabitants of the annexed lands are, for their greater conveniency in attending divine service, brought under the pastoral care of the minister of the church to which they are annexed. But such annexation affects only the

No. 151.

July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

The case was appointed to be heard before seven Judges.*

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The object of proclamation of banns was by publishing to the parties' neighbours to guard against bigamous and incestuous marriages. Proclamation of banns, therefore, should be made in the church of the quoad sacra parish to which the inhabitants were enjoined to resort, and not in that of the original parish from which it had been disjoined. (2) The grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment were, first, that marriage was a civil contract; and, second, that it was not part of the duty of the minister, or the minister and kirk-session, to proclaim banns of marriage. Now, though marriage was a civil contract, the ceremonies connected with it were ecclesiastical ceremonies,—the inhabitants; the lands continue in all civil respects part of the old parish.' If this be a correct designation of the effect of erection of a parish quoad sacra, the claim of the defenders that they have a right to proclaim the banns of persons within the annexed district is inadmissible."

---

* The following are the principal Acts of Assembly and Acts of the Scots Parliament bearing on the question:—

Act of Assembly, sess. 23 and 24, December 17 and 18, 1838, article 21.—"Anent marriage without proclamation of bans, which being in use these years bygone hath produced many dangerous effects: The Assembly would discharge the same, conforme to the former Acts, except the presbyterie in some necessarie exigents dispense therewith."

Act of Assembly 1690, c. 6 (28th October).—"The Assembly recommends it to presbyteries to take notice of all ministers within their bounds, whether the late conforming incumbents or others, ... celebrating clandestine marriages without due proclamation of bans: and to censure them accordingly."

Act of Assembly 1690, c. 7 (29th October).—"That the celebration of marriage, without due proclamation of bans, according to order, three several Sabbaths in the respective parishes, be discharged; and that it be recommended to presbyteries to censure the contraveners."

Act of Assembly 1711, c. 5 (16th May).—"The General Assembly did, and hereby do appoint that the Acts of the General Assembly concerning proclamations of banns be duly observed, and that enquiry be made that the person desiring marriage be not within the forbidden degrees, and be single and free persons, that all concerned do consent."

Directory for Public Worship, 1645.—"The solemnisation of marriage" . . . "Before the solemnising of marriage between any persons their purpose of marriage shall be published by the minister three several Sabbath days in the congregation at the place or places of their most usual and constant abode respectively; and of this publication the minister who is to join them in marriage shall have sufficient testimony before he proceed to solemnise the marriage."

1661, c. 34.—"Our Sovereign Lord, and the Estates of this present Parliament, considering how necessar it is that no marriage be celebrat but according to the laudable order and constitution of this kirk, and by such persons as are by the authority of this kirk warranted to celebrat the same:" . . . . "Therefore his Majesty, with advice of his said Estates, statutes and ordains that whatsoever person or persons shall hereafter marry or procure themselves to be married in a clandestine and inorderly way, or by Jesuits, priests, or any other not authorised by this kirk, that they shall be imprisoned for three months, &c. Likeas his Majesty, with advice foresaid, prohibits and discharges all men and women, having both their ordinar residence within this kingdom, to get marriage to themselves with others within the kingdom of England or Ireland without proclamation of bannes here in Scotland, and against the order and constitution of this Church or Kingdom, under the pains following, viz., &c., which panes, corporal and pecunial, shall no ways be prejudicial to or derogat from the order and censures of the kirks to be inflicted against the delinquents."

See also 1672, c. 9; 1695, c. 12; 1698, c. 6; 10 Anne, c. 7; 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 28.

No. 151.
July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

proclamation of banns was one of these ceremonies, and it was therefore the duty of the minister and the kirk-session to proclaim banns. (3) Even if proclamation of banns could be looked on as inter civilia, the erection of a parish quoad sacra carried with it the disjunction of all matters, sacred and civil, the administration of the poor-law and the right to teinds alone excepted. For instance, an applicant for admission to the poors-roll residing in a quoad sacra parish required to obtain the certificate of the minister and elders of that parish and not of those of the original parish.[1] The minister of a quoad sacra parish was compelled, like every other minister, to contribute to the Ministers' Widows' Fund.[2] A quoad sacra parish had its separate registrar of births, deaths, and marriages.[3] (4) But the case really depended upon the true view of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sec. 8.[4] The disjunction effected under that statute was something very different from anything there had been before. That Act was passed in consequence of the Act of Assembly of 1834, and of the Stewarton case.[5] It was vain to go back to prior authorities. They only referred to the law as existing in their day, not to what resulted from that Act. By it a parish erected quoad sacra became for every purpose of ecclesiastical and not merely sacred functions and jurisdictions the only parish to which its inhabitants belonged. Its minister and kirk-session were the only minister and kirk-session recognised within its limits. This was very different from the case of the intra-parochial churches erected under 5 Geo. IV. c. 90, and previous Acts. Disjunction and erection, under 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, was just the erection of a new benefice and a new cure. For purposes of Church order and discipline the minister and kirk-session of the old parish could not interfere in the new. (5) But proclamation of banns was just part of the order and discipline of the Church.[6] All that the Legislature had done was to say in this matter the law of the Church shall be obeyed. Originally the rule as to publication of banns was one enacted by the Church itself. It was accepted by the Reformed Church from the Roman Catholic. It was only recognised by the civil power[7] as an existing rule of the Church which ought to have the support of the civil power. The Church, in requiring the proclamation of banns, was only carrying out her own ecclesiastical law. According to that law the duty of proclaiming banns is laid upon the minister and kirk-session of the parish, who have both the spiritual guidance of and ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the parishioners. The minister and kirk-session of a quoad sacra parish are by the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, placed in that position, and therefore it is not only their right but their duty to proclaim the banns of marriage of the inhabitants.

Argued for the respondents;—There could be no doubt that prior to the passing of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, proclamation of banns required

---

[1] Murrie v. M'Donald, Dec. 24, 1853, 16 D. 325, 26 Scot. Jur. 154; with which contrast Bell v. Bell, Dec. 10, 1840, 3 D. 204, 13 Scot. Jur. 81, which had reference to one of the parishes incompetently constituted under the Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 90, and the Act of Assembly of 1834.

[2] Grant v. Macintyre, July 14, 1849, 11 D. 1370, 21 Scot. Jur. 567; Cheyne v. Cook, June 20, 1863, 1 Macph. 963, 35 Scot. Jur. 661.

[3] 17 and 18 Vict. c. 80, Registration of Births, &c. Act, 1854, sec. 8.

[4] For 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sec. 8, see Lord President's opinion, p. 899.

[5] Cuninghame v. Presbytery of Irvine, Jan. 20, 1843, 5 D. 427, 15 Scot. Jur. 213; see also separate report.

[6] Ersk. Prin. i. 6, 5; Ersk. Inst. i. 6, 10; Bell's Prin., sec. 1510; Lord Advocate v. Ballantyne, March 14, 1859, 3 Irv. 352, 31 Scot. Jur. 387.

[7] 1661, c. 34; 1695, c. 12; 1698, c. 6; 10 Anne, c. 7; 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 28.

No. 151. July 7, 1875. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

to be made in the church of the parish. The defenders required to establish the proposition that not only was proclamation of banns now competent to be made in the church of a quoad sacra parish, but also that the church of the quoad sacra parish had become the only place where proclamation of banns could legally be made for those residing within the quoad sacra district. In this question very much turned upon the legal category under which the proclamation of banns was to be brought. There could be no doubt that in Scotland marriage was a civil contract. Even in matters ecclesiastical, according to the ecclesiastical law of Scotland, marriage did not hold the same place that it formerly did. It was no longer looked upon as a sacrament, but was regarded by the Church as a purely civil contract, though a civil contract which should receive ecclesiastical benediction. In order to the contraction of a regular marriage the civil law had declared that the ceremony in facie ecclesiæ must be preceded by proclamation of banns. That was the civil ceremony which the law of the country required as precedent to the ecclesiastical ceremony, if the marriage was to be recognised as regular. Further, the proclamation must be made in the church of the parish which the civil law recognised, the parish quoad civilia. Although the proclamation of banns had been originally introduced by the Church it had long since, both by common law and statute, become essential to the contraction of a regular marriage. The civil law did not merely recognise, as was contended, that what the Church had done, in ordering proclamation of banns to be made, was legal and within its competency, but also ordained that such proclamation should be made, and enjoined, as a matter of civil enactment, what had previously been a mere order of the Church. If the civil law only meant to recognise the authority of the Church in this matter the result would be that the Church could alter or rescind what it had originally ordered. But after the passing of the Act 1661, c. 34, it was matter of the plainest inference that the clergy of the Church of Scotland were powerless to alter anything connected with the proclamation of banns. That Act said to the clergy,—"Henceforth proclamation of banns shall be a part of the civil law, and you shall be under a penalty if you conduct your ecclesiastical ceremony where it has been neglected."[1] It was not necessary to argue that a quoad sacra church was not in a sense the parish church of the persons resident within the quoad sacra district. But a quoad sacra church was not the parish church in the view of the Act 1661, c. 34. It was the church of the civil parish that the civil law looked to. The Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, had two objects in view,—the first, to give the Court more ample powers than it already had for the division of extensive and populous parishes, and the erection of new parishes quoad omnia; the second, to give the Court power, which they had not under the Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 90, of attaching a district to a quoad sacra church, and disjoining that district quoad sacra tantum from the original parish. The distinction carefully maintained in the statute between the two cases of disjunction quoad omnia and disjunction quoad sacra shewed that it was the intention of the Legislature that, in the latter case, to all civil effects, the district disjoined quoad sacra was to remain part of the old civil parish. The quoad sacra parish was erected simply to enable the minister to exercise his sacred calling with the authority of a placed minister, and to give him a definite scope for his exertions, which he had not as the minister of a mere chapel-of-ease under 5 Geo. IV. c. 90, and previous Acts. It was not intended to make [1] See Lord Jeffrey's opinion in M'Donald v. Campbell, March 1836, 9 Scot. Jur. 5.

No. 151.
July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

any change in the position of the parishioners in matters of civil regulation, such as proclamation of banns of marriage. Such a change was not to be inferred, but must be made matter of special and distinct legislative enactment. This was made the more clear by the terms used in the 13th section of the Act of 1844 as to the erection of Gaelic churches quoad sacra without any district being attached to them. The ministers and kirk-sessions, in the same terms as the ministers and kirk-sessions of quoad sacra parishes with a district attached, were declared to have the status, powers, rights, and privileges of parish ministers and kirk-sessions, yet it could hardly be contended that a Gaelic church so erected was the church in which members of the congregation were bound to have their banns of marriage proclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised by this action is whether persons resident in the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw ought to have their banns proclaimed with a view to marriage in the parish church of Wishaw or in the parish church of Cambusnethan, out of which parish the quoad sacra parish of Wishaw has been erected.

Now, it seems to me, with reference to the statute of 1844, that the one is just as much a parish church as the other. That statute, to which it is as well to refer at once, enacts by section 8, "That if any person or persons shall, at his, her, or their expense, have built or shall have acquired, or shall have undertaken to build or acquire, a church, and shall have endowed or shall have undertaken to endow the same, it shall be competent for the Lords of Council and Session, acting in their capacity aforesaid of Commissioners for the Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds, ... to inquire into the circumstances, and to erect such church into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland." Now, in that part of the enactment there is nothing said about such church being quoad sacra tantum, or a church in any respect different from any other church. Then the section proceeds,—"And to mark out and designate a district to be attached thereto quoad sacra, and to disjoin such district quoad sacra from the parish or parishes to which the same or any part thereof may have belonged or been attached, and to erect such district into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland, and it shall and may be lawful for the minister and elders of such parish to have and enjoy the status and all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland."

By our decree of erection pronounced in the Teind Court we have here created a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland, and a parish minister and elders forming a kirk-session, who are to enjoy in all respects the status, powers, rights, and privileges belonging to any other parish minister, and any other kirk-session in the Church of Scotland. But it is said that the persons resident in the district which is annexed to this church only quoad sacra must in regard to all civil effects be dealt with as still parishioners of the original parish from which the district itself has been disjoined. Of course that necessarily leads to an inquiry into what constitutes the erection of a parish quoad sacra; and that again renders it necessary to inquire what is a parish. This latter question takes us back to a remote period of history, for the parochial division of Scotland is unquestionably a matter of antiquity. Indeed I do not think it has been satisfactorily ascertained when it commenced. That it was entirely an ecclesiastical division, before the era of the Reformation, cannot, however, I think, be disputed.

No. 151. July 7, 1875. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

The definition of a parish in the canon law (Ferraris Bib. Canon, voce Parochia) is a certain territorial district determined by the pope or the bishop, having a permanent rector, with the power of government and jurisdiction over the people within the district, and of administering to them the sacraments and other divine ordinances. The government and jurisdiction which make part of this definition are afterwards explained by the same authority when enumerating the essentialia of a parish—"Quarto requiritur ut unum solum, ac perpetuum rectorem seu parochum habeat, cum cura animarum, et potestate fori pœnitentialis ipsi soli competente, ita ut jure ordinario nullus alius sed solus ac unicus parochus praedictam habeat curam ac potestatem."

Before the Reformation therefore it is clear that the parochial division of the country was a purely ecclesiastical division, and that the parochial establishment was perfectly complete in itself without aid from the civil government. The patrimony of the kirk furnished the pecuniary means of sustaining and carrying on the whole parochial economy. The provision for the parochus or rector, for the maintenance of the ecclesiastical buildings, for the relief of the poor, and for the support of education, were all made by the Church itself out of its own ample revenues.

During this period of ecclesiastical history, therefore, there could not exist any distinction between those parts of the parochial economy which are now reckoned inter civilia and those which are reckoned inter sacra, because every parochial right and interest fell under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Church. But one of the results of the Reformation was that the patrimony of the Kirk was appropriated by the Crown, and disposed of by the Crown and by Parliament, and thus it became necessary for the Crown and Parliament to provide the means of carrying on the parochial economy. From this time accordingly ministers' stipends, and manses, and glebes, the relief of the poor, the establishment of parochial schools, and the maintenance of churches and churchyards, are provided by Act of Parliament, and all these parts of the ancient parochial economy are thenceforth naturally and even necessarily classed inter civilia. But if to the above be added the right of patronage, we shall, I think, have a complete catalogue of the parochial concerns which, after the Reformation, fell to be classed as inter civilia.

The parochial division of the country, though originally an ecclesiastical institution merely, has been found in practice very convenient for civil purposes also, and some things which have no connection with the ancient parochial economy have by statute received a sort of parochial character. Of these the most obvious example is afforded by the statutes providing for the maintenance of roads by statute-labour. But it is almost needless to say that this kind of legislation does not affect the question we are considering.

If I be right in the enumeration of the parochial concerns which after the Reformation came to be civil, as distinguished from sacred, it will not be very difficult to fix what remains of the parochial administration to be reckoned inter sacra.

That this must embrace the conduct and regulation of public worship, pastoral superintendence, the exercise of Church discipline, and infliction of Church censures, and the administration of the sacraments, will not admit of dispute. But the right and duty of a parish minister extends also to the administration of all

No. 151.
July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

religious ordinances to the people of his parish. The early liturgy or Book of Common Order of the Reformed Church of Scotland in every exemplar which I have seen, whether MSS. or printed, contains special directions for the manner of conducting the visitation of the sick, the burial of the dead, and the solemnisation of marriage, and in all these services I apprehend the minister is handling sacred things only, and not performing any statutory or civil duty.

If, therefore, the solemnisation of marriage be amongst those sacred things in the regulation of which the state does not interfere, then one would think that everything which was preliminary to that solemnisation should be inter sacra also. The preliminaries requisite in order to the proper solemnisation of a marriage in facie ecclesiæ are surely matter for the regulation of the Church, and it can hardly be disputed that what the Church requires as preliminary to one of her ceremonies is inter sacra, and beyond the interference of the civil law. Although the Reformed Church rejected the idea of marriage being one of the sacraments, it assumed from the first and always retained in its own hands the regulation of the preliminaries of the marriage ceremony, just as it assumed the regulation of the preliminaries of admission to the sacraments which it recognised. I cannot find any difference, so far as the regulation of the preliminaries went, between the ceremony of marriage and the sacraments. Nor is this surprising, for though the Reformers did not consider the ceremony of marriage as a sacrament, they did consider it a blessed ordinance, to be performed in the case of all persons entering into the marriage tie, and therefore to be decently performed by the Church only.

I had occasion, in the case of Ballantyne (March 14, 1859, 3 Irv. 352), to examine very carefully the history of the preliminaries of the marriage ceremony, and I think I succeeded in shewing that from the Reformation down to 1661 the proclamation of banns was left entirely in the hands of the Church. It was a matter of ancient institution. It was not altered in consequence of the Reformation. It has repeatedly been recognised by the Acts of the Church Courts. These ordinances require proclamation of banns as an essential precedent to marriage in facie ecclesiæ. When we come to the statutory enactments on the subject we see that the matter of proclamation of banns is not even mentioned, and all that is enforced by the civil power is a compliance with the ordinances of the Church. Such, accordingly, is the tenor of the statute 1661, c. 34, which inflicts penalties only in case of the inorderly celebration of marriage, or in case of its celebration by an unqualified person. This legislation, so far from interfering with the exclusive right of the Church to regulate the form of the ceremony, and its preliminaries, seems rather to recognise that exclusive right. I was, therefore, surprised, on reading the Lord Ordinary's note, to observe that he says that the proclamation of banns in not one of the rights or duties of the minister and elders of a parish, but that it is the duty of the session-clerk of the parish either to proclaim them himself or to have them proclaimed by the precentor. He adds that "the proper legal evidence of such proclamation is a certificate signed by the clerk of the kirk-session of the parish." That is perfectly true; but the certificate of the session-clerk is the proper legal evidence of the proclamation only because he is the servant, and, in this matter, the mouth-piece of the kirk-session and of the minister, with whom, and more especially with the latter, the matter is left by the enactments of the Church Courts on the subject. The minister is the sole person whose right and whose duty it is to make or cause to be made proper proclamation of banns. So at least it is enacted by a series of Acts of Assembly, for there is no civil statute regulating this matter. The session-clerk acts entirely as servant of the minister and kirk-session, and the notion of his making the proclamation, or instructing the precentor to make it, of his own right and responsibility, is an entirely new idea to my mind. The precentor has nothing more to do with the matter than any other member of the congregation; but, simply by reason of his exalted seat, he is generally a convenient mouth-piece. By whomsoever made, the proclamation is truly under the authority of the minister and kirk-session, and especially of the minister.

No. 151.

July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

There are other statutes besides that of 1661, c. 34, dealing with pains and penalties to be incurred by those celebrating irregular marriages. Thus the Act 1695, c. 12, which confirms the previous statutes on the subject, deals not only with the irregular celebration of marriage, but also with the irregular baptism of children, and prohibits under penalties the performance of either right by "ministers now out of their churches." Now, it has never been supposed that because the administration of baptism is here made to a certain extent matter of civil regulation, that therefore this enactment was equivalent to an interference with the Church as to the conditions on which the sacrament of baptism was to be administered. And yet the argument in the present case as to the preliminaries of the rite of marriage seems to come up to that.

Again, the Act 10 Anne, c. 7, which permitted the clergy of the Episcopal communion to perform divine service, according to the forms of their Church, conferred on them the right not only to pray and preach, but to administer the sacraments, and marry, without incurring pains and penalties, but only provided the birth and baptism of children so baptised be registered, and "that no Episcopal minister or ministers residing within that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland presume to marry any persons but those whose banns have been duly published three several Lord's days in the Episcopal congregations which the two parties frequent, and in the churches to which they belong as parishioners by virtue of their residence, and that upon the same pains and punishments as are already inflicted by the laws of Scotland in cases of clandestine marriages; and the ministers of the parish churches are hereby obliged to publish the said banns; and in case of neglect or refusal it shall be sufficient to publish the said banns in any Episcopal congregation alone, any law, statute, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." That is the only statutory enactment which specially requires proclamation of banns. But then it is to be observed that this is an act of toleration, and the Legislature were entitled to affix any conditions they pleased to the concessions thereby granted to persons not belonging to the Established Church. The Act of Queen Anne thus stands in instructive contrast to the statute which requires all the lieges to have their marriages celebrated according to the rules of the Church.

It is also worthy of notice that when this Act of Queen Anne requires the banns of Episcopalians to be published in the parish church it directs its injunction, not to the session-clerk, but to the minister, as the only person who can proclaim or order the proclamation of banns in the parish church.

It appears to me therefore that, in every aspect of the case, proclamation of banns is a matter purely ecclesiastical,—by which I mean not consistorial, but within the regulation and control of the Church as represented by her Courts, and particularly within the control of the minister of the parish.

If, then, a new church is erected, and made a parish church, and a district marked out and attached to it as a parish quoad sacra, and the persons resident within that district are enjoined to resort to that church as their parish church, it certainly would be a very strange thing if that were not the church in which proclamation should be made of their banns of marriage.

Proclamation of banns is not essential to the constitution of the contract of marriage, but has been deemed necessary for decency and order as a preliminary to the Church ceremony. The Church having ordained that there shall be such preliminary, all that the state has said is, a marriage celebrated without this preliminary shall be held clandestine, and those concerned shall be liable to punishment.

A question has been suggested to this effect, if the matter of proclamation of banns is dependent on an order of the Church, and within the jurisdiction of her Courts, what would follow should the Church determine to dispense with this proclamation? The plain answer is, that a regulation of this kind, though originally of Church institution merely, may become so embedded in the customs of the country that it would not be within the power of the Church to dispense with it. I am not saying, however, that it is not within the power of the Church to regulate the practice as to proclamations. It might be found that the present mode of conducting the proclamation had become inexpedient, and that it could be better done in some other way. It would, I think, be within the power of the Church authorities to regulate that matter, and introduce such alterations as were thought advisable. All I do say is, that I do not think that the Church would have the power altogether to abrogate this practice, which, being an immemorial custom, has come to be recognised by the common law of the land.

For these reasons I am compelled to differ from the Lord Ordinary, and to advise that your Lordships sustain the defences.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We were anxious to have the opinion of your Lordships of the First Division not because we differed in opinion but because we felt that a question of such difficulty, and at the same time of such public interest and importance, should receive the most weighty and authoritative decision possible.

In the opinion delivered by your Lordship in the chair I entirely concur.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have felt this case to be interesting, and attended with some, but not much, difficulty. The question is one which, in regard to the quoad sacra parish of Moneydie, I was called on to decide when Sheriff of Perthshire in 1852, and I have now arrived at the same conclusion as I did then—a conclusion in accordance with your Lordship's opinion. Marriage is undoubtedly a civil contract. But the constitution of the contract of marriage is distinct from the procedure by which the sanction of religion is given to the contract. That added religious sanction is appropriate, important, and becoming. But though necessary to the regularity it is not essential to the validity of the marriage, which remains, as Protestant Reformers have always strenuously proclaimed it, a civil contract.

Now, the proclamation of banns is a step of orderly procedure in the celebration of marriage by which religious sanction is given to the contract. It is intended to promote and secure the prior notice of intended marriage, and the

No. 151.
July 7, 1875.
Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c.

becoming regularity of the celebration of marriage, but it does not affect its validity. It is not, I think, a step of civil procedure in the constitution of the marriage, but a step of discipline—a step in the orderly ecclesiastical procedure by which the Church gives sanction, seriousness, and solemnity to marriage as the most important and abiding of human contracts. If this view of the proclamation of banns is correct the result is that the banns may be lawfully and validly proclaimed in the quoad sacra church at Wishaw, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled and the interdict refused.

I shall not presume to add anything more, as I concur entirely in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair.

LORD ORMIDALE, LORD MURE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords of the Second Division having, along with three Judges of the First Division, heard counsel on the reclaiming note against Lord Mackenzie's interlocutor of 30th January 1875, in conformity with the unanimous opinion of the seven Judges, recall the interlocutor complained of, sustain the defences, assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and find them entitled to expenses," &c.

RONALD, RITCHIE, & ELLIS, W.S.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 152.
July 7, 1875.
White, &c. v. Dixon.

WILLIAM LOGAN WHITE AND OTHERS (Raeburn's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Asher—Balfour.
WILLIAM DIXON (Limited), Defenders.—D.-F. Clark—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Moncreiff.

Process—Proof—Jury Trial—Nuisance—River—6 Geo. IV. cap. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 28—13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 49—29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112 (Evidence Act, 1866), sec. 4.—In an action of declarator and interdict brought to prevent the pollution of a river by water pumped from mineral workings the defence was (1) that the defenders had a prescriptive right to send water pumped from the mines into the stream, (2) that the water was the natural drainage of the lands, and (3) that the pursuers had no interest, as the stoppage of the works would not prevent the flow of water from the mines.

Held (dub. Lord Ormidale, aff. judgment of Lord Shand), that the pursuers' motion for a proof before the Lord Ordinary instead of a jury trial should be granted. Proof before answer allowed.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
I.

ON 6th January 1875 Raeburn's trustees, and other proprietors through whose land the river Almond flows, raised an action against the firm of William Dixon (Limited), who were the lessees of certain minerals in the neighbourhood of the river Almond and its tributaries, to have it declared that they were entitled to have the water of the river Almond, and one of its tributaries, the Breich Burn, so far as these streams flowed through their lands, in a pure and unpolluted state. They also concluded for interdict against the defenders discharging any noxious or impure water from their works into these streams.

The pursuers averred that until recently the Breich and Almond had been pure and unpolluted, but that the defenders, in working their pits "by means of pumps or other machinery, take large quantities of polluted water, or other impure matter or substance, from the said pits, and discharge them into or allow them to enter the said Breich River or Burn by means of cuts, ditches, or drains leading from the said pits," and that the water of the Breich and Almond into which it flowed became wholly unfit for primary purposes.

No. 152.

July 7, 1875.
White, &c. v. Dixon.

The defenders explained that the water complained of was pumped out by them in working the "slatey band" seam of ironstone which lay very near the surface and almost cropped out at the river Breich. They averred that this seam had been worked by former tenants before the year 1780, when it had been worked by pits in the bank above the river, "and the drainage water was discharged from a day level into the river." This working by day level had been continued by various tenants, until, owing to the extent of the operations, pumping had to be resorted to; but whenever the pumping ceased the water rose in the workings and flowed from the old levels into the Breich. The effect of stopping pumping would be, it was stated, to drown out all the seams in the mineral field until the water again rose to the old level and flowed thence into the Breich. They further averred that the water, as pumped, was exactly the same as used to flow from the old day levels, which would again flow into the river if the workings were abandoned, and the whole minerals, which were of great value, would be lost. The water, they said, was the natural drainage water of the ground, "not used in any manufacture, and uncontaminated by any artificial process."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—2. The pursuers are not entitled to stop the defenders from pumping the water from their pits and discharging it into the Breich, in respect that (1) the water so pumped is the natural drainage of the ground not used for any manufacture, or contaminated by any artificial process; (2) it is necessary for the working and winning of the minerals that the water should be so pumped and discharged; and (3) the defenders, and their predecessors and authors, have been in use so to pump and discharge the said water for a period greatly exceeding forty years, and are therefore entitled by prescription to continue to do so. 3. The pursuers have no interest to maintain the action, in respect that if the defenders' pumping were stopped the water in question would find its way into the Breich otherwise.

The pursuers moved for a proof before the Lord Ordinary, on the ground that the case was not suitable for a jury trial.

The defenders opposed the motion.

On 24th February 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties, and considered the cause, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation; and appoints the proof to be taken before the Lord Ordinary on a day to be afterwards fixed."*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was nothing to distinguish this case from an ordinary question of nuisance, which would naturally go to a jury. The question of law as to the right of pumping the water could easily be disposed of by the Judge presiding at the trial.

---

* "NOTE.—Had this case been one of the ordinary class of pollution of a stream produced by the refuse of some manufacture I would at once have ordered issues as desired by the defenders with a view to a trial by jury. It is, however, one in which legal questions of novelty and difficulty in reference to the rights of mineral proprietors to drain their workings and otherwise will in all likelihood arise.

"These questions are obviously such as should be determined after a fuller argument than can be given in the progress of a trial before a jury, and, if possible, in a simpler form than that of exceptions to the charge of the Judge; and as I think they will be more satisfactorily disposed of by the Court along with the facts, as these may at the same time be held proved, I have thought it right to allow a proof in terms of the pursuers' motion to that effect."

No. 152.
July 7, 1875. White, &c. v. Dixon.

Prescription was always pleaded in such cases. The Whitadder case,[1] recently in the other Division, was exactly in point, and that had gone to a jury. The difficulty of the case being for the Judge, a bill of exceptions provided the best and simplest form of review, if review were necessary.

Argued for the pursuers;—The case was a very complicated one, and would be far better tried before a Judge than a jury. The defenders pleaded "no interest to sue," so if the case went to a jury they would have to decide on title to sue. The case of M'Fie v. Stewart[2] was one in point, which had been sent to a Judge and not to a jury, because the questions were delicate.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary in this case thought that the point would be better brought out by a proof before answer than by a jury trial, and that because an important question of law underlies the case as to the rights of mineral tenants where the water complained of is not the subject of an opus manufactum. That is the real question which the action is brought to try. The other question to be expiscated, namely, prescriptive use, does not cover the whole ground of the case.

I do not think we should interfere with the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. I should not, however, be prepared to take the Lord Ordinary's ipse dixit upon such a question. I think we ought to see what the special cause is which the parties objecting to a jury trial are prepared to shew.

Here, however, the Lord Ordinary, after hearing the matter fully discussed, has stated the grounds of his opinion, and we have also heard enough to shew that it is doubtful whether there is any pollution at all in the case, except what the defenders call the natural drainage of the ground. That view raises an important point of law, which seems to constitute the essence of the case. I do not say that the natural drainage of the ground is not pollution, merely because it is not the result of a manufacture, if it be produced or used in an unusual way. But it is not clear whether here there is as much or as little pollution as from ordinary rain water. I think a proof before answer is the proper course which the inquiry should follow.

LORD ORMIDALE.—Where, as here, a mere interlocutory judgment regarding a step of procedure, in the course of maturing a case for judgment, is brought under review, I am reluctant to differ from the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships; but I have no hesitation in saying that I would have preferred that the Lord Ordinary had not been deterred by the fear of important points of law arising from sending the case, in its ordinary and natural course, to a jury. Until recently causes of this nature were appropriated to jury trial, and the Court had no alternative but to send them to a jury. Now, however, the Lord Ordinary has it in his power, on cause shewn, to appoint a proof in such cases to be taken before himself. For my own part, I may say that I am not satisfied that any sufficient cause has been shewn in this case for withholding it from a jury, or indeed that any cause has been shewn that might not be urged in almost every case of the kind. As I have already indicated, however, I do not think it would be advisable to differ from the rest of the Court in regard to an interlocutory judgment pronounced in the course of preparing the cause as to the best mode of getting at the merits.

[1] Hume and Others v. Young, Trotter, and Co., Jan. 19, 1875, supra, p. 338.
[2] Jan. 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 408, 44 Scot. Jur. 190.

July 7, 1875. White, &c. v. Dixon.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. The rule as to the nature of the special cause which requires to be shewn is rather flexible. An action for damages for slander has been sent to proof before a Lord Ordinary, and the other Division has treated an insurance case in a similar way. As a matter of expediency in this case I think it would be better to have a proof before answer than to raise the questions of law at a jury trial.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced on 6th July :—" Refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of; and find the reclaimer liable in expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit," &c.

WADDELL & M'INTOSH, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

JANE GRAY, Pursuer and Respondent.—Lancaster.
GORDON MARSHALL, Defender and Appellant.—J. P. B. Robertson.

No. 153.

July 8, 1875. Gray v. Marshall.

Parent and Child—Illegitimate Child—Proof of Paternity.—In an action of filiation and aliment brought by the mother of an illegitimate child, held that the pursuer's allegation of intercourse with the defender was not established by her own testimony, and by evidence of opportunity during the course of an acknowledged courtship, no suspicious circumstances being proved.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Linlithgow, Clackmannan, and Kinross. I.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff-court at Alloa by Jane Gray against Gordon Marshall, carter, for the aliment of an illegitimate child, of which the defender was alleged to be the father.

The facts sufficiently appear from the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute (W. B. Clark), which was as follows :—" Finds that the parties were acquainted with each other for two or three years, and that the defender for several months prior to July 1874 was courting the pursuer with a view to marriage, and that he visited her and frequently walked with her in the evenings in March, April, May, and June of that year on the roads about Dollar, where the parties resided, particularly on the Dollarbank road : Finds that the pursuer depones that in the months above mentioned the defender had carnal connection with her at the side of or near the said road : Finds that on a day in the beginning of July following the pursuer quarrelled with the defender in consequence of his having expressed dissatisfaction that she was encouraging the attentions of another man, and that she thereupon refused to see him again, and the parties never met thereafter till November, when she went specially and informed him of her pregnancy : Finds that the pursuer gave birth to an illegitimate male child on 4th February 1875, of which she depones that the defender is the father : Finds that there is no evidence of suspicious circumstances or improper familiarities on the part of the defender, and that his meetings with the pursuer were known to and recognised by the pursuer's family and acquaintances : Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender is the father of her said child : Therefore assoilzies him from the conclusions of the summons : Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.

The Sheriff (Monro) on appeal, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and found the paternity proved.*

* " NOTE.—The Sheriff does not regard the proof as affording ground for the

No. 153.

July 8, 1875.
Gray v. Marshall.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have come to agree with the Sheriff-substitute, and am unable to adopt the general views on which the Sheriff has decided this case in favour of the pursuer.

The proof comes to nothing but this,—This girl and the defender were acknowledged lovers, in the habit of courting together as persons in that rank do, with the entire approbation and knowledge of the pursuer's parents. This is not the case of clandestine meetings, or meetings at unreasonable hours, or in a suspicious way. All that is proved is that when the pursuer got out in the evenings she and her acknowledged lover were in the habit of taking walks on the hillside of Dollar, and in the roads and lanes in the neighbourhood. That is all that is proved besides the oath of the pursuer.

The question is, whether mere opportunity afforded by honourable courtship amounts to sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's evidence. I should be very sorry to affirm any such proposition.

It appears that the pursuer and defender had a quarrel. This is not without significance. No intimation was made at that time to the defender of the pursuer's state, or until long afterwards.

In short, apart from the pursuer's evidence, there was nothing suspicious on the part of the defender.

LORD NEAVES.—I entirely concur in your Lordship's observations, and in the result at which you have arrived.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur. The case is well summed up in a single finding in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor:—"Finds that there is no evidence of suspicious circumstances or improper familiarities on the part of the defender, and that his meetings with the pursuer were known to and recognised by the pursuer's family and acquaintances."

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal: Find that the respondent (pursuer) has failed to prove that the appellant (defender) is the father of the respondent's child libelled: There-Sheriff-substitute's finding that the defender 'was courting the pursuer with a view to marriage.' The defender depones he was 'sweethearting with her,' and the pursuer depones that the defender was 'courting her.' These expressions do not necessarily imply a courtship with a view to marriage, and the word marriage is not mentioned in the proof, although some parties no doubt regarded the intimacy as a 'regular courtship.' Even if the defender had an intention of marrying the pursuer that goes a short way, in the Sheriff's opinion, to exclude a 'prælibatio matrimonii,' unfortunately too common. The very frequent meetings of the parties for a year and a half, their evening walks, often certainly in the dark, on the roads about Dollar, and particularly in the little frequented road to Dollarbank, afforded abundant opportunities for sexual intercourse. The defender admits that he kissed the pursuer, and that he sometimes walked with her up the bank off the Dollarbank road, at a part where there was no fence; and the pursuer explains without contradiction that at the side of the road there are uneven places entirely out of view of the road, and adds that it was there she and the defender had connection. It was no doubt for dalliance of some kind that they left the road; no other explanation of it is offered. It is a case of solus cum sola in loco suspecto."

---

fore recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and assoilzie the appellant from the conclusions of the summons: Find the respondent liable in expenses in both Courts," &c. No. 153. July 8, 1875. Gray v. Marshall.

H. & A. INGLIS, W.S.—KEEGAN & WELSH, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM FINDLAY, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Trayner.
JAMES MACKENZIE, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour.

No. 154. July 9, 1875. Findlay v. Mackenzie.

Testament—Destination—Conditional Institute—Heirs and Assignees.—In the construction of a will left by a husband, held that a disposition of his whole means and estate in favour of his wife, and "her heirs and assignees whomsoever," was intended to be contingent on the wife's survivance, and that her heirs were not named as conditional institutes.

Opinion (per Lord President) that as a general rule, where there is a mortis causa disposition to a person, his heirs and assignees, failing the disponee, his heirs will take.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS was an action by William Findlay, Blantyre, against James Mackenzie of Glentore, concluding for reduction of the will of the deceased John Todd of Glenduffhill, dated 8th October 1872, on the grounds of incapacity and facility. The pursuer was a nephew and one of the representatives in mobilibus of the deceased. The defender was sole executor and universal legatee under the will sought to be reduced.

The defender stated as a preliminary defence that the deceased had executed another will on 27th April 1866, which excluded the pursuer's claims.

He pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuer's title and interest to sue the present action are excluded by the said disposition and settlement of 27th April 1866.

The deed of 1866 was in these terms:—"I, John Todd, Esquire, of Glenduffhill, near Shettleston, being desirous to settle my affairs for the event of death, and considering that I have already fully provided for my daughter, Mrs Janet Todd or Mackenzie, wife of James Mackenzie, Esq., of Glentore, in an antenuptial contract of marriage entered into and executed by and between the said James Mackenzie and my said daughter with my advice and consent, and that it is my wish to provide farther for my wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, in the event of her surviving me, over and above the provisions already conceived in her favour in an antenuptial contract of marriage between me and her, and in the foresaid marriage-contract of my said daughter,—Therefore I do hereby dispone, assign, and convey to and in favour of my said wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, wherever situated or addebted, which shall belong and be addebted and owing to me at the time of my death, ... and I hereby nominate and appoint my said wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, to be my sole executrix . . ."

Mrs Todd died in 1869. The provisions in her favour in her own and her daughter's marriage-contracts were so expressed as to be contingent on her survivance, as is explained in the opinion of Lord Deas.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the preliminary defences, and more particularly on the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and considered the debate and whole process, finds that, according to the sound construction of the general disposition and settlement executed by the now deceased John Todd of Glenduffhill, of date 27th April 1866, referred to and founded on in the defences, the disposition of the testator's whole means

No. 154.

July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, thereby granted to his 'wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever,' was evacuated by her predecease: Therefore repels the said defences, and appoints the cause to be enrolled with a view to further procedure, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.— . . . . The Lord Ordinary . . . . has adopted and has given effect to the view presented by the pursuer, for the reasons which will now be briefly explained.

"Two things, however, may be premised. The first is, that both parties are agreed that the passage now to be quoted from Erskine's Institutes (b. iii. t. 9, s. 9) is good law. He there says that 'a legacy, where it is devised to a legatee and his executors, is not evacuated by the predecease of the legatee, but passes after the testator's decease to the legatee's executors, not by any right which these executors derive from the legatee to whom that legacy never belonged, he having died before it could have effect by the testator's death, but in their own right as conditional institutes in the legacy.' There is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, no room for distinction between a legacy which, as generally happens, is only a sum charged upon or payable out of the executry, and one which is a bequest or disposition of the whole moveable succession, and therefore on the present occasion the question is not whether Mr Todd could, by disponing his estate to his wife and her heirs and assignees, constitute these heirs conditional institutes, but whether this was done by the deed in which such words are used in the dispositive clause. The second of the things to be premised is, that as the deed in question is a mortis causa deed, the intention of the testator as that is evidenced, not by one part of the deed but by the deed as a whole, is the rule by which the present controversy must be determined. This, the Lord Ordinary understood, was not disputed at the debate; and, at anyrate, the point is one which, as he thinks, is firmly fixed. Taking, then, the deed as a whole, or, in other words, reading the dispositive clause in the light thrown upon it by the context, what is the result established?

"The dispositive clause mentions heirs and assignees, but this is not conclusive, otherwise the rule last mentioned would be displaced. Indeed, assignees, as was admitted by the counsel for the defender, could and would take nothing, Mrs Todd having predeceased the testator. They, whether deriving their right through an inter vivos or through a mortis causa deed, could claim nothing which was not vested in their author. This of itself shews that there may, in the dispositive clause, be a grant in form of words to representatives of a legatee, who, nevertheless, will be entitled to nothing unless the legatee shall acquire the succession. Heirs or executors undoubtedly occupy a more favoured position. They may take though the nominatim disponee or legatee died before the testator; but whether they shall or shall not take depends on the purpose for which they were introduced into the destination. Are they conditional institutes, or, in other words, independent legatees, called to the succession in case of the predecease of the nominatim legatee? Or are they mentioned merely by way of limitation? The context must be referred to before these questions can be answered.

"Turning, then, to the context, which has here to be consulted, the Lord Ordinary, in the first place, thinks that the purpose for which the general disposition and settlement of 1866 was granted, as explained by the testator in the clause introductory to that containing the disposition, leads almost necessarily to the conclusion that the disposition as granted was contingent on the survivance of Mrs Todd. The testator's wish was to increase the provisions already conferred on her 'in the event of her surviving' the testator. The 'therefore' with which the dispositive clause begins has for its antecedent this purpose, and it is hardly conceivable that the heirs of Mrs Todd, for whom, independently, no desire to provide was expressed, were to be free from the condition by which the right conceived in her favour was effected. In the second place, the clause of the deed in which the executor is nominated also shews that the heirs of Mrs Todd were not regarded by the testator as conditional institutes. Had they

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There was no doubt of the general rule of law that under such a destination as the present the heirs of the disponee were called as conditional institutes.[1] It was true that if the other parts of a testamentary deed disclosed a contrary intention that intention would be given effect to. But, in dubio, the dispositive clause must rule. And the inference drawn by the pursuer from the references to other provisions in the wife's favour, and from the appointment of the wife as sole executrix, was not justified. He knew his wife, but he could not tell who her heirs would be, and the law would confer on them the office of executors. Besides, the unnecessary and inappropriate mention of a cause of granting did not invalidate a legacy.[2]

The pursuer argued that the question was entirely one of intention, and that the testator's intention was clear that his wife's interest should be contingent on her survivance.

At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—The deceased John Todd, afterwards of Glenduffhill, was married to the also deceased Helen Coats, in 1844. On that occasion an antenuptial contract of marriage was executed between the spouses, to which James Todd, then of Glenduffhill, father of John, became a party, and conveyed the lands of Glenduffhill to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, but for the wife's liferent only, and to the children of the marriage in fee, but under the real burden of payment to the wife, if she survived her husband, of £15 for mournings, and a liferent annuity or jointure of £40, restrictable to £12 in the event of her second marriage, and also under the real burden of her liferent, in the event of her survivance, of the upper flat and garrets of the mansion-house of Glenduffhill, to be suitably furnished, and a convenient garden and the driving of her coals, but all to be forfeited in the event of her second marriage.

In June 1865 Mr Todd's daughter, Janet, who was the only surviving child of his then subsisting marriage with the said Helen Coats, was married to the defender, James Mackenzie. Mr Todd, on that occasion, became a party to an antenuptial marriage-contract between these spouses, whereby he conveyed his estate of Glenduffhill to "himself in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to the said Janet Todd and the heirs of her body or her assignees and disponees, whom all failing, to the nearest heirs whomsoever of the said John Todd" himself; but under the reservations and burdens following,—1st, under reservation of the said John Todd's liferent allenarly; 2d, under the burden of implement-been so, they, in case of her predecease, would have been appointed, but they are neither named nor referred to in the clause containing the nomination. The testator nominates and appoints 'my said wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, to be my sole executor.' This is all that was required, if she was the only person intended to take under the disposition, but it is not all which was required, and certainly was not all which was to be expected, if the will of the testator was that her heirs were to take in the event of her predeceasing the testator. Their omission from the nomination seems plainly to suggest that, though mentioned in the dispositive clause, they were mentioned because they might take through Mrs Todd, and not because the testator intended to make them independent legatees, or, in other words, conditional institutes.

---

"Numerous decisions were referred to at the debate, and these have been taken into consideration by the Lord Ordinary, but there is in truth little, if any, controversy between the parties as to the law of the case, and therefore he thinks it unnecessary to bring them here under review. All will be found collected on pp. 634-36 of the first volume of Mr M'Laren's Treatise on Wills."

[1] Ersk. 3, 9, 9; Boston v. Horseburgh, 1781, M. 8099. [2] Ersk., 3, 9, 8.

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

ing the whole provisions exigible from the said lands in favour of Mrs Todd (Helen Coats), contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage of 1844, between her and the said John Todd, but excluding the liferent thereby provided to her of the upper flat and garrets of the old mansion-house; 3d, under the burden of the liferent use, in the event of her survivance, of the new mansion-house (erected by Mr Todd), offices and garden, in lieu of the upper flat and garrets and garden of the old mansion-house; 4th, under the burden of payment to Mrs Todd, if she survived her husband, of a liferent annuity of £20; and 5th, under reservation of Mr Todd's right to feu for buildings and to work minerals, &c. The destination of the estate of Glenduffhill in this deed became afterwards the subject of decision in this Court on 18th July 1874 (ante, vol. i. 1203.)

In the meantime, on 2d April 1866, Mr Todd executed the mortis causa deed now under consideration. That deed proceeds on the narrative that the granter had already fully provided for his daughter (Mrs Mackenzie) by the antenuptial contract executed with his advice and consent between her and James Mackenzie, "and that it is my wish to provide farther for my wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, in the event of her surviving me, over and above the provisions already conceived in her favour in an antenuptial contract of marriage between me and her, and in the foresaid marriage-contract of my said daughter." On this narrative the deed proceeds,—"Therefore, I do hereby dispone, assign, and convey, to and in favour of my said wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable," under the burden of his debts, funeral expenses, and such gifts or legacies as he might leave,—"and I hereby nominate and appoint my said wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, to be my sole executrix, reserving power to alter, and dispensing with delivery in usual form."

Mrs Todd predeceased her husband, having died on 2d February 1869. Their daughter, Mrs Mackenzie, died without issue on 7th September 1872, having survived her mother, but predeceased her father. After the death of his wife and daughter Mr Todd executed two deeds, both dated 3d October 1872, the one conveying his estate of Glenduffhill to Mr Mackenzie, under burden of the granter's debts, and a variety of legacies, and the other conveying his personal estate to Mr Mackenzie. Mr Todd died on 7th June 1873, leaving a sister, Mrs Frame, several nieces, and a nephew by another sister, Mrs Findlay, and a nephew, James Todd, who was his heir-at-law, being the son of a deceased brother. The deed conveying Glenduffhill to Mr Mackenzie has been reduced on the ground of want of capacity, facility, and circumvention, and the present pursuer, as one of Mr Todd's next of kin, now seeks, on similar grounds, to reduce the deed which conveys the personal estate to Mr Mackenzie. The pursuer is met by the preliminary objection that the title and interest to reduce this last-mentioned deed is not in the pursuer, but in the heirs of Mrs Todd under Mr Todd's mortis causa deed of April 1866. These heirs,—who have hitherto made no claim,—are said to be her nephew, James Coats, in regard to heritable succession, and her brother James Coats, and two sisters, as regards moveable succession. It is not said, however, whether Mr Todd left any other heritable estate than the lands of Glenduffhill; but we know, from previous litigation, that the inventory of his personal estate was given up at £1277 odds, including a debt of £1068 odds due by Mr Mackenzie himself. The Lord Ordinary has repelled the defence that the pursuer's title and interest are excluded by the deed of 1866, holding that Mrs Todd's heirs were not conditional institutes under that deed, but that the conveyance in favour of Mrs Todd was conditional on her surviving her husband, which she did not do; and in the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary I entirely concur, although I do not adopt all the observations contained in his note.

As regards legacies, properly so called, the general rule is that they become void by the predecease of the legatee, because they are presumed to have been bequeathed from personal favour to the individual. Lord Stair accordingly states the rule thus:—"This is common to all legacies, that if the legatar die before the testator the legacy becomes void, and is not transmitted to the heirs and successors of the legatar"—(Stair, iii. 8, 21).

Mr Erskine, in the passage cited at the bar and quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note, states what is really an exception to or qualification of the general rule, and he states the reason of it, namely, that when the legacy is bequeathed to an individual and his executors, the executors take not as succeeding to the nominatim legatee but as conditional institutes by the direct and expressed will of the testator. That is quite a reasonable exception or qualification, because the natural way of bequeathing a legacy, properly so called, is to bequeath it simpliciter to the individual; and if the testator adds, "and his executors," or, what would be the same thing, "and his heirs," the fair inference is that he had extended his personal favour to these heirs or executors, and this inference has been so often given effect to that, although originally exceptional, it may now be said to be equally well established with the more general rule laid down by Lord Stair.

It is not, however, quite safe to regard the rules applicable to proper legacies, which are made a burden on the heritable or moveable succession, as equally applicable to a dispositive clause either of heritable or moveable estate. It may be either more or less difficult in the one case than in the other to construe the words "heirs and assignees" as importing a conditional institution. I do not go into that question. All I say is, that I am not prepared to concur in the Lord Ordinary's remark that there is no room for distinction between the language of a legacy and the language of a dispositive clause in a mortis causa deed. The last is the case we have to deal with here, and, in dealing with it, I go entirely upon two things,—in the first place, that this is a deed granted in implement of a natural obligation, and, in that respect, more analogous to deeds of provision by a parent in favour of a child than to any other class of deeds; and, in the second place, that, in its very terms, it imports a provision for the wife in the event of her survivance only.

In the case of Russel, 10th March 1769, M. 6372, a father granted a bond of provision in favour of his second son David, his heirs, executors, and assignees, payable at the first term after the death of the granter. David died before his father, and his sister Marion claimed the provision, but the successful argument was,—"Bonds of provision are granted in implement of the natural obligation, and as that ceaseth by the death of the child they are understood to fall." The observation was made that if David had left a child there might have been a conjectura pietatis in favour of that child (Hailes, p. 288), and this remark was given effect to in the subsequent case of Wood v. Aitchison, 26th June 1789, M. 13,043.

The law thus applicable to provisions to children has been long quite settled. Heirs and assignees are held to mean heirs and assignees of the child if the

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

implied condition of survivance is implemented, but not otherwise. The provision is held to have been made from affection for the particular child, and to provide for the maintenance of that child after the death of the father. Much of the same reasoning is applicable to provisions for a widow. But, in the present case, it is not necessary to resort to presumptions, for the terms of the deed read in connection with the two deeds to which it refers, make the testator's meaning unmistakeable. All the provisions conferred by the marriage-contract between the testator and his wife, and all the provisions conferred on her in their daughter's contract of marriage, were expressly made conditional upon her survivance of her husband; and when the testator narrates these provisions, and his wish to provide farther for her, over and above these provisions, and then says, "therefore" he conveys to her his means and estate, so far as not already conveyed to his daughter, I cannot doubt that he meant the additional provisions to be equally conditional with the provisions to which they were added. The appointment of his wife to be his sole executrix points in the same direction. Of course a man may convey his means and estate by a mortis causa deed to his wife and her heirs, intending the heirs to be conditional institutes, just as he may convey them to anybody else. But here I think the testator neither meant to do so, nor actually did so.

The case of Boston, M. 8099, was altogether different. The conveyance by the testator in that case was in favour of his brother John, his heirs and assignees. That was not a conveyance in implement of what the law regards as a natural obligation. John married and had a son Alexander, who survived his father for several years in the lifetime of the testator, who nevertheless left the deed uncancelled and unrevoked, and the Court (altering the judgment of the Lord Ordinary) "found the disposition effectual to the heir of John." I have no fault to find with that decision. I rather think I should have concurred in it. But it is altogether different from the present case, in regard to which I have no hesitation in concurring in the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I also concur in the result which the Lord Ordinary has arrived at, and I do so upon the second ground which he has explained in the note to his interlocutor, viz. that as this is a mortis causa deed the words of the dispositive clause must be construed with reference to the intention of the testator. The question is, what is the meaning of the words "her heirs and assignees whomsoever" under the deed of April 1866? Do they place these parties in the position of conditional institutes, or are they merely substitutes? And the intention in this respect must, I apprehend, be gathered from the whole context of the deed, and not from the dispositive clause alone, especially when, as in this case, a special object and purpose is set out in the introductory narrative, which proceeds as follows:—"Considering that I have already fully provided for my daughter, ... and that it is my wish to provide farther for my wife, Mrs Helen Coats or Todd, in the event of her surviving me, over and above the provisions already conceived in her favour in an antenuptial contract of marriage between me and her, and in the foresaid marriage-contract of my said daughter,—Therefore I do hereby dispone, assign, and convey," &c. So that in construing the dispositive clause of this deed we are necessarily thrown back upon the narrative, in order to ascertain what the testator intended, and what had been already done in the marriage-contracts; and from the passages read by Lord Deas from these contracts it appears that all of the provisions in Mrs Todd's favour were made conditional upon the event of her survivance. Having regard, therefore, as well to the qualifying words of the deed, "in the event of her surviving me," as to the general object of the testator, it appears to me that there is here what is equivalent to an express declaration of intention that this provision was to be of the same description as those in the marriage-contract, and that the disposition of the estate was to be conditional upon the survivance of the wife, and only to take effect in that event, in supplement of provisions already made on her behalf.

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

I do not, therefore, think that in this case the words "heirs and assignees" must necessarily be construed as importing a conditional institution; for if they were so construed the result would be to make the testator do a different thing from what he has said in this deed that he intended to do.

In adhering to this judgment I do not think we can be said to go against the decision in the case of Boston, which was pronounced when the weight of judicial authority upon the bench was very great. But we have no report of the opinions of the Judges, and there was nothing, in my apprehension, in the words of the deed in that case similar to what occur here, and which appear to me to lead to a clear conclusion that it was not the testator's intention to make his wife's heirs and assignees conditional institutes.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As I concur with your Lordships, I should hardly have thought it necessary to offer any observations, but this is a case of considerable importance to the law, and I think it desirable to make it as clear as I can upon what grounds we arrive at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, because I confess I cannot concur with some of the reasons and of the legal propositions contained in his Lordship's note.

I think the true construction of this deed is that the beneficial interest conferred upon Mrs Todd was contingent on her survivance. The dispositive clause is conceived in general, and I think I may say, common terms. It is a disposition to Mrs Todd, and "her heirs and assignees whomsoever," of the testator's whole means and estate, heritable and moveable. In the general case, that is an out and out conveyance, not only to the disponee, but, failing the disponee, to his or her heirs. The expression "heirs and assignees whomsoever" is very common in our conveyancing, but it certainly does not bear the same meaning in every kind of deed. In a disposition proceeding on a sale the conveyance is always to the disponee, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but the meaning is nothing more than would have been imported by a disposition to the purchaser himself. The words are mere surplusage and matter of style. But it is otherwise where these words follow the name of the disponee in a mortis causa disposition, either of heritage, or of a mixed succession, or of moveables. The general rule is that, failing the disponee, his heirs will take. One suggestion has been made in the way of construing these words and taking off the presumption which arises from the meaning which they usually bear which I cannot adopt, namely, that the addition of the words "and assignees," rather takes off from the effect of naming heirs. But there is nothing inconsistent in a conveyance to a person and his heirs if he predeceases, and his assignees if he does not predecease and assigns his right. And so it has happened, that in a great number of cases where the right of the heirs has been sustained the words

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

"and assignees" were adjected, and a competition arose between the assignees to whom the legatee had assigned his right before it vested, and the heir-at-law, and in all these the heir-at-law was preferred, simply because the party who had assigned had no power to do so. But that only shews that the addition of the word "assignees" does not militate against the right of the heir, failing the original disponee.

But while it is a general rule in construing the words "heirs and assignees whomsoever" in deeds of this description that, failing the disponee, the heir takes, that is only a general rule.

If the deed itself in its other parts, or the circumstances of the testator as disclosed in the deed, and other legitimate evidence, or the nature of the provision made, or the character of the relation in which the testator stands to the beneficiary shew a contrary intention, then we must construe these words differently.

Now, in this case, we are bound to take into consideration that the party intended to be benefited was the testator's wife, and we know it is a general rule that provisions in favour of wives to take effect after death are personal to the beneficiaries, and take effect only in the event of their survivance. It is also established here, by competent and legal evidence, that in previous provisions in Mrs Todd's favour everything depended on her survivance. The provisions contained in her own marriage-contract, and equally those in her favour contained in her daughter's marriage-contract, were only to take effect in the event of her becoming Mr Todd's widow, and there is an express declaration in the inductive clause of this deed that it is the testator's desire and purpose that the new provisions should be supplementary to those already made. It is true that he says that he is desirous to settle his affairs. That intention might account for more than a mere provision to his wife. But when he proceeds to say that having fully provided for his daughter he wishes further to provide for his wife, it is rather indicated that that was the only purpose of the deed. Then come the important words, "in the event of her surviving me, over and above the provisions already conceived in her favour in an antenuptial contract of marriage between me and her, and in the foresaid marriage-contract of my said daughter."

Now, I am far from saying that the inductive cause as expressed in the narrative, in other words, the motive as expressed in the narrative, and the dispositive clause, must always be commensurate. We know that that is not so in many deeds. But still, in dubio, it is quite fair to refer back to an expression of intention in the narrative, for the purpose of seeing what is probably meant by the words used in the dispositive clause.

If the words in the dispositive clause of this deed were in all cases voces signatæ, then I should say, both on principle and authority, that nothing could derogate from their effect except an implication so strong from other parts of the deed as to amount to express direction. But I do not think that these words in a deed of this description have a fixed technical meaning.

I do not attach much importance to the use of the word "therefore," because, if a testator says "considering that I have made such and such provisions, I hereby convey so and so," that is just equivalent to saying "therefore I convey." The word "therefore" does not connect the dispositive clause more closely than it would have been connected without it. I think, with Lord Deas, that the circumstance of this being a provision to a wife brings this case nearly within the principle of cases of bonds of provision to children. The object is very much of the same character. It is not to confer the succession on either a stranger or a member of the testator's family for the purpose of making an exhaustive settlement. The object is rather to make a suitable provision for a particular individual, and though the deed does contain a conveyance of the testator's entire means and estate we know that the great bulk of his estate was the property of Glenduffhill, otherwise settled, and that what he had beyond that was not very great.

No. 154.
July 9, 1875.
Findlay v. Mackenzie.

The only respect in which the provision made by this deed differs from former provisions made in favour of the wife is, that the former provisions were only for her liferent, whereas this one is given absolutely.

And it rather seems to me that it is this difference which led the testator to use the words "heirs and assignees whomsoever," for these words are very often used, and in cases of a disposition of heritage by a seller to a purchaser are invariably used, for the purpose of expressing somewhat emphatically that the conveyance is absolute.

On these grounds I come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, but I think it will be necessary to recall his Lordship's interlocutor, for I certainly cannot concur in some of the grounds upon which he has rested his judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Vary the said interlocutor by deleting the words 'evacuated by her predecease,' and substituting in place of them the words 'conditional on her surviving her husband'; Quoad ultra adhere," &c.

DUNCAN & BLACK, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

No. 155.
July 9, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Complainers.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—R. Johnstone.
THOMAS WATT AND MANDATARY, Respondents.—D.-F. Clark—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.
THOMAS BUCHAN AND ANOTHER, Respondents.

Superior and Vassal—Irritancy ob non solutum canonem—Railway—Compensation—Property—Lands Clauses Act (8 Vict. c. 19)—Railway Clauses Act (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33)—Bankruptcy—Trustee—Real and Personal—Assignation.—The proprietor of a piece of land bounded by the sea flood brought a statutory claim of compensation against a railway company on the ground that the land, which had been used for shipbuilding, had been injuriously affected by the formation of the railway upon the shore, whereby access to the sea was cut off. When the railway was formed the land belonged to a vassal of the claimant, paying a feu-duty of £150, who had been sequestrated. The trustee in the vassal's sequestration did not take up the feu, and the superior subsequently obtained decree of irritancy of the feu ob non solutum canonem. The trustee, on condition that the superior made no claim for feu-duties, assigned to the superior any claim of compensation competent to him. Held that the proprietor had no title to insist in the claim (1) in virtue of the decree of irritancy, because the claim of damages, if any, was personal to the vassal, and was vested in the trustee, or (2) in virtue of the assignation, as the trustee had no power to grant it.

Question, whether a claim for compensation on account of the value of land being injuriously affected by the operations of a railway cutting off its access from the sea was competent under the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Acts, either to the proprietor of the dominium utile, or to the superior for his interest.

No. 155.

July 9, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

1st Division.
Ld. Mackenzie.
B.

In December 1873 Thomas Watt of New York intimated to the Caledonian Railway Company a claim for £7500, compensation under the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845,[1] and the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,[2] for injury done by the formation of the Dundee and Perth Railway to a piece of ground near Dundee, bounded by the sea flood, of which he was proprietor. The claim bore that the ground was "injuriously affected by reason of the formation and construction of the said railway along or over part of the shore of the river Tay ex adverso of the subjects above described, thereby depriving the same of their frontage to and access and egress by the sea and sea-shore, and rendering the same valueless for shipbuilding purposes, for which, previous to the construction of said railway, they were used, or for any other purpose requiring a sea frontage."

Watt named Mr T. Buchan as his arbiter.

The railway company named an arbiter under protest, and brought this suspension, praying for interdict against Watt and the arbiters from proceeding with the reference.

They pleaded, inter alia ;—1. The complainers are entitled to the interdict craved, in respect (1) the respondent, Mr Watt, has set forth in his said claim, and has, no sufficient title to insist therein.

The nature of Watt's title to claim compensation, as set forth by him, and the state of the facts, about which there were no dispute, was as follows :—

Watt became proprietor of the superiority of the subject by disposition from his grandfather in 1839. At that time John Calman was proprietor of the dominium utile, paying a feu-duty of £150. Calman was sequestrated in 1843, after which no feu-duty was paid. No title to the property was made up by the trustee in his sequestration.

In 1853 Watt obtained declarator of irritancy of the feu ob non solutum canonem, and in April 1873 the trustee on Calman's estate, with concurrence of the commissioners, assigned to Watt the compensation claims, whatever these might be, competent to him as trustee, against the railway company, on condition that Watt should relieve the estate of any claims for feu-duties or otherwise competent to him.

The Dundee and Perth Railway Act was passed in 1845, and the railway was opened in 1847.

The Lord Ordinary, on 13th January 1875, pronounced this interlocutor :—"Sustains the complainers' plea, that the respondent, Thomas Watt, has not set forth in his answers any sufficient title to insist in the claim for compensation against the complainers set forth in the closed record : Therefore sustains the reasons of suspension, suspends, prohibits, interdicts, and discharges in terms of the note of suspension and interdict : Declares the interdict formerly granted perpetual, and decerns."*

---

[1] 8 Vict. c. 19. [2] 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33.

* "Note.—(After stating the facts)—The claim to compensation for any injury done to Calman's feu-subjects by the construction of the Dundee and Perth Railway vested in the party then interested in these lands in or prior to 1847. The party so interested was William Myles, the trustee on Calman's sequestrated estate. By the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' section 82, the trustee is bound to 'manage, realise, and recover the estate belonging to the bankrupt, wherever situated, and convert the same into money,' according to the directions of the creditors, and, if no such directions are given, with the advice of the commissioners. By the 115th section of that statute it is declared competent to the trustee, with concurrence of a majority of the creditors, and of

No. 155.

July 9, 1875.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

Watt reclaimed, and argued;—1. Irrespective of the assignation, he had (1) a claim to compensation as proprietor of the whole subject, by virtue of the decree of declarator. The irritancy was retroactive. The superior could not sue for past feu-duties. As it was retroactive against him it ought also to be so in his favour. When the feu-incumbrance was worked off by the decree he turned out to be the true owner. The trustee was never the owner, and only the true owner could sue. And it was not a personal debt, such as could have been sued for by an executor. (2) At all events, there was injury to Watt as superior. The ground no longer yielded him £150. The claim, as stated, included all claims of compensation competent to Watt as owner of the ground, though his claim for injury to the superiority was not separately stated. Supposing the heritable creditors, if any, and of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, 'to sell the heritable estate by private bargain, on such terms and conditions regarding price and otherwise as the trustee, with concurrence of those parties, may fix;' and by the 136th section it is provided that 'if on the lapse of twelve months from the date of the deliverance actually awarding sequestration it shall appear to the trustee and commissioners expedient to sell the heritable or moveable estates not disposed of, and any interest which the creditors have in the outstanding debts and consigned dividends, they shall fix a day for holding a meeting of the creditors, to take the same into consideration; and the trustee, besides advertising the same in the "Gazette," shall, fourteen days before the day appointed, send by post to each creditor claiming on the estate a notice of the time and place of the meeting, with a valuation of the estates, and of the outstanding and the consigned dividends; and if three-fourths in value of the creditors assembled at the meeting shall decide in favour of a sale, in whole or in lots, the trustee shall cause the estates, debts, and dividends to be sold by auction, after notice thereof, published at least one month previous to the sale, once in the "Gazette," and in such other newspapers as the creditors at the meeting shall appoint.'

---

"Mr Myles, as trustee on Calman's sequestrated estate, did not comply with any of the statutory directions, but entirely disregarded them, and granted, with concurrence of the commissioners on the estate, the above-mentioned assignation of 19th April 1873, in favour of the respondent. That assignation is a gratuitous deed. The obligation thereby imposed upon the respondent, Thomas Watt, as a condition of the assignation, that he should free and relieve the sequestrated estate of any claims for feu-duties, or otherwise, competent to him, against the same in any manner of way, does not make the deed onerous, because the superior, having taken decree of irritancy ob non solutum canonem, had no claim for payment of any feu-duties in arrear. It is not averred, and it does not appear, that he had any other claims against the sequestrated estate. If there was any claim for compensation (which is now said to amount to £7500) competent to the trustee against the Dundee and Perth Railway Company, or against the complainers as now in right of that company, it was the duty of the trustee to recover the same for behoof of the creditors in the sequestration, and he was not entitled gratuitously to assign such claim. He was not even entitled to sell the same, except in the way and manner pointed out in the 136th section of the Bankruptcy Act. A private onerous sale by the trustee and commissioners of a debt forming part of the sequestrated estate has been held illegal and ineffectual (Crichton v. Bell and Gillon, 11 Shaw, 781; Robertson v. Adam, 19 D. 502).

"The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that the assignation by the trustee on Calman's sequestrated estate does not confer any title upon the respondent under which he can insist in his claim of £7500 for compensation against the complainers. He is also of opinion that the respondent, Thomas Watt, did not acquire any such title, in respect of the decree of declarator ob non solutum canonem obtained in 1853, or of the title in his favour following thereon."

No. 155.
July 9, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

land had been taken, there was no doubt that the superior was entitled to compensation, and it made no difference that the ground was only "injuriously affected."[1] 2. The assignation was not an improper act on the part of the trustee, because it did not injure the bankrupt estate. The claim could not have been taken up for the bankrupt estate without incurring responsibility. Therefore the assignation was not void; and, assuming that the claim was personal and passed to the trustee the assignation gave Watt a formal title to it.

The complainers argued;—It was not admitted that operations of the kind in question founded any claim of damage.[2] But if there was a claim it was personal and was vested in the trustee.[3] The decree of irritancy could not annul that personal right belonging to the vassal, and the trustee had no power by his renunciation to vest in any third person a right which passed to him by the legal assignation of sequestration. The case of Heron v. Espie established the principle that such claims became personal as soon as they emerged. The proprietor could discharge such a claim by receipt, or convey it by assignation. It was attachable by arrestment, and would have been carried by a will.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a suspension and interdict by the Caledonian Railway Company for the purpose of stopping the respondent from proceeding with a claim of compensation before certain arbiters under the Railway and Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts.

The claim is for damage done to property near Dundee by the construction of the Dundee and Perth Railway. The railway was completed and opened in 1847, so that the alleged damage was sustained upwards of twenty-six years ago, and this is apparently the first time that any demand for compensation has been made. That, however, would not be in itself a sufficient reason for interfering with the respondent in prosecuting his claim if the proceeding is open to no other objection. The property is described in the claim as being ground "injuriously affected by reason of the formation and construction of the said railway along or over part of the shore of the river Tay ex adverso of the subjects above described, thereby depriving the same of their frontage to and access and egress by the sea and sea-shore, and rendering the same valueless for shipbuilding purposes, for which, previous to the construction of said railway, they were used, or for any other purpose requiring a sea frontage."

It is apparent from this statement, and from the claim otherwise, that no part of the property was taken by the company for the purposes of their works. The claim is in respect of damage to property injuriously affected. The competency of such a claim might raise a point of some difficulty, which it is not necessary at present to consider, because the only point raised by this reclaiming note is, whether, assuming such a claim to be competent to the owner of the property, the respondent is in the position of the owner who has sustained the damage, and, as such, is entitled to maintain the claim.

The first ground stated by the railway company in support of the suspension is, that the respondent "has set forth in his said claim, and has, no sufficient title to insist therein." The title set forth by the respondent is this,—He says

---

[1] 8 Vict. c. 19, secs. 107, et seq.; 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, secs. 6, 16.
[2] Ogilvy v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 30, 1856, 2 M'Q. 229.
[3] Heron v. Espie, June 3, 1856, 18 D. 917, 28 Scot. Jur. 420.

No. 155.
July 9, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

that he is the heritable proprietor of the subject, in virtue of a disposition and settlement by his grandfather, conveying to him specially the dominium directum of the subject, the owner of the dominium utile being one John Calman, a ship-builder in Dundee, and the conveyance of the dominium directum giving to the claimant the right only to receive a feu-duty of £150, payable out of the subject by Calman. The claimant farther produces an instrument of sasine following on that disposition, and two other instruments, the first, a decree of declarator of irritancy ob non solutum canonem at his instance against John Calman, the feuar, dated 8th November 1853, and the other, an assignation to the claimant by the trustee on Calman's sequestrated estate, of any right or interest which he had in the claim now sought to be prosecuted. Now, it is necessary to keep the dates in view. The feu-right was constituted in 1838. Calman, the feuar, was sequestrated in 1843 before the railway was formed. The injury must have been done between 1845, the date of the Railway Act, and 1847, when the railway was opened. Let us assume that the injury was done in 1846. Now, at that time the feu still remained a separate estate altogether, independent of the dominium directum. No doubt the feuar was sequestrated, and not in a condition, we may suppose, to pay the feu-duty. But whether he was in arrear or not, there was no proceeding by the superior against him. The trustee in the sequestration naturally in the cirumstances did not take up the feu. The superior sometime afterwards, finding that the vassal was bankrupt, and that the trustee would not take up the feu, proceeded to bring an action of irritancy, and obtained decree on 8th November 1853. Now, it is to be observed that, previous to 1853, there was nothing in the person of the claimant or his predecessor except the dominium directum, and consequently the right to levy the feu-duty. The effect of the decree of declarator was to extinguish the feu, and so restore matters, in so far as they could be restored, to the same condition in which they were before the feu-right was given out. The plenum dominium was vested in the party holding previously the dominium directum.

Now, it is maintained that the consequence of that decree is, that the claim which had emerged to the feuar, or the trustee in his sequestration, in consequence of the operations of the railway, became vested in the superior. I cannot assent to that proposition. It seems to me that the claim, if there was one, which opened to the bankrupt in 1846, and passed to the trustee if he chose to take it up, was a claim for compensation in respect of injury done to the bankrupt's property. It was not a claim to have the property restored to its original condition. That was physically impossible. Therefore, there came in place of that a personal claim of damages,—a claim personal to the individual who happened to be owner of the estate at the time. If a person in that position sells the estate, he does not sell the claim. He may make it the subject of special assignation, but the two rights are separate and distinct. The property is heritable, and, as such, can only be conveyed by disposition in common form. The claim is personal, and may be conveyed by assignation and sold separately from the property. In like manner, when a judicial transference of the estate takes place, for example, an adjudication, it will not cover the personal claim, and will carry nothing but the heritable estate. If that be so, will it make any difference that an involuntary transfer has taken place, not following upon the diligence of creditors, but by some other means? Suppose the deteriorated estate is taken by the operation of some other Act of Parliament, would the promoters get anything but the ground? I apprehend not.

No. 155.
July 9, 1875.
Caledonian Railway Co. v. Watt.

They would not get the claim, because it is no part of the estate. Well, if the superior exercises his statutory right of taking decree of irritancy and gets back the estate, or, in other words, extinguishes the feu-right, that is, the real right which exists in the vassal, he cannot get anything except the dominium utile as it stands at the date of the decree. It is in vain to say that the superior takes back the estate which he gave the vassal. He can only take back what remains of it. Suppose the minerals on the estate had been wrought out he would have no claim for them, or even if money was owing to the vassal for minerals which had been wrought out the decree of irritancy would not carry that debt. In short, the superior takes back the dominium utile just as it stands, deteriorated it may be since the creation of the feu by the act of the vassal, the operation of law, or the effect of physical forces. That being so, the claimant did not get right to the claim of damages by the decree of declarator. But if he, as superior, acquired no right to the claim of damage, in whose person was it, always supposing it has any real existence? It belonged to the trustee in the sequestration. The trustee has conveyed it to the claimant by assignation. The Lord Ordinary has held that he was not entitled to do so, and that the assignation is void. In that conclusion I agree. If this was a valuable right the trustee had no right to dispose of it gratuitously, and so I think the claimant's contention is just as ill founded on that ground as it is upon the other. That seems to establish that, in so far as the alleged damage was done to the dominium utile, or, as the claimant would represent it, the plenum dominium as vested in his person, it is clear that he cannot maintain his claim.

It has been suggested, however, that he may have a claim in respect of the feu-duty, because if the ground is so deteriorated that it cannot be used for shipbuilding or other purposes which require access to the sea—then the security of the superior is diminished, if not altogether taken away, and I am not prepared to say that, assuming this kind of injury to be a proper subject for a statutory claim of compensation, the superior may not make such a claim as well as the vassal. But then we have no such claim before us. If we refuse this interdict the arbitration goes on, and it can only proceed on this claim. We have no power to amend it or alter it. It is a statutory claim, and must be disposed of by the arbiters as it stands, if the proceeding goes on. Therefore, this not being a claim for damage done to the superior, but a claim which I do not think belongs to the respondent at all, for damages to the vassal's estate, I agree with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

HOPE, MACKAY, & MANN, W.S.—H. & A. INGLIS, W.S.—Agents.

PETER BEATTIE (Inspector of Barony Parish), Pursuer.—Burnet—R. V. Campbell.
GEORGE GREIG (Inspector of City Parish, Edinburgh), Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Black.

No. 156.
July 9, 1875.
Beattie v. Greig.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

Poor—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 71—Settlement—Desertion—Notice.—Mary Goldie or Rivers, a native of Edinburgh City Parish, wife of John Rivers, a native of England, became chargeable as a pauper to Barony Parish on 5th February 1869, and received relief from that parish with short intervals till her death on 18th November 1871. Notice was given by the Barony Parish on 15th April 1869 to the Edinburgh inspector, who did not admit the claim, and a correspondence was kept up from time to time till the pauper's death. When she became chargeable she was deserted by her husband, but he came back in May 1869, and lived with her till his death on 19th January 1870. Notice was again given to Edinburgh on 24th August 1870.

In an action by the inspector of Barony Parish against the inspector of Edinburgh, as the parish of the pauper's birth, for repayment of the amount of her aliment during the whole time of her chargeability, held (1) that Edinburgh was liable for the period from February 1869 to May 1869, the pauper being at that time the deserted wife of a man who had no settlement in Scotland; (2) that Edinburgh was not liable for the period from May 1869 to January 1870, when the husband was at home; (3) that the pauper having ceased to be chargeable to Edinburgh on the return of her husband a fresh notice was necessary upon his death, and Edinburgh was not liable from the date of his death till 24th August 1870, the date of the second notice; (4) that Edinburgh was liable for the period from 24th August 1870 till the pauper's death.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—D. CURROR, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS JANE LORD OR BROCKIE AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—Burnet.

No. 157.
July 10, 1875.
Brockie.

Trust—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict., c. 97, sec. 12—Appointment of New Trustees.—The Court will not appoint new trustees under an English trust, even where part of the trust-estate consists of heritable property in Scotland.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

IN 1850 the late Thomas Brockie, wine and spirit merchant, Oldham, executed an indenture in the English form by which he conveyed in trust to two persons therein named certain heritable subjects in Scotland, and two policies of insurance on his life.

The persons named as trustees accepted the trust, and the conveyance of the policies of insurance was duly intimated to the insurance companies, but no title was made up by the trustees to the heritable estate.

Mr Brockie died in October 1874 a domiciled Englishman, having survived both the trustees.

The present petition was presented by Mr Brockie's widow and eldest son, two of the beneficiaries under the indenture, for appointment of new trustees under sec. 12 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867. The petitioners suggested two Englishmen as trustees. The prayer of the petition was "to appoint the said Joseph Hargreaves and Clement Wrigley, and the survivor of them, or such other persons as your Lordships may think fit, to be trustees under the said deed of trust made and granted by the said Thomas Brockie, with all the powers incident to that office, and with power to them to assume trustees in terms of the said deed of settlement;

No. 157.
July 10, 1875.
Brockie.

and further, to grant warrant to complete a title in favour of the trustees to be so appointed to the moveable estate specified in the inventory annexed, amounting to £999, 19s. or thereby, and to all bonuses and other sums payable under the policies of assurance mentioned in said inventory; or otherwise to do in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

Authority was not craved to make up titles to the heritable estate in the persons of the trustees to be appointed, because Mr Brockie was not feudally vested in the subjects.

The Lord Ordinary, on 3d July 1875, refused the prayer of the petition.*

The petitioners reclaimed.

It was stated for them that similar applications had been granted in the Outer-House, and reference was made to the case of Hall,[1] where it was said the application was refused on special grounds.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is beyond question an English trust. The person who made it was a domiciled Englishman. No doubt, the trust included heritable estate in Scotland, but the administrators appointed are English administrators. The question is whether the Scotch Trust Act of 1867 is applicable. I am clearly of opinion that it is not. If we were to hold that it was applicable we should be conferring on English trustees powers which it is quite possible might be inconsistent with the law of England, under which they are bound to administer. The consequence would be either that the trustees appointed by us would be bound to administer according to the law of Scotland, and perhaps contrary to the provisions of the English law, or we should be appointing trustees who would not be bound to carry out the provisions of the Act under which they were appointed.

* "NOTE.—The indenture of 14th November 1850 is an English deed, the meaning and legal effect of which this Court is incompetent to determine without the aid of an English Court or of counsel learned in English law. Assuming that a trust is thereby well constituted, and that there are interests thereby created which require the protection of some judicial interposition to supply trust machinery in lieu of that which has failed according to the representation in the petition, I am of opinion that this is not the Court to resort to for that purpose. It is an English trust created by an English deed for behoof of English beneficiaries, and it is for the English Court having jurisdiction in the matter to afford any remedy which the circumstances may require. This Court may have to determine whether or not the indenture is efficacious to carry real property in Scotland, but under this petition the only question is about repairing the machinery of the trust, which is said to have broken down, and it appears to me that this is a question for the determination of the proper Court in England. With respect to any property in Scotland which the deed may be held effectually to carry we shall certainly recognise the validity of any appointment which the English Court having jurisdiction in the matter of the trust may see fit to make. In the case of a Scotch trust we should not hesitate to supply a failure of trustees in circumstances which seemed to us to require that this should be done, although part or all of the property affected by the trust happened to be in England, and I think it improbable that an English Court would interfere or hesitate about leaving the matter to our determination. By interfering in this case we might do great injustice, and an appointment by us might be disregarded by the Court in England which has jurisdiction in the trust, and is undoubtedly competent to make any appointment that may be required."

[1] Hall and Others, petitioners, March 13, 1869, 7 Macph. 667, 41 Scot. Jur. 357, see note of Lord Barcaple in reporting the case.

It may be matter of regret that we cannot make the appointment craved, but we have no alternative. No. 157. July 10, 1875. Brockie.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MASON & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

CAPTAIN H. YOUNG.—Balfour. No. 158.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Rutherfurd.

July 10, 1875. Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Income-Tax, liability to be Assessed for—Master Mariner—Property-Tax Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 1, schedule (D), and sec 39.—Held that the master of a merchant vessel trading between Glasgow, the Mediterranean, and New York, who was absent from the country for more than nine months in the year, and was only resident in it during the remainder for short periods of two or three weeks at a time, but whose wife and family resided in Glasgow in a house of which he was tenant, and in which he resided when on shore, was resident in Great Britain in the sense of the Property-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, and was liable to be assessed for income-tax on his salary as master.

1ST DIVISION. B.

CAPTAIN H. YOUNG, master of the steamship "Olympia," belonging to Messrs Henderson Brothers of Glasgow, appealed to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against an assessment for the year 1874-75 made upon him under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 1), in respect of his salary as master mariner, on the ground that he had not been resident within Great Britain, in the sense of that schedule, during the year of assessment.*

The Commissioners were of opinion that the appellant was assessable, and confirmed the assessment.

The appellant craved a case for the opinion of the Court under the provisions of 37 Vict. c. 16 (The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1874), secs. 8, 9, and 10, which was accordingly stated by the Commissioners.

The case set forth that the vessel of which the appellant was master traded between Glasgow, the Mediterranean, and New York, and that during the year of assessment he had been less than three months in Great Britain, for periods of two or three weeks at a time. He admitted, however, that he was tenant of a house in Glasgow, which was occupied by his wife and family during his absence, and by himself when in this country.

Appearance was made for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Argued for Captain Young;—By the term "residing in Great Britain," used in schedule D, was implied a reasonable amount of personal residence. There were no direct decisions on the point, but the cases which had occurred under the Poor-Law Acts were analogous, and supported the principle that actual and not constructive residence must be regarded.[1]

* Sec. 1 enacted, that from and after 5th April 1842 duties should be levied, inter alia, under schedule D, ... "upon the annual profit or gain arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere, there shall be charged yearly, for every twenty shillings of the amount of such profits or gains, the sum of four pence."

[1] Hutchison v. Fraser, Feb. 11, 1858, 20 D. 545, 30 Scot. Jur. 294; Aberdeen Infirmary v. Watt, Dec. 15, 1858, 21 D. 117, 31 Scot. Jur. 91; M'Gregor v. Watson, March 7, 1860, 22 D. 965, 32 Scot. Jur. 410; Greig v. Miles and Simpson, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1132, 39 Scot. Jur. 617; Moncrieff v. Ross, Jan. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 331, 41 Scot. Jur. 196; Jackson v. Robertson, Jan. 7, 1874, ante, vol. i. p. 342.

No. 158.

July 10, 1875. Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Argued for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue;—The cases referred to under the Poor-Law Acts dealt with residence as affecting domicile. The present was a question of residence as involving liability to taxation. In that view the appellant must be looked upon as merely a temporary absentee, and, therefore, notwithstanding such temporary absence, chargeable under schedule D, and the 39th section of the Act of 1842.* Though there were no decisions directly bearing on the point in Scotland, the Court of Exchequer in England had, in a case under the old Property-Tax Act, 46 Geo. III. c. 65, pronounced a decision[1] which supported this view.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This assessment is laid on under schedule D of the Property-Tax Act, 1842, "upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain, from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere," and the only question is, whether the person assessed is resident within Great Britain.

There can be no doubt that his case is in every other respect within the terms of schedule D. He makes an annual gain in the shape of salary by his employment or vocation of master mariner, and it does not matter whether that employment or vocation is carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere.

Now, while there are many persons residing in Great Britain who never leave it, and many more who do not leave it frequently or for long periods, there are also many who are constantly on the move, leaving and returning. This latter class is increasing every day with the activity and restlessness of the population. Therefore I cannot think that anything like continuous residence is contemplated by the statute. The decisions under the poor-law which were cited to us have therefore no application. I should rather imagine that if a man has his ordinary residence in this country, it does not matter whether he is absent for a longer or shorter period during the year. That depends upon his occupation, tastes, and habits. Some people are engaged in such business as takes them constantly away from home,—for instance, the class to which the appellant belongs, and which is now a very extensive one. The question is therefore of general importance.

The appellant is master of a trading vessel which hails from Glasgow. When not at sea he lives at Glasgow, and when at sea he is represented at Glasgow by his wife and family. That he has in the ordinary meaning of the words a residence in Glasgow is beyond all doubt. It is equally clear on the facts stated that he has no other residence, for a sailing-ship on the high seas, or in a foreign or colonial port, cannot be recognised as a residence. I think what is

---

* 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35 (Property-Tax Act, 1842), sec. 39, enacts "That any subject of Her Majesty whose ordinary residence shall have been in Great Britain, and who shall have departed from Great Britain and gone into any parts beyond the seas, for the purpose only of occasional residence, at the time of the execution of this Act, shall be deemed, notwithstanding such temporary absence, a person chargeable to the duties granted by the Act as a person actually residing in Great Britain, and shall be assessed and charged accordingly (in manner hereinafter directed) upon the whole amount of his profit or gains, whether the same shall arise from property in Great Britain or elsewhere, or from any allowance, annuity, or stipend (except as herein is excepted), or from any profession, employment, trade, or vocation in Great Britain or elsewhere."

[1] Attorney-General v. Coote, June 13, 1817, 4 Price, 183.

No. 158.
July 10, 1875.
Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

meant by the statute is better expressed by "dwelling-place" than by "residence." His only dwelling-place is Glasgow, where he dwells when he is at home, and where his wife and family dwell when he is at sea.

The 39th section of the Act of 1842 was referred to. It enacts,—(His Lordship read the section as quoted, supra, p. 926, note). A doubt has been raised whether that provision applies to the present case,—whether a man who trades between Glasgow and New York can be said to have "departed from Great Britain and gone into any parts beyond the seas, for the purpose only of occasional residence." But, supposing he cannot, the terms of the section are still important. They shew that the Legislature recognises that the continuity of ordinary residence may be broken by the person going elsewhere, for the purpose of occasional residence, yet nevertheless retaining his actual residence in Great Britain. This throws a great deal of light upon the provisions in schedule D. I entertain, therefore, no doubt that this man's ordinary residence in this country fixes his liability for income-tax, though his absences in any one year may be of very considerable duration, provided they are not distributed in such a way that his residence in any other particular country is actually longer than his residence in Great Britain. The duration of the appellant's absences is accidental and fluctuating; it varies with the fluctuations of trade, and his absence may be for a very long time, and yet be only temporary, for it is in the prosecution of a purpose of a temporary character.

I was much struck with the case to which Lord Ardmillan drew our attention,[1] where a citation by leaving a copy of the warrant with the person's father "within his said father's dwelling-house in Newburgh, with whom he lives and resides when not at sea, to be given to him, because I could not find himself personally," was sustained as a good citation. Lord Jeffrey says,—"The addition here, 'when not at sea,' just means that his father's house is where he lives and resides when not absent on business. There are many men whose business is peripatetic. They are less in the bosom of their families than more fortunate men, but they have a residence." And Lord Mackenzie says,—"Every sailor has a residence on land. We have no persons who are born and live and die on the water. The execution just certifies that he is a sailor, and has a residence on land with his father." That case appears to me to have much more bearing on the present than the cases about residential settlement under the poor-law. The appellant, as I think, though a sailor in active employment, has his residence in Glasgow, and is therefore liable in income-tax under the provisions of schedule D.

LORD DEAS.—This assessment is laid on under the clause in schedule D of the Property-Tax Act of 1842 which your Lordship has read. It is certainly an important question whether this appellant, and others in a like position, are resident in Great Britain in the sense of that enactment. A second question has also been raised, whether, if the appellant does come under the clause in schedule D, there is anything in section 39 of the Act to take him out of it.

In considering these questions I look exclusively at the statute. All the argument which was submitted to us by both parties on the Poor-Law Act was, in my opinion, only calculated to mislead. As one of your Lordships remarked, the Poor-Law Act was not passed for the purpose of levying a tax, but for the [1] Brown v. M'Callum, Feb. 14, 1845, 7 D. 423, 17 Scot. Jur. 217.

No. 158.
July 10, 1875.
Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

purpose of providing a maintenance for the poor. We are dealing here with a statute which lays a tax upon the whole nation, so far as wealthy enough to fall within its scope. Now, though an Act imposing a tax upon a particular class of individuals is to be strictly construed, an Act like the present, which aims at equality of taxation, is to be construed in favour of general liability rather than against it.

I do not see how it can reasonably be doubted that this appellant is resident in Great Britain in the sense of the statute. I think it equally clear that there is nothing in the 39th section to exempt him. He can, so far as I can see, derive no benefit from the terms of that section. If it throws any light at all on the question it rather favours the view of the Crown, by shewing that the Legislature contemplated that there might be temporary absence without involving the cessation of ordinary residence.

I am, therefore, of opinion with your Lordship that the deliverance of the Commissioners is right.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

D. CROLE, SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE.—Agent.

No. 159.
July 10, 1875.
Cadzow v. Lockhart.

WILLIAM CADZOW, Pursuer.—Balfour—Mackintosh.
SIR SIMON MACDONALD LOCKHART, Defender.—Adam.

Process—Jury Trial—Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 112), sec. 4—Reparation—Damages—Game.—Where by the lease of a farm, under which the game was reserved to the landlord, it was "expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, or rabbits, during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm," held, in an action of reparation for damage by rabbits, that, in view of the difficulties of construction which must arise upon this clause at the trial, the case was unsuited to be sent to a jury, and that this was sufficient cause why the proof should proceed before a Lord Ordinary under the Evidence Act, 1866, but the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof altered, by adding the words "before answer."

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

THE pursuer, William Cadzow, was tenant under the defender, Sir S. Macdonald Lockhart, Bart., of Lee and Carnwath, of the farms of East and West Nemphlar.

The lease of East Nemphlar was entered into in 1858, and that of West Nemphlar in 1864. The former was understood between the parties to be for nineteen years, though, having been entered into during the pupillarity of the then proprietor of the estate, it was nominally only for one year. The latter was for seventeen years.

Both leases contained a clause of reservation in these terms:—"Reserving also to the proprietor and his foresaids the sole right to the whole game and fish of every kind within the lands hereby let, with full power to himself and to those having his permission to hunt, shoot, or fish and sport on the farm without liability in damages; and the tenant shall be bound to preserve the game of all kinds to the utmost of his power, to interrupt poachers and unqualified persons, and to give information of them to the proprietor and his foresaids, or those acting for him or them; and it is hereby expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, or

No. 159.

July 10, 1875.
Cadzow v. Lockhart.

rabbits during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm."

The pursuer, on the allegation that there had been a great increase in the rabbits on the farms since the succession of the defender to the estate in May 1870, and particularly that a waste stripe of ground lying between the farms and the river Clyde had been turned into a rabbit-warren, and that he had suffered loss, injury, and damage thereby during the five years from Whitsunday 1870 to Whitsunday 1875 to the extent of not less than £120 a-year, raised this action of damages against the defender, concluding for £600.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage to the extent sued for from the undue increase of rabbits on his farms, and on the adjacent ground belonging to the defender, as condescended on, he is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender is entitled to be assoilzied, in respect that all claims of damages are excluded by the pursuer's leases.

The Lord Ordinary, on 29th June 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows to the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the defender a conjunct probation: Grants diligence against witnesses accordingly," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The case should have been sent to a jury. It was a claim of damage to crops by rabbits. It was therefore one of the enumerated causes under the Judicature Act of 1825.[1] It did not fall under the exceptions contained in the clause of relaxation in the Act of 1850.[2] It must necessarily have been sent to a jury prior to the passing of the Evidence Act of 1866.[3] Under that Act consent of parties or special cause shewn were the only grounds on which such a cause could be sent to proof before a Judge. There was no consent of parties. Nor was there any special cause shewn. It was the common case of game damage. The pursuer required to establish increase since the lease was entered into—that the increase was material, and that it brought the total stock of rabbits up to what was unreasonable. If there was any peculiarity in the case arising from the clause of reservation the Judge would give his directions to the jury at the trial. There was nothing in that clause which should render the case more unmanageable for jury trial than any other.[4]

Argued for the defender;—The Lord Ordinary was right in refusing the pursuer a jury trial, though he should have qualified his interlocutor by making it before answer. The defender's plea that all claim for damages was excluded by the terms of the leases was eminently prejudicial, and had not been disposed of. Moreover, the existence of that plea and of the clause of reservation in the lease on which it was founded was sufficient special cause to warrant the Court refusing a jury trial. The clause of reservation took the case quite out of the ordinary rule. Very difficult questions of construction must necessarily arise upon it, and thus rendered the case unsuitable for jury trial.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the defender in this case has shewn good cause

---

[1] 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 28.
[2] 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, sec. 49.
[3] 29 and 30 Vict. c. 112, sec. 4.
[4] Morton v. Graham, Nov. 30, 1867, 6 Macph. 71, 40 Scot. Jur. 37; Syme v. Earl of Moray, Jan. 14, 1868, 6 Macph. 217, 40 Scot. Jur. 133.

No. 159.

July 10, 1875.
Cadzow v. Lockhart.

why the proof should proceed before the Lord Ordinary under the Evidence Act of 1866, rather than that the case should be sent to trial before a jury.

The terms of the clause of reservation of game in the lease are very peculiar, and delicate questions of law may probably arise as to what is the kind of proof rendered necessary thereby in order to enable the tenant to get the better of that clause. The result of the case will clearly depend on the construction which the Court may put upon the clause. The Lord Ordinary has declined—and I think rightly declined—to give any opinion upon that question of construction until the proof is before him. At least that is the real meaning of his interlocutor allowing proof,—though he neither disposes of the prejudicial pleas, nor reserves them by making the proof before answer, and in that respect his interlocutor must be corrected. Now, the course which the Lord Ordinary has taken has this advantage, that the parties will be able to bring his judgment on the construction of this clause before us for review by the ordinary method of reclaiming note, whereas, had he sent the case to a jury, the only means of obtaining such review would be by a bill of exception.

But there is this further consideration, that there would be extreme difficulty in adjusting issues here. The issue allowed in Syme's case clearly would not do. We could not give it without previously deciding on the construction of the clause in favour of the tenant. The issue in that case was just the ordinary issue applicable to a case where there are no specialties such as there are here.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to, adding the words "before answer."

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Vary the interlocutor by adding the words 'before answer' after the words 'to the pursuer a proof'; and, quoad ultra, adhere to the interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note, reserving expenses."

J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—HECTOR F. M'LEAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 160.

July 13, 1875.
Mitchell v. Macfarlane.

WILLIAM MITCHELL, Pursuer.—Harper.
AGNES MACFARLANE, Defender.—Brand.

Cessio—Condition—Future Earnings.—Held that a person incarcerated for failure to pay a sum of damages awarded for seduction, breach of promise of marriage, and aliment, who was not possessed of any property, but had been earning 27s. a-week before his incarceration, was not entitled to the benefit of cessio, except upon condition of granting an obligation to pay weekly to the incarcerating creditor a portion of his wages, which fixed at one-sixth.

2D DIVISION. R.

IN May 1874 Agnes Macfarlane raised an action of damages against William Mitchell, a diver, for breach of promise of marriage and seduction, and also for aliment. Before the proof was taken a tender was made by Mitchell of twenty-five guineas and expenses. The offer was accepted and decree was given for these sums.

Upon this decree Mitchell was incarcerated by Macfarlane on or about 10th March 1875.

Mitchell then raised the present process of cessio. Decree of cessio was opposed by the incarcerating creditor, except upon condition of Mitchell undertaking to give up a portion of his future earnings.

The Court remitted to the Sheriff of Midlothian to take Mitchell's examination. The following facts were brought out by the examination:— Mitchell had seduced Macfarlane, who bore a child to him, and he had afterwards married another woman; the child had since died; Mitchell's wages, when he was last working, were 27s. a-week; but he had sometimes earned higher wages; he had never paid any part of the sum due to Macfarlane, nor contributed to the aliment of the child; he was not possessed of any funds. No. 160. July 13, 1875. Mitchell v. Macfarlane.

The undernoted cases were cited for Macfarlane.[1]

Mitchell having declined to come under any obligation with respect to his future earnings, the Court, on 2d June 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect the pursuer declines to come under an obligation to make provision for payment of any part of his debt to the incarcerating creditor out of his future earnings finds that the pursuer is not entitled in hoc statu to the benefit of the process of cessio bonorum."

Upon 13th July 1875 Mitchell renewed his application, stating that he was willing to come under an obligation to pay to the incarcerating creditor such a proportion of his wages as the Court should think proper.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having resumed consideration of the cause, in respect the pursuer is now willing to come under an obligation to pay to the incarcerating creditor weekly out of his wages one-sixth part thereof, find him, upon granting said obligation, entitled to the benefit of the process of cessio bonorum, and appoint him to appear at the bar to make oath in terms of the statute, and grant warrant to the keeper of the prison to bring the pursuer before the Court for that purpose."

J. & A. PEDDIE, W.S.—W. S. STUART, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES GORDON OSWALD, Petitioner.—D.-F. Clark—Thoms. No. 161.

Entail—Application of Consigned Money—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 67.—In an application by an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in the neighbourhood of Glasgow to apply money consigned under the Lands Clauses Act in the purchase of other lands to be entailed, the purchase of a Highland sporting estate in Inverness-shire authorised in the circumstances, and the value (1) of the mansion-house, (2) of timber necessary for the protection and amenity of the mansion-house, and (3) of the shootings and fishings, allowed to be paid out of the consigned money, but the value (4) of other houses not required for purposes of agriculture, and (5) of the other timber on the estate, disallowed. July 13, 1875. Oswald.

THIS was a petition at the instance of James Gordon Oswald, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Scotstoun and others, situate on the north bank of the Clyde, near Partick, partly in the county of Renfrew and partly in the county of Lanark, to uplift and apply consigned money, the price of portions of that estate taken under their respective Acts by the North British Railway Company and the Clyde Navigation Trustees, in the purchase of other lands, to be entailed in the same way as the lands of Scotstoun.* 1ST DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. M.

[1] Russell v. Wood, March 11, 1834, 12 S. 543; Kerr v. Anderson, May 16, 1837, 15 S. 928, 9 Scot. Jur. 434

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, 8 Vict. c. 19, sec. 67, enacts that consigned money, the price of entailed lands, may be applied, inter alia, "in the purchase of other lands, to be conveyed, limited, and settled upon the same heirs, and the like trusts and purposes, and in the same manner as the lands in respect of which such money shall have been paid stood settled."

No. 161.
July 18, 1875.
Oswald.

The petitioner, in respect that from the vicinity of the estate of Scotstoun to Glasgow, and the erection upon it of manufacturing and other public works, it had lost its residential character, proposed to purchase the estate of Aigas, situate four miles from Beauly, in Inverness-shire, and asked the authority of the Court to complete a conditional agreement for its purchase for £19,000, which he had entered into with Mrs Chisholm-Batten, the proprietrix, and her husband. The total amount of the consigned money was £19,765, 12s. 6d.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th February 1875, remitted to Mr R. B. Ranken, W.S., and Mr William Grant, factor to the Earl of Seafield, Glen-Urquhart, to inquire and to report.

Mr Grant reported the value of the estate of Aigas as £19,194, made up as follows:—

1. Land and farm buildings,		£12,884	0 0
2. Mansion-house,		660	0 0
3. Drumnaleac Cottage (about three-quarters of a mile distant from the mansion-house, and suitable for a shooting-lodge,	£500 0 0
School-house,	200 0 0
Saw-mill,	50 0 0
		750	0 0
4. Timber (whereof was necessary for the shelter and amenity of the mansion-house, valued separately, say £400 to £500),		3000	0 0
5. Shootings and fishings,		4000	0 0
		£21,294	0 0
Deducting public burdens, £60 a-year at thirty-five years' purchase,		2,100	0 0
		£19,194	0 0

Mr Ranken in his report drew the attention of the Court to the distance of the estate of Aigas from the original entailed estate of Scotstoun, and to the questions (1) whether the value of the mansion-house, (2) whether the value of the other houses, not required for agricultural purposes,[1] viz. Drumnaleac Cottage, the school-house, and the saw-mill, (3) whether the value of the timber,[2] and (4) whether the value of the shootings and fishings, could be allowed as proper applications of the consigned money in the interest of succeeding heirs of entail.

The Lord Ordinary reported the petition to the First Division.

The petitioner intimated that he was prepared to provide out of his own private funds for the value of any of the items mentioned by the reporter which the Court should think it proper to disallow.

Lord President.—This is an application at the instance of an heir of entail in possession to have consigned money uplifted and applied in terms of the 67th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, "in the purchase of other lands to be conveyed, limited, and settled upon the same heirs, and the like trusts and purposes, and in the same manner as the lands in respect of which such money shall have been paid stood settled."

Now, the entailed estate is situated on the banks of the Clyde, partly in the county of Lanark and partly in the county of Renfrew, while the lands which [1] Duke of Hamilton, Petitioner, June 12, 1858, 20 D. 1134, 30 Scot. Jur. 669.

[2] Boyd v. Boyd, March 2, 1870, 8 Macph. 637, 42 Scot. Jur. 340.

No. 161.
July 13, 1875.
Oswald.

it is proposed to purchase are situated in the county of Inverness, and the first objection which is suggested by the Lord Ordinary is that the lands proposed to be purchased are situated at too great a distance from the original entailed estate. I do not, however, see any great difficulty in this. The 67th section does not limit the petitioner to the purchase of lands adjoining the entailed estate, and in the absence of any limiting words in the statute I do not think we are entitled to listen to this objection.

The other points raised are of more importance, and require more careful attention.

The value of the estate proposed to be purchased is stated by Mr Grant, to whom a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary, at £19,194. The price actually agreed to be paid for the estate, subject to our approval, is £19,000. Either sum almost exhausts the consigned money. But there is included, according to the valuation of the reporter, £660 as the value of the mansion-house, £750 as the value of other houses on the estate not required for agricultural purposes, £3000 as the value of growing timber on the estate, and £4000 as the value of the shootings and fishings.

The question is, whether in regard to these items the purchase is such as ought to be authorised in the interest of succeeding heirs of entail, or whether, if he still wishes the purchase to be completed, the petitioner must not furnish funds out of his own pocket to meet the cost of these items, or at least of some of them.

With regard to the mansion-house, I do not think that there can be any difficulty in holding that it is a good part of the investment of the consigned money.

With regard to the other houses, I am equally clear, on the authority of the case of the Duke of Hamilton, that they are not a good part of that investment.

With regard to the timber, again, though there seems to be a considerable quantity of it, there may not be more than is suitable for shelter and for the amenity of the estate. But then it is part of the subject which the heir of entail in possession can at any time cut down and carry off, and it cannot therefore be considered as a proper investment of the consigned money in the interest of the succeeding heirs. If there can be shewn to be any part of the timber which the heir of entail would not be entitled to cut down, that may stand in a different position. We are told by the reporter, that to the extent of £400 or £500 the timber is such as is necessary for the protection and amenity of the mansion-house, and it is contended, on the authority of the case of Boyd, that in so far as it is necessary for that purpose it is not within the right of the heir of entail in possession to cut it down, and that therefore to that extent it is a good part of the investment of the consigned money. The case of Boyd was attended with considerable difficulty, but the Court there arrived at the conclusion that the right of the heir of entail to cut down timber was not so extensive and uncontrolled as to entitle him, or his creditors in his right, to cut down what was necessary for the protection and beautification of the mansion-house. Following that case, we may, I think, allow the minimum sum stated by the reporter to be taken out of the consigned money, as being a good charge against the succeeding heirs of entail. The remainder must be provided by the petitioner himself.

Lastly, there is the matter of the shootings and fishings. The fishings, I think, need hardly have been mentioned. They are not, in the circumstances,

No. 161.
July 18, 1876.
Oswald.

separate from the shootings. They may have a slight effect in enhancing the value of the shootings, but they have no separate value of their own. I take the £4000 mentioned by the reporter as the value of the shootings alone. Now, if this is not to be taken as a part of the value of the estate in a question with succeeding heirs, I confess I do not think this estate should be purchased at all. The purchase proposed is just the purchase of a Highland sporting estate—a perfectly legitimate object in the present case. That the shooting rental is a recognised part of the ordinary rental of a Highland estate is now beyond doubt, and in questions between heirs of entail and parties in right of provisions out of the estate the shooting value of the estate is invariably taken in computo, whether let or not. Therefore, in a question like the present, the shooting rental of the estate is just as good a part of the annual value of the estate as the agricultural rental. It may be that the shooting rental is a little more precarious than the agricultural rental, but it is none the less recognised as part of the annual value. I am, therefore, of opinion that the £4000 is a perfectly good representative of value in a question with succeeding heirs.

On the whole matter, therefore, I think that the Lord Ordinary should require the petitioner to provide £750 for the houses, and £2600 towards the price of the timber, out of his own private funds, and that on that being done he may authorise the application of part of the consigned money to the rest of the purchase.

Lord Deas.—The only point on which I have any doubt is with regard to the houses other than the mansion-house. I do not think that the case of the Duke of Hamilton supports any general rule that the value of houses not necessary for purposes of agriculture must be disallowed. In that case it is stated that "the houses were the buildings connected with the mill, the machinery of which belonged to the tenant, and the cottage was where the tenant of the mill resided." Now, a portion of the buildings here may, I think, fairly be looked upon as in a different position. The reporter mentions that Drumnaleac Cottage, on which a value of £500 is put, has "a coach-house and stable, quite new, attached," while nothing is said as to the mansion-house having a stable. It is a very reasonable thing that the mansion-house, on a property such as this, should have a stable and other offices, and if there are none attached to it then I think the value of the stable, &c. belonging to Drumnaleac Cottage might fairly be allowed.

On the other points I entirely concur in your Lordship's opinion.

Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the estate of Aigas in the proceedings mentioned is a competent and proper investment of the consigned money, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Find that the value of the mansion-house (£660), and of the shootings (£4000), may be stated as part of the price to be paid out of the consigned money: Find that the value of the timber, to the extent of £2600, and the value of houses other than the mansion-house, are not to be stated as part of the price to be paid out of the consigned money; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as shall be just and consistent with these findings."

R. & J. A. Haldane, W.S.—Agents.

PETER ROBERTSON, Pursuer and Appellant—Lancaster.
THE EARL OF DUDLEY, Defender and Respondent.—Balfour—Keir.

No. 162.

July 13, 1875.
Robertson v. Earl of Dudley.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal for Jury Trial—Statutes 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, and 30 and 31 Vict. c. 100, sec. 73.—Where an interlocutor in the Sheriff-court sustained the plea of the triennial prescription quoad a part of the claim under a summons and allowed a proof prout de jure quoad the rest,—

Held (1) that appeal for jury trial was competent; (2) that appeal being competent, the whole case was removed to the Court of Session, and that it was competent for that Court to review the part of the Sheriff's interlocutor sustaining the plea of prescription.

Observation (per Lord President) on Hamilton v. Henderson, June 10, 1837, 15 S. 1105, 9 Scot. Jur. 529.

Proof—Business-books—Commission and Diligence—Competency.—Circumstances under which, in a question between a landlord and tenant as to whether certain services were to be rendered by the tenant in addition to the rent stipulated, the Court allowed the landlord a diligence to recover the books kept by the tenant in relation to the business of the farm, with a view of shewing the actual profit realised by him during his occupancy.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff-court of Argyllshire in April 1875 by Peter Robertson, late sub-tenant of the farm of Clashgour, which formed part of the Black Mount deer forest, against the Earl of Dudley, tenant of the forest. 1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Argyllshire. M.

The summons concluded (2) for £336, for the keep of eight cows, kept for the defender on the farm of Clashgour during the pursuer's sub-tenancy, from Whitsunday 1867 to Whitsunday 1874; (3) for £112, as the keep of two horses under the same circumstances; and (4) for £700, as the wages due to the pursuer as head keeper to the defender at the forest lodge for seven years, from Whitsunday 1867 to Whitsunday 1874, at £100 a-year. Periodical interest was also claimed on each of these sums.

The Earl of Dudley denied that he was owing the pursuer the sums contained in the 2d, 3d, and 4th conclusions of the summons, and explained, inter alia, that prior to Whitsunday 1867 the pursuer had acted as his head keeper at a wage of £100 a-year; that when at Whitsunday 1867 he became sub-tenant of the farm of Clashgour his services as head keeper, which were to be continued, were taken into account in fixing the rent to be paid, which was diminished by the amount of his wages accordingly.

Besides stating pleas on the merits to the last three conclusions of the summons, he also stated this special plea as to the fourth conclusion,—(4) In any view, the claim for wages prior to Whitsunday 1872 is prescribed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sir G. Home), on 28th April 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows the pursuer a proof habili modo of his averments that his wages up to Whitsunday 1872 are still resting owing: Allows him a proof prout de jure of the other averments contained in the fourth head of the summons, and of those contained in the 2d and 3d heads of the same: Allows the defender a proof of his averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation," &c.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial.

---

* "NOTE.—The pursuer's wages previous to Whitsunday 1872 are clearly prescribed, and he is therefore limited to proof, so far as regards them, by the defender's writ or oath. On the other points there seems to the Seheriff-substitute no doubt that a proof is necessary."

No. 162.

July 13, 1875. Robertson v. Earl of Dudley.

Issues were appointed to be lodged for the trial of the case. When the case came before the Court for approval of the issues it was argued for the pursuer and appellant;—The interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, so far as it limited his proof as to his claim for wages prior to Whitsunday 1872 to writ or oath of the defender, should be recalled, and the whole case should be sent to a jury. The employment of the pursuer by the defender being admitted, and no averment of payment being made, but only of an arrangement in lieu of payment, prescription did not apply, and the arrangement must be proved.[1]

Argued for the defender and respondent;—The appeal was incompetent. Where a plea of prescription was sustained and proof was limited to writ or oath, it was incompetent to advocate,[2] and equally incompetent to appeal for jury trial. Though there could be no doubt that the plea of the triennial prescription did apply, and that the Sheriff's judgment limiting the proof was sound, it was not open to the Court to consider that point, for no appeal was allowed on points of law against an interlocutor allowing a proof. As the Sheriff's deliverance on that point must stand, the case could not be brought to the Court of Session for jury trial, for it was not competent to have part of the case referred to writ or oath in the Sheriff-court and part sent to a jury in the Court of Session.

Farther, even if the Court were of opinion that appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act was competent, trial by jury was not imperative, and the case, being unsuited for a jury, should be sent to proof before a Judge.[3]

Replied for the appellant;—The appeal was competent. Even assuming that the Sheriff was right in sustaining the plea of prescription, it was no objection to an appeal for jury trial that part only of the case could be sent to a jury.[4] But appeal for jury trial brought the whole of a case into the Court of Session, and it was open to the Court before sending a case to a jury to consider whether there had been, as already argued, any undue limitation of proof in the inferior Court.

If the appeal was competent there could be no doubt that the case was well suited for jury trial, and no reason had been stated for a departure from ordinary rule.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and the 73d section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, and it stands in a somewhat peculiar position.

The summons contains several conclusions, the fourth and last of which is for £700, as the wages due to the pursuer as head gamekeeper to the defender for seven years from 15th May 1867 to 15th May 1874.

Now, as regards this conclusion, a plea was taken in the inferior Court founded on the statute of 1579, introducing the triennial prescription, and, accordingly,

---

[1] Shepherd v. Meldrum and Duncan, Jan. 23, 1812, Hume, 394; M'Naughton v. M'Naughton, July 1, 1813, Hume, 396; Anderson v. Halley, June 11, 1847, 9 D. 1222, 19 Scot. Jur. 532.

[2] Hamilton v. Henderson, June 10, 1837, 15 S. 1105, 9 Scot. Jur. 529; Primrose v. Mackenzie, Nov. 18, 1859, 22 D. 1, 32 Scot. Jur. 2.

[3] Sands v. Meffan, Jan. 20, 1829, 7 S. 290, 1 Scot. Jur. 18; Dennistoun v. Rainey, Knox, and Co., May 16, 1871, 9 Macph. 739, 43 Scot. Jur. 408; Chisholm v. Marshall, Jan. 17, 1874, ante, vol. i. 388; Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong, Nov. 24, 1874, supra, p. 148.

[4] Stewart v. Rutherfurd, July 19, 1862, 24 D. 1442, 34 Scot. Jur. 713.

No. 162.
July 13, 1875.
Robertson v. Earl of Dudley.

the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th April 1875 is thus expressed,— "Allows the pursuer a proof habili modo of his averments, that his wages up to Whitsunday 1872 are still resting owing: Allows him a proof prout de jure of the other averments contained in the fourth head of the summons, and of those contained in the second and third heads of the same," &c. Though the Sheriff-substitute does not in proper form sustain the plea of prescription, there can be no doubt of what his meaning was in pronouncing this interlocutor. He meant to limit the pursuer's proof to writ or oath of the defender, so far as the claim for wages up to Whitsunday 1872 was concerned.

The respondent in this appeal, who is also the defender in the inferior Court, objects to this appeal for jury trial as incompetent, because there is here an interlocutor which only in part allows a proof prout de jure, and in part a proof by writ on oath. Reference has been made to the case of Hamilton v. Henderson, decided so far back as June 10, 1837,[1] and to another subsequent case of Primrose v. Mackenzie, decided on November 18, 1859.[2] The latter case seems, however, hardly an authority, because the advocator at once, on the case of Hamilton v. Henderson being referred to, gave up the point. But without questioning the soundness of the decision in Hamilton v. Henderson, the case is open to the observation that the advocator there, admitting that the Sheriff's interlocutor limited him to proof by writ or oath as to the whole cause, nevertheless pleaded that there were no good grounds for such limitation, and that he was entitled to an allowance of proof prout de jure. One would have reasonably thought that if the advocator could have shewn that prescription did not apply, and that the Sheriff was therefore wrong in limiting the proof, that would have entitled him to go on with his advocation for jury trial. But then it must be remembered that at the date of Hamilton v. Henderson there existed another remedy for such a state of matters. The provisions of 50 Geo. III., c. 121, gave the party aggrieved by a limitation of proof in the Sheriff-court a right to advocate on any legal objection that he could state. Therefore the case of Hamilton v. Henderson proceeded rather on the footing that the advocator had mistaken his remedy. He should have advocated under the Act of 50 Geo. III., c. 121, and then having had the Sheriff's interlocutor set right, he would have had his advocation for jury trial under 6 Geo. IV., c. 120. But it is important to observe that under the present system of Sheriff-court procedure it is incompetent to advocate or now to appeal on a legal objection to the mode of proof allowed. Therefore, where a party thinks that the Sheriff has limited unduly the proof allowed, he has no longer a remedy, unless he is entitled to bring his appeal under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, as amended by the Court of Session Act of 1868, and plead his objection here. He would otherwise be tied up to go on and make his reference to oath in the inferior Court, and then when he came here to appeal against the final judgment he would be too late to raise his objection to the mode of proof with effect. If, therefore, the question arose again in a simple form we should require to consider whether the case of Hamilton v. Henderson was applicable to the altered state of the law.

But the case of Hamilton v. Henderson is for other reasons not applicable to the present case. This is not an interlocutor limiting proof to writ or oath, except as regards a portion of the demand. Assuming the Sheriff-substitute right in that partial limitation, or that his deliverance on that point cannot be brought

[1] 15 S. 1105, 9 Scot. Jur. 529.

[2] 22 D. 1, 32 Scot. Jur. 2.

No. 162.

July 13, 1875. Robertson v. Earl of Dudley.

under review, there still remains the question whether, in respect of the proof at large allowed as to the rest of the case, the pursuer is not in a position to appeal for jury trial. I think that he is. To make appeal for jury trial competent it is not necessary that the whole case be sent to a jury, or that the whole case be fitted to go to a jury. For instance, one portion of a case may depend entirely on a question of law and not on fact at all,—or one portion may depend on an intricate state of accounts, of all matters the very last to lay before a jury. In short, one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact that a case may consist of different and separable parts, and if one of them is fitted to be tried by jury, surely it is not to be supposed that it was the intention of the Legislature to exclude entirely that part of the case from the benefit of appeal for jury trial merely because another part of the case is unsuited to be tried by a jury. Therefore, though the Sheriff-substitute may have been quite right in limiting the proof as he did, it is quite competent for us to entertain this appeal.

In the case of Stewart v. Rutherfurd, July 19, 1862, 24 D. 1442, the question was raised whether advocation for jury trial was competent, in respect that only a part of the case could be sent to a jury. Lord Kinloch, before whom the case came as Ordinary, found the advocation nevertheless competent, and that judgment was affirmed, without even calling on counsel for the advocator. That seems to me to decide that the fact that one part of the case cannot be sent to a jury is no reason for refusing altogether an appeal for jury trial.

I am, therefore, against this objection to the competency of this appeal.

But, then, the question remains, what is the next step to be taken. If we were to abide strictly by the judgment in Hamilton v. Henderson we should have to say that we could not entertain the question whether the Sheriff has rightly limited the proof in respect of the plea of prescription or not. The Act 50 Geo. III., c. 121, has been repealed, and there cannot now be an appeal on a point of law against an interlocutor allowing a proof. I do not, however, think that we are bound to deal so strictly with the matter. Although the appeal for jury trial is the only one now competent against an interlocutor allowing a proof, still it has the effect of removing the entire case into this Court. When a part of a case is brought here for trial by jury the rest necessarily follows it. It must therefore be within the competency of this Court to dispose of the whole points in the case, and amongst others, before sending part of the case to a jury, to decide whether the Sheriff was right in his limitation of proof as regards the rest.

But though it is thus competent for us to entertain and dispose of that point, I confess I do not feel the slightest doubt that the Sheriff was right. The statute of 1579 is clearly applicable, and he had simply no alternative but to sustain the plea founded on it.

The case is therefore in this position, that we must adhere to his interlocutor on this point, or perhaps we should rather vary it so as to put it in proper form, and leave the pursuer to proceed with his reference to oath here, the remainder of the case being sent to trial before a jury.

Lord Deas, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure concurred.

The Court then pronounced this interlocutor:—"26th June 1875 . . . . Find that the claim for wages under the fourth conclusion of the summons, so far as regards the period prior to the term of Whitsunday 1872, falls under the operation of the statute 1579,

No. 162.
July 13, 1875.
Robertson v. Earl of Dudley.

c. 81, and can be proved only by the writ or oath of the defender: Quoad ultra appoint the pursuer to lodge amended issues by Wednesday next, the 30th current."

Amended issues were lodged by the pursuer in terms of this interlocutor, and were approved by the Court.

The trial of the case was fixed to take place at the summer sittings for jury trials.

The defender thereafter moved the Court for a commission and diligence to recover the documents mentioned in the following specification:—"All business-books, cash-books, day-books, journals, ledgers, bank-books, memoranda, note or other books, statements of profit or loss, bank and other accounts, balance-sheets, or other documents kept or made by or on behalf of the pursuer, that excerpts may be taken therefrom of all entries therein shewing or tending to shew the profits or losses made by the pursuer from the farm of Clashgour for the period from Whitsunday 1867 till Whitsunday 1874."

The pursuer objected, on the ground that the documents called for did not bear directly on the matter at issue in the case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question to be tried between the parties is whether the pursuer was sub-tenant of Clashgour under the defender on an arrangement for a yearly tenancy at a rate of £230, without any further consideration or condition, or whether, in addition to his rent, the pursuer was to give the defender his services as head keeper, and keep a certain number of cows and horses for him. It becomes a very important matter in trying that question to ascertain what was the true value of the farm of Clashgour at Whitsunday 1867, when the bargain between the parties was first made. If it should turn out that £230 was a fair rent as at that date the defender's case would almost certainly fail. If, on the other hand, it should turn out that £230 was an inadequate rent, that would be strongly in favour of the defender. We may naturally expect evidence of opinion to be led by both parties as to the value of the farm in 1867, and if, as is very probable, the evidence on that point is conflicting, reference to the books now sought to be recovered might contribute much to solve the difficulty. For if it should turn out that the profits of the farm, as shewn by these books during the years of the pursuer's tenancy,—and they give a very good average of Highland sheep farming,—were such as to give a good return to the tenant for his skill, industry, and outlay, and leave a margin over sufficient to cover his salary as gamekeeper and his claims for the keep of the defender's cows and horses, that would, in the eyes of a jury, appear to be an extremely important fact.

Therefore, though averse to allowing diligence for the recovery of books not bearing directly on the matter at issue in a case, I cannot help thinking that the production of the books here sought may materially assist the jury in coming to a just decision between the parties. I am therefore for granting the diligence.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"13th July 1875 . . . . Having considered the motion for the defender, No. 28 of process, grant diligence at his instance against havers for recovery of the documents mentioned in the specification, as amended, thereto annexed, and grant commission," &c.

JOHN GILL, L.A.—GIBSON-CRAIG, DALZIEL, & BRODIES, W.S.—Agents.

No. 163.

July 14, 1875
Auld v.
Shairp.

MRS JESSIE STEWART HOWAT or AULD, Pursuer.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. C. Smith.
JOHN CAMPBELL SHAIRP, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Lancaster.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Illegal Retention of Offices.—A communication by the principal of a college to the patron of a professorial chair therein to the effect that the appointment of one of the candidates would be injurious to the interests of the university, is privileged.

S, Professor of Humanity in the United College of St Andrews, having been appointed to the office of principal of the college, intimated to the patron of the chair of Humanity his intention of resigning that chair at the end of the current session. The patron wrote to A, one of the candidates for the chair, intimating that he had "great pleasure in determining at once to appoint him to the chair," and requesting him to communicate with his (the patron's) agent "when the proper time arrived for completing the appointment." Thereupon S wrote a letter of remonstrance to the patron, stating that A had notoriously failed as a classical master, and that his appointment would be a heavy blow to the prosperity of the college, and concluding with a request to the patron, if it was still possible, to reconsider his resolution. S, at the request of a large majority of his colleagues, continued to retain the chair, along with the principalship, until A's death, a period of two years. The patron took no steps towards filling the chair by issuing a presentation in favour of A or any one else, and remained entirely neutral. After A's death, his widow and executrix raised an action of damages against S, founded on the defender's having illegally, as she maintained, retained the chair of Humanity after he had been appointed principal, and so prevented A from being presented to the chair, and also upon the slander of her husband alleged to be contained in the letter above mentioned. Held, after a proof before answer, (1) that A had no legal nor enforceable right to the chair of Humanity, but merely an expectation of being appointed, and therefore neither he nor his representative could found upon the alleged illegality of the retention of the chair by S as a ground of damage, (2) that the communication to the patron respecting A's qualifications was privileged, and that malice had not been proved.

Question, Whether, by the constitution of the United College of St Andrews the combination of the office of principal with a professorial chair was illegal.

Observations as to how far adverse criticisms on the qualifications of a candidate for a public office are actionable where no special privilege can be pleaded.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Gifford.
R.

SEQUEL of case reported ante, p. 191.

Upon 14th January 1875 this case was again put out for debate, when, after some discussion, the Court indicated an opinion that the law and the facts were inextricably involved in one another. This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having further heard counsel in the cause, in respect the parties express their willingness that the Court shall determine the mode in which the facts shall be ascertained, before answer allow to both parties a proof of their respective averments, and allow the pursuer to add the word 'maliciously' to the 8th article of her condescendence, the proof to be taken before one of the Judges of this Division of the Court, and continue the reservation of the question of expenses."

A proof was accordingly taken before the Lord Justice-Clerk, the result of which sufficiently appears from his Lordship's opinion, infra, p. 942.

The pursuer's pleas are stated on p. 194. The defender, besides the two preliminary pleas there quoted, stated the following pleas on the merits;—(3) The chair of Humanity never having been vacant, the action is unfounded. (4) The combination of the offices of principal and professor of Humanity in the person of the defender not having been

No. 163.

July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

illegal, and having been approved of by the United College, and by the Senatus of the University, cannot form any ground for liability in damages on his part. (5) The defender, not having slandered the late James Auld, is entitled to absolvitor. (6) Any statements made by the defender regarding Dr Auld's unfitness for the Latin chair were, in the circumstances condescended on, privileged. (7) The pursuer, having sustained no damage from the defender, has no right to insist in this action.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no privilege, or, at all events, no such privilege as to cover the communication complained of.[1] Privilege had, in recent times, been extended to many cases where formerly it could not be pleaded, but with this extension the principle had been recognised that privilege must be kept within limits. In any view, malice had been proved, first, by the inconsistency of the statements complained of with the defender's own testimonials formerly given to Dr Auld; and, secondly, by the persistency with which he attacked Dr Auld, after being told by the Duke of Portland that he intended to present Dr Auld to the chair of Humanity so soon as it should become vacant.* Further, the unprecedented and illegal† combination of the offices of principal and professor, with the avowed object of excluding Dr Auld from the chair which had been promised to him, was not only in itself a ground of damages, but must be regarded as tending to instruct legal malice on the part of the defender in the question of slander.

Argued for the defender;—It was well settled that a communication made bona fide upon any subject in which the party communicating had an interest, or in reference to which he had a duty, was privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contained criminatory matter which, without that privilege, would be slanderous and actionable.[2] The defender was acting within the sphere of his duty as principal of the college, in a way in which he was bound, and was certainly entitled to act, when he recommended that a presentation should not be issued in favour of a person whom he thought unfit for the office. As for the statement complained of in regard to Dr Auld's use of testimonials, the defender made no charge of fraud against Dr Auld. He merely expressed an opinion on a point on which there might be an honest difference of opinion. As for malice, there was no evidence of the defender

[1] Milne v. Bauchope, July 19, 1867, 5 Macph. 1114, 39 Scot. Jur. 543.

* Several letters were written by the defender to the Duke of Portland and his commissioner after that of 17th March 1869 (quoted, p. 194, note), expressing the views of himself and his colleagues in regard to the proposed appointment of Dr Auld.

† The Act for uniting the two colleges of St Salvator and St Leonard in the University of St Andrews, 1747 (printed in vol. 3 of the evidence taken before the University Commission of 1826), which proceeds on the preamble of the inadequacy of the salaries of the professors in the two colleges and the expediency of uniting the revenues of the two colleges under one management, and uniting also the corresponding professorships, enacts, inter alia, that the United College "shall consist of the following members—that is to say, one Principal, one Professor of Greek, three Professors of Philosophy, . . . one Professor of Humanity, one Professor of Civil History, one Professor of Mathematics, and a Professor of Medicine."

Since the union of the colleges the principal had never, in point of fact, held a professorship.

[2] Per Lord Campbell in Harrison v. Bush, 1855, 5 Ellis and Blackburn, 344 (see p. 348); Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man, Nov. 1872, L. R., 4 Privy Council App. 495 (see Sir R. Collier's Judgment, p. 504); Hart v. Gumpach, Nov. 1872, ibid. p. 439; Macbride v. Williams, Jan. 28, 1869, 7 Macph. 427, 41 Scot. Jur. 241; Starkie on Libel, 3d ed. p. 267, &c.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

being actuated by any motive other than a desire for the best interests of the university. On the contrary, his personal friendship to Dr Auld was shewn by the testimonials which he had formerly given him. It was said that these were inconsistent with the statement now complained of, but an important matter had occurred in the interval, viz., that the Commissioners on Scottish Burgh Schools had reported unfavourably of Dr Auld's teaching.

The illegality of the combination of the offices of principal and professor of Humanity was a mere assumption on the part of the pursuer. The object of the Act uniting the colleges was to combine inadequate salaries. There was to be not more than one Professor of Humanity, nor more than one Principal. But there was nothing to prevent the two offices being held by one person. But even if the combination was illegal, it could not give Dr Auld or his representatives any direct right of action against the defender. Dr Auld had no vested right to the chair. He had a mere promise of being appointed upon the occurrence of a vacancy. Take the analogous case of the lease of a farm being promised by a landlord to a new tenant upon the expiry of an existing lease: If the old tenant refused to remove, the person to whom the lease had been promised might, perhaps, have an action against the landlord, but he could have no right of action against the tenant in possession.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—When this very interesting and very important case was before us on the question of title we repelled the plea of want of title, in so far as it was pleaded as a bar to the action, and to no other effect; and before further answer we, of consent, allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments. The question which had mainly been argued in that former discussion was, how far the pursuer, as executrix and representative of her deceased husband, Dr Auld, had a title to maintain the claim of damages which is the foundation of this action. We held that the claim was not excluded in respect of the personal nature of the action, because, although it is a claim of damages founded on alleged slander, it sought compensation, not merely for loss of reputation and wounded feeling, but also for substantial loss on account of the exclusion of Dr Auld from the professorship of Humanity in the United Colleges of St Andrews, which is said to have been the result of the slander.

We have now the entire facts before us, and I think, on the whole, that the course which was adopted by the parties, and which we sanctioned, of taking this as a proof before one of ourselves, was the best course which could have been followed. I have now to express the opinion which I have formed upon these facts. The proof, though it is voluminous—I do not say too voluminous,—resolves into one or two very simple and indeed undisputed facts. Dr Auld was made the classical master in the Madras College, I think, about 1849. In the year 1861 some dissatisfaction appears to have arisen in St Andrews in regard to the mode in which his duties were discharged, or, at all events, in regard to the classical department in the college; and the trustees of the Madras College at that time came to the resolution to dismiss him. That intention, however, was not carried into effect. Some of the professors, including Principal Shairp, who was then Professor of Humanity in the United Colleges, and some other townsmen or citizens of St Andrews, interposed and signed a joint-remonstrance to the trustees, pointing out the great hardship that dismissing Dr Auld would be to himself, and saying many flattering and civil things in regard to his competency as a teacher and as a scholar. This attempt to dismiss Dr Auld was not renewed. In 1862 it appears from Mrs Auld's evidence that Dr Auld became a candidate for the head-mastership of the Ayr Academy, and in that year he obtained a variety of certificates from a number of very competent persons in regard to his qualifications, and among the rest, one from Principal Shairp. He did not succeed in obtaining that appointment. In 1866, when there was some expectation that Principal Shairp, who was then Professor of Humanity, would be removed to Glasgow, it appears that Dr Auld printed, or reprinted, these certificates or testimonials which he had received in 1862, but apparently they were not used at that time. In 1868 the Madras College was examined by Mr Sellar and Dr Harvey, as sub-commissioners under the Royal Education Commission which was at that time sitting, and the report of Dr Harvey, who specially examined the classical portion of the Madras College, was unquestionably couched in unfavourable terms.* And this brings us up to the point of the vacancy which gave rise to the whole of these proceedings. Principal Shairp was appointed to the office of Principal in 1868, and it was taken for granted by everyone that his appointment created a vacancy in the chair of Humanity, and accordingly Dr Auld, among others, became a candidate for the office, and sent to the patron, the Duke of Portland, a printed copy of the testimonials which he had received in 1862, and which he had printed in 1866, as indeed these printed testimonial themselves most distinctly bear. Principal Shairp communicated with the Duke of Portland, and undertook to teach the class to the end of the then session,—that is to say, the session ending in 1869; and intimated that it was his intention to demit his office at that time. The Duke of Portland resolved to appoint Dr Auld to the vacancy,† and at his special request that intention was publicly intimated, and, on that intention becoming known, Principal Shairp wrote the letter which contains the alleged slander,‡ dated on the 17th of March 1869, in which he remonstrated against the intention indicated by the patron, on the ground that Dr Auld had notoriously failed in the capacity of classical teacher in the Madras Institution, and that his department had been reported against by the Education Commission; and he also stated that if Dr Auld had used the testimonials granted in 1862 these were granted for a totally different purpose, and that Dr Auld had no right to use them as he did. Now, that is the alleged slander. What followed upon that was this—the Duke of Portland simply did nothing, but Principal Shairp, with the concurrence, and, he says, with the advice of his colleagues, although he had intimated his intention to demit the chair, resolved to hold it, and that for the express purpose of preventing the patron from presenting Dr Auld.§ And hold it he did, and continued either to teach it himself or to supply the teaching for a period of two years, until the death of Dr Auld on the 11th of August 1871, and then, and then only, did he resign the professorship.‖

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

---

* See ante, p. 194, note.

† The Duke of Portland's letter to Dr Auld is quoted ante, p. 192.

‡ Quoted in full, ante, p. 193, note.

§ The minutes of meeting of the United College shewed that six of his eight colleagues requested Principal Shairp, "under existing circumstances," to give up his intention of resigning the chair of Humanity at the ensuing term, and still continue to teach the Humanity classes. Professors Flint and Macdonald did not concur in that request, and afterwards dissented.

‖ Dr Auld, upon receipt of the Duke of Portland's letter to him of 13th

No. 163.

July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

Now, that, I think, is a sufficient summary of the facts that have been proved in this case. And, in the outset, it is quite plain that one material part of the case, as originally stated, entirely fails. It was alleged, and that was one main element in the former argument, that the suit was not merely for reparation for wounded feelings, or for injury to character, but that the slander had culminated in a most serious patrimonial loss, and that the result of the slander was that Principal Shairp was allowed to retain this professorship to Dr Auld's injury, and that the patron was induced not to insist on his presentation in consequence of the representations that were made. That was an important element in the case, but it turns out that this was not the fact. The Duke of Portland did not withhold his hand from appointing Dr Auld in consequence of these representations. He says exactly the reverse. He says in his letters, and in those answers to questions, which are held in this case—and very properly held—to amount to his testimony, that he thought he was in no way called upon to interfere in that matter,—that as long as the principal did not demit his office he did not think that he was bound to contest the question of whether there was or was not a vacancy, and he did not intend to do so. But he also stated in the most distinct terms that the moment the office was vacant Dr Auld was the person that he intended to appoint, and that he would accordingly appoint him. And, therefore, the slander, whatever it was, was not slander which led to any action or inaction on the part of the patron, who simply held his hand because Principal Shairp had not resigned his office.

Now, that clears a very considerable portion of the ground in this action; for the real damage supposed to be suffered in consequence of the defender's representations vanishes from the case entirely, and it becomes one simply of slander, not accompanied, or said to be accompanied, by any specific patrimonial loss.

As to the defender's right to retain the chair of Humanity it is perhaps not necessary that we should express any decided opinion. But the question has been raised very clearly and distinctly, and my impression certainly is that by accepting the office of principal Mr Shairp necessarily vacated the chair of Humanity. If the patron had issued a presentation I cannot see that Principal Shairp could by possibility have excluded the presentee. I do not think he could have resisted his induction, and that all the more that he had voluntarily undertaken to the patron to demit his chair at the end of the then current session. I say nothing as to what arrangements might be made for temporary administration; and I say nothing as to what the powers of the patron might be,—either the patron of the office of principal or the patron of the chair of Humanity. These are matters that are not in question here. The arrangement upon which Principal Shairp held the chair of Humanity was not an act of

---

March 1869, wrote on 19th March to Mr Stuart Grace, secretary to the trustees of the Madras College, resigning his appointment as classical master in the Madras College, as at Whitsunday following. Upon 2d April 1869 he wrote to Mr Grace withdrawing his resignation. The trustees intimated to Dr Auld that his resignation could not be withdrawn, and that they had resolved to take time to consider whether they would again appoint him, and the terms and conditions on which any such appointment should take place. Dr Auld replied that it was his intention to carry out his resolution of retiring at the Whitsunday following. The trustees appointed another gentleman to the post, and Dr Auld remained without employment till his death.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

temporary administration, and the patrons of the two chairs gave no consent whatever to the state of matters that existed at that time. The Crown did not interfere, and the Duke of Portland did not interfere, but it was left upon its own merits. The notion that in order to exclude a particular candidate the Principal could continue to hold this chair at his own hand, and to invert the admitted usage of the University from time immemorial, is one to which I should not wish to be supposed to give any sanction whatever. It is plain that if it had not been for the untimely death of Dr Auld this question might have arisen, and I cannot see any good ground upon which Principal Shairp could have maintained his position.

I have said this much because the question was directly raised, and I am unwilling to appear to sanction a course which I think has no foundation in the proper order of the University. But whether it was so is immaterial in this case, for Dr Auld had no vested right in the appointment. He had nothing but an indication from the patron of what he was to do when the chair should, in his opinion, become vacant,—an intention which he might change at any time, and which conferred no vested right whatever on Dr Auld.

This being so, the case resolves itself into a simple action of damages for defamation, brought by the executrix of the person said to be defamed, and the damages claimed consequently are not for special loss, but for injured feelings and reparation only. I do not say, if that had been the complexion of the action at first, whether I should have thought it clear that the right to sue did descend to an executor, for that was not the position in which the case was originally presented. But assuming that it did, the question now remains, whether the proof has established the claim. There are two grounds on which the alleged libel is said to be defamatory. The first is the allegation it contains that Dr Auld had notoriously failed as a teacher in the Madras College, and secondly, that Dr Auld had improperly used the testimonials which he had received from the defender and the other professors in the University in 1862. I do not go into the particular terms of the letter. It is rather sharp, and certainly unfriendly to Dr Auld, but the substance of the alleged slander rests on these two allegations, that he had notoriously failed as a teacher in the Madras Institution, and that he had made an improper use of the testimonials.

Now, I am not prepared to say that if this communication is not privileged it is not slanderous. I rather think that in the absence of allegation and proof of the truth of the matters stated by the defender it is slanderous, and is a sufficient ground of action. In reference to the first, viz., that Dr Auld had notoriously failed as classical master in the Madras College, I do not think that that has been proved, and I do not think that it is alleged to be proved. Dr Auld may not have been, and probably was not a very vigorous master, but there is a long interval between that and notorious failure; indeed, there are many instances of teachers who turned out in the end men of the greatest reputation, having their alternations of success and failure, and popularity and unpopularity, and I do not think, looking to the very respectable body of evidence that was adduced of Dr Auld's qualifications, that the allegation that he had notoriously failed was substantiated by proof, and, not being substantiated by proof, I think it was an imputation for which the defender would be liable, unless it is privileged.

Still less do I think that there was any ground whatever for the reflection made on Dr Auld's use of the testimonials; and I entirely demur to the view that seems to have been taken for the defender in this matter. It is quite plain

No. 163.

July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

to me that the defender wrote very hastily and without sufficient recollection of the facts in regard to which he was writing. He had confused in his mind between the testimonials or remonstrance addressed by himself and the other professors to the trustees of the Madras College in 1861, and the testimonials which were given when Dr Auld was or intended to be a candidate for the mastership of the Ayr Academy in 1862. In regard to these last testimonials it is plain on the face of them that they were not given for any such specific object as having weight with the trustees of the Madras College, which would have been absurd in itself, because the trustees of the Madras College had already got the remonstrance of the professors in their hands, and there is not the smallest indication that Dr Auld intended ever to use them for that purpose. I am perfectly satisfied that Dr Auld obtained them for the purpose of his candidature in 1862, which he intended to insist in; and, if I were to surmise, I should say that probably Dr Auld, finding his position uncomfortable in the Madras Institution, wished to have a general attestation of his qualifications, in case any place might become vacant to which he might aspire, and that his friends, the professors, were perfectly willing to aid and assist him in that object. I cannot for one moment admit that there is any usage analogous to a practice of trade by which a professor is to attest the qualifications of a man, as shewn in his public actings and teaching, for one purpose, and, without any special agreement with him, complain when that attestation of a fact is used for another purpose. A certificate of a man's qualifications for a particular office of course bears on its face its limited character. But a general attestation of a man's abilities or scholarship simply alleges the writer's belief in a fact. Dr Auld's scholarship, knowledge, and powers of teaching, as exhibited in the Madras College, were facts to which these testimonials were addressed; and, if the testimonials were true, the fact could not possibly be altered by his candidature for a professorship. When such general testimonials as these are given to a man, he is entitled to use them in every quarter and for any purpose for which he thinks they may be required or useful. No doubt there may be a special bargain made with him that he shall only use them for one purpose; but, to tell the truth, the fact of such a bargain or reservation would not very much commend itself to my mind.

But then the question arises, was this communication privileged? In other words, is the defender free from liability unless he be proved to have acted maliciously, or is it enough that he acted honestly and in good faith? I think there was privilege. Privilege consists in the right of a man to express his honest opinion on a matter in regard to which he has a duty or a right or an interest to speak to any other who has a corresponding duty or right or interest. Now, this is the law even in regard to matters of private concern. But a chair in one of our Universities is a matter of public concern, and a subject in which, indeed, any member of the community is entitled to take an interest. Much more has the Principal of the University a substantial right to speak his mind to the patron of the chair within his bounds when he knows or believes that an appointment prejudicial to its interests is likely to take place; and, in my opinion, this being a matter of public concern, the Principal, or the person at the head of the institution, must necessarily have—what I imagine persons with an inferior duty or interest must also have—a right to express an opinion in the proper quarter upon a matter in which the credit of the University is so largely concerned. I do not mean to say that

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

I would hold out any very great encouragement to professors, or even to the Principal, to interfere in matters of patronage. I cannot say that there was a duty in the stricter sense to interfere. My impression rather is, looking to the nature of the controversy, that though Dr Auld's qualifications might not be of the highest, they were not of that nature that necessarily or imperatively called for a remonstrance of this description. But we have seen and known things of the same kind before. There was a very celebrated occurrence some thirty years ago in regard to a chair in the University of Oxford, which is fresh in the recollection of some of us, where the whole of the professors in the University of Oxford in a body remonstrated with the Crown against an appointment which had been proposed; and we know very well that the language used on that occasion was by no means measured, and that the length of time during which the controversy lasted was very considerable. Now, I do not intend to express any opinion as to whether Principal Shairp would have been better advised if he had remained silent, but if he thought that the interest of the University was at stake, and felt the importance of the chair of Humanity in regard to every Scotch University—because it is the portal or gateway through which the students enter—I cannot possibly say that he was not within the general rule of law which affixes a privilege to persons expressing their honest mind upon occasions on which they have an interest and a right to speak. Here he spoke to the patron, who was the proper recipient of his opinions.

I am therefore of opinion that this case is clearly within the rule of privilege, and that malice must be proved before the pursuer can succeed.

The question of malice is perhaps not without some little difficulty. What is said on the part of the pursuer, and said with some strength and plausibility, is that Principal Shairp in 1861 and 1862, when he did not expect, no doubt, to have Dr Auld for a colleague, expressed himself in the strongest terms in regard to Dr Auld's qualifications as a teacher, and notwithstanding that, he writes to the Duke of Portland, when he feared that he may have him as a colleague, that he had notoriously failed in the very capacity to which his compliments had previously been addressed, and it is said by the pursuer that that is proof of malice. I think there is plausibility in that statement, but having heard the evidence, and having heard Principal Shairp's account of the matter, I have come to the clearest opinion that there was no personal feeling or ignoble motive on the part of Principal Shairp at all, but that his honest belief when he wrote to the Duke of Portland was that Dr Auld's appointment would be injurious to the University, and therefore he is only liable to this observation, that he made his encomiums somewhat too broad in 1861 and 1862, probably from a feeling of good nature, which sometimes prompts in that direction, but that at all events, whatever he had said in 1861 or 1862 he was quite honest in stating as his opinion that Dr Auld had notoriously failed in the Madras College, and that his appointment would be injurious to the University. The difficulty in which the defender is placed is obvious, but as I must affirm as matter of fact that he did not write his honest opinion in 1869 before I can affirm the allegation of malice, I have no hesitation at all in saying that I believe thoroughly in the honesty of the statement made in the letter in question.

The second point in regard to the proof of malice is also of some weight, and that is, that there was a persistency on the part of Principal Shairp which led him to do what I take to be an illegal act for the purpose of excluding Dr Auld, viz., to retain the professorship against the patron, without right, for no other purpose whatever than to prevent the appointment of the presentee, whose appointment he feared. Now, if there had been malice—if there had been the slightest ground to suspect that there was personal and not public motive at the bottom of all this, I should think that a very dangerous element indeed, as far as the Principal was concerned; but not finding any element of that kind, the only result is, that whatever it proves it does not prove malice on the part of the Principal. Whether he had or had not a right to retain the chair of Humanity does not derogate from the honesty of his intervention, whatever may be said of his discretion. What he said about the certificates was hasty and ill considered, but was still a matter of opinion; and therefore, upon the whole matter, I have been unable to come to any other conclusion than that the pursuer must fail in her action.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

I cannot close without saying, at the same time, that it is impossible not to feel a considerable amount of sympathy both for the pursuer and for her deceased husband; for the unfortunate man, having been tantalised with the expectation of this professorship, not merely failed to obtain it, but lost at the same time the office which, on the representations of the Duke of Portland, he had been induced to resign.

On the whole matter, I think we must pronounce a decree of absolvitor.

Lord Neaves.—This is a case of interest and importance both on general and on special grounds. I cannot help feeling considerable sympathy for the pursuer, for her husband's and her own disappointment must have been great, and from her own point of view one can easily see how strongly she must have felt. We cannot expect her to adopt any views of her husband's inefficiency or want of right and title to this chair. She must remember him as an amiable and excellent man, who, after getting a promise of this appointment, was deprived of it partly by delay and partly by other circumstances. But while we entertain these feelings of sympathy for her we must also look at the other side of the case, and I firmly believe that Principal Shairp was actuated in what he did by a desire for the good of the University, of which he was a conspicuous member. One sympathises also with his feelings, even although they were expressed with apparent keeness.

The pursuer's pleas are two-fold. The first is, that the defender having illegally retained possession of the chair of Humanity, and wrongfully prevented Dr Auld from being presented thereto, and having thereby caused loss, injury, and damage to the pursuer, ought to be decerned to make reparation as concluded for. As to the alleged illegal retention of the chair by Principal Shairp, I cannot find such a relation subsisting between Dr Auld and Principal Shairp as to lead me to suppose that a right of action can arise to Dr Auld against Principal Shairp for what he may have done. I am rather inclined, with your Lordship, to look upon the holding of the two offices as incompatible. At the same time, they may be retained temporarily for special purposes and in special circumstances. It could scarcely be said that Principal Shairp might not hold the chair of Humanity during the remainder of the session following his appointment, or for the time necessary to make ulterior arrangements; and that shews that there is no vital incompatibility between the two offices. The idea of any permanent retention of both is out of the question, but I am not satisfied that there was any intention to retain them permanently. I do not see any evidence of that, though there may have been a retention until it should be seen what should be

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

the final outcome of this dispute. But whether Principal Shairp was right or wrong—whether he might be considered to have vacated the chair or not—I cannot see that that gives rise to any legal ground of action at the instance of Dr Auld or his representative. Dr Auld had no presentation to the chair. He had only a promise of the appointment when the Duke of Portland should consider that the vacancy had taken place. The Duke of Portland was willing to give him the chair when it was vacant, but he was not willing to enter into any litigation on the subject, or to contest the point. A fair enough illustration of this was given during the argument with reference to a landlord's right to remove a tenant in the case of his having promised a lease of the farm to another tenant. I cannot say that that other tenant who may have got that promise has any direct right of action against the tenant in possession. He may urge upon the proprietor by moral or legal considerations to do all that is necessary to fulfil his promise; but I do not think that he has any right of action against the tenant in possession. As little can I say that if the patron here chose deliberately to remain neutral, which he did—for that is the position which he expressly avowed himself as occupying—a party in Dr Auld's position, having no presentation to the office, could have any right of action against Principal Shairp to vacate the chair for his behoof, or to pay him damages. If the Duke of Portland had died before Dr Auld what would Dr Auld's position have been? His promise would not have been binding upon the Duke's successor; and so Dr Auld had just what might be called a spes successionis in the matter, which gave him no direct right of action against Principal Shairp.

The second plea is with reference to the slander, and this turns on the letter addressed to the Duke by Principal Shairp. I have great difficulty in seeing any slander in that letter. It undoubtedly speaks of the inferiority of Dr Auld's claim to become a professor, and it also complains that he has used certain testimonials; but I cannot say that I see anything libellous in that letter. We must look at the whole circumstances. Dr Auld was an aspirant to a public situation. He was not being assailed in a position which he occupied by some person who was depreciating him, but he was aspiring to a new appointment of a different kind from the one he held, requiring different qualifications, and a higher training. He was publicly aspiring to that office, and he was in communication with the patron on the subject. Now, I confess I have a strong idea that wherever an appointment of a public nature is contemplated, and, in particular, one which, besides affecting the public at large, affects a certain locality in a very strong way, the aspirant to that position lays his character and qualifications open to criticism by all who have a natural and legitimate interest in the appointment. I am not sure that I would call that privilege. I do not think that it is of the nature of libel to speak of an aspirant for an office of that kind as not being qualified for the office. I think the newspapers might have discussed the merits of all the candidates, and said that they considered one to be good and another to be inferior, with the most perfect freedom, without being liable in damages, any more than for a literary critique. An appointment of that public kind is subject to the observation of the public, and is, I think, a legitimate subject of discussion; and I cannot help thinking that it would be very unfortunate if it were not so. A patron is a trustee for the benefit of the public. He is entitled to expect—and no patron with right feeling will complain that he receives—such light fairly stated by any competent party on the subject, to assist him in his choice, and to guide him to a right decision, or prevent him from making an improper choice. That it is a libel to say that a master in a burgh school, although a respectable and amiable man,—for there is not a word said against his morals,—is not a first-rate scholar or has not been successful in his class, when he is aspiring to another position, and putting himself therefore upon a scrutiny—appears to me to be a very dangerous proposition. Upon this ground alone I consider the action unfounded.

No. 163. July 14, 1875. Auld v. Shairp.

At any rate this view is closely connected with the question of privilege, when the relation is considered between Principal Shairp and the office which was to be filled up. Can we suppose that a man at the head of a University is not to take a strong interest in the welfare of the body with which he is connected, and with which his own prosperity and happiness are so intimately bound up? It is for the public interest that he should do all he can, consistently with justice, in such a matter. I cannot doubt that he had a privilege to go to the patron, and to represent, if he did it honestly and without any evil purpose or sinister view, the opinion he entertained of the candidates who were proposed. It is said he should not have interfered because the patron had said he would make the appointment; but that is not sufficient. The appointment was not made. It was right that Principal Shairp should let it be known what he thought on the subject, and the opinion he stated was honestly entertained by a great number of persons in the same position. It was entertained by the other professors, except, I think, by Professor Flint, and by one gentleman who is now no more (Dr Macdonald).

If, then, there is privilege, it can only be got rid of by proving malice, and the question is, has that been proved? I cannot say that I see any proof of malice. The idea of personal malignity has not been suggested, and if it were, it is groundless upon the face of the case. There may have been an anxiety, and perhaps an over-anxiety, about the matter on the part of Principal Shairp, but this will not make malice. It was a matter of great importance that Principal Shairp should make known his opinion if he thought the appointment would be injurious to the University, and, having stated that to the patron, will the mere manner in which it is done constitute malice? I think not. It is said that it arose from a desire to have an Oxford man, and that this makes malice. I cannot see it in that light. I am not such an exclusive admirer of Oxford as perhaps Principal Shairp is, though I recognise in the fullest manner the benefit we have got from Oxford scholars, and from the connection which has subsisted between Oxford and Scotland. But no one who knows the history of English literature is ignorant of the very good reasons which Principal Shairp has for looking back on Oxford as an excellent nursery for young men, and connecting it with some of the most distinguished scholars that have been produced in this century. This was a feeling which he naturally had, and I cannot think that was malice. It was also said that his former testimonials proved malice. His former testimonials proved a little too much facility, I think, in the other direction; but I do not think they prove malice. As to the testimonials, all that Principal Shairp stated was his opinion that he (Dr Auld) had no right to use them as applicable to a professorship, for they had been given him as general testimonials. This seems to have been his view; and I agree with him thus far, that testimonials for a schoolmaster are not necessarily testimonials as to a man's fitness as a professor.

On the whole matter, there being no proof of malice, I think this was either a communication to the patron which required no privilege at all, or a communication which was privileged owing to the position of Principal Shairp. On these grounds I come to the same conclusion with your Lordship that we must assoilzie the defender.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

I cannot conclude without making the observation that I hope some light has been thrown in this question upon the subject of testimonials which ought to produce serious thoughts in the minds of those who give and those who receive them. A testimonial ought to be strictly true, and not coloured. I do not say one should write a testimonial as he would write history, for there he must not be afraid of speaking of everything that is bad as well as of everything that is good. This would never do, and the testimonial would not be used if it were done. But it ought to be a strictly true testimonial, and, if we may borrow from a heathen author in regard to truth, we should not allow ourselves to be carried beyond the truth on any subject—testimonials or anything else—

"Though Phalaris with his brazen bull be nigh,
And loudly dictate to our lips a lie."

These gentlemen would not have done or said anything incorrect out of fear or compulsion. But favour, friendship, compassion, are sometimes as great seducers from the path of strict accuracy as fear or force, and it is acknowledged that to some extent the testimonials were modified by these amiable influences. But though I think in this case there was a little embellishment given to the facts, I cannot visit that error in such a way as to convict Principal Shairp of malice in this case, because he may have been a little too easily led to further the views of Dr Auld on a former occasion. I think he had countenance for all that was done. There was some truth in what was said about Dr Auld having failed. We see in Mr Grace's evidence an opinion to that effect. But the question is not whether that is the truth, but whether it was an opinion which Principal Shairp was entitled to entertain, and did honestly entertain; and he tells us that even from the time the testimonials were given he had seen proofs of Dr Auld's teaching which did not influence him favourably; and no one connected with the University of St Andrews could fail to see what a serious stigma was cast on the Madras School teaching by the report of the Sub-commissioners on Education becoming publicly known. The idea must have been painful that a man of whom that report had been made (whatever explanation might be given of it) was to become the holder of so important a chair in the University as that of Humanity.

On the whole, I see nothing that would lead me to deprive Principal Shairp of the privilege which he possessed, or of his right to tender to the patron his opinion, believing it to be an honest opinion, in the matter.

LORD ORMIDALE.—In this case, which raises some questions of novelty and importance, I must now assume—my views on the point having been, at a former stage of the litigation, overruled by a majority of the Court—that the pursuer, as executrix of the late Dr Auld, is entitled to sue, as she does, the present action of damages for the injuries caused by certain alleged libellous or slanderous statements uttered by the defender of and concerning her late husband, and also for the defender's alleged illegal conduct in retaining the chair of Humanity in the United College of St Salvador and St Leonard's at St Andrews, he being at the same time Principal of that College.

The pursuer also concludes for damages arising to herself "as an individual," but she does not in the record explain how she was or could be individually injured, and she has not by evidence or argument attempted to support this branch of her action, which may therefore be laid aside as not requiring farther notice.

No. 163. July 14, 1875. Auld v. Shairp.

The pursuer has endeavoured to support her claim for damages, as executrix, on the grounds, 1st, that the defender libelled and slandered her late husband, Dr Auld; and 2d, that he acted illegally in retaining for some time the chair of Humanity, thereby preventing Dr Auld being inducted into that chair, and enjoying the emoluments thereof. These grounds of action substantially relate to and arise out of the same matters.

The defender, in December 1868, while he held both the office of principal and the chair of the Humanity class, intimated to the College, and to the Duke of Portland, the patron of the chair, his intention of resigning the latter in May following. In consequence of this intimation, Dr Auld, who was then the master of the burgh school of St Andrews, called the Madras College, applied to the Duke to be appointed to the chair about to be vacated by the defender, and the Duke, in March 1869, intimated by letter to Dr Auld that he had determined to give him the appointment. The defender a few days thereafter wrote to the Duke deprecating the appointment of Dr Auld to the chair of Humanity, as not having the necessary qualifications; and the defender also continued till after the death of Dr Auld, in August 1871, to hold the chair himself, thereby, as the pursuer says, preventing her late husband obtaining it.

Such is, briefly, and in general terms, the state of matters in relation to which the pursuer, after the death of her late husband, who had himself neither raised, nor intimated any intention of raising, an action of damages against the defender, insists in her present claim as her husband's executrix. Her claim requires, for the sake of distinctness, to be considered, first, as arising from the defender's alleged libellous or slanderous statements, and, secondly, from his alleged illegal conduct in retaining, as he did, the chair of Humanity as well as the office of principal.

In her record the pursuer is very vague and general in her allegations, which are all contained in the 8th article of her condescendence, touching the libellous and slanderous statements of which she complains. She there explains, as the reason of this, that she did not know the exact terms of the letters the defender had written, and therefore that she could not specify more particularly his libellous utterances—a somewhat strange and unusual statement coming from the pursuer of an action of damages. Ultimately, however, the pursuer, in the course of the proceedings, procured all the defender's letters, and it is in respect of the statements in his letter to the Duke of Portland of 17th March 1869 that she has chiefly, if not exclusively, maintained her claim for damages under her first ground of action. For although it is true that in the 8th article of her condescendence she also avers, in general terms, that besides libelling her husband in letters to the Duke of Portland, the defender slandered her husband in "verbal statements to all the professors of the United College, and particularly to Professor Campbell, the Professor of Greek in the University, during the months of March, April, and May 1869, or about that time," the nature and terms of the slanderous statements thus vaguely alluded to have never yet been explained, and she has made no attempt to support them. It is obvious, indeed, from the proof, that no case of that description has been established, and I did not understand her counsel at the discussion to say that it had. It is a different question, which will be afterwards noticed in dealing with the matter of privilege, whether the defender's communications to the professors, such as they were, may not go some length to shew quo animo he wrote the letter of 17th March to the Duke of Portland.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

Now, there is no doubt that the defender, in his letter to the Duke of Portland of 17th March, expressed himself in very decided terms as to the failure of Dr Auld as classical master of Madras School, and stated his opinion, for that and other reasons, that Dr Auld was ineligible for the chair of Humanity. The defender also stated in this letter, in reference to certain testimonials which Dr Auld had some years previously obtained from various persons, and from the defender himself among others, "that they were never intended to certify to his fitness for a professorial chair, and if Dr Auld has laid them before your Grace for this purpose, I must be allowed to say that he had no right to do so." The pursuer endeavoured to make two points out of this—1st, that it was false and calumnious for the defender to say of Dr Auld that he had failed as a teacher in the Madras School, and that he was consequently unfit and disqualified for the position of professor of the Humanity chair in the United College; and 2dly, that it was also false and calumnious for the defender to say of Dr Auld that he had improperly used testimonials given for one purpose in order to accomplish another. I am not quite satisfied that these propositions of the pursuer are maintainable, looking merely at the terms of the letter of 17th March; but as the alleged libellous statements might probably be so innuendoed as to have enabled the pursuer to get into a proof, and as a proof was allowed and has been adduced, I consider it unnecessary, especially in the view I have taken of the result of the proof, to scrutinise, apart from it, very critically the statements of which the pursuer complains, in order to determine whether they are or are not libellous in themselves.

Assuming them to be libellous, or that by innuendo they could be made to bear that character, I can entertain no doubt that in making them the defender had the protection of privilege. According to all the authorities, English as well as Scotch, cited at the discussion, it is a well-established principle that a communication made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party making it has an interest, or in reference to which he acted in the discharge of a duty, public or private, legal or moral, is privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains criminatory matter, which, without that privilege, might subject him in damages. The plea of privilege was, in language even more favourable for the party founding on it, recognised and given effect to in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the recent cases of Hart v. Gumpach (Law Reports, Privy Council Cases, vol. iv. p. 439), and Laughton v. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, ib., p. 495. And to the same effect also is the law stated in Broom's Commentaries (p. 753), and in Starkie on Libel (p. 267). In our own Court, again, we have very good illustrations of the principle in the cases of Milne v. Bauchope, 19th July 1867 (5 Macph. 1114), and Macbride v. Williams and Dalzell, 28th January 1869 (7 Macph. 427). The former of these cases related to certain statements which a party claiming to be in the position of head-master of an educational establishment had made about a female teacher in that establishment; but although the jury found he did not occupy the position on which he rested his privilege, and therefore negatived that ground of defence, the Court, in disallowing a motion for a new trial, threw no doubt upon the principle itself as applied to such a position as that of the head of an educational establishment.

No. 163.

July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

On the contrary, Lord Cowan, apparently with the concurrence of the rest of the Court, expressly said,—"I desire to state, in explicit terms, that I do not dispute the privileged position of a person placed in the position of governor, rector, or head-master of an educational or other institution in his communications to the managers or directors of the institution with relation to its management or its interests. These communications, when made in bona fide, within the scope of his proper functions, are certainly privileged." And so in the other case of Macbride v. Williams and Dalzell, the principal of a veterinary college was held to be privileged in making certain statements in themselves of a criminatory nature to the patrons of the institution in relation to one of the professors. That case indeed has, in its leading features, a very striking resemblance to the present; the only distinction between the two being one pointed out by the pursuer at the discussion, viz., that there the individual complained of held the appointment of professor, and was in the actual discharge of its duties, while here the statements made by the defender were of and concerning a candidate merely for the office of professor. But I am unable to see how this distinction can be held to affect the matter of privilege, for all the elements requisite to constitute privilege are to be found in the present as clearly as they existed in the case referred to.

But, before remarking farther upon the position of the defender, in the circumstances of the present case, as a privileged one, it is necessary to notice that, besides the statements in his letter of 17th March to the Duke of Portland in regard to Dr Auld's unfitness for the professorship of Humanity, the pursuer also complains of his statements in the same letter regarding the testimonials, to the effect that they had been granted about seven years before to assist Dr Auld for a different object than to obtain a professorship, and therefore that "if he has laid them before your Grace for this purpose I must be allowed to say that he had no right to do so." Surely the defender was entitled to express that opinion, whether it was a correct one or not, without subjecting himself in damages as for a false and calumnious libel. The defender did not say that Dr Auld laid the testimonials before his Grace for a fraudulent or deceitful purpose. And in anything he said he did not impugn the motives of Dr Auld at all, but merely questioned his right.

Supposing, however, that the defender's statements regarding the testimonials were held to be calumnious, I think that, in making them, equally as in making his other statements complained of, he must be taken as having acted in a matter in which he had an interest, and from a sense of duty, and is accordingly protected by privilege. What the precise rights and duties of the defender as Principal of the United College are does not appear, and for the present purpose need not, I think, be minutely inquired into. It is enough that his position as Principal vested him with an interest and conferred on him a duty to interfere to the extent he did. According to the pursuer's own statement in the first article of her condescendence, the defender, as Principal of the United College, is "head of the society, and in that capacity fulfils the offices of superintendence and jurisdiction which the original constitution of the colleges assign to him." It can scarcely be doubted, therefore, that the defender had, in reference to the reputation and prosperity of the college, of which—in the pursuer's own words—he was the head, and exercised a superintendence, a material and obvious interest to see that a suitable appointment of a professor, and especially a professor of Humanity, who holds, as it were, the door of entrance to the college, was made. And if he had such an interest, it follows that, interfering to the extent he did, he did no more than exercise a duty which obviously belonged to him. Nor can it be doubted that the defender's communication was made to a party who, as patron of the Humanity chair, had a corresponding interest and duty.

If I am right so far, the pursuer cannot prevail, unless she establishes that the defender acted maliciously. But I have been unable to discover from the proof any ground for imputing malice to the defender. To me it appears manifest that he entertained none, but that in making his communication to the Duke of Portland he acted solely from a sense of what he honestly believed to be his duty to the college of which he was the head, and whose interests were in some measure in his keeping and under his superintendence. One thing at least is clear, that in his whole actings he had the approval, with two exceptions, of all the professors of the United College, who, indeed, participated in everything he did. His communications to and with the professors, in place of shewing that he was actuated by any improper animus or feeling towards Dr Auld, go far to prove the reverse.

In regard, again, to the alleged illegal conduct of the defender in retaining the Humanity chair after the date when he had intimated his intention of resigning it, the pursuer's statements are to be found in the third and seventh articles of her condescendence, and require careful attention. In the third the pursuer sets out a minute of the college, which bears that the defender "while he was ready to demit the chair immediately, if it should seem desirable, was willing to teach the Humanity classes until the end of the session, and at that date, or on the 15th of May, to resign the chair;" and then she goes on to say, that, "notwithstanding the legal disability of the Principal of said United College to hold a professorship in conjunction with the office of Principal, and, notwithstanding his actual resignation of the professorship of Humanity, to take effect on the 15th of May 1869, as embodied in the foresaid minute, the defender, on the expiration of the time during which it was agreed that he should continue to perform the duties of the professorship, refused to demit the same, and continued to exercise the office of professor, and to receive the endowments pertaining to the office until after the death of the said James Auld, which took place on 11th August 1871." In making this statement the pursuer proceeds on the assumption that the defender had, by the minute referred to, actually resigned the professorship, but I scarcely think she is right in this, for by the minute the defender had merely intimated an intention to resign it at a future date, and, in point of fact, he had not, prior to the death of Dr Auld, actually resigned. The pursuer, again, in the seventh article of her condescendence, assumes the "legal disability" of the defender to hold a professorship in conjunction with his office of Principal, but she has not succeeded in shewing that there was any such disability. Indeed, beyond some speculative observations and suggestions made at the discussion, nothing has been advanced, by way of evidence or otherwise, to instruct this, while it is well known that the Principal of St Mary's College at St Andrews has long held and now holds a professorial chair, along with his office of Principal.

Irrespective, however, of such considerations, and whatever may be thought of the defender's conduct in retaining as he did the Humanity chair, it is sufficient to remark that the pursuer has entirely failed to shew that any right of action could have thence arisen to Dr Auld, or to her as his executrix. Dr

No. 163.

July 14, 1875
Auld v. Shairp.

Auld was not the patron of the chair, nor had he actually obtained any legal or enforceable right to it. Neither had the defender come under any obligation or promise to Dr Auld to resign the Humanity chair. In short, there neither was, nor is it said that there was any privity of contract whatever between the defender and Dr Auld in the matter. Whether the Duke of Portland, as patron of the chair, or the Crown, might have challenged the defender's retention of the Humanity chair, is another thing altogether, which it is unnecessary to inquire into, for it is not pretended that Dr Auld had come into the right and place of either the patron or the Crown by assignation or otherwise. I am therefore quite unable to understand upon what principle the pursuer, as executrix of Dr Auld, has any right or title to insist in the present action, so far as it is laid upon the assumed disability of the defender to retain for some time, as he did, the Humanity chair in conjunction with his office of Principal.

The result is, that for the reasons I have now stated, I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to support her action on any of the grounds libelled, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

LORD GIFFORD.—This case is now before us as a concluded cause upon the proof which has been led, and on the whole pleas of parties, which have been very fully and ably argued. The case involves several distinct questions, all of which are attended with nicety and difficulty, but on all of these questions, so far as necessary for the decision of the present case, I have formed a clear opinion in favour of the defender, Principal Shairp.

The case divides itself into two great branches.

I. The first question is, whether Principal Shairp is liable in damages to the pursuer, Mrs Auld, for having, as she alleges, slandered her husband, the late Dr Auld. The slander is said to be contained in Principal Shairp's letter to the Duke of Portland, dated 17th March 1869. The pursuer also complains of Principal Shairp's letter to the Duke of Portland of 12th May 1869, but this last letter merely repeats part of the previous one, and substantially the statements complained of are those contained in the letter of 17th March 1869. The pursuer maintains that the statements in this letter, relative to the late Dr Auld, are false and calumnious, and operated to his loss, injury, and damage.

The alleged slander complained of consists of two particulars, which may be shortly stated thus—(1) a statement that Dr Auld was unfit to discharge the duties of Professor of Humanity in the United College, St Andrews, and that he had notoriously failed to discharge efficiently the duties of classical master in the Madras College; and (2) that Dr Auld had made an improper use of testimonials which had been given him some years previously by the defender, and by some other Professors of St Andrews University.

The main defence relied upon by the defender in this branch of the case is, that the defender, in making the statements complained of, was in a position of privilege as Principal of the United College of St Andrews, and that, having made the statements in bona fide, and in the honest discharge of his duty, he is not liable in damages therefor. Although not on record, the plea of veritas was also suggested at the debate, and it seemed to be maintained that the statements in the letter of 17th March being in all respects true, there could be no damages awarded in respect thereof.

If the case had depended upon the plea of veritas I would not feel myself in a position to sustain it. I do not think that upon the closed proof now before us there is sufficient evidence to enable me to affirm that, in point of fact, the late Dr Auld was unfit to be Professor of Humanity in St Andrews University, or that he had notoriously failed as classical master in the Madras Institution, and still less would I be prepared to find, in point of fact, that Dr Auld had made an unfair or unjustifiable use of the old testimonials which he had received from the St Andrews Professors. The question of Dr Auld's fitness for the professorship, and the question whether he had been successful in the Madras Institution, are to a large extent matters of opinion, as to which different persons might very fairly take different views. It is apparent that different views on these questions were held, and quite honestly held, by different parties, as well as by different sections of the public of St Andrews interested in its educational prosperity; but I find no sufficient evidence to enable me to say with any confidence which of the conflicting opinions was the right one, and accordingly I could not sustain the technical plea of veritas convicii.

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

But I think the main defence upon which Principal Shairp relies in this branch of the case is well founded. I think Principal Shairp was in a privileged position, entitling him honestly to express to the patron of the Humanity chair his opinion as to the fitness or suitability of any of the candidates for that chair. Principal Shairp admittedly held the office of Principal of the United College. Whatever be his special duties as Principal I cannot doubt that they include the general supervision of his branch of the University, and impose upon him the duty of doing what is in his power to secure its efficiency. Nothing can more closely touch the efficiency and prosperity of the University than the appointment of its professors, and although the duty may be a most difficult and delicate one, requiring the greatest prudence and caution in its discharge, I cannot say that it is not fairly within the duty of the Principal to remonstrate in proper and fitting terms, and to the proper persons, against an appointment which he honestly thinks would be injurious or ruinous to the interests of the University. To this extent I am of opinion that Principal Shairp was in a privileged position, and this seems to me to be sufficient for the determination of this branch of the case.

To a certain extent, every one who openly and avowedly becomes a candidate for a position like a public chair in a public University exposes himself to and invites fair and honest criticism, and if that criticism proceeds from proper quarters, and does not exceed fair and reasonable limits, I think the candidate cannot complain, although the criticism should be adverse or even severe; but it is not necessary in this case to consider any such general question of privilege, for surely if any person was privileged or called upon honestly to criticise or comment upon Dr Auld's claims it was the Principal of the University in which Dr Auld was seeking a chair. I say nothing of the delicacy of the Principal's position, or whether the case was such as to make his interference an absolute duty. Of this the Principal must, I think, be himself the judge; but this I do say, that if the Principal honestly believed that the proposed appointment would be hurtful or ruinous to the University, then it was his duty to remonstrate, and he will be protected by his privilege in an action for slander. I do not think it necessary to find how far this privilege extends. I incline to think it would extend to the other Professors and members of the Senatus, all of whom have a very direct interest, and some of whom have a serious pecuniary interest in the appointment of their colleagues. It is enough to say that this interest, this duty, and this privilege, resides in the Principal.

No. 163. July 14, 1875. Auld v. Shairp.

Now, if this be so, it follows that the Principal must be protected in an action for slander, unless it can be established that he acted maliciously and in mala fide, not in the honest discharge of what he believed to be his duty, but under the influence of personal and unjustifiable motives, and with an intention not to benefit the University, but to injure the late Dr Auld. I think malice in cases like the present has this wide meaning, that it includes every motive except the honest and pure wish fairly and sincerely to discharge a duty.

Now, the existence or absence of malice is always a question for the jury, and the jury are entitled to take into consideration the whole circumstances of the case, and the whole actings of the defender, and to infer therefrom whether his conduct has not been such as to infer the presence of other than pure and upright motives. On this point I am of opinion, as a juryman, that malice has not been established; on the contrary, I think it sufficiently appears that Principal Shairp, in what he did, was actuated only by an honest desire to secure the welfare of the University, and to avert what he honestly believed would be an injury or a misfortune. I do not judge of his actings according to canons of mere taste, but I think that his whole conduct shews an earnest and sincere belief that what he did was necessary for the University over which he presides. I abstain from entering upon detail. He was a personal friend of the late Dr Auld. He seems to have gone to him privately to induce him to withdraw his candidature. He addressed his remonstrances to the proper quarter, the Duke of Portland, and privately, without seeking to give needless publicity thereto. His opinions were shared by the great majority of the Senatus, the action of some of whom was even stronger than his own. I think his remonstrance was timeous, for although the patron had intimated his intention to appoint Dr Auld, no appointment had been issued, and it was undoubtedly in the patron's power, if he found sufficient reason, to withhold the appointment, and give it to another. If the appointment had been actually issued it might have been otherwise, for it would have been a strong proof of mere malice to express an opinion when it was too late, and when there was no end to be served thereby. The pursuer founded strongly on the fact that the defender retained the Humanity chair after having intimated his resignation, and this as a proof of malice, apart altogether from her separate plea that such retention was illegal and wrongous. I do not think that this argument has much weight. It is proved that the defender retained the chair at the express request of the Senatus, with only two dissentient voices. He did so after communication with the patron, who left him at entire liberty to act as he thought right, and apart from all questions of illegality. I am disposed to think that the defender's continuing to hold the chair of Humanity in compliance with the earnest wish of the great majority of the professors, and in circumstances open to misconstruction, is rather a proof of the Principal's strong and bona fide belief in the extreme inexpediency of the proposed appointment of Dr Auld. I cannot for a moment listen to the suggestion that the defender was actuated by unworthy or mercenary motives regarding the fees or emoluments connected with the chair.

It was farther urged for the pursuer that the defender's malice was proved by his having misrepresented to the patron the nature of the testimonials which he and the other professors had granted to Dr Auld in 1861 and 1862. It is true that some of these testimonials appear to have been given not merely to enable

No. 163.
July 14, 1875.
Auld v. Shairp.

Dr Auld to retain his situation in the Madras College, but with a view to his candidature for the Ayr Academy or other appointment. Principal Shairp seems to have overlooked this, and to have represented that they were merely given to save him from the threatened dismissal from the Madras College. But the real substance of the statement was that the testimonials were not intended to certify Dr Auld's fitness for a professorial chair, and this is undoubtedly true; and it appears to me that the mere inaccuracy in detail as to what had happened six years previously is no sufficient proof of the defender's malice, and not even an indication of the absence of bona fides.

On the issue of slander, therefore, in respect of the defender's privileged position, and that he acted in bona fide and without malice, I feel myself bound to find for the defender. I might add, in reference to the alleged damage resulting directly from the slander, that there is no proof of any direct damage. It is in evidence that Principal Shairp's letter had no effect on the mind of the Duke of Portland, to whom it was addressed. It did not alter the Duke's intention. The Duke himself expressly says so. He adhered to the last to his intention to appoint Dr Auld the moment the office should become vacant, and whether the defender acted illegally or not in retaining the office (which is a different question), it seems clear enough that the alleged slanderous letter had no effect per se in keeping Dr Auld out of the professorship; and this brings me to the second branch of the case.

II. The second ground of action on which the pursuer relies is that the defender acted illegally, and to Dr Auld's loss, injury, and damage, in retaining the Humanity chair after having intimated his intention to resign it as at 15th May 1869. This branch of the action involves several distinct and difficult questions, apart altogether from its bearing on the question of malice, to which I have already adverted.

In the first place, I am of opinion that neither the late Dr Auld, up to the time of his death, nor the pursuer as his widow and executrix, ever had any title to challenge the illegality of Principal Shairp's retention of the Humanity chair, or to claim damages therefor.

The late Dr Auld never was appointed Professor of Humanity. The presentation was never issued or delivered. All that Dr Auld had or could have was an intimation of the patron's intention to appoint him to the chair, an intention which while it never varied, and was never altered on the part of the patron, was yet never carried into effect. Dr Auld, so far as that chair was concerned, was never more than one of the general public, with expectations certainly, but with no more rights than any citizen of the country. A hoped for or expected appointment will not give a title to sue. Suppose, then, that Principal Shairp had never written to the Duke of Portland at all, and had never been in communication either with the patron or his agents, would this action have lain? Would the present branch of it have been competent either at the instance of Dr Auld or of his widow? I think not. The abstract legality or illegality of Principal Shairp's conduct might have been raised by the patron, by the Crown, by the Senatus or its members, and perhaps by any member of the University, or by others, but not by any mere member of the community, and not by Dr Auld, unless he had actually obtained a presentation; and certainly without such presentation Dr Auld, even supposing that he could have tried the question, could never have claimed damages.

But, in the second place, I am not prepared to affirm in point of law the absolute illegality in Principal Shairp continuing after his induction as Principal to hold the chair of Humanity. It is plain that in certain circumstances he might do so after becoming Principal. For example, in this very case, when appointed Principal in the middle of a session, it was hardly disputed that he might fairly and rightly continue Professor of Humanity till the close of the session. Any other course would have been unfair to the University, and unjust to the students of the class.

No. 163. July 14, 1875. Auld v. Shairp.

In like manner, it might often happen that circumstances might render expedient even a more prolonged tenure of the chair by a Principal, or by an occupant who had been promoted to the principalship. It is rather a question of expediency than of absolute illegality, and if all interested concur or acquiesce in a temporary union of the two offices I see no absolute illegality which would prevent such temporary arrangement. In this case there was, if not a virtual acquiescence and concurrence, at least an absence of any challenge on the part of all concerned,—that is, neither the Crown nor the patron, nor the Senatus, nor the University Court, nor any other party interested, intervened or complained of the illegality of the course taken.

On the general abstract question, whether a Principal holding that office for life might not also hold for life the chair of Humanity, I would rather decline giving any opinion. Such unions are not unknown in other Universities, although in general I should think they are not expedient. Something might depend on the terms of each appointment, and on the concurrence of the Crown, the patrons, and the authorities of the University. It is sufficient for the present case,—if indeed it is even necessary to go so far,—to find that there was no absolute illegality in the unchallenged arrangement of a temporary and precarious character which took place in the present case. On the second branch of the case also I think the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for John Campbell Shairp against Lord Gifford's interlocutor of 30th June 1874, recall said interlocutor, and assoilzie the defender from the whole conclusions of the action: Find the defender entitled to expenses, with the exception of such part thereof as have been incurred between the 10th of February 1874, when the record was closed, down to the 15th of December 1874, when the plea on title was repelled, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report, and decern."

THOS. SPALDING, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 164. July 15, 1875. Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

JAMES EAGLESHAM AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—Balfour—Alison.
JOHN GRANT, Defender.—D.-F. Clark—Mackintosh.

Agent and Principal—Partnership—Right in Security.—A cautioner in a composition settlement between a trader and his creditors obtained an assignation to the trader's business and estate. It was agreed that the cautioner should receive a commission of 7½ per cent on the gross proceeds of the sales, and he bound himself, after providing for the payments undertaken by him and for his own commission, to account to the trader for the balance. Notwithstanding the assignation, the trader was allowed to continue his business without ostensible change, subject, however, to the control of the cautioner. Held that the cautioner was not liable for a business debt incurred by the trader, either on the footing that the business truly belonged to him, or that he was a partner in the

No. 164.

July 15, 1875.

Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

same, the true intention and effect of his agreement with the trader being merely to create a security in his favour.

THIS was an action at the instance of James Eaglesham and Co., warehousemen, Glasgow, against John Grant, accountant, Inverness, for certain sums, amounting to about £100, being the balance of the price of goods furnished by the pursuers to one James Munro, who formerly carried on business as a draper in Inverness in a shop called the "London House."

The pursuers averred that although the business, for which they supplied the goods in question, was carried on in the name of Munro, he was merely the agent or servant of the defender, acting for the defender's behoof as sole principal, or at all events that the defender was a partner with Munro in the business.

In support of these averments the pursuers founded upon certain deeds which had come to their knowledge. They pleaded;—(1) The goods in question having been furnished upon the order of the said James Munro, acting as the agent or servant of the defender, his principal, and the defender having received and taken the benefit of the said goods, he is liable to pay the price thereof. (2) At all events, the defender is so liable, in respect that if he was not the sole principal, he was at least the chief partner in the business for which the said goods were ordered, and that as such he accepted and took the benefit thereof. (3) In respect of the deeds and writings above narrated, and of the actings which followed thereon as aforesaid, the defender is liable to the pursuers for the price of the said goods, and they are entitled to decree therefor, with expenses.

A proof was allowed, from which the following facts appeared:—

In the early part of 1871 Munro became insolvent. He offered his creditors a composition of 15s. per £, payable by five equal instalments, which they were prepared to accept if duly secured. In these circumstances Munro applied to the defender to assist him in carrying out the composition arrangement. The defender, as a matter of business, agreed to guarantee the last two instalments of the composition upon certain conditions, which were embodied in a minute of agreement between him and Munro, dated 4th April 1871.

By this deed Munro bound himself to transfer to the defender his whole business and estate, with power to the defender to realise the estate and carry on the business, as he might choose or direct. The deed contained an obligation on Munro to assign the lease of his shop and dwelling-house to the defender, and to insure his life for £500 in name of the defender. Munro undertook to devote his entire time and energies to the business of the "London House," with a view to enabling the defender to realise the stock to the best advantage as speedily as possible. It was provided that no goods should be ordered for the purpose of the business without the defender's written authority, and that for the payment of any goods ordered in contravention of this provision the defender should be in no way liable.

The defender bound himself to pay out of the proceeds of Munro's stock and other effects the two last instalments of the composition, and also the value of such goods as might, upon his written authority, be ordered for the purposes of the business or replenishing the stock; and further, to pay out of these proceeds to Munro a weekly alimentary allowance of £1, 10s., and to allow Munro to retain his dwelling-house, rent free, and to pay the rent, taxes, and public burdens for the shop and dwelling-house, and whole wages to servants and assistants in the shop and house, and generally the whole working expenses of the establishment, as the same should be fixed by him, together with the premiums

No. 164.
July 15, 1875.
Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

on Munro's life, and the insurance on the property, and the expenses which had been or might be incurred in carrying out the agreement. The defender further bound himself to pay all the monies and proceeds which he might realise from the sale of the stock, from the recovery of the debts, and generally from the estate of Munro, into a separate bank account to be opened by him in his own name, and which might be operated on by him when necessary.

It was stipulated that the defender should receive a commission of £7, 10s. per cent "on all the monies which might be received or recovered by him in connection with the carrying on of the business and realisation of the estate," and the defender bound himself, after providing for all the payments undertaken by him, or for which he had rendered himself or might render himself responsible, as well as for his own commission and expenses, to account to Munro for the balance which might remain in his hands.

In pursuance of this agreement the defender guaranteed to Munro's creditors the last two instalments of the composition, and on 17th April 1871 Munro executed in favour of the defender an assignation and conveyance of his stock in trade and whole other estate, and also an assignation of the lease of his house and shop, which was not, however, intimated to the landlord.

Munro continued in possession of his house and business premises as before without any ostensible change. His name remained over the door, and was used in all advertisements regarding the business, and in the invoices of goods sent out and received. The correspondence in the course of the business was conducted entirely in his name, and the bills granted to creditors for goods supplied were signed by him.

On the other hand, in pursuance of the agreement, the whole receipts for the business were paid by Munro into a bank account kept in name of the defender, and which was operated on by the defender's cheques alone. Munro was restricted to an allowance of 30s., afterwards with the defender's consent enlarged to £2 a-week, for personal and family expenses, and this sum and the wages or salaries of shop assistants and servants, and rates and taxes on the house and shop, were deducted from the drawings from time to time before the balance was paid into bank. A cash-book was also opened by Munro at the defender's desire, containing a record of the cash transactions in connection with the business; and this book and the bank book in the defender's name gave the means of tracing all such cash transactions. When sums became payable, either on account of composition on Munro's former debts, or on account of goods ordered, or for payment of rents, or the like, in carrying on the business, after the agreement was entered into, the defender granted cheques on the bank account in his name, into which the proceeds of the business were paid. These cheques were granted almost invariably, not to the creditors directly, but were payable "to bearer," and handed to Munro, who made the payment or remittance, but they generally specified the particular purpose for which they were granted. The defender did not insist on Munro obtaining written authority from him before giving orders for goods. He was aware that goods were required, and were in course of being ordered from time to time, and the extent of his interference on this subject was to urge Munro to be careful to avoid ordering anything more than was absolutely required for the current wants of the business.

Under this system matters proceeded from April or May 1871 until April 1873. In the meantime Munro's creditors, including the pursuers, who had a debt due to them when the defender interposed as cautioner,

No. 164.

July 15, 1875.
Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

received payment of the composition on their debts. The money was to a great extent obtained from the receipts of the business; but there was a considerable deficiency, which was met by advances from the defender.

The goods the price of which the pursuers sued for were supplied to the "London House" in the winter of 1872-3. They were ordered by Munro, and invoiced to him, and were not furnished in reliance on the defender's credit to any extent. It was admitted that at the time the goods were furnished the pursuers knew nothing of the arrangements between the defender and Munro, beyond the fact that the defender had become cautioner for the last two instalments of the composition. Munro granted bills for the goods.

In April 1873 a state of Munro's affairs was made up, which shewed that the business was not prospering, and it was resolved that the business should be wound up, and the stock disposed of, if possible, to a purchaser. An opening having occurred elsewhere, Munro removed in May 1873 from Inverness, taking with him his household furniture, with the knowledge of the defender, and without objection on his part. Munro subsequently granted a bill to the defender for the estimated value of the furniture, and at the same time a bill for the estimated amount of the defender's advances.

When Munro left Inverness both he and the defender anticipated that when the stock was sold there would be a reversion in Munro's favour of £200 or £300, after repayment of the defender's advances and payment of his commission. The stock was sold in July with Munro's sanction, and it then became apparent that in place of a reversion the business would shew a considerable loss.

Munro having incurred additional debts in his new business, his estates were sequestrated on 4th October 1873. A claim was lodged for the defender, based upon the two bills mentioned; but that claim was afterwards withdrawn and another given in for the defender's actual advances and commission.

After Munro's sequestration, the existence of the agreement between him and Grant, and relative deeds, became known to the trustee in the sequestration, and through him to the trade creditors, in consequence of which the present action was raised.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to establish facts relevant to infer responsibility on the part of the defender for the sums sued for: Repels the pursuers' pleas in law, sustains the pleas in defence, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.*

---

* "NOTE.—(After a narrative of the facts)—Such being the state of the facts as to the origin and history of the defender's connection with the business, the questions of law which arise are,—whether the defender has become responsible for the business debts (1) because the business carried on ostensibly in Munro's name was truly carried on for his behoof, Munro being agent, and the defender the principal? or (2) because the defender was truly a partner with Munro in the business? and it will, I think, be convenient to take the last of these questions first.

"I am of opinion that in a question between Munro and the defender no partnership existed, and that the substance and effect of the agreement into which they entered was that the defender undertook to guarantee the payment of debts due by Munro, which might involve an advance on his part, on condition that Munro should conduct his business under stringent supervision, regulations, and restrictions, and should pay the defender a commission on the gross

No. 164.

July 15, 1875. Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for them;—Munro was absolutely divested in favour of the amount to be received in connection with the carrying on of the business and realisation of his estate, until the defender should be relieved of his guarantee. That this was the substance of the arrangement between these parties is, I think, apparent, if it be considered what would have been the position of matters if the parties had realised their expectations, and the business had prospered instead of going back. In that case, from the receipts of the business, the composition on the debts, the payment of which the defender had guaranteed, would have been paid without any advance on the defender's part being necessary; and as soon as his guarantee had in this way been superseded, and assuming that he was not under an advance, Munro would have settled with him by simply paying the stipulated commission under the agreement. On payment of that commission it is clear the defender was bound to discharge all the deeds that had been granted in his favour. This shews that the true nature of the arrangement between him and Munro was that commission should be paid by Munro for services rendered,—the service being the interposition of the guarantee, and the amount of commission being dependent on the sums received from the business, and in the realisation of any part of Munro's estate which might be sold. The defender was not even to receive a share of the profits of the business. His commission had no relation to profits, but was fixed with reference to the gross receipts from Munro's whole estate; and as between him and Munro there was no stipulation that he should bear any share of the losses which might be sustained. Both parties transacted on the footing that the business should continue to be Munro's. If it succeeded and he paid the defender's commission, the business belonging to him was freed from any burden or obligation in favour of the defender. If it failed, on the other hand, I see no reason for holding that the defender in that case became a partner with Munro. He did not undertake in that case to bear a share of the losses, any more than he became entitled in the case of success to a share of the profits. The losses of the business fall on Munro because the business belonged to him. The defender's loss is the amount of his commission and any sum he advanced under his guarantee, excepting any composition he may recover on these amounts; for his interest, as between him and Munro, was by their agreement limited to his commission and the repayment of any advances he might be obliged to make.

"Previous to the now leading case of Cox v. Hickman, House of Lords (Appeal from Exchequer Chamber), August 1860, 8 Clark's House of Lords Cases, 268, and 30 Law Journal (Common Pleas), 125, participation in the profits of a business was sufficient to infer responsibility as a partner, as explained, with the only limitation of the rule, and a full reference to the authorities, in the last edition (3d edition) of Mr Lindley's work on Partnership, p. 36. In that case it was decided that the right to a share of the profits of a business does not necessarily infer the liability of partnership, and that the relation of partnership depends on the question whether the business is in substance and reality carried on by the alleged partner himself, or by others authorised to act as his agent or agents for that purpose, the destination or division of profits being a material or pregnant circumstance, but a circumstance only, in determining that question. The case of Cox v. Hickman has been followed by several others, referred to by Mr Lindley on pp. 40 to 45 of his work, the leading cases being those of Bullen v. Sharpe, 1865, Law Reports, 1 Common Pleas, p. 86, and Mollwo, March, and Company v. Court of Wards, in the Privy Council, July 1872, 4 Privy Council Appeals, 419. These two cases have perhaps a more direct bearing on the second ground of responsibility maintained here against the defender; and the latter of them indeed in some material respects in its circumstances closely resembles the present case. Without entering into any analysis of these cases, which would involve much detail, I have only to say that I concur in the view expressed by Mr Lindley that the judgments in these two cases merely carried out to their legitimate results the principles which were announced, and which received effect, in the decision of Cox v.

defender, with merely the hope of a reversion. The business was truly the defender's.[1]

Hickman; and I think they bear out the statement made by Mr Lindley, obviously after very careful consideration and examination of the judgments, and with a special knowledge of the case of Mollwo, with which he was very familiar, that they 'establish the doctrine that no person who does not hold himself out as a partner is liable to third persons for the acts of persons whose profits he shares, unless he and they are really partners inter se.'

"Of course a business carried on in the name of one person may be entirely the business of another whose name may be unknown to third parties, and in that case the unknown principal is responsible for all contracts made by his agent carrying on the business within its ordinary line, while the agent, even if paid by a salary only, will himself be responsible for the business debts, not because he is truly a partner, but because he holds himself out as such. The case of Edmunds v. Bushell and Jones, Law Reports, 1 Queen's Bench, 97, cited by the pursuers, is an illustration of this rule. Where, however, the question is, whether a person who receives with others a share of the profits of a business, of which they are unquestionably partners, is also a partner, I think it is the result of the decisions above referred to that (in the absence of acts shewing that with his knowledge or authority he was held out as a partner) the receipt of profits will not infer responsibility as a partner unless the parties, having regard to the subsistence of their arrangements, are really partners inter se; and referring, in particular, to the opinion of Baron Bramwell in the case of Bullen v. Sharpe, and to the judgment in the case of Mollwo, March, and Company, I think there is no more reason for inferring agency, with resulting liability for the debts of the business, from an agreement to share profits, than for inferring partnership as between the parties receiving profits.

"Reverting to the question whether the defender was a partner with Munro in the business in question, I think the pursuers have failed to instruct such partnership, (1) because what the defender received, or was to receive, was really not a share of profits, but a commission on the gross receipts from the business and the realisation of Munro's estate; and (2) because, even if these could be represented as a share of profits, the true nature of the arrangement between Munro and the defender was that a guarantee was interposed for a certain return, and not that the defender should have any share in the business to be carried on as belonging to him as well as Munro.

"The remaining question is, Whether the business belonged entirely to the defender, Munro being merely his agent or servant in conducting it? I am of opinion that the facts proved do not warrant this inference. The defender never took possession, as he no doubt might have done, of the stock and other personal property which belonged to Munro, but, on the contrary, allowed Munro to continue in open possession as formerly. The conveyance was not acted on in any way. It is true, the business was conducted under the stringent conditions and restrictions for which the defender stipulated when he agreed to interpose his guarantee, and, in particular, the whole monies drawn were paid into an account in the defender's name, and could only be drawn out again on his cheques. Certain other conditions were relaxed, as, for example, the provision that goods should not be ordered without written authority; but, notwithstanding, Munro alone carried on the business, subject, no doubt, to strict control, and to an obligation to limit himself to a small sum for maintenance. Munro's own name appeared in every way, so far as regards the public, as if he were under no control. The sole change under the agreement was, that, as the price for the defender's interposition by his guarantee, Munro submitted to the defender's control so far as he chose to exercise it, which appears to have been very little, in carrying on the business.

"For the reasons already stated, I hold it to be clear there was no partner-

[1] Murray and M'Gregor v. Campbell and Co., Nov. 28, 1827, 6 S. 147; and cases cited by the Lord Ordinary.

No. 164. At advising,—

July 15, 1875. Eagleaham & Co. v. Grant.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised in this case is very important, ship between the parties inter se, and the same considerations appear to me to shew that Munro was acting for himself as the proprietor of the business, and not for the defender in carrying it on. The defender, no doubt, had an interest, viz., to receive his commission, and be relieved of his guarantee, and for that purpose had stipulated for such control as he took over the management. But the management was not for his behoof as in right of the business, but for Munro, to whom the profit or loss belonged.

"The points chiefly relied on as fixing liability on the defender in the character of a principal, Munro being his servant or agent merely, are the existence of the bank account and the operations on it, the fact that the defender made large advances from his own funds to enable the business to be carried on, and the granting of the bills above mentioned by Munro to the defender on the eve of bankruptcy. As to the first of these, if it be assumed that the bank account had been in the name of a third party for the defender's protection, and to secure him against the application of the receipts of the business to any other purpose than payment of its debts, and that the cheques of this third party had alone been effectual, the result, so far as the business is concerned, would have been the same, viz., that it would have been carried on subject to the control stipulated for. In that case I do not think there would have been room for the argument founded on the existence of the bank account, and it seems to make no real difference that the defender himself had this check on the application of all money received in the business, by having the bank account in his own name. The fact that the defender paid considerable sums out of his own pocket in carrying on the business is, I think, of no importance, for substantially they were loans by the defender, or payments which he could not avoid making under his guarantee. They cannot, I think, be truly represented as money advanced by the defender as principal to Munro as his agent in carrying on his business. As to the bills granted on the eve of bankruptcy they appear to me to have been taken at a time when the parties were in some confusion as to the precise effect of their agreement and what had followed, which is not to be wondered at, having regard to the rather unusual and somewhat complicated nature of the arrangements which they had entered into. The defender was entitled to commission on any part of Munro's estate which was realised, and as the furniture was, as it were, taken away from his power of control and of taking possession of it, he may have regarded it as realised, in the sense of giving him a claim for commission on its value. But, whatever be the explanation, the parties were evidently under a misapprehension as to the nature of the defender's rights. The bills were subsequently abandoned, and I do not attach any real importance to the fact of their having been taken.

In the view now stated, the agreement between the parties not having been followed by the defender himself taking possession of Munro's business or effects,—a fact which is illustrated by the circumstance that the trustee has now right to the debts, and would also have had right to the stock if it had not been sold and realised before the sequestration,—it follows that Munro was acting for himself and not as the defender's agent in carrying on the business, and if so, responsibility against the defender cannot be maintained.

"It is perhaps unnecessary to consider what would have been the result if the defender had taken possession in a way which seems never to have been contemplated—viz., by removing Munro from the occupation of the premises. Even in that case, however, it is by no means clear, that if the defender carried on the business under the agreement in Munro's name, and without holding himself out in any way as a partner, or as carrying on the business to any extent for his own behoof, that the result would have been different. In that case it is clear that the return to be received by the defender would still have been a commission on the receipts of the business and nothing more, and he would have carried on the business for Munro's behoof ultimately,—the profit

No. 164.

July 15, 1875.
Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

and has been treated with great ability and at considerable length by the Lord Ordinary. But I think that the grounds on which the case falls to be decided lie within a narrow compass.

The pursuers, who are merchants in Glasgow, furnished goods to a man named Munro, who kept a shop in Inverness. He was the sole party known to them, and they trusted solely to his credit. He has become bankrupt, and the pursuers say that they have since discovered that Munro was merely an agent, and that the real person who had the benefit of the transaction was Grant, the defender; and they found upon a deed which they maintain has the effect of making Grant the real trader, and Munro only an agent. I do not doubt that if this deed, said to constitute the relation of principal and agent between Grant and Munro, had been for the benefit of Grant, if Grant had been the real trader, though Munro was ostensibly put forward, the pursuers' claim would have been well founded. Nor should I have been disposed to admit the limitations on the agent's powers as giving rise to an exception to the general rule, if the business were truly that of Grant, and not that of Munro.

It is clear, however, that the whole transaction, by whatever name it be called, was nothing but a security. It was a piece of mechanism devised for the purpose of getting Munro's composition accepted, for the purpose of securing the creditors in payment of that composition, and also for the purpose of securing Grant, who guaranteed the payment of two of the composition instalments, against loss in consequence of his guarantee. We must take the whole transaction as one. That being so, the fact seems conclusive of the case. The principle of partnership so largely dealt with in the English cases cited has no place here. This deed conferred upon Grant no participation in the profits of the business of any kind. The profits went to one man only,—to Munro. No other person, as trader, had any interest in them. True, these profits were appropriated to pay Munro's debts, his composition to his creditors, and the relief of his cautioner; but these were purposes wholly for Munro's benefit, and no one participated in any part of the profits, excepting as a consequence of Munro's having them applied for his individual advantage. Grant was simply a medium, interposed to accomplish the payment of Munro's debts. He gets nothing to himself but a commission. In short, beyond this he cannot gain, but he may lose by the arrangement. The profits of the trade go to Munro, or, what is precisely the same thing, to Munro's creditors. In this state of matters, there could not in any view be any ground for alleging a partnership between Grant and Munro. As little was Grant the principal in the trading, and Munro an agent. The business was not carried on for Grant's benefit, but for Munro's benefit.

This is sufficient for the decision of the case. At the same time I think that a valuable principle is laid down in the English cases, particularly in that of or loss being Munro's under the agreement. He would truly have been, I think, the agent for Munro, the principal; and if his acts in carrying on the business were all consistent with the character of agent for Munro, in whose name and by whose mandate the business was conducted under the agreement, and the defender had not held himself out as a partner to the public, I am disposed to think he would not have been responsible for the trade debts. With reference to this question, however, much might depend on the special circumstances proved as to the mode of taking possession and the particular acts of the defender; and without actual facts, such as do not here occur, the question does not admit of being made the subject of a definite opinion."

---

No. 164.
July 15, 1875.
Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

Mollwo, March, and Co., which comes nearest to the present, that the substance and not the form of the transaction is to be looked at. Here the substance of the transaction was not the constitution of a partnership, nor of the relation of principal and agent, but of a security between debtor and creditor, which subsisted solely for that purpose, and was intended to terminate when that purpose was served.

LORD NEAVES.—I take the same view as your Lordship. There are two strong facts in the case. The public were never in any way misled by anything done by Grant. Neither was Grant embarking on the business for his own benefit. The agreement was that the business should be proceeded with so as to pay Munro's debts, and after that to revert to its old channel. If by any means, either from the business or from extraneous sources, Munro had been able to pay off his debts and Grant's commission, Grant's right and interest in the business would have ceased at once. No equity demands that Grant should be made liable to parties who never knew anything of him until after Munro's sequestration. There never was any delivery to Grant of the stock in trade so far as the public were concerned. Partnership between Grant and Munro is therefore out of the question. Nor can it be said that they stood to one another in the relation of principal and agent. It is no doubt true that if a person whose name may be unknown to third parties carries on a business by means of another, whom he allows to be held out as his general agent, the principal cannot plead any private stipulations between him and his agent in bar of his liability. The case of Edmunds v. Bushell and Jones, L. R. 1 Q. B. 97, illustrates this proposition. It came out that a business, carried on under the firm of Bushell and Company, was truly the property of Jones, and therefore Jones was made liable for business debts. But I cannot assimilate that case to the present.

LORD ORMIDALE.—It is acknowledged by the pursuers that they did not rely on Grant's credit. They knew nothing indeed of Grant at the time they sold the goods to Munro. Still, if it had been proved that Munro was only the ostensible trader, and that Grant was the real principal, or was a partner with Munro, Grant would be liable. Was he, then, principal or partner in any proper sense? I entirely concur in thinking that there is no evidence sufficient to establish that he was. Grant, no doubt, had an interest of a certain kind in the business. He was to be remunerated for his services in being interposed as a check on behalf of Munro's creditors, and further stipulations were made to secure himself from his guarantee. Beyond that he had no interest in the drapery business. It was conceded that Munro could have discharged Grant at any moment on relieving him of his guarantee, and paying him the commission stipulated for. A partner could not be so discharged, and this is perhaps a sufficient test of the question of partnership.

The second alternative maintained for the pursuers is that Grant, although not a partner with Munro, was the principal in the business, and that Munro was a mere man of straw. I cannot think that this was the case. On the contrary, when we come to consider the true position of the parties, we find that Grant was really no more than an agent. Munro was still principal. The business was carried on to liquidate his debt. Grant was there as a check to superintend Munro, and he was to get for his services a certain remuneration.

No. 164.
July 15, 1875.
Eaglesham & Co. v. Grant.

His position was, in short, that of agent. The present case is quite different from that of Edmunds v. Bushell and Jones,[1] cited for the pursuers. In that case, while Jones had the sole interest in the business, Bushell was put forward as the ostensible trader, Jones lying behind, and, as he thought, exposing himself to no liability. In the present case, so far from Grant having the sole interest in the business, or being able to stop it when he pleased, the fact was the very reverse.

Upon these grounds, and without going into the other English cases cited, Cox v. Hickman, and Mollwo, March and Company v. Court of Wards,[2] which were stronger cases against the parties sought to be made liable than the present, I have come to be of the same opinion with your Lordship. I wish, however, to guard myself from being supposed to afford any countenance to a case of fraudulent concealment, as where a man of straw is put forward to carry on business on behalf of another. No such case arises here. It is not so stated on record, and there is no indication of it in the evidence.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have arrived at the same result without any difficulty. When the pursuers made the furnishings for which they are now claiming they knew nobody but Munro, who was carrying on business in his old shop, and they took Munro's bills, three in number, in payment of the debt. They now maintain that it was Grant who was the draper, and that it was to him that the goods were really furnished. This contention is founded on two grounds.

In the first place, it is said that Grant was a partner of Munro's, and therefore liable, and this plea is a good one if made out in fact. But the pursuers have entirely failed to prove that Grant was a partner. We have the minute of agreement and the whole facts before us. Whatever the effect of the deed is, it is not a contract of copartnery. The defender is not under the deed to receive any share of the profits, nor are any of the elements which belong to a partnership present.

The alternative ground on which the pursuers rest their claim presents only a little more difficulty, viz. that the business was Grant's. Here again it is a question of fact whether Grant was the real person with whom the pursuers dealt, for if Munro was a mere servant, it is not disputed that if the real trader can be got at he would be liable. In my opinion the pursuers have failed to prove this branch of their case also. I quite agree that we must look to the substance of the transaction between Grant and Munro, and not to the mere form; but the substance is in accordance with the defender's contention, and not with the pursuers'. The real nature of the transaction was that Munro was to continue to carry on the business for his own behoof, and it does not cease to be his business because the proceeds were to go to his creditors. The agreement was, in short, a form of security stipulated for by Grant—perhaps not a very good form of security, but that does not make Grant the real trader. On the contrary, it is proved that Munro was the party who contracted with the pursuers.

On these grounds, I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded.

THE COURT adhered.

J. W. & J. MACKENZIE, W.S.—MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] L. R., 1 Q. B. 97.
[2] See Lord Ordinary's note supra, p. 964

No. 165.

July 15, 1875. Robertson v. Steuart.

MARGARET WILSON OR STEUART, now ROBERTSON, AND HUSBAND, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Scott—Brand.
FRANC NICHOLS STEUART, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Balfour.

Process—Expenses—Separate Defenders—Joint Defence.—Two defenders convened in an action agreed to conduct their defence jointly, and this agreement was acted upon from the date of closing the record, until, after a judgment of the Inner-House in favour of the pursuer, one of the defenders compromised the case by payment of a sum of money "in full of the conclusions of the action against him," including that for expenses. The other defender appealed to the House of Lords, and obtained a reversal of the judgment of the Court of Session, in consequence of which he was assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the action, and was found "entitled to the expenses incurred by him" in the action in the Court of Session.

Held that the latter defender was only entitled to recover his own separate expenses and one-half of the joint expenses incurred by both defenders under the arrangement between them.

1ST DIVISION. M.

Vide ante, vol. i. p. 532, and supra, House of Lords reports, p. 80.

In this case the House of Lords, on 7th June 1875, reversed the judgment of the Court of Session, and ordered the appellant, Franc Nichols Steuart (defender in the Court of Session) to be "assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses of the Court below," and remitted the case back to the Court of Session to do therein as should be just and consistent with their judgment.

The Court, on 26th June 1875, on the petition of Franc N. Steuart applied this judgment of the House of Lords, and found him "entitled to the expenses incurred by him in this Court, and also to the expenses of the said petition, and of the procedure thereon," and allowed an account of these expenses to be given in to the Auditor to tax and report.

The action had originally been laid against Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, as well as against Mr Franc Nichols Steuart. Up to the date of closing the record in the case the two defenders were represented by separate counsel and agents, but at that stage they arranged (July 20, 1872) that throughout the subsequent procedure they should be represented by the same counsel, but that, as the case was one requiring an extraordinary amount of investigation and precognition of witnesses preparatory to the proof, they would continue to employ their two agents jointly, each agent taking a separate department in the preparation of the cause. This arrangement was acted upon down to 6th June 1874, when, in consequence of the judgment of the Inner-House of 27th February 1874, the defender, Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, resolved to compromise the case. This he did by payment to the pursuer of £5750 "in full of the conclusions of the action against him," including that for expenses.

The defender, Franc Nichols Steuart, alone appealed to the House of Lords.

In terms of the interlocutor of 26th June 1875, applying the judgment of the House of Lords, Franc Nichols Steuart lodged his account of expenses with the Auditor. This account was made up on the principle of charging the work done by the two agents separately between 20th July 1872 and 6th March 1874, as if one agent only had been employed to conduct the whole case. No charge was made for double attendance, &c. The amount of this account the Auditor taxed at £1392, 15s. 10d., "reserving for the determination of the Court the question as to the amount which should be deducted from the account in respect of the joint representation of the defenders during the period between 20th July 1872 and 6th June 1874." *

No. 165.

July 15, 1875.
Robertson v. Steuart.

The defender, F. N. Steuart, objected to the Auditor's report, in as far as he proposed to disallow him the half of the joint expenses from 20th July 1872 to 4th June 1874.

He contended that his account of expenses, as rendered and taxed, was just the same as if he had been sole defender in the cause. There were no separate or separable expenses incurred by the double representation included. He was liable to both sets of agents, and it was jus tertii of the pursuers to found on any arrangement there might be between him and Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, who was no longer a party to the case, or on any right of relief he might have against Sir Archibald.[1]

It was argued for the pursuers;—Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart had compromised the whole case, including the matter of expenses. To give effect to the contention of the defender, F. N. Steuart, would be to interfere with the terms of that compromise, and to relieve Sir Archibald of his share of the defender's joint expenses. The Auditor was therefore right in making an apportionment.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The finding under which this defender is asking expenses is thus expressed in our interlocutor of 26th June last:—"Find the said defender entitled to the expenses incurred by him in the action in this Court," &c. The question now before us depends, I think, entirely upon the meaning of the words "expenses incurred by him."

The expenses included in this account were undoubtedly incurred by Sir Douglas Stewart and Mr Franc Nichols Steuart jointly, and they are jointly liable to the two agents employed. But I do not see that in these circumstances one of the two joint employers can be held, in a question with the opposite party to the action, to have incurred the whole of the account. He may be so held in a question with the agents to whom he has incurred a joint liability along with his co-defender, but that is a matter with which his opponent has no concern. I think the true meaning of the words "expenses incurred by him" is just the amount which, in the result, he will have to pay to his agent or agents. Now, there can be no possible doubt that, even if he has to pay the whole account to the agents, he will be entitled to relief against Sir Douglas Stewart to the extent of one-half. As Sir Douglas is now out of this process, he may have to raise a separate action of relief against him, but that he will have relief there can be no doubt whatever. All therefore that he will in the ultimate result have to pay is the one-half of the joint account. That is all, therefore, that he can recover from the pursuer under our interlocutor.

The soundness of this view is, I think, very well illustrated by a considera-

* NOTE BY THE AUDITOR.—"During the period mentioned the defenders were represented by the same counsel, and were or might have been represented by the same agents also. Such an arrangement was, in the opinion of the Auditor, proper in the circumstances, and it humbly appears to him that the expenses may fairly be regarded as applicable to the extent of one-half to the case of the defender Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart. In the event of this view being approved of by the Court there will fall to be deducted from the taxed amount reported the sum of £651, 13s., leaving, as balance of expenses to be decerned for, £741, 2s. 10d."

[1] Hughes and Duncan v. Gordon, Dec. 13, 1823, 2 S. 580 (N. E. 498); Stewart v. Robertsons, Nov. 25, 1852, 15 D. 94, 25 Scot. Jur. 68; Macleod v. Heritors of Morvern, Feb 16, 1870, 8 Macph. 528, 42 Scot. Jur. 245.

No. 165.

July 15, 1875. Robertson v. Steuart.

tion of the compromise entered into between the pursuer and Sir Douglas Stewart, and of the very strange and unjust result which would follow were we to sustain the opposite contention.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—Having heard counsel on the Auditor's report on the account of expenses incurred by the defender, Franc Nichols or Franc Nichols Steuart, No. 306 of process, taxing the same at the sum of £1392, 15s. 10d., approve of the deduction therefrom of £651, 13s., as mentioned in said report: Approve of the said report, and decern," &c.

M'CAUL & ARMSTRONG, S.S.C.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 166.

July 15, 1875. Graham v. Bell.

HENRY GORDON, Pursuer and Real Raiser.
JOHN GRAHAM, Claimant and Appellant.—Kinnear.
MUNGO BELL, Claimant and Respondent.—Fraser.

Diligence—Arrestment—Execution—Clerical Error—1 and 2 Vict. c. 114 (Personal Diligence Act, 1838), sec. 9.—Where an execution of arrestment bore to proceed on an extract Sheriff-court decree (containing warrant to arrest, in virtue of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 9) dated 13th January and extracted 6th February 1872, whereas the decree which formed the warrant of arrestment was dated 30th January 1872, held that the discrepancy was fatal to the validity of the arrestment.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries-shire. M.

THIS multiplepoinding was raised in the Sheriff-court of Dumfries, at the instance of Henry Gordon, sheriff-clerk of Dumfriesshire, curator bonis of William Graham.

The fund in medio was a sum which the pursuer and real raiser was due to Peter Graham.

Inter alia, a claim was lodged for Mungo Bell, who founded on a decree obtained by him against Peter Graham, dated 30th January and extracted 6th February, and upon arrestment of the fund in medio executed on 20th February 1872.

It was objected by the claimant John Graham to the claim for Mungo Bell that both the schedule of arrestment and the execution of arrestment founded on bore to proceed upon an extract decree containing warrant of arrestment obtained by him against Peter Graham dated 13th January and extracted 6th February 1872, whereas the extract of the decree produced bore the decree to have been pronounced on 30th January 1872.

This objection was sustained by the Sheriff-substitute (Hope) and by the Sheriff (Napier). An appeal was taken for the claimant John Graham upon another point, under which the claimant Mungo Bell was heard.

Argued for Mungo Bell;—The error was not in essentialibus. Since the passing of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838,* the extract not the

* 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114 (the Personal Diligence Act), sec. 9, enacts,—"Where an extract shall be issued of any decree or act pronounced or to be pronounced by any Sheriff . . . . the extractor shall, in terms of the schedule (No. 6) hereunto annexed (or as near thereto as circumstances will permit) insert therein a warrant to charge the debtor or obligant to pay the debt or perform the obligation within the days of charge, under the pain of poinding and imprisonment, and to arrest and poind according to the present practice . . .; which extract shall be subscribed and prepared in other respects as extracts are at present subscribed and prepared," &c.

No. 166.
July 15, 1875.
Graham v. Bell.

decree was the warrant of arrestment. The decree contained no warrant to arrest. It was only under his statutory powers, first given by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, that the extractor inserted, when required, a warrant to arrest in the extract decree. Thus the extract became the warrant. Now, though the date of the decree was given by mistake as the 13th January instead of 30th January, the date of the extract was right, and that was the material point. Further, the charge and execution of charge on which the arrestment proceeded gave correctly the date of the decree. There could, therefore, be no real doubt as to the true date of the decree, and the debtor could not be misled by the mere clerical error which had occurred.[1]

Argued for John Graham;—A decree since the passing of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, necessarily implied a power in the extractor to issue a warrant of arrestment. But it was not the act of the extractor, but the decree of the Judge that was the real warrant. The date of the decree was therefore material.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The arrestment founded on by the claimant Mungo Bell proceeds upon an extract decree of the Sheriff of Dumfries, and that extract has appended to it a warrant to charge and also to arrest and poind in the form prescribed by the Personal Diligence Act, 1838.

The objection to the arrestment arises in this way. The extract begins as usual with the date of the decree,—"At Dumfries, the 30th day of January 1872." And at the end, in conformity with schedule 6 appended to the Act, there is this statement,—"Extracted upon this and the four preceding pages at Dumfries, the 6th day of February 1872 years, by me, Sheriff-clerk-depute of the county of Dumfries. CHARLES M'KIE, Sh.-Ck.-Dep." Therefore the date of the decree is 30th January, and the date of the extract is 6th February 1872. On the warrant contained in that extract a charge was given on 7th February, the execution of which is perfectly correct. So far therefore the diligence is good, and no objection lies. But it is in the next step that the blunder is committed. When the creditor proceeds to arrest, in virtue of the warrant contained in this extract decree, his execution of arrestment, which is dated 20th February 1872, refers to the decree as bearing date 13th instead of 30th January. No doubt it bears also correctly that it was extracted on 6th February. The same blunder is committed in the schedule of arrestment which was left with the arrestee.

The question then is, whether this error, appearing in the execution and schedule of arrestment, is fatal to the arrestment?

It must be observed that the Personal Diligence Act merely gives authority to make certain additions to the form of extract previously in use. It does not in any way regulate the form of extract. For after the words authorising the extractor to insert a warrant to charge, arrest, and poind, the 9th section of the Act proceeds,—"Which extract shall be subscribed and prepared in other respects as extracts are at present subscribed and prepared." Therefore so far as the extract itself is concerned, there is nothing new introduced by the statute, and when it is argued that the extract is thereby made the warrant of the arrestment, I think the Act of Parliament is simply misread.

---

[1] Henderson v. Rollo, Nov. 18, 1871, 10 Macph. 104, 44 Scot. Jur. 73.

[2] Ersk. iii. 6, 18; Menzies, 312; Beattie v. M'Lellan, May 28, 1844, 6 D. 1088, 16 Scot. Jur. 472; Brown v. Blaikie, Feb. 1, 1849, 11 D. 474, 21 Scot. Jur. 135.

No. 166.
July 15, 1875.
Graham v. Bell.

The truly important thing for consideration here is that the date of the decree is misstated in the execution of arrestment. Now, a decree dated 13th January and extracted 6th February is a different thing from a decree dated 30th January and extracted 6th February, and, what is of more importance, they are by no means inconsistent with one another. It is quite possible that there should be two decrees, one pronounced on 13th and the other on 30th January, and both extracted on 6th February. There is, therefore, an essential discrepancy between the execution of arrestment and its warrant. We must therefore adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff.

The case of Henderson v. Rollo, to which we have been referred, was very different from the present. There the whole steps of diligence were written on the same piece of paper, and therefore means were afforded of at once correcting the clerical error which had been committed in the date of the decree on which the diligence proceeded. That is not, however, the case here.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find with reference to the claim of Mungo Bell, respondent, that the schedule of arrestment and execution thereof, dated 20th February 1875, founded on in the claim, are disconform to their warrant, inasmuch as the decree on which they proceed is stated to be dated the 13th instead of the 30th January 1872, and that the arrestment is consequently inept and did not attach the fund in medio," &c.

JOHN WHITEHEAD, S.S.C.—JOHN GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 167.
July 16, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

MRS MARY SANDERSON EDMONSTON or SYMINGTON, Pursuer.—D.-F. Clark—Asher—Mackintosh.
ANDREW JAMES SYMINGTON, Defender.—Fraser—Scott—Burnet.

Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Separation—Custody of Children.—In an action of separation the House of Lords, after granting decree of separation at the wife's instance, found that, in the circumstances of the case, the husband was entitled to the custody of the sons and the wife to the custody of the daughters of the marriage during pupillarity, so long as no different order should be made by the Court of Session, but subject to such regulations as the Court might make for the access of each parent to the children in the custody of the other, and subject to an obligation by the parents respectively not to remove the children from the jurisdiction of the Court. Terms of order made by the Court.

1ST DIVISION. B.

THIS was a petition by Andrew James Symington to apply a judgment of the House of Lords in an action of separation and aliment at the instance of Mrs Symington.

The judgment of the House of Lords is reported supra, H. L., p. 41.

The Court, having heard counsel, appointed the parties respectively "to lodge minutes with regard to the application of the said judgment," and particularly with regard to the custody of the children of the marriage.

Minutes were put in accordingly. The only difference between the proposals made by Mr and Mrs Symington respectively was, that Mr Symington desired that the two girls, who were to remain in the custody of the mother, should be allowed to remain with him from Saturday to

No. 167.

July 16, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

Monday, and not for Saturday only, on the occasion of the monthly visits which it was agreed that they should pay to him, and that they should be allowed to reside with him during six weeks of the year, while Mrs Symington objected to their visiting him except for the day.

The ages of the children were as follows:—Boys—Andrew James, twelve years; Eric, nine and a half; and Harold, eight and a half. Girls—Agnes, seven; and Margaret, five.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I take it for granted that the husband and wife are not to be resident at any great distance from one another. In fact the wife has intimated her intention, in the interest of the children, of changing her residence when necessary, so as to be sufficiently near the husband, wherever he may be. This facilitates very much the disposal of the points now before us. The first of these points is that of the occasional residence with the one parent of the children committed to the care of the other. Now, on this matter there is a manifest distinction drawn in the remit of the House of Lords between the case of the boys and of the girls. It is suggested that the occasional residence of the boys with the mother is desirable, and I do not entertain any doubt that an arrangement ought to be made with that view. In that respect, I think Mrs Symington's proposal is most judicious.

But, on the other hand, Mr Symington proposes the occasional residence of the girls with him. There is no suggestion in the remit that we should provide for that, and there are obvious reasons why, for the present, we should not do so. It is hardly necessary that I should enter in detail into the reasons why it is not desirable that young girls of the ages of five and seven should be transferred from one house to another, particularly where they must be deprived of the services of their ordinary attendant, whether she be a servant or their mother. The mother could not, of course, accompany them, nor would it be judicious to introduce a servant from the one household into the other. Therefore for the present, but for the present only, I am against any occasional residence of the girls with their father. It depends on circumstances, and on the after history of this pair, what arrangement we may sanction in the future.

As to the visits on Saturdays, I think the arrangement is on the whole satisfactory. It will admit of all the children being with each parent once a month. But for the same reason as I am against the occasional residence of the girls with the father, I am not disposed to allow of their remaining from Saturday till Monday. And that being so, as regards the girls, it is not expedient that any other arrangement should be made as regards the boys.

There remains to be disposed of the question of the education of the boys, and we shall not pronounce any final interlocutor till we hear what proposal Mr Symington has to make on that point.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was subsequently pronounced:—"Apply the said judgment: Appoint the pursuer, Mrs Symington, forthwith to deliver the children, Andrew James, Eric, and Harold, to the defender, Mr A. J. Symington, but under the condition that the said children are to reside with the pursuer for one month during their autumn holidays, for one week in April, and for one week at Christmas; and under the further condition that once a-month, every alter-

No. 167.
July 16, 1875.
Symington v. Symington.

nate fortnight during the remainder of the year, the said children shall spend a Saturday in the house of the pursuer, the defender making all the necessary arrangements and disbursements for fulfilling these conditions; and under this further condition, that the said children shall be educated at the school of Langside till the further orders of the Court: Find that the pursuer is to have the custody of the children, Agnes and Margaret, subject to the future orders of the Court, but under the condition that the said children, Agnes and Margaret, are, except during the residence of the children, Andrew James, Eric, and Harold, with the pursuer, once a month—a fortnight after the fortnightly visit of the other children to the pursuer—to spend a Saturday in the house of the defender, so that the whole five children shall spend the day together once every month in the house of the defender; and it is further ordered that neither the pursuer nor the defender shall remove any of the children beyond the jurisdiction of this Court: Reserving to either party to apply to the Court for any further or other orders which may become necessary, and decern."

J. & R. D. Ross, W.S.—John Galletly, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 168.
July 20, 1875.
Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.

Thomas Robson Miller and Others (Owners of the "Isabella"), Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—J. G. Smith.

Thomas Powell and Others (Owners of the "Maranham"), Respondents and Claimants.—MacLean.

James Donald and Others (Owners of the "Sourabaya"), Respondents and Claimants.—Alison.

Michael Sundt and Another (Owners of the "Anna"), Claimants.—Keir.

Ship—Collision—Reparation—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514, and Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 54.—It is competent for the owner of a vessel to present a petition to the Court under the 514th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, with a view to having his liability for damages ascertained or restricted, without admitting liability for such damages.

Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514.—Forms of procedure.

1st Division. B.

On 21st October 1874, during a storm of wind, the ship "Isabella," while lying at the "Tail of the Bank," off Greenock, came into collision successively with two other vessels, the "Maranham" and the "Anna," and with a floating dock called the "Sourabaya." The collision with these three vessels in succession took place on the same occasion, and within the space of an hour or thereby. Considerable injury was sustained by all three.

The owners of the "Maranham," on 3d December 1874, raised an action of damages against the owners of the "Isabella," concluding for £2000.

The owners of the "Anna," on 8th December 1874, brought a similar action, concluding for £1500, and the owners of the "Sourabaya" also brought a similar action on 10th February 1875, concluding for £13,000. All three sets of pursuers arrested the "Isabella" on the dependence of their respective actions.

The owners of the "Isabella" denied liability, and defended these actions.

On 4th March 1875, during the dependence of these actions, and before any proof was led, the owners of the "Isabella" presented a petition,

No. 168.

July 20, 1875.

Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.

founding on sec. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 63,* and on sec. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104,† and stating that it would be convenient to have the actions which had arisen out of the collision of 21st October 1874 tried together, and that they were desirous, in the event of their being found liable, to have their liability restricted, in terms of the statute,—the value of the "Isabella" at the time of the collision, at £8 per ton, being insufficient to answer the suits or claims instituted against them; and in which they craved the Court "to find that, if liable, the petitioners are not liable in respect of the loss or damage caused by the said collisions, or any of them, to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the registered tonnage of the said vessel 'Isabella,' being in all the sum of £8536; and on the petitioners consigning or finding caution for said sum, to recall the said arrestments; to appoint all persons having any claims in reference to or arising out of the said collisions to lodge the same within such time as may be fixed, with certification that otherwise they shall be excluded; to stop further proceedings in said actions, or give such directions for the trial of the questions therein raised, or otherwise, as may appear to be convenient; and in the event of its being found that the petitioners' vessel is to blame, to decern for payment of the sum or sums which may be found due out of the said sum of £8536, or distribute the same rateably among the several claimants; to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents and all other persons from bringing any other action or actions, suit or suits, against the said vessel 'Isabella,' or against the petitioners, or any or either of them, in respect of the said collision; and to find the petitioners entitled to expenses."

The Court, on 5th March 1875, appointed intimation to be made on the walls and in the minute-book, and to be served on the owners of the "Maranham," the "Anna," and the "Sourabaya," and ordained them to lodge answers within eight days; and further appointed "advertisement of the said petition and this deliverance to be made once in each of the 'Edinburgh Gazette,' the 'Scotsman,' and the 'Shipping and Mercantile Gazette' newspapers, respectively."

---

* Sec. 54.—"The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur, without their actual fault or privity, that is to say,—. . . . '(4) Where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat,—Be answerable in damages in respect of . . . loss or damage to ship's goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the ship's tonnage . . . .'"

† Sec. 514.—"In cases where any liability has been or is alleged to have been incurred by any owner, in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then . . . . it shall be lawful in . . . . Scotland in the Court of Session . . . . . to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner, for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, ... and for the distribution of such amount, rateably, amongst the several claimants, with power for any such Court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other Court in relation to the same subject-matter; and any proceeding entertained by such Court of Chancery, or Court of Session, or other competent Court, may be conducted in such manner, and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the same, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the Court thinks just."

No. 168.
July 20, 1875.
Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.

Answers were put in for the owners of the "Maranham," in which they stated,—"The present petition seems to the respondents to be incompetent, or, at all events, premature," and, founding on sec. 506 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, contended that the owners of the "Isabella" were liable for the full amount of damages done by her.

Answers were also put in for the "Sourabaya," in which they maintained that the liability of the petitioners to them should be dealt with independently from their liability to the other owners, but did not object to the competency of the petition.

No answers were put in for the "Anna," and no appearance was made for any other party.

The value of the "Isabella" at £8 per ton was admitted to be £8536, and the Court, on 20th March, having considered the petition and answers, recalled the arrestments upon caution for that amount, and, quoad ultra, continued the petition in the roll.

The three actions against the owners of the "Isabella" were tried together in May 1875, and resulted in their being found liable to the owners of the "Maranham" in £2000, and expenses; to the owners of the "Anna" in £1227, 8s. 8d., and expenses; and to the owners of the "Sourabaya" in £4750, and expenses. The total amount in which they were thus found liable did not exhaust the value of the vessel at £8 a-ton. The owners of the "Isabella" thereafter consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court the sum of £8536, for which they had previously found caution.

On 6th July 1875 the Court pronounced this interlocutor in the petition:—"Appoint the respondents and all others having or pretending to have any interest in the matter of the petition to lodge claims within eight days from this date, under certification that if they fail to do so they will be excluded from participation in the fund for division, and appoint this deliverance to be advertised once in the 'Edinburgh Gazette' and in the 'Scotsman' and the 'Glasgow Herald' and the 'Shipping and Mercantile Gazette' newspapers."

Claims were accordingly lodged for the owners of the "Maranham," the "Anna," and the "Sourabaya," claiming the amounts found due to them in their respective actions of damages.

Parties were then heard as to the final disposal of the petition and as to expenses.

Argued for the respondents;—The petition was incompetent. Such petition could only competently be brought when the petitioner admitted liability.[1] The petition was also unnecessary and premature, and ought to be refused.[2] The sum for which the petitioners were liable, even under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, greatly exceeded the damages found due. Moreover, there never had been any decision by the Court that the £8 per ton limitation of liability applied. The respondents had always maintained that the three collisions were independent collisions. Were it necessary they were prepared to prove this. But in consequence of the damage found due being fully covered by the value at £8 a-ton of the "Isabella," there was no necessity for any such inquiry being entered on. All that they had done was to consent to loosing of the arrestments on caution for £8536, or £8 a-ton on the vessel's tonnage, being satisfied that that was the full value of the vessel. At [1] Hill v. Audus, 1855, 1 Kay and Johnson, 263.

[2] Flensburg Steam Shipping Company v. Seligmann, July 18, 1871, 9 Macph. 1011, 43 Scot. Jur. 550.

No. 168.

July 20, 1875.
Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.

any rate they ought to be found entitled to their expenses, the petitioners having brought this petition while resisting liability.[1]

Argued for the petitioners;—The petition was competent. It was also necessary at the time it was brought, for the damages claimed by the respondents greatly exceeded the sum for which they were liable under the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. It was only because the respondents had failed to establish the full measure of damages claimed that the total sum found due was less than the snm for which the petitioners were liable. On the question of expenses, they consented to the respondents getting the expenses of putting in their claims, but no further expenses.

The respondents thereafter intimated that they accepted this offer, and withdrew their further claim for expenses.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If the Solicitor-General consents to the respondents being allowed these expenses* good and well, but I certainly should not have been disposed to allow them.

I think it right also to add that I have no doubt of the competency of the petition. It was presented under the 514th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, which provides—(His Lordship read the section quoted, supra, p. 977, note †). The reason why that enactment was inserted in the Merchant Shipping Act was, that the Act had already provided for a limitation of the sum to be paid in name of damages by the offending ship. It is quite clear on the face of the 514th section that its provisions are intended to apply whether the owners admit or deny liability.

When they admit liability the Court will proceed to stop all actions and suits brought or to be brought for the purpose of constituting liability.

When they deny liability the Court will allow such actions to go on.

But as to the competency of this petition, I do not see the smallest room for doubt. The only suggestion of doubt has arisen from a plain misunderstanding of the case of Hill decided by Vice-Chancellor Wood.

The question of expenses is one of some nicety. If the claims made against the owners of the offending ship are of such large amount that it is absolutely necessary to get them restricted under the provisions of the statutes, it may be that the petitioner will not get his own expenses, especially if additional claimants come in under the petition, but it does not follow that the claimants are to get theirs. It is not, however, necessary to dispose of this point, as parties have come to an arrangement.

The other Judges concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"In respect the petitioners have now consigned the sum of £8536, being the aggregate amount for which they are liable in respect of the loss or damage caused by the collisions referred to in the petition, grant warrant and authority to the Accountant of Court to deliver to the petitioners or their agent the bond of caution granted by them for said sum upon delivery of a certified copy of this interlocutor; and in regard to the distribution of said sum, rank and prefer upon the said sum of £8536 the claimants afternamed to the extent follow-

[1] "Normandy," 1870, L. R. 3 Ad. 152 (see p. 157); "Amalia," 32 L. J., Probate, 191.

* i.e., expenses of claims, but not of discussing the competency of the petition.

No. 168.
July 20, 1875.
Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c.

ing:—The claimants, James Donald and others (owners of the 'Sourabaya'), for the sums of £4750 and £192, 5s. 6d.; the claimants, Thomas Powell and others (owners of the 'Maranham') for the sums of £2000 and £193, 10s. 5d.; and the claimants, Michael Sundt and others (owners of the 'Anna') for the sums of £1227, 8s. 8d., and £158, 16s. 5d., in terms of their claims respectively; and repel said claims quoad ultra: Of consent find the claimants entitled to the sum of £4, 4s. each as the expenses of lodging their claims, and find neither party entitled to expenses quoad ultra: Grant warrant and authority to the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland to make payment to the claimants respectively of the said sums to which they are ranked and preferred aforesaid, and also of the said respective sums of £4, 4s. of expenses, and that out of the said sum of £8536, and to pay to the petitioners or their agent the balance of said sum of £8536, with interest accruing or which may accrue thereon after deducting the payments above mentioned, and grant warrant and authority to the Accountant of Court for the purpose of payment as aforesaid to exhibit, or, when necessary, deliver up to the said bank the deposit-receipt, No. 30 of process, and decern."

WILLIAM B. GLEN, S.S.C.—J. & R. D. ROSS, W.S.—WEBSTER & WILL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 169.
July 20, 1875.
Harvey v. Lindsay.

JOHN HARVEY, Pursuer and Appellant.—Party.
JAMES LINDSAY, Defender and Respondent.—Burnet.

Process—Judgment—Cancelling Interlocutor—A. S. 10th March 1870, sec. 3 (1).—In an appeal to the Court of Session in a Sheriff-court action for payment of £50, the appellant, per incuriam, printed the summons in another action between the same parties in which the conclusion was for payment of £20. The respondent having taken the objection that the appeal was incompetent, in respect that the sum concluded for was under £25, the counsel for the appellant, who had only been instructed at the bar, being in ignorance of the mistake, admitted that he had no answer to the objection, and the appeal was dismissed as incompetent. A note having been presented by the appellant, setting forth the mistake, and craving that the interlocutor should be cancelled, held that the interlocutor having been pronounced and signed under an error in point of fact, induced by the parties, it was within the power of the Court to order it to be cancelled, and that, in the circumstances, it should be cancelled accordingly.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

JOHN HARVEY brought an action in the Sheriff-court of Lanark against James Lindsay concluding for £50.

On 15th June 1875 the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the action.

On 1st July the pursuer appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session.

On 5th July the appeal was received by the Clerk of the First Division.

On 14th July the appellant lodged his print, in terms of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71, and the Act of Sederunt 10th March 1870, sec. 3 (1). This print contained the proper note of appeal and interlocutors in the cause, but wanted the minute of defence, and the summons was not the summons in the cause, but the summons in a previous action at the instance of the same pursuer against the same defender, proceeding upon the same media concludendi, but concluding only for £20, which action had been abandoned by the pursuer before the present action was raised, and the summons in which had been lodged in process in the present action by the respondent as a production. The appellant's agent

No. 169.

July 20, 1875. Harvey v. Lindsay.

having borrowed up the inferior Court process, had sent the wrong summons to the printer per incuriam, and had not observed the mistake on boxing the copies of the print.

On 15th July, when the appeal appeared in the single bills, the respondent moved the Court to dismiss the appeal as incompetent, in respect that the action in which it was taken concluded only for £20.

Mr Scott, advocate, appeared for the appellant, and stated that the case had only been put into his hands at the bar, that he had no information beyond what was contained in the print, and that on the face of the print he saw no answer to the objection.

The Court, accordingly, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 15th July 1875.—The Lords having heard counsel on the competency of the appeal, dismiss the appeal as incompetent, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses, which modify to £3, 3s. sterling, and for which sum decern against the appellant for payment to the respondent."

On 20th July, the appellant having lodged a note to the First Division, appeared personally at the bar, and craved that the interlocutor of 15th July should be cancelled, or that he should be otherwise reponed against it, in respect of the circumstances stated above, and, in particular, that the respondent had been fully aware of the nature of the mistake which had occurred at the time he made his motion to have the appeal dismissed, the summons erroneously printed having been produced by the respondent himself, and had concealed his knowledge; and that the competency of the appeal should be sustained.

The respondent contended that it was not competent for the Court to recall or alter their own interlocutor once pronounced,[1] and that, even if it were recalled, that would not benefit the appellant, as he had now fallen from his appeal by not lodging a proper print within fourteen days from the date on which the appeal was received.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very curious and important point. The appeal came before us on the 15th instant, and upon its being moved, the respondent took the objection that the appeal was incompetent, because the conclusion of the summons was only for £20. The appellant's counsel admitted that he had no answer to this objection, and, accordingly, we dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

It now turns out that the fact on which that interlocutor proceeded was not a fact at all. The summons really concludes for £50, and, therefore, the objection of incompetency does not apply.

The true facts of the case are these. The agent for the appellant in printing the necessary papers printed not the record in this case, but the record in a former action at the instance of the same pursuer against the same defender, arising out of the same circumstances, but concluding only for £20. That action had been dismissed, but the service copy was produced by the defender, the respondent in this Court, as a production in this process. The appellant's agent had simply, by a piece of gross carelessness, put the wrong record into the hands of the printer, and had either not revised the proof sheets, or, in doing so, had failed to notice his mistake.

In these circumstances, it is impossible to deny that our interlocutor of the 15th instant proceeded on an error in point of fact, induced by the parties themselves. Both parties are to blame; the appellant for lodging an incorrect print, and the [1] Cuthill v. Burns, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 849, 34 Scot. Jur. 426.

No. 169.
July 20, 1875.
Harvey v. Lindsay.

respondent for stating an objection founded on what he ought to have known was an inaccurate statement as to the value concluded for in the summons, and so materially contributing to mislead the Court.

That being so, it seems to me very much the same as if we had been misled by a misprint occurring in the printed papers; for the printing of a wrong summons is just a very large misprint. The question then comes to be, is there no remedy for this state of matters except an appeal to the House of Lords? I should be very sorry to find myself compelled to come to that conclusion. On the contrary, I think it is within our powers, the facts being quite ascertained by an examination of the process, to order our interlocutor of the 15th inst. to be cancelled.

We are told, however, that on that being done there arises another objection to the appeal, inasmuch as the appellant has not boxed a print of the note of appeal, record, and interlocutors, within fourteen days after the process was received in Court, in terms of the Act of Sederunt 10th March 1870, section 3. But even supposing that to be a well-founded objection, it will not interfere with what we are now doing. If we were to sustain it we should not refuse the appeal as incompetent, but should hold it abandoned, in terms of the above mentioned Act of Sederunt.

But the respondent will find on looking more carefully at that Act of Sederunt that his objection is not of much value. The fourteen days for printing only expired yesterday, and the appellant has eight days from that date to get himself reponed. All he has to do, therefore, is to put in a proper print and get himself reponed in terms of the Act of Sederunt.

Lord Deas.—It is perfectly settled by the immemorial practice of this Court that, where a clerical error has been committed, or other undoubted mistake has occurred in a signed interlocutor, we can, de recenti, correct it.

On the same principle I think we can, de recenti, cancel the whole interlocutor where it is framed under a palpable mistake as to the matter of fact on which it proceeds, which is undoubtedly the case here.

Lord Ardmillan and Lord Mure concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having considered the note for the appellant, No. 19 of process, and heard the appellant personally, and the counsel for the respondent, in respect the interlocutor of 15th current was pronounced and signed under an error of fact as to the amount concluded for in the summons, induced by the summons in another action having been printed as the summons in the cause now under appeal, authorise and appoint the clerk to cancel the said interlocutor: Farther, direct the printed papers in this appeal to be withdrawn from process as being an insufficient compliance with the provisions of the Act of Sederunt."

D. F. Bridgeford, S.S.C.—N. M. Campbell, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 170.
July 20, 1875.
Gelstons v. Christie.

S. and I. Gelston, Pursuers.—Trayner.
James Christie, Defender.—J. C. Smith.

Proof—Judicial Admission—Qualified Admission.—In an action by a manufacturer against his agent for the amount of certain accounts alleged to have been collected by him from customers, the defender produced an account debiting himself with the sums collected by him, and on the other hand stating as an item on the credit side an unliquidated claim of £200 for time and labour spent by him in promoting the business of the agency, which agency he alleged had improperly been taken from him. Held that the pursuer was not entitled to take the admission of the sums collected contained in the account without the qualification contained in the other entries, but must prove his averments in common form.

No. 170.

July 20, 1875.

Gelstons v. Christie.

1st Division. Ld. Craighill. M.

MESSRS S. AND I. GELSTON, tobacco manufacturers, Belfast, sued James Christie, their agent in Glasgow, for the sum of £230, 15s. 3d. as due by him to them, being the amount of certain accounts collected by the defender from their customers at various dates from 4th to 30th September 1874, conform to an account produced with the summons, under deduction of a contra account for commission, porterage, and other charges, amounting to £31, 8s. 1d., also produced, and which they admitted to be due.

The defender stated that the accounts produced with the summons were incorrect, and averred;—"A correct statement of the accounts between the defender and the pursuers is herewith produced, and here held as repeated brevitatis causa."

The following was the account produced by the defender:—

Account-current, Messrs S. and I. Gelston, Belfast, with James Christie, Glasgow.

1874.
Sept. 12.	To cash,	£30	0	0
19.	Do.	40	0	0
26.	Do.	60	0	0
30.	To commission on sales,	38	6	5
"	To sundries (porterage, storage, and incidents),	23	15	4
"	By cash from various customers—(here followed a list),				363	9	9
"	To time and labour bestowed on the agency personally by James Christie, working up a connection and making a business in S. and I. Gelston's tobacco, the agency having been unwarrantably taken away when this done, and the connection as unwarrantably assumed by them, as per circulars of 30th September and 2d October last, issued by them, and advertisement in Glasgow newspapers inserted by them on 3d October last—say during four months, at £50 per month,	200	0	0
"	To salary of traveller, William Coutts, employed in the agency for 13 weeks at £2, 10s. per week,	32	10	0
"	By balance,				61	2	0
		424	11	9	434	11	9
	To balance brought down due J. C.	61	2	0

No. 170.

July 20, 1875. Gelstons v. Christie.

The defender pleaded;—(2) Compensation. (3) Retention.

The pursuers, on the footing that the last two items on the credit side of the defender's account could not be looked at in the present action, and that, setting them aside, the account shewed a balance of £171, 8s. due to them, put into process a minute (No. 13 of pro.) offering to accept of that sum as in full of the debt sued for, and moved for decree accordingly.

The Lord Ordinary, on 16th March 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defender is not entitled to bring forward in the present action, as items of credit, the sum of £200 and the sum of £32, 10s., being the two last items on the credit side of the account, No. 10 of process, produced by the defender, and held brevitatis causa as repeated in his defences, these neither being constituted as debts due by the pursuers, nor claims arising out of the contract libelled by the pursuers: Finds (2) that, deducting the said two sums of £200 and £32, 10s., there is shewn by the said account produced by the defender, No. 10 of process, to be due by the defender to the pursuers, a balance of £171, 8s.: Finds (3) that by the said minute, No. 13 of process, the pursuers accept of the said sum of £171, 8s. as in full of the debt sued for, and move for decree accordingly: Therefore repels the defences so far as inconsistent with the preceding findings, and decerns against the defender for the said sum of £171, 8s. sterling, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses, subject, however, to a slight modification, to be afterwards settled; meantime allows an account of pursuer's expenses to be given in," &c.

The defender reclaimed.[1] At advising,—

LORD DEAS.—The pursuers are tobacco manufacturers in Belfast. They bring this action against James Christie, commission agent in Glasgow, on the narrative that they appointed him their agent there in 1874, and that he had, in that capacity, collected accounts due to them by various customers, according to the account libelled, No. 7 of process, and had failed to account for the sums so collected. This account, No. 7 of process, extends from 7th to 30th September 1874, and sets forth a list of the sums which Mr Christie is said to have collected, and for which it is alleged he has not accounted.

In defence, Mr Christie denies that there has been any irregularity in connection with his accounts, denies that the account, No. 7 of process, is correct, and alleges that there is a sum due to him by the pursuers which is in excess of that claimed by the pursuers from him, and he produces a state of accounts between himself and the pursuers.

Now, the account, No. 7 of process, produced by the pursuers, is not an account current at all. It contains nothing but those items which the defender is said to have collected, and for which he is said to have failed to account. The account which Mr Christie produces, on the other hand, has two sides, a debit and a credit side, and is therefore a proper account current between the parties. It begins at an earlier date than the pursuers' account. It contains a long list of sums which Mr Christie admits that he did collect for the pursuers, but several of which differ from those charged in the pursuers' account. Credit is taken for certain sums of cash as paid over by Mr Christie to the pursuers, [1] Johnston v. Robertson, March 1, 1861, 23 D. 646, 33 Scot. Jur. 335; Milne v. Donaldson, June 10, 1852, 14 D. 849, 24 Scot. Jur. 504; Bilsborough v. Bosomworth, Dec. 5, 1861, 24 D. 109, 34 Scot. Jur. 49.

No. 170.

July 20, 1875.
Gelstons v. Christie.

and for several sums which he alleges are due to him by the pursuers, and a balance is brought out as due to him instead of to the pursuers.

Now, the question is whether, by giving in that account, the defender is to be held to have admitted the debt sued for? I do not think that he is. I do not see how the production of that account current can be held to be an admission of the debtor's liability for the sum sued for.

It has long been decided that, in the case of judicial admissions, the admission must be taken with any qualifications attached to it. I may refer to the cases of Carnegy v. Carnegy, Feb. 22, 1825, 3 S. 566; Grierson v. Thomson, Jan. 14, 1830, 8 S. 317; Campbell v. M'Cartney, June 23, 1843, 14 D., appendix, p. 1086; Milne v. Donaldson, June 10, 1852, 14 D. 849, 24 Scot. Jur. 504. In this last case the Lord President (Colonsay) expressly laid it down that it was "no matter whether the admission be put in words or in figures." Then we have the recent case of Picken v. Arundale and Co., July 19, 1872, 10 Macph. 987, in which the Lord President, after carefully examining the decided cases, says,—"I apprehend that it is too late to call in question the soundness and expediency of this rule of practice."

It is true that only one of these important cases was cited to us from the bar. But the cases exist, and the import of them is, that no admission on record, be it in words or in figures, is to be taken without its qualifications. The question now is whether we are to depart from that doctrine? It may very well be that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at an equitable result. But, looking at the current of decisions, I do not think the defender can be held to have admitted the debt. The pursuers are not obliged to accept the admission with its qualification, but, failing their doing so, there is nothing to absolve them from the burden of proving their debt in the ordinary way, and I think they must just do so.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the balance claimed by the pursuers as due by the defender on the accounts between them is not to any extent admitted, except under the qualification that the pursuers are owing the defender larger sums, as stated in the account lodged by the defender, No. 10 of process: Find that the pursuers are not entitled to take the admission of the defender without its qualification, but must prove their averments in common form, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as shall be just and consistent with the above findings: Find the defender entitled to expenses since the date of the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, with power to his Lordship to decern for the taxed amount."

M'EWEN & CARMENT, W.S.—T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 171.

July 20, 1875. Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

JOHN JOHNSTON, Pursuer.—Thoms—Rhind.
MRS MARION WADDELL OR JOHNSTON, Defender.—Balfour.
JOHN WALLS AND OTHERS (William Johnston's Testamentary Trustees), Defenders.—R. V. Campbell.
JOHN M'CULLOCH AND OTHERS (Cardowan Trustees), Compearers and Defenders.—Balfour.

Acquiescence—Bona fide Consumption—Legacy—Election—Approbate and Reprobate—Compensation.—A husband, by trust-disposition and settlement, gave his widow a liferent of the residue of the testamentary trust-fund, and in respect thereof "recommended" and "enjoined" her "to discharge or abstain from exacting from a son of the marriage her liferent rights in certain lands under a previous inter vivos trust-deed. This deed gave to the son, on his surviving his mother, an alimentary liferent of the lands, protected from the diligence of his creditors, of which lands the son was in possession as tenant. The son was a trustee both under the testamentary and under the inter vivos trust-deed. The husband died in 1867, and the widow was allowed to enjoy both the liferent of the residue and the rents of the lands until 1872, when, for the first time, the son challenged her right to draw both provisions, and it was found, in an action at his instance, that she was bound to make her election. She thereupon elected to take the liferent of the lands. In a second action at his instance, held (1) that the son was entitled during his mother's life to payment of an equivalent provision out of the annual proceeds of the residue as a surrogatum for the liferent of the lands, but that such provision was not subject to the restriction attached by the father to the son's liferent after the mother's death; (2) that though the plea of bona fide perception and consumption did not apply in a case of election, yet, as the son had, as trustee on both trusts, concurred in the payments made to his mother, he was barred from claiming repetition of the payments of the produce of the residue down to the date of his judicial challenge of her right to draw both provisions; (3) that though the son was in arrears as tenant with several terms' rent of the land, yet the mother's claim for the rents could not be set off against his claims of repetition of the produce of the residue, there being no concursus debiti et crediti between the mother and son by reason of the intervention of the two trusts.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

IN the year 1856 the late William Johnston, farmer, South Balgray, purchased the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, near Shettleston, Glasgow, and took the disposition thereof to himself and his wife in conjunct liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to his son, John Johnston, his heirs, assignees, and disponees whomsoever, in fee.

In the same year Mr Johnston bought Blackhill and Provan Mill, Glasgow, and took the disposition in similar terms, except in so far as it was in favour of another son, William Johnston junior, as fiar, in place of John.

On 12th January 1858, William Johnston and his wife, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, as liferenters, and John Johnston as fiar of the lands of Easter Cardowan, on the narrative that the former conveyance to the spouses in liferent and their son John in fee, had been made out temporarily until the present trust should be constituted, disponed, for their respective rights of liferent and fee, these lands of Easter Cardowan to John M'Culloch and others, including John Johnston (hereafter called the Cardowan trustees), as trustees, for the purposes following, viz.:—"First, we authorise and appoint our said trustees and their foresaids to allow and grant to the said William Johnston and Mrs Marion Waddell, and the survivor of them, the liferent of the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, rents, issues, and profits thereof, during all the days and years of their lives, for their liferent use allenarly. Second, We authorise and appoint our said trustees and their foresaids after the death of us, the said William Johnston and Mrs Marion Waddell, to allow and grant to me, the said John Johnston, their son, the alimentary liferent of the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, rents, issues, and profits thereof, during all the days and years of my life, for my alimentary support, declaring that the said liferent shall not be affectable by the debts or deeds of me, the said John Johnston, nor attachable by the diligence of my creditors; and we empower our said trustees and their foresaids either to allow the said John Johnston to possess and farm the said lands for his own liferent behoof, or the trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, may assume possession of the same, and let the lands to a tenant at such rent as they can obtain, and for such period of years as they consider advisable, and they shall secure the rent thereof, and pay the same to the said John Johnston for his alimentary behoof." The remaining purposes provided the fee of the property or of the proceeds, should it be sold under power of sale given to the trustees, to the children of John Johnston, and failing children, to his brothers and sisters.

William Johnston left a general trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th March 1865, with three codicils attached, whereby, on the narrative "that I have already made partial provisions for behoof of my sons, John Johnston and William Johnston, ... by conveying to the said John Johnston the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and by conveying to the said William Johnston the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, ... or, in other words, by purchasing and taking the conveyances of said properties to them," he disponed to John Walls and others, including his son John Johnston, the pursuer (hereafter called the testamentary trustees), as trustees, his whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the purposes following, viz., inter alia—"Third, In respect of the provisions in favour of my wife, the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, hereinafter contained, I recommend and enjoin her, in the event of her surviving me, to discharge or abstain from exacting from the said John Johnston and William Johnston her liferent rights in the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, conveyed to the said John Johnston as aforesaid, and the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill conveyed to the said William Johnston as aforesaid. Fourth, ... Lastly, I hereby direct, authorise, and empower my trustees to hold, pay, and apply the whole residue and remainder of my said trust-means and estate for behoof of my wife, the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly during all the days and years of her life; and after her death, I direct and empower them to hold, pay, and apply" the same for behoof of his children and grandchildren in certain proportions.

The Cardowan trustees did not enter upon the management of the property till about eighteen months before the death of William Johnston, the management remaining till then in his hands.

Shortly after the purchase of Easter Cardowan in 1856, the pursuer, John Johnston, became tenant of these lands, under his father and mother, on a verbal lease, at a rent of £60 a-year; and in the same way his brother, William Johnston, got a verbal lease of Blackhill and Provan Mill at the rent of £17.

In 1860 a written lease of Cardowan was executed in the pursuer's favour by his father and mother for their lives, and that of the longest liver of them, at the same rent of £60.

William Johnston senior died on 23d July 1867, and on his death the Cardowan trustees, on the ground that the lease of 1860 was not binding upon them, re-let the lands of Easter Cardowan to John Johnston at a rent of £100.

John Johnston paid the rent of the lands of Easter Cardowan from his father's death down to Martinmas 1871, when he fell into arrears; and at the date of this action the whole rents from Martinmas 1871 were unpaid.

No. 171. July 20, 1875. Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

William Johnston junior, as tenant of the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, paid the rent of £17 a-year to his mother until his death in 1873.

At a meeting of the Cardowan trustees, held on 13th November 1867, at which John Johnston was present, it was intimated for Mrs Johnston, as the minutes of meeting bore, "that she did not intend to exact any rents for the lands for this half year, but that in future she, in the meantime, thought that she might ask both her sons to pay. In these circumstances, the agents were instructed to get Mrs Johnston's concurrence to this minute. The law agents were appointed factors to collect . . . . the rent of the lands that might become due hereafter, in the event of Mrs Johnston continuing to think that her sons ought to pay her rent." This minute was signed by the pursuer, John Johnston. Thereafter the rents of Easter Cardowan, as paid by John Johnston, were handed over by him and the other Cardowan trustees to Mrs Johnston.

From the date of William Johnston's death the testamentary trustees, of whom the pursuer was one, paid over the liferent of the residue of the trust-estate to Mrs Johnston, in terms of the last purpose of the trust.

On 19th February 1872, however, John Johnston, for the first time, formally challenged his mother's right to draw both the rents of Easter Cardowan and the liferent of the trust-estate by an action of declarator, count, reckoning, and payment against her, in which he sought to have it declared that, since his father's death in July 1867, he had been and was entitled to the rents and profits of the lands of Easter Cardowan, and to occupy and use them during his life, and that the defender, Mrs Johnston had no right or title to draw or exact any part of the rents of these lands, and further concluded that she should account for such rents as she had already received. The ground upon which this action was laid was, that Mrs Johnston could not both approbate and reprobate her late husband's settlement, and that she could not, therefore, in respect of the injunction contained in that deed, exact the rents of Easter Cardowan if she accepted the provision of residue made to her by the settlement.

In this action the Lord Ordinary (Mure), on 10th December 1872, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that according to the true meaning and intention of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Johnston, executed in the year 1865, the defender, Mrs Johnston, is entitled to take the benefit of the provision of residue, made to her in liferent under the said deed, only on the footing and condition, inter alia, of her discharging or abstaining from exacting the liferent of the lands of Easter Cardowan, conveyed by the said William Johnston, her husband, in 1856, to himself and his wife in conjunct liferent, and to the pursuer and his heirs and assignees whomsoever in fee; and before further answer, appoints Mrs Johnston to state within three weeks from this date whether she elects to take the liferent of the residue provided to her by her husband's settlement, or to claim the liferent of the said lands of Cardowan, and reserves in the meantime all questions of expenses."

The First Division, on 25th February 1873, adhered to this interlocutor, and appointed Mrs Johnston to declare her election within fourteen days.

Mrs Johnston accordingly put in process a minute stating that she elected to take the liferent of the lands of Easter Cardowan and others provided to her in the disposition of 1856 and trust-deed of 1858. The Lord Ordinary, on 6th December 1873, interponed authority to this minute, and quoad ultra dismissed the action. No. 171.

July 20, 1875. Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

On 25th April 1874 John Johnston raised the present action, calling as defenders his mother, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, and the testamentary trustees, and concluded (1) that the defender, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, should produce an account, shewing the whole sums of money paid by the other defenders, the testamentary trustees, to and received by her during the period between 23d July 1867 and 6th December 1873, shewing the dates at which such sums were paid to her, and also shewing the sums which year by year have been received by her in respect of her liferent right in the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and the sums which year by year have been received by her in respect of her liferent right in the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, so that there might appear and be ascertained "the true amount which, in pursuance of the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, falls to be paid to the pursuer by the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston,—in respect of her having, in disobedience to the recommendation and injunction contained in the said trust-disposition and settlement, that in the event of her surviving the said William Johnston, and in respect of the provisions in her favour, which in his said trust-disposition and settlement are after contained, she should discharge or abstain from exacting from the pursuer and his brother, William Johnston, son of the aforesaid William Johnston, her liferent rights in the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and in the said lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, exacted her liferent right in the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, as well as taken payment of the said provisions, so far as applicable to the foresaid period, or part thereof, from the trustees for the time being acting under the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils;—and in respect that in the course of an action raised before our said Lords, at the instance of the present pursuer against the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston and others, the summons in which was signeted 19th February 1872, the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, on or about 27th May 1873, elected to keep and continue to exact her said liferent right in the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, to which election the authority of the Court was interponed on or about 6th December 1873;" and that she should make payment to him of such sum as should be ascertained to be the true amount due by her to him as aforesaid; (2) or otherwise that the defender, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, should make payment to him of the sum of £3000 sterling in name of the loss, injury, and damage caused to him in the premises by her having illegally and wrongfully exacted the provisions in her favour made by her husband in his trust-disposition and settlement, as well as the liferents of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and of Blackhill and Provan Mill; (3) that the defenders, the testamentary trustees, "are bound in future, and as from and after the said 27th day of May 1873, to make payment to the pursuer of a part of the said provisions, which, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement, are payable to the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, the said part being one standing to the whole of said provisions in the same proportion as the annual value of a liferent of the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds bears to the cumulo annual value of the liferents of the said lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and of the said lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill," or of such other portion of the said provisions as should be determined, and that they should be decerned and ordained to make payment to him of such part of the provisions in favour of the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston accordingly.

No. 171.

July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The defender, Mrs Johnston, having taken and elected to take the liferents of the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, was not and is not entitled to any part of the provisions made to her in her deceased husband's settlement. 2. The defender, Mrs Johnston, being bound to count and reckon with the pursuer for the sums received from her husband's estate up to December 1873, or to make up to him the loss, injury, and damage he has sustained through her actings between 23d July 1867 and 6th December 1873, he should have decree, as libelled in the first and second conclusions of the summons. 3. By the implied will of his father the pursuer is entitled, out of the revenue of the residue of his father's estate, to a surrogatum for the liferent of the lands of Easter Cardowan or Blackfaulds, and he should have decree for such a surrogatum as the Court may fix, as libelled in third conclusion of the summons.

The defender, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, pleaded;—1. The pursuer is barred from his demand for repetition of any moneys drawn by his mother from Easter Cardowan, or his father's estate, prior to 19th February 1872, because—(1) he did not previously insist on putting the defender to her election; (2) he concurred and acquiesced in the payments to her; (3) she received and spent the moneys as her own in bona fide. 2. Assuming that the principle of equitable compensation is applicable, the pursuer is only entitled to a proportion of the defender's residuary liferent after allowing therefrom also a proportionable equivalent for the liferent of Blackhill and Provan Mill, as the values in question may be ascertained by the Court. 3. The defender is entitled to set off her claim for arrears of rent due by the pursuer against any sum to which he may be found entitled in this action, or, at all events, she is entitled to retain any such sum against the said arrears.

The defenders, the testamentary trustees, stated;—(Stat. 3) "The defenders are advised that the following claims have emerged relative to the disposal of the liferent of the residue provided to the pursuer's mother, viz.—(1) The residuary legatees, and the other legatees entitled to payment or division as at her death, may insist on immediate access to their provisions. (2) If, on the other hand, Mrs Johnston's residuary liferent is to be applied in compensation to the pursuer for the liferent of Easter Cardowan, it must also be similarly and proportionally applied to compensate William Johnston or his representatives for the liferent of Blackhill and Provan Mill. (3) In the same event, whatever be the proportions in which the pursuer and William Johnston's representatives are to be compensated, neither of these parties can draw more than an equivalent for the liferent of their respective lands, as the same may be ascertained by the Court, and the balance, if any, of the residuary liferent falls to the pursuer's mother or the residuary legatees. (4) The pursuer's mother may claim that the condition attached to her residuary liferent was personal to her sons, and that she is now entitled to draw both the liferent of the late William Johnston's lands, and also the balance of her residuary liferent, after deducting the proportional equivalent for the liferent of Easter Cardowan, and that in any event she is now so entitled as to one-third of both liferents, or otherwise the said balance falls into residue."

And pleaded;—1. All parties not called. 2. This action should be sisted until the defenders bring a multiplepoinding and exoneration. 3. Should the defenders' first and second pleas not be sustained, they plead that the claims set forth in their third statement, so far as in the interest of parties not called hereto, are sound in law, and should receive effect in this action. 5. Any provision to which the pursuer may be found entitled

No. 171.

July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

should be declared alimentary, and not affectable by his debts or deeds, or the diligence of his creditors.

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d July 1874, pronounced this interlocutor :*— "Repels the first and second pleas in law for the defenders, William Johnston's trustees: Finds (1st) that, according to the sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late William Johnston, the defender, Mrs Johnston, was not entitled to exact payment from his trustees of the liferent of the residue of his trust-estate, and also her liferent interest in the lands of Easter Cardowan, and the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, which had belonged to the said William Johnston: Finds (2d) that, since the death of William Johnston, the defender, Mrs Johnston, has drawn the liferent of the residue of her husband's trust-estate down to Martinmas 1873, and that she has also exacted payment of the rents of Cardowan down to the year 1871, when the pursuer fell into arrear in payment of the said rents: Finds (3d) that, shortly after the death of William Johnston, the defender, Mrs Johnston, intimated to his trustees, of whom the pursuer was one, her intention to draw the rents of Cardowan and Blackhill, as well as the liferent of the residue of the trust-estate, and that the pursuer allowed her to do this without objection till the year 1872: Finds (4th) that since the decision pronounced by the First Division of the Court in February 1873, referred to in the record, the defender, Mrs Johnston, has elected to take the rents of the heritable properties of Easter Cardowan, Blackhill, and Provan Mill, instead of the liferent of the residue of the trust-estate: Finds, in these circumstances, in point of law—(1st), that the liferent of the residue of the trust-estate is thus left free for division among the parties, of whom the pursuer is one, whose right to the rents of the heritable properties has been injuriously affected by the defender, Mrs Johnston, electing to draw those rents; and (2d), that the pursuer is not entitled to demand repetition from the defender, Mrs Johnston, of the liferent interest in the trust-estate received by her down to the end of the year 1871; and before further answer, appoints the said defender to put into process a state of the sums received by her since the end of the year 1871 from her husband's trustees, as the liferent of the residue of his estate, and also of the sums paid, or payable to her in respect of her liferent right in the lands of Easter Cardowan, and in the lands of Blackhill and Provan Mill, in order that it may be ascertained what proportion of the liferent residue of the trust-estate falls to be paid to the pursuer in lieu of the rents of Easter Cardowan, and reserves in the meantime all questions of expenses." †

* The case was fully heard before Lord Mure, and this interlocutor and note were prepared by his Lordship; but his removal to the Inner-House prevented them from being issued. In order to avoid the expense and delay of additional discussion both parties agreed that Lord Craighill should issue the interlocutor and note, without a new hearing, and on that footing they were accordingly signed.

† "NOTE.—The first of the above findings in point of law appears to the Lord Ordinary to be fully warranted, upon the principle of the rules laid down and applied in the cases of Kerr and Wauchope, 17th February 1819, 1 Bligh, p. 1; Peat v. Peat, 14th February 1839;[1] and Harvey's Trustees v. Harvey's Trustees, 30th January 1863;[2] while the decision in the case of Peat is also, as it appears to him, an authority adverse to the views submitted on the part of the defenders, Johnston's trustees, to the effect that, in respect of the case of Annandale, 9th June 1847,[3] the residue ought now to be disposed of in the same

[1] 1 D. 508, 11 Scot. Jur. 337.
[2] 1 Macph. 345, 35 Scot. Jur. 211.
[3] 9 D. 1201, 19 Scot. Jur. 529.

No. 171.

July 20, 1875. Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

Thereafter, on 12th January 1875, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, productions, and whole process, in relation to the question, what proportion of the liferent residue of the trust-estate now falls to be paid to the pursuer in lieu of the rents of Easter Cardowan, and considered the debate—finds (1) that the proportion of the free liferent of the residue falling to be paid to the pursuer is that borne by the free rents of Easter Cardowan, in computation with the free rents of Blackhill and Provan Mill; (2) that the free rents of Cardowan, as set forth in the minute, No. 37 of process, and as admitted by the defenders at the bar, amount to £127, 5s. 7d., and those of Blackhill and Provan Mill amount to £92, 9s.; and (3) that applying these figures to the free residue, the sums to which the pursuer is entitled, as in lieu of the free liferent of Easter Cardowan for the periods following, are as follows:—That is to say, for the half year prior to Whitsunday 1872, £49, 11s. 8d.; for the half year prior to Martinmas 1872, £50, 0s. 9d.; for the half year prior to Whitsunday 1873, £50, 0s. 9d.; for the half year prior to Martinmas 1873, £50, 4s. 5d.; and for the half year prior to Whitsunday 1874, £50, 4s. 7d., amounting together to the sum of £250, 2s. 2d., all the said sums being set forth in the state, No. 38 of process, admitted by the pursuer at the bar to be correct; appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard as to the application of these findings to the conclusions of the summons, so far as undisposed of, and on any other questions awaiting discussion and decision, including the question of expenses, which is hereby again specially reserved."

When the case again came before the Lord Ordinary a motion was made for the defender, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, to allow the Cardowan trustees to sist themselves as parties defenders in the action, which was opposed by the pursuer. The Lord Ordinary, however, granted leave to them to compear, and they were sisted by interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 3d February 1875, "in order to facilitate the disposal of the third plea in law for the defender, Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, by enabling the pursuer to obtain pro tanto a discharge of such sums due to the compearers under the lease of Cardowan as the Court may think proper to set off against the pursuer's claims in terms of the said plea."

Thereafter, on 6th February 1875, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on way as it would have been if the liferent had been extinguished by the widow's death. The parties mainly interested to make such a claim are called as defenders in the present action, and have none of them raised any such question as that referred to by the defenders, Johnston's trustees; and if these defenders have any reason to apprehend that the question may yet be raised, it is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, for them to decide whether they ought to have recourse to a multiplepoinding, but that is not, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, a reason why the present process should be sisted to enable them to do so. The Lord Ordinary has therefore repelled the first and second pleas in law for the trustees.

---

"With reference to the plea of bona fides maintained by Mrs Johnston, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that, as the question raised in the principal action was by no means free from difficulty, and as the pursuer till shortly before the date of that action allowed the defender to draw both the rents of the heritable property and the liferent interest of the residue without objection, the defender is fairly entitled to maintain that she is not now bound to repeat payment of the residue drawn and disposed of by her in the belief that the pursuer was not to dispute her interpretation of the settlement. The Lord Ordinary has therefore, to some extent, given effect to that plea."

No. 171.

July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

the conclusions of the summons, and the pleas of parties still undisposed of, and considered the debate and whole process, finds (1) that the rents and other prestations payable by the pursuer for Easter Cardowan, now in arrear, exceed the sum found to be due to him by the interlocutor of 12th January last; (2) that the trustees under the inter vivos trust-deed as to Easter Cardowan, to whom the said rents are payable, for behoof of the defender, Mrs Johnston, as liferentrix, have been sisted as defenders compearers in this action, that they may concur with the defender, Mrs Johnston, in her contention that the said rents and prestations, to the extent of the sum found due to the pursuer as aforesaid, shall be set off against the said sum, and that the judgment now to be pronounced upon that plea may be binding upon them, and the pursuer be thereby exonered and discharged of said arrears to the extent foresaid: Therefore finds that the defender, Mrs Johnston, and the said defenders compearers, are entitled to set off the said arrears of rent and prestations, so far as required, against the said sum found due to the pursuer as aforesaid; and that the said sum being in this way paid or satisfied, nothing remains due to the pursuer for which decree can now be pronounced, and this without prejudice to the right to the defenders, the testamentary trustees, to raise the question as to the alimentary character of the payments to which the pursuer is entitled, should a decision of that question come to be required for safe trust administration: Further, finds and declares that the defenders, the trustees, original and assumed, of the late William Johnston, under his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th March 1865, and relative codicil, are bound, from and after the term of Whitsunday 1874, and during the lifetime of his mother, to make payment to the pursuer half-yearly, at the usual terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, of a share of the free residuary liferent of his father's estate, according to the proportion settled by the first and second findings in the said interlocutor of 12th January last; and decerns and ordains the defenders, the trustees under his father's trust-disposition and settlement, to make payment to the pursuer of such share accordingly, reserving to the defenders, if such share shall in any year exceed the sum of £127, 5s. 7d., to retain, if so advised, such surplus in their hands till the right of the pursuer to payment thereof shall be determined by the Court: Finally, finds no expenses due to or by either the pursuer or the defenders, and decerns."

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for him;—(1) The Lord Ordinary was wrong in finding by his interlocutor of 23d July 1874 that the pursuer was not entitled to demand repetition from his mother of the liferent interest in the trust-estate received by her down to the end of 1871. In so doing he virtually sustained the plea of bona fide consumption. The doctrine of bona fide perception and consumption had never hitherto been held to apply in a case of election. Bona fide perceptio et consumptio, according to Erskine,[1] had place only where "one who though he be not truly proprietor of the subject which he possesses yet believes himself proprietor upon probable grounds and with a good conscience." Lord Eldon in Kerr v. Wauchope,[2] stated the elements involved in election thus,—"Courts of equity hold it to be against conscience that A should take the estate bequeathed to him and at the same time refuse to effectuate the implied condition contained in the will." To sustain the plea of bona fide consumption in a case where the principle of approbate and reprobate put a person to his election would be going contrary to those equitable considerations on [1] Inst. ii. 1, 25; Bankton, i. 8, 12.

[2] May 3, 1819, 1 Bligh, 22.

No. 171.
July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

which alone that doctrine has been shewn to be applicable.[1] Besides, the plea had been repelled in stronger cases for its application,[2] as in the case of Blair, where there had been taciturnity for thirty-nine years on the part of the claimant. (2) In any view the Lord Ordinary was wrong in his interlocutor of 12th January 1875 in not giving the pursuer an allowance as in lieu of the free liferent of Easter Cardowan for the half year prior to Martinmas 1871. By not doing so he practically sustained the plea of bona fide consumption in relation to a term's rent which the defender had not received, and therefore could not have spent. (3) The interlocutor of 6th February 1875 should be recalled, and the plea of set off repelled. The attempt to sist the Cardowan trustees shewed that it did not exist between the original parties to this action. They could not sist themselves for this purpose.

Argued for the defender, Mrs Johnston;—(1) Ex facie of the deeds the defender had a clear title to draw both provisions, had it not been for the third purpose of the trust-disposition. Now, that purpose was expressed in very doubtful terms; "recommend" and "enjoin" were certainly terms which a lady might be excused for mistaking. But, farther, the pursuer, the party interested, contributed to her mistake. He was a trustee on both trusts, and he not only did not insist on her making her election, but he concurred in making payments to her which were beyond her true right, and he could not now be heard in this demand for repetition. Where a person has not been put in mala fide by the actings of a trustee, factor, tenant, or other party, whose duty it is to pay or to withhold according to the rights of parties, the mere obtaining of the money is in favour of the plea of bona fide perception and consumption. But (2) bona fide perceptio et consumptio had been sustained up to the date of citation in similar cases.[3] (3) If the plea of bona fide consumption should be sustained, the next question was at what point did that bona fide consumption stop. But here the plea was stated with reference to the liferent of the trust-estate, and not to the rents of Cardowan. It mattered nothing therefore that the rents of Cardowan due at Martinmas 1871 and subsequently were not received by the defender, while the produce of the residue had been received and consumed. Bona fide consumption of the liferent of the trust-estate consequently continued until the date of citation in the action of declarator in February 1872 as the Lord Ordinary had found.[4] (4) Waiver was a good plea against the pursuer's demand to go back in the assertion of his rights, and here waiver was well founded.[5] (5) Though a proper case of set off in the strict legal sense could not be maintained in the circumstances, inasmuch as in the matter of the Cardowan rents there was no direct concursus debiti et crediti between the pursuer and the defender, he being the tenant not of the defender but of the Cardowan trustees, still the defender was entitled in equity to be protected from having to pay to the pursuer a large sum, while he himself was due a

---

[1] 1 Bell's Com. (M'Laren's ed.), 141.

[2] Grant, Nov. 16, 1633, M. 1743; Woolmet, Nov. 20, 1662, M. 1730; Cockburn, Feb. 12, 1697, M. 1734; Agnew, July 15, 1746, M. 1732; Blair v. Stewart, Nov. 18, 1783, M. 1775.

[3] Moir, June 16, 1826, 4 S. 731 (N. E.); Agnew v. Lord Stair, May 19, 1826, 4 S. 612 (N. E.); Duke of Buccleuch v. Duke of Queensberry's Executors, March 10, 1824, 2 Shaw's Appeals, 43; Duchess of Roxburghe, Feb. 17, 1815, F. C.; Menzies v. Menzies, July 3, 1863, 1 Macph. 1025, 35 Scot. Jur. 590.

[4] Ersk. Inst. ii. 1, 29.

[5] Laing, June 2, 1829, 7 S. 693.

similar sum to which she was entitled, though by the intervention of a trust it had to pass through another hand before it reached her. The sisting of the Cardowan trustees removed all difficulty in sustaining the plea.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr William Johnston was possessed of considerable estate, both heritable and moveable. Some portions of his heritable estate he disposed of by deeds inter vivos, but his general estate was made the subject of a testamentary disposition. By his deed of 1858 the lands of Easter Cardowan were settled, through the medium of a trust, in the following way. Mr Johnston and his wife and the survivor were provided in the liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and after the death of the survivor the trustees were directed to allow their son, John Johnston, the pursuer, to enjoy a liferent of the lands, which was declared strictly alimentary, the fee being provided to his children, and failing them, to his brothers and sisters.

By his testamentary settlement Mr Johnston made certain provisions in favour of his wife in the event of her survivance, and among other things he gave her the liferent of the residue of his property. But to that provision there was this addition, viz.,—"In respect of the provisions in favour of my wife, the said Mrs Marion Waddell or Johnston, hereinafter contained, I recommend and enjoin her, in the event of her surviving me, to discharge or abstain from exacting from the said John Johnston her liferent right in the lands of Easter Cardowan," &c.

Upon the death of Mr Johnston in 1867 his widow took the liferent of the residue which was provided to her by his trust-settlement, but without complying with his injunction to discharge or abstain from exacting the liferent of Easter Cardowan. In short, she took both provisions, and continued to do so for nearly six years. But in 1873, in an action at the instance of the present pursuer, we found that she was not entitled to enjoy both provisions, and must make her election. She elected to take the rents of Easter Cardowan, and to give up the liferent of the residue.

The present action has been raised by John Johnston, the son, against the widow and the testamentary trustees, concluding that he should be compensated for the loss of the liferent of Easter Cardowan which the widow has elected to take, by an allowance out of the proceeds of the residue.

There are three interlocutors now under review, viz., those of 23d July 1874, and of 12th January and 6th February 1875, each disposing of only a part of the case.

The first of these, that of 23d July 1874, sets out the various circumstances and points of the case so fully, that I may as well read it, as introductory,—(His Lordship read the interlocutor of 23d July 1874, supra, p. 991). Now, the only part of this interlocutor to which the pursuer objects is the second finding in law, and also the corresponding finding in fact. That finding in fact, on which the finding in law is based, is this,—"That shortly after the death of William Johnston, the defender, Mrs Johnston, intimated to his trustees, of whom the pursuer was one, her intention to draw the rents of Cardowan and Blackhill, as well as the liferent of the residue of the trust-estate, and that the pursuer allowed her to do this without objection till the year 1872." The finding in law is—"That the pursuer is not entitled to demand repetition from the

No. 171.
July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

defender, Mrs Johnston, of the liferent interest in the trust-estate, received by her down to the end of the year 1871."

The question raised on this point is not, I think, attended with much difficulty. A person to whom two alternative provisions are left by testamentary bequest is certainly under no circumstances entitled to both of them; and if, on the face of the settlements, or deeds constituting the settlement, it is clear that he is entitled only to one of two provisions, it is abundantly clear also that he cannot be held in bona fide if he accepts and consumes both. A person may be ignorant of law, and incapable of understanding a deed, but he has always access to advice. He must be presumed to take advice, and to act upon it. And if in effect he does draw both provisions, it is impossible to say that he is acting in good faith. The remarks of Lord Eldon in Kerr v. Wauchope, 1 Bligh, 18, on the matter are expressly applicable to the present case.

But, on the other hand, where on the face of the settlement the question is one of great difficulty whether certain provisions are intended to be alternative or cumulative,—and one has seen such cases before the Court,—then the mere fact of a beneficiary accepting both is not inconsistent with good faith, particularly if legal advice is taken.

The question is, under which of these categories does the case fall? If Mrs Johnston had been left to herself and her own law adviser, and had insisted upon receiving the double provision, I should have had the greatest possible difficulty in holding that she was in bona fide; for it does not appear to me that there was any difficulty in the question whether the provisions were to be alternative or cumulative which any ordinary lawyer could not have solved for her. We were very clear at any rate when the case came before us.

But the peculiarity of the case is that the party interested acquiesced, and not merely acquiesced but did something more than acquiesce. For John Johnston, the pursuer, was not only one of the Cardowan trustees but one of the testamentary trustees, and therefore his concurrence was indispensable to the payment of money from either estate to Mrs Johnston. If he had chosen to prevent either set of trustees paying to Mrs Johnston he was in a position to do so; but, instead of that, he, being present at the meeting of trustees at which the widow announced her intention of drawing the rents of Cardowan, as well as the liferent of the residue, raised no objection but acquiesced, and thereafter allowed the income of both estates to be paid by himself and his co-trustees to the widow. He himself was therefore a party to putting into the hands of the widow those proceeds of the trust-estate which he now calls upon her to restore. In these circumstances I think Mrs Johnston is quite entitled to say that she received them in good faith, for the party who was interested in objecting, and who was one of those who made these payments to her, contributed to and encouraged her in her mistake. I therefore concur in the Lord Ordinary's finding on this branch of the case.

Turning, now, to the interlocutor of 12th January 1875, in which the Lord Ordinary disposes of the question, what proportion of the liferent residue of the trust-estate now falls to be paid to the pursuer in lieu of the rents of Easter Cardowan, and fixes the period from which that payment is to commence, we find that the pursuer merely contends for another half year,—that is to say, he contends that he is entitled to a payment as in lieu of the liferent of Easter Cardowan for the half year prior to Martinmas 1871 as well as to what the Lord Ordinary has given him.

No. 171.
July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

Now, it appears that the rents payable at Martinmas 1871 have not been paid to or received by Mrs Johnston, and therefore it is contended that, as she has not received them, she cannot be said to be in bona fide in dealing with them in any way, either in uplifting them or in spending them.

But it seems to me that that argument is fallacious. The question is, whether the pursuer is entitled to be compensated out of the income of the residue for the loss of the rent payable at Martinmas 1871. But as that rent has never been paid or received, the question is not whether Mrs Johnston received and spent that rent in bona fide, but whether she received in bona fide the corresponding part of the annual proceeds of the residue. In coming to the conclusion he has done, I think the Lord Ordinary has satisfactorily carried out the findings in his interlocutor of 23d July 1874.

Lastly, we have to consider the interlocutor of 6th February 1875, and that interlocutor raises a question of an entirely different character. Its object was to dispose of the whole cause, and apply the findings in the previous interlocutors. Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary finds that the sum already found due to the pursuer is extinguished by compensation or set off. Now, it appears that the pursuer was tenant of the lands of Easter Cardowan, and that he has fallen into arrear with his rent. The lands were let to him by the body of trustees who were infeft in the estate, and they were the only parties who had an active title to levy the rents. But this action was not directed against them but against Mrs Johnston, who had levied the liferent of the residue of the testamentary estate, to which they, the Cardowan trustees, were in no way entitled, and also against the testamentary trustees, who had paid to Mrs Johnston the liferent of the residue in their hands, and who were found liable to pay to the pursuer in the future. The trustees under the trust-conveyance of Cardowan were not made parties to the action.

Mrs Johnston, no doubt, has a plea of compensation on record, and the question is, whether, independently of sisting the Cardowan trustees as compearers in the action, that is a good plea in her mouth. I think it is not. I think Mrs Johnston cannot plead compensation. She was not proprietrix of the lands, either in liferent or fee. She was merely a beneficiary under a trust. It is true she was entitled, under the provisions in the trust-deed, and in consequence of her election to abide by them, to the annual produce of the lands in liferent. But then she could not sue for these rents. The trustees were the only parties who could do so. No landlord's remedies were competent to her. Now, when a party pleads compensation on a concursus debiti et crediti, he must be in possession of an active title to sue. Unless he can sue for the debt he cannot plead it in compensation. The doctrine of compensation was only introduced for the purpose of preventing unnecessary actions. As, then, this lady had no title to raise an action, she can have no foundation for a plea of compensation.

But then the curious device was resorted to, in order to strengthen her case, of introducing the Cardowan trustees, who have the right to raise actions for the rents, as parties compearers in this process. They could not be competently introduced without consent, and, even if introduced, how could they plead compensation from whom nothing was sought? It seems to have been thought that by a sort of amalgamation of interests a title could be made out to plead compensation. But the proceeding was most irregular. The party who is called as a defender, against whom the conclusions of the action are directed, is the only person who can plead compensation. The Cardowan trustees are not here for any proper purpose, and therefore neither by themselves, nor in conjunction with Mrs Johnston, have they right to state this plea.

No. 171.
July 20, 1875.
Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

On this part of the case, therefore, I differ from the Lord Ordinary. The result will simply be to recall this interlocutor of 6th February 1875, and decern in favour of the pursuer for the sum found due to him by the previous interlocutor of 12th January 1875.

But there still remains the fifth plea for the defenders, the testamentary trustees, to be disposed of, viz., that "any provision to which the pursuer may be found entitled should be declared alimentary, and not affectable by his debts or deeds, or the diligence of his creditors." If the trustees have anything to say on that point we shall be glad to hear them.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

It was then stated for the testamentary trustees that they had thought it their duty to state their fifth plea, that they might bring the point under the notice of the Court; but it was admitted by their counsel that they could not cite any authority for imposing such a condition by implication.

It was contended for the pursuer that it was not competent for the Court to lay such a restriction over a fund where it had not been expressly imposed by the testator. The restriction applied to the rents of Cardowan merely, and could not be imposed on the compensatory provision which the Court had fixed on equitable considerations as coming in place of what the testator had intended the pursuer to get under the trust-disposition and settlement.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the pursuer against Lord Craighill's interlocutor dated 6th February 1875, and also as a reclaiming note against the two previous interlocutors of Lord Craighill, dated the 23d July 1874 and 12th January 1875, adhere to the said interlocutors of 23d July 1874 and 12th January 1875: Recall the said interlocutor of 6th February 1875: Repel the plea of compensation stated by Mrs Johnston: Find that the trustees on the estate of Cardowan, compearers, cannot either alone or jointly with Mrs Johnston be heard to maintain that plea of compensation in this action; decern against the defender, Mrs Johnston, to make payment to the pursuer of the sums specified in the interlocutor of 12th January 1875, amounting in all to £250, 2s. 2d. sterling, with interest on each sum at five per cent from the date at which it became due till payment: Farther, find and declare that the defenders, the trustees, original and assumed, of the late William Johnston, under his trust-disposition and settlement dated 8th March 1865 and relative codicil, are bound, from and after the term of Whitsunday 1874, and during the lifetime of the pursuer's mother, to make payment to the pursuer, half-yearly at the usual terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas, of a share of the free residuary liferent of his father's estate, according to the proportion settled by the first and second findings in the said interlocutor of 12th January 1875; and decern and ordain the defenders, the trustees under his father's trust-disposition and settlement, to make payment to the pursuer of such share accordingly, reserving to the defenders, if such share shall in any year exceed the sum of £127, 5s. 7d., to retain, if so advised, such surplus in their hands till the right of the pursuer to payment thereof shall be determined by the Court: Finally, find no expenses due either to or by either the pursuer or the defenders, and decern." No. 171. July 20, 1875. Johnston v. Johnston, &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ALLARDICE, ROBSON, & INNES, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT WALLACE, AND MRS MARJORY MILLER OR WALLACE, his Wife, Pursuers.—Strachan.
JAMES HENDERSON, Defender.—Mackintosh—Henderson.

No. 172. July 20, 1875. Wallace v. Henderson.

Process—Accounting—Lis alibi pendens.—A husband raised an action against a heritable creditor who had been in possession of subjects destined to the pursuer and his wife, and the survivor of them, concluding that the defender should be ordained to render an account of his intromissions with the rents, and pay the balance due, with interest from the date of citation. This action was allowed to fall asleep, and several years after the husband and wife raised a second action against the creditor, concluding for an accounting, and for declarator that the debt was extinguished. Pending the action the husband died. Held that the surviving wife was fiar of the subjects, and that the plea of lis alibi pendens applied to the second action only in so far as it concluded for an accounting for the rents due prior to the date of citation in the first action.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

IN 1841 Robert Wallace, merchant, Lybster, and his wife, Marjory Miller or Wallace, obtained a feu of two lots of ground in the village of Lybster. The feu-disposition bore, in consideration of the feu-duty therein stipulated, to sell, alienate, and in feu-farm dispone "to Robert Wallace, merchant, Lybster, and Marjory Miller or Wallace, his wife, and the longest liver of them, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever (but secluding assignees before infeftment), heritably and irredeemably, all and whole," &c.

In March 1853 Mr and Mrs Wallace granted a heritable bond over these subjects for £350, in favour of Robert Sutherland, to which bond the defender, James Henderson of Bilbster, acquired right conform to assignation in his favour dated 21st November 1859.

At Whitsunday 1861 Henderson entered into possession of the subjects in virtue of the bond, and from and after that date he alone intromitted with the rents.

On 27th February 1866 Robert Wallace, suing in his own name alone, and without his wife, raised an action in the Court of Session against the defender, James Henderson, concluding, inter alia, that the defender should be ordained "to exhibit and produce before our said Lords a full and particular account of his whole intromissions with the rents, maills, duties, and whole proceeds of the two lots of ground in the said village of Lybster, with the buildings erected thereon belonging to the pursuer, and sometime occupied by him as a hotel or inn, whereby the true balance due by the defender to the pursuer may appear and be ascertained by our said Lords; and the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £2000, or of such other sum as shall appear and be ascertained by our said Lords as the balance of the defender's said intromissions, with the legal interest thereof from the date of the citation to follow hereon until payment; or in the event of the defender failing to produce an account as aforesaid, he ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £2000, which shall in that case be held to be the balance of said intromissions, with the legal interest thereof from the date of citation until payment."

No. 172.

July 20, 1875. Wallace v. Henderson.

Certain procedure took place with regard to a claim of damages, which formed another branch of this action, which resulted in the action being dismissed on 11th January 1867, so far as regarded the conclusions for damages, and in a finding of expenses in favour of the defender.[1] No steps were taken in the accounting. The expenses found due to the defender were not paid, and the action was allowed to fall asleep.

On 12th October 1874, Robert Wallace, and his wife Mrs Marjory Miller or Wallace, raised the present action of count, reckoning, &c., against the defender, James Henderson, concluding that the defender should exhibit and produce a full and particular account of his whole intromissions with the rents of the subjects in Lybster which belonged to them, whereby the true balance thereon might be ascertained; and that the defender should be ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £500 sterling, or of such other sum as should be ascertained to be due by him as the balance of his intromissions; or in the event of his failing to produce such account, that he should be ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £500 sterling, which should in that case be held to be the balance of his intromissions; or otherwise, that the defender should be ordained to impute the sum of £500, or such other sum as might be ascertained to be due by him as the balance of his intromissions, to account pro tanto of the sums due to him by the pursuers under and in virtue of the bond and disposition in security over the subjects for the sum of £350 sterling, granted by them in favour of Robert Sutherland, and dated the 16th day of March 1853, and assigned to the defender on 21st November 1859; and on the pursuers making or tendering payment of any balance that might remain of the sums due to the defender under the foresaid bond and disposition in security, and assignation thereof, in his favour, after the foresaid sum of £500 sterling, or such other sum as might be ascertained to be the balance of the rents as aforesaid being imputed to account thereof, as well as all other sums which he had received to account, the defender should be ordained to grant, execute, and deliver to the pursuers a formal and valid discharge of the bond and disposition in security, containing all the usual and necessary clauses.

In defence to the action the defender pleaded;—The grounds of action being already sub judice in a pending suit at the pursuers' instance against the defender, the present action is incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th March 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defender; and in respect thereof dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses; and remits the account thereof," &c.

Subsequent to the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, the pursuer, Robert Wallace, died.

The pursuer, Mrs Marjory Miller or Wallace, reclaimed.

Argued for her;—(1) The parties to the two actions were not the same. The husband was sole pursuer in the first. The husband and wife were joint pursuers in the second. The dependence of the first action at the husband's instance did not prevent the wife insisting in the second in her own right, especially after her husband's death. (2) The object of the two actions was different. In the first the object was merely count and reckoning. In the second the real object was to disburden the subjects and have the bond discharged; the accounting was merely ancillary and preliminary to the main object being attained. (3) In any view the conclusions of the first action were only for accounting up to the date of citation, and did not involve a continuous accounting up to the date of [1] Vide Wallace v. Henderson, Jan. 11, 1867, 5 Macph. 270, 39 Scot. Jur. 124.

No. 172.
July 20, 1875.
Wallace v. Henderson.

decree.[1] In some cases an accounting was continuous up to the date of the decree, but in such case the summons was expressed accordingly. In other cases, by acquiescence an accounting was allowed to be continuous. But where neither of these things was the case, an accounting was no exception to the ordinary rule—decree could not go beyond the conclusions of the summons. All, therefore, that could be done in any event was to sustain the plea as regarded the years prior to 27th February 1866, the date of citation in the first action.

Argued for the defender;—If the wife's concurrence was not necessary in the second action, then the plea of lis alibi held good. Now, (1) in a case of conjunct fee to a husband and wife the husband was the true fiar, the wife having only a protected liferent;[2] and, even if the wife had a right of fee, it was only one which emerged on survivance. During the husband's life, he alone had the active title to uplift and sue for the rents. Hence, in either view, the second action, just as the first, was competent at the husband's instance without the wife's concurrence. Further, an action of accounting, though the mere words of style in the summons appeared to restrict its conclusions to the date of citation, was, in practice, treated as continuous, so far as necessary to settle all questions between the parties. The husband, therefore, could have got all he sought in the first action, and his death did not enable his widow to insist when he could not.

LORD DEAS.—The construction of the destination here is really a simple matter. The destination in the feu-disposition—(for it must be noted that it is an ordinary feu-disposition and not a disposition for a price paid by either of the disponees)—is as follows:—"To Robert Wallace, merchant, Lybster, and Marjory Miller or Wallace, his wife, and the longest liver of them, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever (but secluding assignees before infeftment), heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole," &c.

Under that destination it is clear that the spouses, and the survivor of them, became entitled to the fee. It is not a destination in conjunct fee and liferent. There is no mention of liferent. There is nothing but a fee to the husband and wife and the survivor. The wife is the survivor, and is therefore the fiar.

In these circumstances the first action at the husband's instance was quite a good action. It was an action for the rents only. In virtue of his jus mariti, that action was quite good as a personal action at his instance, but it by no means follows that he could have either sold or burdened the subjects to the prejudice of his wife's eventual right as fiar.

That being so, there may be room for the plea of lis pendens to a limited extent. But the question is, how far does that plea go? The conclusions of the first action cannot be read as comprehending the rents down to the present date. Assuredly it cannot comprehend them after the husband's death. Such an action is often so laid as to involve a continuous accounting, and parties sometimes hold it to be so, although not expressly so laid. But where it is neither so laid, nor so construed and dealt with by the parties, the accounting is limited to the date of citation. Decree in absence could go no further than the sum concluded for, with interest (as here expressly libelled), from the date of citation.

---

[1] Wauchope v. North British Railway Company, Dec. 20, 1860, 23 D. 191 (see p. 201), 33 Scot. Jur. p. 96.

[2] Stair, iii. 5, 51; Ersk. iii. 8, 36; Ferguson, 1739, M. 4202; Bell's Conveyancing, ii. 777.

No. 172.

July 20, 1875. Wallace v. Henderson.

Besides, this second action is a different action from the first. It not only concludes that the defender should account for his intromissions with the rents, but also to have it found and declared that the heritable debt due to the defender is extinguished by those intromissions, and that the pursuers are entitled to have their bond discharged. Consequently no plea of lis pendens could in any view lie against this action as a whole. But if the second action was to any extent a good action in the husband's lifetime, it remains a good action at the instance of the wife, who is sole fiar in her own right after the husband's death. The result here is that the plea of lis pendens can only be sustained so far as regards the rents up to the date of citation in the first action.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor of 4th March 1875: Sustain the plea of lis pendens, so far as regards the rents concluded for in the first action: Quoad ultra repel that plea, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as may be just: Find the said pursuer entitled to expenses since the date of the said interlocutor reclaimed against, which modify to £5, 5s. sterling, and for which sum decern against the defender for payment to the said pursuer."

WALLS & SUTHERLAND, S.S.C.—HORNE, HORNE, & LYELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 173.

July 20, 1875.* Rhind, et al. v. Sheach, et al.

JAMES RHIND AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Pearson.
DAVID SHEACH, Respondent.—Mair.
MARGARET JAMES SHEACH OR SMITH AND SPOUSE, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—M'Kechnie.

Process—Petition—Competency—Sequestration of an Estate—Appointment of a Judicial Factor—Junior Lord Ordinary—20 and 21 Vict. c. 56, sec. 4.—Held (by Lord Curriehill, Junior Lord Ordinary) that a petition for the sequestration of a trust-estate and for the appointment of a judicial factor, which did not at the same time pray for the removal of the trustees or executors, was competent before the Junior Lord Ordinary.

Outer-House. Ld. Curriehill.

THIS petition was presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary by James Rhind and others, being certain of the beneficiaries under the last will and testament of the deceased John Rhind, who died on 28th August 1873.

The respondents were David Sheach, the sole accepting executor, and also a beneficiary, and Margaret James Sheach or Smith and others, also beneficiaries under John Rhind's testamentary deed above mentioned.

The prayer of the petition was "to sequestrate the estate of the said deceased John Rhind, if necessary, and to appoint" such person as the Court might think proper "to be judicial factor thereon, with the usual powers."

The petition did not pray for the removal of David Sheach from his office of executor.

Answers were lodged for the respondents, in which it was maintained that the application was competent only in the Inner-House, and was incompetent before the Junior Lord Ordinary, (1) because it was virtually an application for the removal of David Sheach from his office of executor; and (2) because it prayed for the sequestration of the executry estate.

The Junior Lord Ordinary, on 16th March 1875, pronounced this inter-

* Decided March 16, 1875.

locutor:—"Repels the plea of incompetency stated by the respondents; sequestrates the estate of the deceased John Rhind, and appoints Mr Robert Strathern, W.S., to be judicial factor thereon, with the usual powers, he always finding caution before extract, and decerns ad interim," &c.* No. 173. July 20, 1875. Rhind, et al. v. Sheach, et al.

ROBERT J. LINDSAY, W.S.—W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—Agents.

CHARLES HARRIS AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Respondents.—Scott—Balfour.
GILLESPIE, CATHCART, AND FRASER, Defenders and Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Watson—Guthrie Smith.

No. 174. July 20, 1875.† Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Domicile.—Circumstances in which held that a firm of Glasgow merchants had also a trading domicile at Greenock, and might be sued in the Sheriff-court of Renfrewshire.

IN March 1874 Charles Harris and others, owners of the screw-steamer "Wastdale," raised an action of damages for breach of charter-party in the Sheriff-court of Renfrewshire at Greenock, against Gillespie, Cathcart, 1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrewshire. M.

* "NOTE.— . . . If the petition had expressly prayed for the removal of the executor it seems to be settled by the case of Mitchell, 20th July 1864, 2 Macph. 1378, 36 Scot. Jur. 693, that it ought to have been presented directly to the Inner-House and not to the Junior Lord Ordinary. But it does not pray for removal of the executor, but merely for the sequestration of the executry estate and the appointment of a judicial factor, which would not necessarily involve the removal of the executor, though it would cause a temporary suspension of his functions pending the sequestration. It therefore becomes necessary to inquire whether and how far such a petition is, according to the sound construction of the Act 20th and 21st Vict. c. 56, regulating the distribution of business in the Court of Session, one of those petitions which must be brought in the first instance before the Junior Lord Ordinary and disposed of by him in the Outer-House.

"By that Act it is provided, sec. 4, that 'All summary petitions and applications to the Lords of Council and Session which are not incident to actions or causes actually pending at the time of presenting the same shall be brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary officiating in the Outer-House, who shall deal therewith and dispose thereof as to him shall seem just, and, in particular, all petitions and applications falling under any of the descriptions following shall be so enrolled before and dealt with and disposed of by the Junior Lord Ordinary, and shall not be taken in the first instance before either of the two Divisions of the Court, viz.:—

"'1. Petitions and applications under any of the various statutes now in force relative to entails.

"'2. Petitions and applications under any of the General Railway Acts or under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, or under any local or personal Act.

"'3. Petitions and applications relative to money consigned under any statute or law subject to the order, disposal, or direction of the Court of Session.

"'4. Petitions and applications for the appointment of judicial factors, factors loco tutoris, or loco absentis, or curators bonis, or by any such factors or curators for extraordinary or special powers, or for exoneration or discharge.

"'5. All petitions, applications, and reports under the Act of the 12th and 13th Vict. c. 57, entituled "an Act for the better protection of property of pupils, absent persons, and persons under mental incapacity, in Scotland."'

"By a proviso at the end of sec. 5 of the statute it is provided that the 'Lord Ordinary may in special cases, if he see cause, report such petition or application to the Court, who may thereupon dispose of the same, or give such instructions thereanent to the Lord Ordinary as they may deem proper.'

† Decided January 5, 1875.

No. 174. July 20, 1875. Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser.

and Fraser, designed in the summons as "merchants in Glasgow and Greenock, and having a place of business in each of these towns."

"And by sec. 10 it is provided that 'the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation shall have the same powers in regard to petitions for the appointment of factors loco tutoris, curators bonis, and judicial factors as are by this Act conferred in relation thereto on the Junior Lord Ordinary as aforesaid.'

"Petitions for sequestration are not expressly specified in the foregoing enumeration, but the petitioners maintain that such petitions are by implication contained under the general words 'petitions for the appointment of judicial factors.' The first question therefore to be considered is whether, upon the sound construction of the 4th sec. of the statute, a petition for sequestration of an executry or trust-estate, and the appointment of a judicial factor thereon, is a petition falling under the 4th subdivision of the enumerated petitions. This question has never, so far as I am aware, been made matter of express decision, but in some of the decided cases it seems to have been taken for granted that such a petition is competent before the Junior Lord Ordinary. See the cases of Morris v. Bain, 27th Feb. 1858, 20 D. 716, 30 Scot. Jur. 369, and Shedden, 27th June 1867, 5 Macph. 956. In each of these cases a trust and executry estate was sequestrated and a judicial factor appointed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, as exercising under the 10th section of the Act the jurisdiction conferred by the 4th section upon the Junior Lord Ordinary.

"It must be observed that in the case of Morris v. Bain the prayer for sequestration and the appointment of a factor was alternative to a prayer for the removal of the trustee and executor, and that both in that case and the case of Shedden the object of the application was to supersede the management of an existing trustee in whom the petitioning beneficiaries had ceased to have confidence. In both of these cases the Inner-House, in disposing of reclaiming notes against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, seem to have assumed (although the point does not appear to have been raised in either case) that such a petition could be competently presented to and entertained by the Junior Lord Ordinary.

"Further, in the case of Viscountess Hawarden, 31st May 1861, 23 D. 923, 33 Scot. Jur. 477, sequestration of an executry estate was awarded by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, and a judicial factor appointed, and the appointment was confirmed in the Inner-House upon a reclaiming note. In that case, however, there was no executor vested with the estate, there being a competition for the office in dependence when the petition for sequestration was presented, and the question as to the jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary does not seem to have been raised.

"Subsequent, however, to the cases of Morris v. Bain and Viscountess Hawarden, but before the case of Shedden, other two cases occurred, in one of which the Court assumed, and in the other of which they decided, that an application for the removal of a trustee and for the appointment of a judicial factor was properly presented in the first instance, not in the Outer-House but in the Inner-House. In the earlier of these cases, viz., Fleming v. Craig, 30th May 1863, 1 Macph. 850, 35 Scot. Jur. 510, the object of the petition was the removal of the trustee, the appointment of a judicial factor being sought not as an alternative to but as a necessary consequence of the removal of the trustee. But in the more recent of these cases (Mitchell, 20th July 1864, 2 Macph. 1378, 36 Scot. Jur. 693), where the petition was for the removal of certain parties from the office of trustees and executors under the settlement of a deceased party, with an alternative prayer for sequestration of the trust-estate and the appointment of a judicial factor, it was held by the Court on the report of the Junior Lord Ordinary (Barcaple) who distinctly brought under their notice the cases of Morris v. Bain and Fleming v. Craig, that as the real object of the petition was the removal of the trustees such a petition was incompetent before the Lord Ordinary, even in so far as regarded the alternative prayer for sequestration of the estate and the appointment of a judicial factor. In that case the Lord President said,—'The argument turned a

No. 174.

July 20, 1875.
Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser.

The defenders stated—(Stat. 1) "The defenders' firm has its principal office and its domicile in Glasgow . . . . . the office in Greenock being merely a subsidiary office, where clerks are kept for the purpose of attending to the discharge of cargoes arriving for them at the port of Greenock, and to the other incidents of the shipping part of the defenders' business. There is no partner of, or any person holding a power of procuration for, the defenders resident in Greenock, or permanently stationed there, and none of the clerks in Greenock make contracts for the firm. The defenders sell sugar extensively to refiners in Greenock, but their sales are not made by any one connected with the Greenock office, nor in the Greenock office, but either by a partner or a person holding a power of procuration, who goes down from Glasgow to attend the Sugar Exchange in Greenock, where the sales are made."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders are not in the present case liable to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Renfrewshire.

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) repelled this plea.*

---

good deal upon the question whether the parts of the prayer could be separated, the respondents contending that if any part of the prayer was incompetent the whole was incompetent, and the petitioners, on the other hand, contending that if part of the prayer was competent the petition to that extent ought to be sustained. In my opinion the way to view the petition is to see what is its real purport and object. I think the main purpose is to have the trustees removed, and I think that is not an object that can be arrived at by a petition presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary.' The other Judges concurred. From these remarks of the Lord President it would appear that had the petition sought merely sequestration and the appointment of a judicial factor it would have been held to be competent before the Junior Lord Ordinary.

"In comparing and contrasting these four cases it must be kept in view that so far as appears from the report neither the case of Fleming v. Craig nor the case of Mitchell was brought under the notice of the Court when deciding the case of Shedden. The result, however, of a comparison of the whole four cases appears to be this,—that where a petition is presented solely or chiefly for the purpose of having the trustee removed, it cannot competently be presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary, but only to the Inner-House, while, on the other hand, a petition for sequestration of a trust or executry estate and appointment of a judicial factor, without any prayer for removal of the trustee or executor, has been hitherto assumed to be competent if presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary, although the effect of the sequestration is to suspend, during its subsistence, the trustee's power of acting and administration. And I understand that ever since the passing of the Act of 1857 it has been the constant practice for the Junior Lord Ordinary to entertain and grant petitions for sequestration combined with the appointment of a judicial factor. I am of opinion that such petitions are truly petitions for judicial factors within the sense and meaning of the Act, and that the respondents' plea of incompetency should be repelled."

* "NOTE.—. . . . In the present case the cargo was to be discharged at Greenock. The contract was to be fulfilled there, and the defenders wrote to the pursuers from Greenock regarding the previous cargoes shipped to Greenock under the same charter-party. Their letter No. 9-35 of process, is dated 'Greenock, 16th Dec^r. 1873,' and it has these words printed on another part of the sheet, 'Greenock, 20 Palmerston Buildings. Glasgow, 54 Millar Street.' There is nothing there to shew that the defenders themselves regarded Greenock as subsidiary to Glasgow, but rather something to indicate that Greenock, quoad this piece of business, was their chief office.

"But whether the Greenock establishment be a 'subsidiary office' or not, the Sheriff-substitute thinks that the judgments of the Supreme Court in the cases of the Aberdeen Railway Company v. Ferrier, 28th January 1854, 16 D. 422, and Young v. Livingston, 13th March 1860, 22 D. p. 983, make it impossible for him to sustain the defenders' plea."

No. 174.
July 20, 1875.
Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser.

The defenders having appealed, the Sheriff (Fraser) recalled the interlocutor in hoc statu, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments in reference to the plea of no jurisdiction.

A proof was led. Samuel Barclay, partner of defenders' firm, deponed,—"I exhibit the defenders' bank pass-books kept here with the Royal Bank in Greenock. . . . We also have an account at the Clydesdale here. But that is only for lodging money. . . . I have charge of the Greenock office of the defenders. . . . Our average number of clerks there is ten. Mr Harvey is now our chief clerk here. He acts under my directions. We keep a full set of books here. . . . In absence of any partner Mr Harvey signs the firm's letters here. Mr Fraser of defenders' firm comes to Greenock daily to the Sugar Exchange, and sometimes he goes to the office. I come down once a week or oftener to the office. Mr Bryce, one of our managing clerks in Glasgow, used to come regularly to Greenock with Mr Fraser. When Mr Fraser comes to Greenock, and does not go to the office here (or when I do that), Mr Harvey comes and meets us at the Sugar Exchange. We have a sugar warehouse in Greenock. We are about the largest importers of sugar here, and the sugar is warehoused here if it does not go direct to the refiners. We have many ships consigned to us here. Our staff here looks after the sugar in the vessels consigned to us. We make large sugar sales here.

"Cross-examined for defenders.—. . . . No partner resides in Renfrewshire. No clerk of ours here holds a power of procuration. No one with such a power resides in this county. Glasgow is our head office. Greenock is a branch. The sugar sales are all made in the Sugar Exchange here. None in the office of the defenders. The sales notes which are issued for the sugar sold are always issued from the Glasgow office, and when we buy by letter we write and send the letters from Glasgow. The clerks here just carry out the instructions sent from Glasgow. They look after the discharge and the storage of the sugar and the custom-house work. They also clear the vessels. They have nothing to do with sales. We have a private wire from the Glasgow to the Greenock office in daily use, so as to give instructions to our subordinates here, and let them consult us. . . . . Our letters from correspondents abroad are always sent to Glasgow, and then we instruct the Greenock clerks of what is required to be done at Greenock. The vessels are generally consigned to Greenock, and they always discharge there. The bills of lading are sent, as a matter of course, to Glasgow, though sometimes, to save a day, we give express instructions to send them to Greenock. Our two bank accounts are for convenience. The Clydesdale account is just of monies paid in here, to be credited to us in Glasgow. No one here can draw on our bank accounts. When money is wanted we send down a cheque or cash from Glasgow. This we do daily. The clerks telegraph the amount probably required. We rent our warehouse here for storing sugar that has not been sold, just keeping it till a purchaser turns up. We don't refine. The contract about the s.s. 'Wastdale' was entered into and signed in Glasgow. J. and R. Young, brokers in Glasgow, represented the pursuers, and met with Mr Bryce on defenders' behalf, and negotiated the contract there. All the letters regarding the contract, so far as I know, were written from Glasgow. Any letter sent from Greenock about it would be written and sent under general instructions from Glasgow. . . . . We buy and sell sugar largely in various parts of the world, and we have consignments of sugar and other goods to other ports besides Greenock. Our business is entirely managed from Glasgow.

"Re-examined for pursuers.—We have no counting-house anywhere but here and in Glasgow. . . . . Mr Fraser goes to the refiner's offices, as well as to the Sugar Exchange. The refiners buy the sugar, and when they pay in cash they pay in Greenock, and when they pay by bill we sometimes discount it here. We have a discount as well as a deposit account here. Our office here is for the convenience of our general business. We sell grain to Greenock men, sending down a clerk to do so."

No. 174.

July 20, 1875.
Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser.

The Sheriff-substitute again repelled the plea.

The Sheriff on appeal pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, and in place thereof, finds, in reference to the question of jurisdiction, that this is an action of damages for breach of contract entered into on 22d August 1873 between the pursuers and the defenders; that the defenders are merchants trading in Greenock, having in that town premises in Palmerston Buildings; that they are importers of sugar and West India produce to Greenock; that they have banking accounts in the branches of the Royal and Clydesdale Banks at Greenock, and have in Greenock a large establishment of clerks and other subordinates, and are, in short, Greenock merchants: Finds, therefore, that the defenders are subject to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Renfrew, they being persons carrying on business within the said county: Finds that they have been properly cited to the Court of the Sheriff of Renfrew: Therefore repels the first plea in law stated for the defenders," &c.

The defenders appealed to the First Division, with a view to trial by jury.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, and of new repel the defenders' (appellants') first plea."

W. ARCHIBALD, S.S.C.—A. KELLY MORRISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME II.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
See separate Indices of Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1056, and Court of Justiciary, p. 1057.

ACCOUNT. Proof—Settlement of contra-accounts—Parole.
A, a firm of iron merchants, had an account against B, an iron merchant and broker, for £9562. B, as broker for C, had an account against A for £7536, both payable at the same settling day. B's account as broker for C was, at a meeting for settlement, not disputed, but A's was to a certain extent. B paid the admitted balance due by him, and the payment was marked as a payment to account on the copy of A's account, held by him, and a receipt for the sum so paid was written upon it. A having subsequently become bankrupt, held, in a question between A's creditors and B (1) that the account, with the receipt for the payment to account, with pencil markings of figures on the back shewing that the amount of the sum paid had been fixed, after deducting B's account from A's, were insufficient to establish a settlement between A and B by crossing accounts and payment of the balance; and (2) that it was not competent to supplement the proof of settlement by parole evidence. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Company, Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

ACCOUNTING. See Process, 23.

ACQUIESCENCE. Trustee.
A widow, having under certain trust-deeds an alternative right either to a liferent of lands or a liferent of residue, was allowed for four years to enjoy both possessions without challenge on the part of her son, one of the trustees, who had the interest to call upon her to elect. Held that the son was barred by acquiescence from claiming repetition from the widow of the over payments. Johnston v. Johnston, July 20, 1875, p. 986.

ADMISSION. See Poor, 4—Proof, 4.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Mandate—Sale—Homologation.
A law-agent employed to sell certain heritable subjects got from the seller an improbative offer of the subjects at a certain price. He then, in the presence and with the consent of an intending purchaser, wrote on the same paper with the offer a modified acceptance of the offer, which was signed by the purchaser, but was not tested. He thereafter wrote a docquet on the paper containing the offer and acceptance, whereby he stated that he, as agent for both parties, accepted and confirmed "the foregoing agreement," and acknowledged having received 1s. from the purchaser to account of the price. Held, after considering a proof as to the nature of his employment by the parties, that as there was no evidence of such special authority having been given him as to entitle him to make the contract for the parties his confirmation of the missives was of no effect, and that the agreement could not be enforced.

AGENT AND CLIENT—Continued.

Observations as to the nature of the authority necessary to entitle an agent to confirm such missives.

Question, Whether it is competent for one man acting for two persons to conclude a contract between them? Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 4, 1874, p. 163.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL.

1. A law-agent bought shares in his own name on the employment of a person who neither paid for the shares nor would give instructions for reselling them on the settling day. The agent, after giving notice that he would sell the shares, carried them over in his own name through his London brokers, and sometime afterwards sold them without loss. He then claimed the difference between the price at which he had purchased the shares for his principal and the market price on the settling day. The claim was disallowed, on the ground that the claimant could not, while acting as agent for the owner of the shares, become the purchaser thereof, and that no loss had accrued upon the transaction. Cunningham v. Lee, Nov. 13, 1874, p. 83.

Ship—Shipbroker—Commission.

2. A broker sued a shipbuilder for 2½ per cent commission on the price of a ship built by the defender, on the ground that the order had been obtained through the pursuer's introduction and recommendation. Held upon a proof that the pursuer had failed to prove any contract between him and the defender for payment of the commission sued for, or to shew that the order was the direct result of his intervention, and consequently that he was not entitled to commission. Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop, March 20, 1875, p. 657.

Contract.

3. A commercial traveller agreed to act for a firm of wholesale tea merchants for a commission of one-third of the difference between the price quoted by his employers as the value of the tea, adding the charge for brokerage and other expenses, and the money obtained by the sale of the tea, his employers retaining the right of accepting or rejecting orders, and collecting all accounts themselves. Held, upon the terms of the agreement, that this entitled him to one-third of the profits, if any, on each sale effected through him, without deduction in respect of loss upon other sales. Lloyd and Co. v. Laurie, Feb. 16, 1875, H. L., p. 1.

Partnership—Right in Security.

4. A cautioner in a composition settlement between a trader and his creditors obtained an assignation to the trader's business and estate. It was agreed that the cautioner should receive a commission of 7½ per cent on the gross proceeds of the sales, and he bound himself, after providing for the payments undertaken by him and for his own commission, to account to the trader for the balance. Notwithstanding the assignation, the trader was allowed to continue his business without ostensible change, subject, however, to the control of the cautioner. Held that the cautioner was not liable for a business debt incurred by the trader, either on the footing that the business truly belonged to him, or that he was a partner in the same, the true intention and effect of his agreement with the trader being merely to create a security in his favour. Eaglesham and Company v. Grant, July 15, 1875, p. 960.

ALIMENT. Husband and Wife—Sheriff.

Observed (per Lord Deas) that in granting an interim allowance of aliment to a wife, the Sheriff ought to fix a time at which the aliment should cease. M'Donald v. M'Donald, May 25, 1875, p. 705.

See Husband and Wife—Parent and Child, 1.

APPEAL. See Process (Appeal), and Justiciary Index—Public House.

APPORTIONMENT, POWER OF. Marriage Contract—Provision to Children.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife's fortune was conveyed to trustees, with directions, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to "pay over or assign" the whole trust-funds to the child or children of the marriage, "in such proportions, and at such time, and under such conditions as" the spouses should by joint deed appoint, and failing such apportionment, then in certain specified proportions. A portion of the wife's funds, amounting to £25,000, was advanced by the marriage-contract trustees on heritable bond over two estates purchased by the husband for £28,000 during the subsistence of the marriage. The parents, on the narrative that it was their wish to entail these estates, as well as the patrimonial estate of the husband, on the children of the marriage, and their heirs, before the children of any subsequent marriage of the husband or other substitutes, and that the husband had for that purpose agreed to alter the destination of his patrimonial estate, and to execute an entail of the whole estates, and had executed the same, proceeded, in the exercise of their power of division, to provide that the above mentioned sum of £25,000 secured over the husband's estates should be "settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," the said sum being the share of the trust-fund, "which we do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate, it being our desire and appointment, that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately on the death of the survivor of us discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands."

Held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that this was a valid exercise by the parents of the power of appointment contained in the marriage-contract in favour of the eldest son to the extent of £25,000 in fee, the addition of the words "and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," importing no effectual limitation of his right, and the direction to the trustees to discharge the bond for £25,000 over the entailed estate being one which could only be carried out with his consent. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees, June 17, 1875, H. L., p. 125.

See Trust, 3.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. See Bona Fides.

ARBITRATION.

A dispute between two parishes as to the settlement of a pauper was referred by them to the decision of a society of inspectors of poor, which was in the practice of deciding such questions by vote at their general meetings, at which it was uncertain what members would be present. Held that the reference and the award following thereon were valid. Bremner v. Elder, June 24, 1875, H. L., p. 136.

ARRESTMENT. Execution—Clerical Error—1 and 2 Vict. c. 114 (Personal Diligence Act, 1838), sec. 9.

Where an execution of arrestment bore to proceed on an extract Sheriff-court decree (containing warrant to arrest, in virtue of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 9) dated 13th January and extracted 6th February 1872, whereas the decree which formed the warrant of arrestment was dated 30th January 1872, held that the discrepancy was fatal to the validity of the arrestment. Graham v. Bell, July 15, 1875, p. 972.

ASSESSMENT. See Poor—Public Burden.

ASSIGNATION. Right in Security—Jus cedendarum actionum.

A creditor in a debt, heritably secured, was also assignee of a liferenter of the burdened subject. The fiar having tendered payment of the debt and demanded an assignation, held (in deciding a question of expenses) that the creditor was entitled to qualify the assignation with the condition that if the interest were regularly paid the assignation should not be used in prejudice of the liferent right. Fraser v. Carruthers, March 11, 1875, p. 595.

ASSIGNATION—Continued.

See Railway, 1.

ATTAINDER. See Entail.

ATTESTATION OF DEEDS. See Writ.

BANKRUPTCY. Suspension and Liberation—Caution for Expenses.

1. A bankrupt is entitled to bring and prosecute a suspension of diligence which has attached or may attach his person without finding caution for expenses, although it may raise large and intricate questions of accounting between him and the incarcerating creditors. Young v. Robertsons, March 13, 1875, p. 599.

Statute 1696, c. 5—Sale—Security.

2. On 16th May 1874 P and Son, merchants, received from H £500, and granted the following written obligation:—"We have this day received from you £500; and we hereby promise to give you, within one month from this date, delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for wheat, oats, beans, or Ind. corn, to the full value." P and Son then purchased grain in the market from various persons on credit, and between 22d May and 8th June handed delivery-orders therefor to the value of £238 to H. P and Son were sequestrated on 25th June.

In an action brought by the trustee on P and Son's estate, held that the deliveries of grain were reducible as granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction or further security of a prior debt in preference to other creditors within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 5. Gourlay v. Hodge, June 2, 1875, p. 738.

Trustee—Power to adopt or cancel Bankrupt's Executory Contracts—Current Contract—Delectus Personæ—Mora.

3. A firm contracted to supply shipbuilders with iron for certain vessels which were to be built, and had partially implemented the contract, which was a beneficial one for them, and was daily becoming more so, when they became insolvent. The day after the insolvency the shipbuilders wrote cancelling the contract. Two days afterwards the firm's manager wrote asking for time to make arrangements. Twenty-six days after the insolvency the trustee on the sequestrated estate wrote offering to go on with the contract or to come to terms upon which it might be cancelled, which offer was refused. In an action for damages at the instance of the trustee, held that, without deciding whether the contract was one which the trustee could competently have taken up as not involving delectus personæ, in the circumstances he had not declared his option to go on with the contract tempestivé, and that the shipbuilders were not liable in damages.

Question, whether the contract was one that could competently be taken up by the trustee and creditors? Anderson v. Hamilton and Co., Jan. 22, 1875, p. 355.

19 and 20 Vict. c. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 126, 127.

4. A trustee on a sequestrated estate pronounced a deliverance rejecting the claim of a creditor as being insufficiently vouched, and allowing him to lodge further evidence within eight days. The creditor did not lodge further evidence within eight days, and did not appeal within the statutory period of fifteen days. In a suspension at his instance, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Young) interdicted the trustee from paying a dividend till the creditor's claim had been disposed of by a deliverance admitting or rejecting it, the previous deliverance being held incompetent under the 126th section of the statute.

Observed (per Lord President), that when a trustee contemplates rejecting a claim by an alleged creditor on the ground that the claimant is a conjunct and confident person, the claimant is entitled to have an opportunity of leading evidence prout de jure to prove the reality of the transaction. Ritchie v. Balgarnie, Jan 14, 1875, p. 297.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act; 1856), secs. 25, 108, &c.

5. In a sequestration a creditor, being a brother of the bankrupt, produced, as the only voucher of his debt, a decree in absence obtained by him against the bankrupt within sixty days of bankruptcy,—objection to his vote sustained. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Affidavit.

6. The Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856, sec. 25, provides that when a creditor is a corporation, an affidavit "by the secretary, manager, cashier, clerk, or other principal officer of such corporation, shall be sufficient." Held that an assistant manager of a joint stock banking company was a principal officer of the bank in the sense of the Act. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

7. In a sequestration the Sheriff allowed an addition to be made to an affidavit by one of the creditors. The addition was made by the deponent, and initialed by him and by the magistrate before whom the original deposition had been made.

Objections (1) that the addition was not part of the oath, and (2) that it was not duly authenticated, repelled. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Affidavit—Valuation of Securities.

8. A creditor used an arrestment within sixty days of the bankruptcy of his debtor. In his affidavit he deponed that he put no value upon it. Objection that he ought to have put a value upon it repelled, in respect that by sec. 108 the arrestment was not effectual to the creditor. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Ranking—Cautioner.

9. Although a cautioner for the debt of a person who has become bankrupt will not be allowed to rank on the bankrupt's general funds for his loss as cautioner when the creditor has already been ranked for the full debt, if the cautioner holds a lien over any special fund belonging to the bankrupt his right to full indemnity therefrom will not be affected by the ranking of the creditor. Jamieson v. Forrest, May 25, 1875, p. 701.

Ranking—Cautioner—Security.

10. Held that a person holding a lien over a portion of a bankrupt's estate in security of advances made to him, and against risks and loss through a cautionary obligation undertaken for the bankrupt, was entitled to apply the security in the first instance to extinguish his loss through the cautionary obligation. Jamieson v. Forrest, May 25, 1875, p. 701.

Ranking—Blank Bill—Cautioner—Accommodation Bill.

11. A lent B £300 and at the same time took in security from B a blank bill stamp for £2000, signed by him and indorsed by four other persons, A being in the knowledge that no relation of debtor and creditor subsisted between B and the indorsers. B not having paid the £300, and one of the indorsers having become bankrupt, A, who had filled up the blank stamp as a note for £2000, claimed to rank on the bankrupt indorser's estate for that amount till the dividends should amount to £300.

Held that the bankrupt indorser was in reality only a cautioner, and that A was only entitled to rank on his estate for the £300 actually lent to B. Jackson v. M'Iver, July 6, 1875, p. 882.

Discharge—Preference—Statutes 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 151, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 33, sec. 3.

12. The 151st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that if a bankrupt shall have been personally concerned in or cognisant of the granting of any preference he shall forfeit all right to a discharge.

In an application by a bankrupt for his discharge, after the lapse of two years from the date of the sequestration, held that the terms of the above section were imperative, and that the Court was bound, ex proprio motu, although there was no appearance for the trustee and creditors, to enforce them. Pendreigh, June 5, 1875, p. 769.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Foreign—Forum Competens.

13. The mercantile sequestration of a bankrupt in a foreign country renders a subsequent award of sequestration in Scotland incompetent. Goetze v. Aders, &c., Nov. 27, 1874, p. 150.

See Bill, 2—Husband and Wife, 6—Railway, 1—Recompense.

BARONY. See Fishings.

BILL. Suspension.

1. In a note of suspension of a charge on a bill for £100 it was averred that when the bill became due the debtor had paid £30, and granted a bill for £70; that the second bill had been fraudulently altered to £75 by the respondent in order to conceal that it was a partial renewal of the first; that the complainer had paid the £75 to avoid litigation; and that the charger was now fraudulently seeking to enforce payment of the first bill. The £75 bill was produced, and was ex facie altered. Held that the complainer was entitled to have the note passed on caution. Simpson v. Taylor, Nov. 4, 1874, p. 75.

Compensation—Concursus Debiti et Crediti—Bankruptcy.

2. When certain bills were discounted by indorsees for value, and subsequently retired by them at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, held that they were entitled to plead compensation upon them against a debt due by themselves to the bankrupt; and the special objections (1) that they were neither the holders at the date of the sequestration nor the drawers, but only intermediate indorsees, (2) that they held a letter of guarantee from a third party, whose name did not appear on the bills, but for whose behoof they had been drawn, against any loss they might sustain on the bills, and, therefore, were pleading compensation in the interest of the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, repelled. Hannay and Son's Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co., Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

Suspension—Joint Adventure—Partnership—Summary Diligence.

3. The three trustees of an unregistered joint stock building association, who had signed a bill drawn on and addressed to them, B., U., and S., "trustees of the New Imperial Building Association," by one of the members of the association for the amount of an account for plaster work done on the association's buildings, presented a note of suspension of a charge on the bill, on the ground that the charger was not entitled to use summary diligence, in respect (1) that the complainers were only liable qua trustees, and (2) that the drawer was a partner of the association, and as such was, under the articles, liable pro rata along with the whole members for the amount in the bill. Held that the charge was competent, in respect (1) that the acceptor's signatures were unqualified, and (2) that, even if their liability could be held to be qua trustees merely, they had not averred that there were no funds of the association in their hands. Brown, &c. v. Sutherland, March 17, 1875, p. 615.

Suspension—Intoxication.

4. In a suspension of a charge upon a bill upon the ground that it had been obtained when the suspender was incapacitated through intoxication, held on consideration of a proof as to the suspender's state on the occasion, and his subsequent actings, and in respect that he had never challenged the bill, though frequently applied to for payment of it, until charged, six months after it had become due, that he was not entitled to suspend the charge. Pollok v. Burns, March 3, 1875, p. 497.

Discharge—Indorser—Cautioner—Pactum de non petendo.

5. The holder of a bill, after it had been dishonoured and duly protested, while he retained possession of the bill, granted a discharge to the acceptors "of all claims and demands competent" to him against them, "reserving entire my claims against any obligants, other than" the acceptors, "presently bound to me along with" the acceptors. He thereafter sued the latest of three indorsers of the bill for the amount in the bill. Held that the discharge did not extinguish the debt, but was merely an agreement not to sue the acceptors, and that the indorser must pay, his recourse against the acceptors not being prejudiced. Muir v. Crawford, May 4, 1875, H. L., p. 148.

BILL—Continued.

See Bankruptcy, 11.

BONA FIDES. Approbate and Reprobate.

Observed that a person who is put to his election between two alternative provisions, and who draws both, cannot in general plead bona fide perception and consumption in answer to a claim for repetition. Johnston v. Johnston, &c., July 20, 1875, p. 986.

See Sale, 1.

BURGH. Burgh Election—Police Commissioners.

The Ballot Act, in enacting that "all municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which the elections of councillors in" certain royal burghs "are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the date of the passing of this Act, as amended by this Act," only prescribes the mode of conducting the election in the sense of taking the votes, adding them up, and declaring the result, and does not repeal the provisions in secs. 48 and 50 of the Police and Improvement Act of 1862 as to the mode of dealing with an equality of votes, and fixing the day of election of Police Commissioners. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 299.

See Church, 3.

CARRIER. Passengers' Luggage—Contract.

Held (in aff. judgment of the Second Division) in a case not falling within the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, that special conditions limiting the common law liability of a carrier were not imported into a contract of carriage by merely printing them on the back of the ticket delivered by the carrier in exchange for the fare, the person receiving the ticket not having actually read the conditions, and not having had his attention directed to them by anything printed on the face of the ticket, or by the carrier himself when issuing it. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson, June 1, 1875, H. L., p. 71.

See Railway.

CAUTIONER. See Bankruptcy, 9, 10, 11—Bill, 5.

CESSIO. 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, sec. 2.

1. A person raised a summons of cessio bonorum. His creditors objected to the competency of the summons, inasmuch as it did not set forth, in terms of A. S. 24th December 1838, sec. 1 (to regulate proceedings in processes of cessio bonorum), any ground entitling the pursuer to cessio under the statute. The only fact founded on in the summons was that the pursuer had been charged to pay a debt on 10th November 1873, but as the summons was raised on 18th November, before the inducice had expired, no warrant of imprisonment had or could have issued against him. Held that as the pursuer was not in any of the situations enumerated by the statute, the objection must be sustained, and the summons dismissed as incompetent. Jacobsen v. His Creditors, Dec. 18, 1874, p. 227.

Future Earnings.

2. Held that a person incarcerated for failure to pay a sum of damages awarded for seduction, breach of promise of marriage, and aliment, who was not possessed of any property, but had been earning 27s. a-week before his incarceration, was not entitled to the benefit of cessio, except upon condi-

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN

VOLUME II.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
See separate Indices of Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1056, and Court of Justiciary, p. 1057.

ACCOUNT. Proof—Settlement of contra-accounts—Parole.
A, a firm of iron merchants, had an account against B, an iron merchant and broker, for £9562. B, as broker for C, had an account against A for £7536, both payable at the same settling day. B's account as broker for C was, at a meeting for settlement, not disputed, but A's was to a certain extent. B paid the admitted balance due by him, and the payment was marked as a payment to account on the copy of A's account, held by him, and a receipt for the sum so paid was written upon it. A having subsequently become bankrupt, held, in a question between A's creditors and B (1) that the account, with the receipt for the payment to account, with pencil markings of figures on the back shewing that the amount of the sum paid had been fixed, after deducting B's account from A's, were insufficient to establish a settlement between A and B by crossing accounts and payment of the balance; and (2) that it was not competent to supplement the proof of settlement by parole evidence. Hannay and Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Company, Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

ACCOUNTING. See Process, 23.

ACQUIESCENCE. Trustee.
A widow, having under certain trust-deeds an alternative right either to a liferent of lands or a liferent of residue, was allowed for four years to enjoy both possessions without challenge on the part of her son, one of the trustees, who had the interest to call upon her to elect. Held that the son was barred by acquiescence from claiming repetition from the widow of the over payments. Johnston v. Johnston, July 20, 1875, p. 986.

ADMISSION. See Poor, 4—Proof, 4.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Mandate—Sale—Homologation.
A law-agent employed to sell certain heritable subjects got from the seller an improbative offer of the subjects at a certain price. He then, in the presence and with the consent of an intending purchaser, wrote on the same paper with the offer a modified acceptance of the offer, which was signed by the purchaser, but was not tested. He thereafter wrote a docquet on the paper containing the offer and acceptance, whereby he stated that he, as agent for both parties, accepted and confirmed "the foregoing agreement," and acknowledged having received 1s. from the purchaser to account of the price. Held, after considering a proof as to the nature of his employment by the parties, that as there was no evidence of such special authority having been given him as to entitle him to make the contract for the parties his confirmation of the missives was of no effect, and that the agreement could not be enforced.

AGENT AND CLIENT—Continued.

Observations as to the nature of the authority necessary to entitle an agent to confirm such missives.

Question, Whether it is competent for one man acting for two persons to conclude a contract between them? Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 4, 1874, p. 163.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL.

1. A law-agent bought shares in his own name on the employment of a person who neither paid for the shares nor would give instructions for reselling them on the settling day. The agent, after giving notice that he would sell the shares, carried them over in his own name through his London brokers, and sometime afterwards sold them without loss. He then claimed the difference between the price at which he had purchased the shares for his principal and the market price on the settling day. The claim was disallowed, on the ground that the claimant could not, while acting as agent for the owner of the shares, become the purchaser thereof, and that no loss had accrued upon the transaction. Cunningham v. Lee, Nov. 13, 1874, p. 83.

Ship—Shipbroker—Commission.

2. A broker sued a shipbuilder for 2½ per cent commission on the price of a ship built by the defender, on the ground that the order had been obtained through the pursuer's introduction and recommendation. Held upon a proof that the pursuer had failed to prove any contract between him and the defender for payment of the commission sued for, or to shew that the order was the direct result of his intervention, and consequently that he was not entitled to commission. Moss v. Cunliffe and Dunlop, March 20, 1875, p. 657.

Contract.

3. A commercial traveller agreed to act for a firm of wholesale tea merchants for a commission of one-third of the difference between the price quoted by his employers as the value of the tea, adding the charge for brokerage and other expenses, and the money obtained by the sale of the tea, his employers retaining the right of accepting or rejecting orders, and collecting all accounts themselves. Held, upon the terms of the agreement, that this entitled him to one-third of the profits, if any, on each sale effected through him, without deduction in respect of loss upon other sales. Lloyd and Co. v. Laurie, Feb. 16, 1875, H. L., p. 1.

Partnership—Right in Security.

4. A cautioner in a composition settlement between a trader and his creditors obtained an assignation to the trader's business and estate. It was agreed that the cautioner should receive a commission of 7½ per cent on the gross proceeds of the sales, and he bound himself, after providing for the payments undertaken by him and for his own commission, to account to the trader for the balance. Notwithstanding the assignation, the trader was allowed to continue his business without ostensible change, subject, however, to the control of the cautioner. Held that the cautioner was not liable for a business debt incurred by the trader, either on the footing that the business truly belonged to him, or that he was a partner in the same, the true intention and effect of his agreement with the trader being merely to create a security in his favour. Eaglesham and Company v. Grant, July 15, 1875, p. 960.

ALIMENT. Husband and Wife—Sheriff.

Observed (per Lord Deas) that in granting an interim allowance of aliment to a wife, the Sheriff ought to fix a time at which the aliment should cease. M'Donald v. M'Donald, May 25, 1875, p. 705.

See Husband and Wife—Parent and Child, 1.

APPEAL. See Process (Appeal), and Justiciary Index—Public House.

APPORTIONMENT, POWER OF. Marriage Contract—Provision to Children.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage the wife's fortune was conveyed to trustees, with directions, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, to "pay over or assign" the whole trust-funds to the child or children of the marriage, "in such proportions, and at such time, and under such conditions as" the spouses should by joint deed appoint, and failing such apportionment, then in certain specified proportions. A portion of the wife's funds, amounting to £25,000, was advanced by the marriage-contract trustees on heritable bond over two estates purchased by the husband for £28,000 during the subsistence of the marriage. The parents, on the narrative that it was their wish to entail these estates, as well as the patrimonial estate of the husband, on the children of the marriage, and their heirs, before the children of any subsequent marriage of the husband or other substitutes, and that the husband had for that purpose agreed to alter the destination of his patrimonial estate, and to execute an entail of the whole estates, and had executed the same, proceeded, in the exercise of their power of division, to provide that the above mentioned sum of £25,000 secured over the husband's estates should be "settled on and belong to our eldest son and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," the said sum being the share of the trust-fund, "which we do hereby allot and apportion as the share of our eldest son, or, failing him, of the heir of entail succeeding to the said entailed estate, it being our desire and appointment, that the said trustees under our marriage-contract before narrated, or the survivors of them, should immediately on the death of the survivor of us discharge the said heritable bond, and disburden the said lands."

Held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that this was a valid exercise by the parents of the power of appointment contained in the marriage-contract in favour of the eldest son to the extent of £25,000 in fee, the addition of the words "and other members of our family in succession, being heirs in possession of the entailed estate," importing no effectual limitation of his right, and the direction to the trustees to discharge the bond for £25,000 over the entailed estate being one which could only be carried out with his consent. M'Donald v. M'Donald's Trustees, June 17, 1875, H. L., p. 125.

See Trust, 3.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. See Bona Fides.

ARBITRATION.

A dispute between two parishes as to the settlement of a pauper was referred by them to the decision of a society of inspectors of poor, which was in the practice of deciding such questions by vote at their general meetings, at which it was uncertain what members would be present. Held that the reference and the award following thereon were valid. Bremner v. Elder, June 24, 1875, H. L., p. 136.

ARRESTMENT. Execution—Clerical Error—1 and 2 Vict. c. 114 (Personal Diligence Act, 1838), sec. 9.

Where an execution of arrestment bore to proceed on an extract Sheriff-court decree (containing warrant to arrest, in virtue of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 9) dated 13th January and extracted 6th February 1872, whereas the decree which formed the warrant of arrestment was dated 30th January 1872, held that the discrepancy was fatal to the validity of the arrestment. Graham v. Bell, July 15, 1875, p. 972.

ASSESSMENT. See Poor—Public Burden.

ASSIGNATION. Right in Security—Jus cedendarum actionum.

A creditor in a debt, heritably secured, was also assignee of a liferenter of the burdened subject. The fiar having tendered payment of the debt and demanded an assignation, held (in deciding a question of expenses) that the creditor was entitled to qualify the assignation with the condition that if the interest were regularly paid the assignation should not be used in prejudice of the liferent right. Fraser v. Carruthers, March 11, 1875, p. 595.

ASSIGNATION—Continued.

See Railway, 1.

ATTAINDER. See Entail.

ATTESTATION OF DEEDS. See Writ.

BANKRUPTCY. Suspension and Liberation—Caution for Expenses.

1. A bankrupt is entitled to bring and prosecute a suspension of diligence which has attached or may attach his person without finding caution for expenses, although it may raise large and intricate questions of accounting between him and the incarcerating creditors. Young v. Robertsons, March 13, 1875, p. 599.

Statute 1696, c. 5—Sale—Security.

2. On 16th May 1874 P and Son, merchants, received from H £500, and granted the following written obligation:—"We have this day received from you £500; and we hereby promise to give you, within one month from this date, delivery-orders on stores in Glasgow for wheat, oats, beans, or Ind. corn, to the full value." P and Son then purchased grain in the market from various persons on credit, and between 22d May and 8th June handed delivery-orders therefor to the value of £238 to H. P and Son were sequestrated on 25th June.

In an action brought by the trustee on P and Son's estate, held that the deliveries of grain were reducible as granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction or further security of a prior debt in preference to other creditors within the meaning of the Act 1696, cap. 5. Gourlay v. Hodge, June 2, 1875, p. 738.

Trustee—Power to adopt or cancel Bankrupt's Executory Contracts—Current Contract—Delectus Personæ—Mora.

3. A firm contracted to supply shipbuilders with iron for certain vessels which were to be built, and had partially implemented the contract, which was a beneficial one for them, and was daily becoming more so, when they became insolvent. The day after the insolvency the shipbuilders wrote cancelling the contract. Two days afterwards the firm's manager wrote asking for time to make arrangements. Twenty-six days after the insolvency the trustee on the sequestrated estate wrote offering to go on with the contract or to come to terms upon which it might be cancelled, which offer was refused. In an action for damages at the instance of the trustee, held that, without deciding whether the contract was one which the trustee could competently have taken up as not involving delectus personæ, in the circumstances he had not declared his option to go on with the contract tempestivé, and that the shipbuilders were not liable in damages.

Question, whether the contract was one that could competently be taken up by the trustee and creditors? Anderson v. Hamilton and Co., Jan. 22, 1875, p. 355.

19 and 20 Vict. c. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 126, 127.

4. A trustee on a sequestrated estate pronounced a deliverance rejecting the claim of a creditor as being insufficiently vouched, and allowing him to lodge further evidence within eight days. The creditor did not lodge further evidence within eight days, and did not appeal within the statutory period of fifteen days. In a suspension at his instance, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Young) interdicted the trustee from paying a dividend till the creditor's claim had been disposed of by a deliverance admitting or rejecting it, the previous deliverance being held incompetent under the 126th section of the statute.

Observed (per Lord President), that when a trustee contemplates rejecting a claim by an alleged creditor on the ground that the claimant is a conjunct and confident person, the claimant is entitled to have an opportunity of leading evidence prout de jure to prove the reality of the transaction. Ritchie v. Balgarnie, Jan 14, 1875, p. 297.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 25, 108, &c.

5. In a sequestration a creditor, being a brother of the bankrupt, produced, as the only voucher of his debt, a decree in absence obtained by him against the bankrupt within sixty days of bankruptcy,—objection to his vote sustained. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Affidavit.

6. The Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856, sec. 25, provides that when a creditor is a corporation, an affidavit "by the secretary, manager, cashier, clerk, or other principal officer of such corporation, shall be sufficient." Held that an assistant manager of a joint stock banking company was a principal officer of the bank in the sense of the Act. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

7. In a sequestration the Sheriff allowed an addition to be made to an affidavit by one of the creditors. The addition was made by the deponent, and initialed by him and by the magistrate before whom the original deposition had been made.

Objections (1) that the addition was not part of the oath, and (2) that it was not duly authenticated, repelled. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Affidavit—Valuation of Securities.

8. A creditor used an arrestment within sixty days of the bankruptcy of his debtor. In his affidavit he deponed that he put no value upon it. Objection that he ought to have put a value upon it repelled, in respect that by sec. 108 the arrestment was not effectual to the creditor. Dow and Co. v. Union Bank, Feb. 23, 1875, p. 459.

Ranking—Cautioner.

9. Although a cautioner for the debt of a person who has become bankrupt will not be allowed to rank on the bankrupt's general funds for his loss as cautioner when the creditor has already been ranked for the full debt, if the cautioner holds a lien over any special fund belonging to the bankrupt his right to full indemnity therefrom will not be affected by the ranking of the creditor. Jamieson v. Forrest, May 25, 1875, p. 701.

Ranking—Cautioner—Security.

10. Held that a person holding a lien over a portion of a bankrupt's estate in security of advances made to him, and against risks and loss through a cautionary obligation undertaken for the bankrupt, was entitled to apply the security in the first instance to extinguish his loss through the cautionary obligation. Jamieson v. Forrest, May 25, 1875, p. 701.

Ranking—Blank Bill—Cautioner—Accommodation Bill.

11. A lent B £300 and at the same time took in security from B a blank bill stamp for £2000, signed by him and indorsed by four other persons, A being in the knowledge that no relation of debtor and creditor subsisted between B and the indorsers. B not having paid the £300, and one of the indorsers having become bankrupt, A, who had filled up the blank stamp as a note for £2000, claimed to rank on the bankrupt indorser's estate for that amount till the dividends should amount to £300.

Held that the bankrupt indorser was in reality only a cautioner, and that A was only entitled to rank on his estate for the £300 actually lent to B. Jackson v. M'Iver, July 6, 1875, p. 882.

Discharge—Preference—Statutes 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 151, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 33, sec. 3.

12. The 151st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacts that if a bankrupt shall have been personally concerned in or cognisant of the granting of any preference he shall forfeit all right to a discharge.

In an application by a bankrupt for his discharge, after the lapse of two years from the date of the sequestration, held that the terms of the above section were imperative, and that the Court was bound, ex proprio motu, although there was no appearance for the trustee and creditors, to enforce them. Pendreigh, June 5, 1875, p. 769.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Foreign—Forum Competens.

13. The mercantile sequestration of a bankrupt in a foreign country renders a subsequent award of sequestration in Scotland incompetent. Goetze v. Aders, &c., Nov. 27, 1874, p. 150.

See Bill, 2—Husband and Wife, 6—Railway, 1—Recompense.

BARONY. See Fishings.

BILL. Suspension.

1. In a note of suspension of a charge on a bill for £100 it was averred that when the bill became due the debtor had paid £30, and granted a bill for £70; that the second bill had been fraudulently altered to £75 by the respondent in order to conceal that it was a partial renewal of the first; that the complainer had paid the £75 to avoid litigation; and that the charger was now fraudulently seeking to enforce payment of the first bill. The £75 bill was produced, and was ex facie altered. Held that the complainer was entitled to have the note passed on caution. Simpson v. Taylor, Nov. 4, 1874, p. 75.

Compensation—Concursus Debiti et Crediti—Bankruptcy.

2. When certain bills were discounted by indorsees for value, and subsequently retired by them at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, held that they were entitled to plead compensation upon them against a debt due by themselves to the bankrupt; and the special objections (1) that they were neither the holders at the date of the sequestration nor the drawers, but only intermediate indorsees, (2) that they held a letter of guarantee from a third party, whose name did not appear on the bills, but for whose behoof they had been drawn, against any loss they might sustain on the bills, and, therefore, were pleading compensation in the interest of the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, repelled. Hannay and Son's Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co., Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

Suspension—Joint Adventure—Partnership—Summary Diligence.

3. The three trustees of an unregistered joint stock building association, who had signed a bill drawn on and addressed to them, B., U., and S., "trustees of the New Imperial Building Association," by one of the members of the association for the amount of an account for plaster work done on the association's buildings, presented a note of suspension of a charge on the bill, on the ground that the charger was not entitled to use summary diligence, in respect (1) that the complainers were only liable qua trustees, and (2) that the drawer was a partner of the association, and as such was, under the articles, liable pro rata along with the whole members for the amount in the bill. Held that the charge was competent, in respect (1) that the acceptor's signatures were unqualified, and (2) that, even if their liability could be held to be qua trustees merely, they had not averred that there were no funds of the association in their hands. Brown, &c. v. Sutherland, March 17, 1875, p. 615.

Suspension—Intoxication.

4. In a suspension of a charge upon a bill upon the ground that it had been obtained when the suspender was incapacitated through intoxication, held on consideration of a proof as to the suspender's state on the occasion, and his subsequent actings, and in respect that he had never challenged the bill, though frequently applied to for payment of it, until charged, six months after it had become due, that he was not entitled to suspend the charge. Pollok v. Burns, March 3, 1875, p. 497.

Discharge—Indorser—Cautioner—Pactum de non petendo.

5. The holder of a bill, after it had been dishonoured and duly protested, while he retained possession of the bill, granted a discharge to the acceptors "of all claims and demands competent" to him against them, "reserving entire my claims against any obligants, other than" the acceptors, "presently bound to me along with" the acceptors. He thereafter sued the latest of three indorsers of the bill for the amount in the bill. Held that the discharge did not extinguish the debt, but was merely an agreement not to sue the acceptors, and that the indorser must pay, his recourse against the acceptors not being prejudiced. Muir v. Crawford, May 4, 1875, H. L., p. 148.

BILL—Continued.

See Bankruptcy, 11.

BONA FIDES. Approbate and Reprobate.

Observed that a person who is put to his election between two alternative provisions, and who draws both, cannot in general plead bona fide perception and consumption in answer to a claim for repetition. Johnston v. Johnston, &c., July 20, 1875, p. 986.

See Sale, 1.

BURGH. Burgh Election—Police Commissioners.

The Ballot Act, in enacting that "all municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which the elections of councillors in" certain royal burghs "are directed to be conducted by the Acts in force at the date of the passing of this Act, as amended by this Act," only prescribes the mode of conducting the election in the sense of taking the votes, adding them up, and declaring the result, and does not repeal the provisions in secs. 48 and 50 of the Police and Improvement Act of 1862 as to the mode of dealing with an equality of votes, and fixing the day of election of Police Commissioners. Hamilton v. Police Commissioners of Dunoon, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 299.

See Church, 3.

CARRIER. Passengers' Luggage—Contract.

Held (in aff. judgment of the Second Division) in a case not falling within the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, that special conditions limiting the common law liability of a carrier were not imported into a contract of carriage by merely printing them on the back of the ticket delivered by the carrier in exchange for the fare, the person receiving the ticket not having actually read the conditions, and not having had his attention directed to them by anything printed on the face of the ticket, or by the carrier himself when issuing it. Henderson and Others v. Stevenson, June 1, 1875, H. L., p. 71.

See Railway.

CAUTIONER. See Bankruptcy, 9, 10, 11—Bill, 5.

CESSIO. 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, sec. 2.

1. A person raised a summons of cessio bonorum. His creditors objected to the competency of the summons, inasmuch as it did not set forth, in terms of A. S. 24th December 1838, sec. 1 (to regulate proceedings in processes of cessio bonorum), any ground entitling the pursuer to cessio under the statute. The only fact founded on in the summons was that the pursuer had been charged to pay a debt on 10th November 1873, but as the summons was raised on 18th November, before the inducia had expired, no warrant of imprisonment had or could have issued against him. Held that as the pursuer was not in any of the situations enumerated by the statute, the objection must be sustained, and the summons dismissed as incompetent. Jacobsen v. His Creditors, Dec. 18, 1874, p. 227.

Future Earnings.

2. Held that a person incarcerated for failure to pay a sum of damages awarded for seduction, breach of promise of marriage, and aliment, who was not possessed of any property, but had been earning 27s. a-week before his incarceration, was not entitled to the benefit of cessio, except upon condition of granting an obligation to pay weekly to the incarcerating creditor a portion of his wages, which fixed at one-sixth. Mitchell v. Macfarlane, July 13, 1875, p. 930.

CESSIO—Continued.

CHURCH. Glebe.

1. In a petition for authority to feu a glebe the Court approved of certain alterations, rendered necessary by the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, on the model feu-charter approved of in the Penicuick case (5 Macph. p. 1145). Browne, March 1, 1875, p. 488.

Parish Quoad Sacra—Marriage—Proclamation of Banns.

2. Held that the proclamation of banns was prescribed by the Church as a preliminary to the celebration of marriage in facie ecclesiæ, and that such proclamation was one of the functions and duties of the office of minister of a church erected into a parish church under the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, for the district attached thereto as a parish quoad sacra. Hutton, &c. v. Harper, &c., July 7, 1875, p. 893.

Parish Bells.

3. On the rebuilding, in 1779, of the parish church of a parish partly burghal partly landward, it was agreed between the heritors of the parish and the magistrates of the burgh that a steeple should "be carried up on the east end of the church," at the sole cost of the burgh, "which steeple, when finished, with the bells, &c., therein, is to be the sole property of the burgh for ever, the bells, however, to be employed for the parish as well as the town." The steeple was completed in 1784, and the burgh bells were thereafter hung in it.

Held (in aff. judgment of the First Division) (1) that having regard to the circumstances of the contracting parties at the date of the agreement, and specially to the fact that the heritors were bound to provide a bell for the parish church, the agreement was to be construed as conferring on the parish the exclusive right to use the bells for ecclesiastical purposes; and therefore (2) that the town-council were not entitled to order the bells to be rung on Sundays or national and parochial Fast-days for the purpose of intimating worship elsewhere than in the parish church at such hours as might be fixed by the kirk-session. Magistrates of Peebles v. Kirk-Session of Peebles, June 7, 1875, H. L., p. 117.

Division of Area of Church. See Process, 16.

COMMISSION. See Agent and Principal, 2, 3.

COMPANY. See Partnership.

COMPENSATION. Liquid and Illiquid.

1. In an action for payment of the price of goods the defender admitted the debt, but pleaded compensation in respect of a counter claim of damages arising out of a separate transaction, which was disputed by the pursuer. Held that the defender was not entitled to plead compensation in respect of the illiquid claim of damages. Mackie v. Riddell, Nov. 20, 1874, p. 115.

Concursus debiti et crediti—Bankruptcy.

2. When certain bills were discounted by indorsees for value, and subsequently retired by them at maturity after the bankruptcy of the acceptor, held that they were entitled to plead compensation upon them against a debt due by themselves to the bankrupt; and the special objections (1) that they were neither the holders at the date of the sequestration nor the drawers, but only intermediate indorsees, (2) that they held a letter of guarantee from a third party, whose name did not appear on the bills, but for whose behoof they had been drawn, against any loss they might sustain on the bills, and, therefore, were pleading compensation in the interest of the guarantor, who had no debt to compensate, repelled. Hannay and Son's Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Co., Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

COMPENSATION—Continued.

Concursus debiti et crediti—Trust.

3. Held that arrears of rent due by the tenant of lands vested in trustees under a settlement could not be set off against a debt claimed by the tenant from a beneficiary under the settlement entitled to the income of the lands, there being no concursus debiti et crediti, and that the plea of compensation was not validated by the trustees sisting themselves as defenders along with the beneficiary. Johnston v. Johnston, July 20, 1875, p. 986.

See Contract, 3.

CONDITION IN RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE. See Succession, 8.

CONTRACT. Locatio Operarum—Building—Vis Major.

1. A contractor undertook to build the entire brick-work of a house at certain rates. Before the work was completed a brick gable, forming a portion of it, was blown down during a violent gale of wind. Held that it having been proved that the work had been executed according to contract the loss fell upon the owner of the house, and that the contractor was entitled to recover from him the price of the work destroyed (diss. Lord Deas, on the grounds (1) that the contractor had not proved that the work had been executed conform to contract, and that the accident might not have been caused by a deviation therefrom; and (2) that even if it had been proved that there was no fault on the part of the contractor, the risk lay with him).

Opinions that the onus lay, in the first instance, on the contractor to shew that his work was conform to contract. M'Intyre v. Clow, Jan. 8, 1875, p. 278.

Sale—Timeous Rejection.

2. A firm of engineers contracted to make and deliver a machine consisting mainly of two heavy pieces of cast iron, "the whole to be of the best description, and warranted." The two parts of the machine were transmitted to a railway station—the place of delivery—on 7th February. On 17th February the purchaser, after removing one of the pieces, discovered serious defects in it, and at once intimated rejection to the sellers. On 28th February an agreement was entered into between the purchaser and the sellers that the purchaser should then take delivery of the machine and pay the price, the sellers undertaking to pay half the expense of replacing the defective portion of the machine if it should break within twelve months. Five days afterwards the purchaser removed from the railway station the remaining portion of the machine, and on the same day intimated that he had discovered defects in this part also. Held that the purchaser was precluded by the agreement from rejecting the machine for defects which he might have discovered by examination before the date of the agreement. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott, March 17, 1875, p. 601.

Damages—Defence.

3. A tradesman entered into a written contract to furnish and fit up machinery by a certain date. The time was allowed to run out without anything being done, and the tradesman having afterwards completed the work sued for the contract price. The defenders did not dispute the sufficiency of the work, but they averred that another definite time had been verbally substituted for the time originally stipulated, and they resisted payment on the ground that the pursuer had failed to execute the work within the time agreed on, and had thereby occasioned them loss to an amount exceeding the sum sued for. Held, on the principle that one party is not entitled to enforce performance of a contract if he has himself violated an express condition thereof, that the defenders were entitled to have their claim of damages liquidated in the action at the pursuer's instance, and set off against the contract price. Macbride v. Hamilton and Son, June 11, 1875, p. 775.

See Agent and Principal—Carrier—Reparation, 5—Sale, 2.

CRIME. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1057.

DAMAGES. See Reparation—Contract, 3.

DAMNUM FATALE. See Contract, 1.

DEED. See Writ.

DESTINATION. See Fee and Liferent, 2, 3.

DILIGENCE. See Arrestment—Bill, 3—Poinding the Ground.

DILIGENCE FOR RECOVERY OF WRITS. See Process, 1, 2.

DISCHARGE. See Account—Lease, 4.

DOMICILE. Jurisdiction—Sheriff.

Circumstances in which held that a firm of Glasgow merchants had also a trading domicile at Greenock, and might be sued in the Sheriff-court of Renfrewshire. Harris, &c. v. Gillespie, Cathcart, and Fraser, July 20, 1875, p. 1003.

DONATION INTER VIRUM ET UXOREM. See Husband and Wife, 4.

ENTAIL. Crown Charter—Attainder—Forfeiture—Statutes 1690, c. 33, and 7 Anne, c. 21—Res Judicata.

1. In 1868 a person brought an action to establish his right to estates under an entail constituted in 1687 by a procuratory of resignation (which was followed by a crown charter of resignation and novodamus and infeftment thereon), in the character of heir-male of one of the heirs of entail attainted in 1746, alleging that by the Acts 1690, c. 33, and 7 Anne, c. 21, the effect of the forfeiture was limited to the rebel and his issue, and that the estates passed in terms of the entail to the heir-male next after the rebel and his issue, or otherwise, that on the attainder the estates became vested in the Crown, and that the pursuer had right to the estates under the Restoration Act, 24 Geo. III. c. 57.

It was held that the effect of the forfeiture was not so limited, and an interlocutor was pronounced finding that the estates on the attainder became vested in the Crown, and that the pursuer had no right under the Restoration Act.

The pursuer then raised a second action, founding on the crown charter of 1687, on the ground that the terms of the crown grant were effectual, independently of the law of entail, to limit the effect of the attainder to the rebel and his issue. Held (1) (alt. judgment of Lord Young, and dub. Lord Ormidale), that the plea of res judicata did not apply, the media concludendi of the two actions being different; but (2) (aff. judgment of Lord Young), that whatever might be the effect of an original crown grant in terms of the charter of 1687, that deed, being a charter by progress following upon and in terms of the procuratory of resignation, could not have the effect contended for by the pursuer. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees, March 9, 1875, p. 538.

Destination—Entail by two Deeds—Fetters.

2. A proprietor entailed his estate upon A, and the heirs-male of his body, and a series of substitutes, reserving to himself power to revoke and alter by any writings under his hand, "which writings shall be taken as a part of the present deed of entail, and shall be as effectual" "as if the same had been inserted herein." In a subsequent deed the granter revoked the destination in the former deed in so far as regarded the substitutes following the heirs-male of the body of A, and disponed the estates to A, and the heirs-male of his body, and a series of substitutes entirely different from those in the deed of entail. The second deed contained an obligation to infeft A, whom failing, &c., "in manner and on the terms specified in the previous deed of entail," with and under the burden of the provisions, conditions, restriction, limitations, clauses irritant and resolutive, expressed in the said deed of entail, and an assignation to the procuratory and precept in the deed of entail. The deed further contained a declaration that the institute and substitutes should be entitled to possess the estates on the deed of entail and these presents, and on no other title whatever. The entailer recorded the deed of entail, and ENTAIL—Continued.

A recorded the deed of revocation and new destination in the Register of Entails, and completed a title by infeftment and crown charter of confirmation, each bearing to proceed upon both the entailer's deeds.

In a question inter hæredes, held, in accordance with the Countesswells case, that the deed of 1823 must be read as a new substantive conveyance, superseding that in the entail of 1816, and free from the fetters of an entail. Kenny v. Taylor, March 19, 1875, p. 636.

Fetters.

3. A deed of entail cannot effectually impose fetters by reference to another deed. Kenny v. Taylor, March 19, 1875, p. 636.

Resolutive Clause.

4. A deed of entail, after the cardinal prohibitions, contained a resolutive clause in these terms:—In case the heirs "shall contravene the before written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them, that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions or provisions and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions to be hereinafter added and appointed by me, they shall ipso facto amit, forfeit," &c. The deed contained no subsequent restrictions against altering the order of succession, alienation, or contracting debt. The validity of the entail having been challenged, on the ground that the resolutive clause was not applied to the cardinal prohibitions, held (in aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the words "shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions or provisions" embraced contraventions of the restrictions before mentioned, and that the entail was valid. M'Donald v. M'Donald, March 12, 1875, H. L., p. 28.

Trust—Direction to Entail Moveables.

5. A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees "to settle and secure my lands and estate of K. herein specially before conveyed, and the plate, paintings, and other plenishing in the mansion-house thereof, . . . by deed or deeds of strict entail," to his eldest son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to a series of substitutes. On the testator's death the institute under the entail, maintaining that "plate, paintings, and other plenishing" could not be made the subjects of a valid entail, objected to the trustees going through the form of executing a deed of entail to include them, and demanded that they should be delivered to him in fee-simple. In a special case presented by the institute and the trustees to have the point at issue between them determined, held that the testator's intention being clear, the invalidity of the proposed entail was not so manifest as to entitle the Court, in the absence of the substitute heirs of entail, to refuse effect to the testator's directions, and that the trustees were bound to include "the plate, paintings, and other plenishing" in the deed of entail to be executed by them, leaving the institute to challenge it in a competent process with the proper contradictors.

Question, Whether it could competently be made a condition of a strict entail that the heirs of entail in succession should always possess certain specific moveable subjects. Kinnear v. Kinnear's Trustees, June 5, 1875, p. 765.

Application of Consigned Money—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 67.

6. In an application by an heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate in the neighbourhood of Glasgow to apply money consigned under the Lands Clauses Act in the purchase of other lands to be entailed, the purchase of a Highland sporting estate in Inverness-shire authorised in the circumstances, and the value (1) of the mansion-house, (2) of timber necessary for the protection and amenity of the mansion-house, and (3) of the shootings and fishings, allowed to be paid out of the consigned money, but the value (4) of other houses not required for purposes of agriculture, and (5) of the other timber on the estate, disallowed. Oswald (Petitioner), July 13, 1875, p. 931.

EXECUTOR. Lease.

1. A tenant under an agricultural lease in favour of himself and his heirs, in which he bound himself, his heirs and executors, to pay the rent, died before the expiration of the lease. The heir declined to take up the lease, and the executor also refused to do so.

Question, Whether the executor was liable for any loss the landlord might sustain through non-implement of the contract.

Held, by Lord Gifford (Ordinary), that the executor was liable. Bethune v. Morgan, Dec. 16, 1874, p. 186.

Reparation—Slander—Title to Sue.

2. A widow, two years after her husband's death, raised an action of damages as his executrix and as an individual, alleging that the defender, by illegally retaining a professorship in a college after his appointment to the office of principal, and by slanderous statements concerning the deceased, had prevented the patron of the professorship from implementing a written promise to appoint the deceased to the chair. Held that the pursuer had set forth a title to sue.

Observations on the maxim of the civil law, Actio personalis moritur cum persona. Auld v. Shairp, Dec. 16, 1874, p. 191.

EXPENSES. Jury Trial.

1. An action of damages for slander and a counter action of damages for assault were tried together before the same jury. In the action for slander the jury found for the pursuer on one of the issues, and assessed the damages at 1s. The Judge refused to certify that the case was suitable for jury trial under section 40 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. In the counter action for assault the jury found for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £5. Held, in the circumstances, that the pursuer of the action for damages for assault was entitled to expenses. Pirie v. Meikle, Oct. 23, 1874, p. 40.

Mandatary—Jury Trial—A. S. 16th February 1841, sec. 46.

2. On the day fixed for the trial of a cause by jury the pursuer's mandatary lodged a minute of withdrawal before the jury were empannelled. No appearance was made for the pursuer, and the defender took a verdict. Held that the mandatary was liable for the fees to counsel and agents, and payments to witnesses and jury for the trial, and for the expenses of audit. Chapman v. Balfour, Jan. 8, 1875, p. 291.

Trustee.

3. It is a question of circumstances whether testamentary trustees who have unsuccessfully defended the trust-deed in an action of reduction will be allowed their expenses out of the estate. Watson v. Watson's Trustees, Jan. 20, 1875, p. 344.

Separate Defenders—Joint Defence.

4. Two defenders convened in an action agreed to conduct their defence jointly, and this agreement was acted upon from the date of closing the record, until, after a judgment of the Inner-House in favour of the pursuer, one of the defenders compromised the case by payment of a sum of money "in full of the conclusions of the action against him," including that for expenses. The other defender appealed to the House of Lords, and obtained a reversal of the judgment of the Court of Session, in consequence of which he was assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the action, and was found "entitled to the expenses incurred by him" in the action in the Court of Session.

Held that the latter defender was only entitled to recover his own separate expenses and one-half of the joint expenses incurred by both defenders under the arrangement between them. Robertson v. Steuart, July 15, 1875, p. 970.

Taxation—Expenses of Witness.

5. In a Sheriff Court action the evidence of an important witness was taken on commission to lie in retentis. The witness was brought at great expense from the South of England to the seat of the Sheriff-court. Held that the party who adduced the witness and who was successful in the action, was only entitled to recover from the opposite party the amount which would have been incurred if the deposition to lie in retentis had been taken at the residence of the witness without sending agents there, but observed that there was no absolute rule on the subject. Graham v. Borthwick, June 12, 1875, p. 812.

EXPENSES—Continued.

FACULTY AND POWERS. See Apportionment—Trust, 3.

FALSA DEMONSTRATIO. See Succession, 7.

FEE AND LIFERENT. Minerals.
1. Where a testator by a general settlement left his estate (the minerals under which were wrought during his life, and were let on a lease current at the time of his death) to his two daughters, one-third each pro indiviso in fee, and to his granddaughter the other one-third pro indiviso in liferent allenarly, and to the heirs of her body in fee,—held that the granddaughter as liferentrix was entitled to enjoy the one-third of the mineral rents during her life, and to concur with the fiars in renewing the leases when necessary, provided there was no substantial danger of exhaustion of the minerals. Wardlaw v. Wardlaw's Trustees, Jan. 23, 1875, p. 368.

Heir.
2. Where an estate was conveyed mortis causa to a father in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and to the heirs-male of his body and other substitutes in fee,—held that a fiduciary fee was vested in the father during his life for behoof of his heirs-male and the other substitutes, and that he was not entitled to dispone with the concurrence of his eldest son, who could not be during his father's life, and might never be, his father's heir-male.
Observations on the case of Newlands, April 26, 1798, 3 Ross' L. C. 634. Ferguson v. Ferguson, March 19, 1875, p. 627.

Husband and Wife.
3. A feu-disposition to a husband and wife, and the longest liver of them, and their heirs and assignees, gives the fee to the wife, if she survive her husband. Wallace v. Henderson, July 20, 1875, p. 999.

FISHINGS. Salmon-Fishing—Prescription—Possession—Barony.
1. In an action brought against a proprietor of lands on the sea-coast to establish the right of the Crown to salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of his lands, the defender's titles shewed that his lands had formed part of a barony, of which the earliest extant title was a crown charter of confirmation and novodamus, dated in 1584, of the lands and barony, with fishings. By feu-charter, dated in 1587, the lands in question were disponed, with pertinents, by the baron to the defender's ancestor, fishings being mentioned in the tenendas clause only, and upon this charter the disponee was infeft. It was proved that the defender and his ancestors had possessed the salmon-fishings in question from time immemorial.
Held that the crown charter of 1584 being a sufficient title to salmon-fishings, if followed by prescriptive possession, and such possession having followed, the Crown was equally divested whether that possession had been by the Crown vassal himself or some one deriving right from him, and that it was jus tertii for the Crown to found upon any defect, if such existed, in the transmission of the right from the crown vassal to the sub-vassal. Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch, Oct. 20, 1874, p. 27.

Salmon-Fishings—Prescription—Possession.
2. Held that a proprietor of lands on the sea coast under a barony title or a crown grant cum piscationibus may instruct a title as against the Crown to salmon-fishings in the sea ex adverso of his lands by proof of salmon fishing by net and coble for the prescriptive period. M'Douall v. Lord Advocate, April 16, 1875, H. L., p. 49.

FOREIGN. Bankruptcy.
The mercantile sequestration of a bankrupt in a foreign country renders a subsequent award of sequestration in Scotland incompetent. Goetze v. Aders, &c., Nov. 27, 1874, p. 150.

FRANCHISE. See separate Index of Cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1056.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY. Title to Sue.

By the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, secs. 18 and 19, the property of a friendly society established under it is vested in the trustees, who are authorised to sue or defend any action in any Court of law or equity concerning the property of the society. A branch or "court" of the Ancient Order of Foresters' Friendly Society was itself established as a friendly society under the Act—its rules providing for the election of its officers and for the administration of its affairs by the "court," subject to the laws of the Order. In consequence of the "court" having failed to comply with a decision of a superior judicatory, the executive council of the Order, acting in accordance with their laws, suspended the "court," and subsequently granted a new "dispensation" in favour of a minority of its members, authorising them to assume the name and number of the suspended "court." The majority continued to meet as if there had been no suspension, and elected trustees, who raised an action against trustees elected under the new dispensation, to have it found that the pursuers had right to the custody of the money, securities, &c., belonging to the "court," and for delivery of the same. Held, after a proof, that the pursuers had not instructed a title to sue (diss. Lord Gifford, who held that while the executive council could cut off the "court" from the Order, it could not disincorporate the "court" as a friendly society). Simpson, &c., v. Ramsay, &c., Nov. 24, 1874, p. 129.

GABLE. See Property, 2.

GAME. Damages—Jury Trial—Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 112), sec. 4.

Where by the lease of a farm, under which the game was reserved to the landlord, it was "expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, or rabbits, during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm," held, in an action of reparation for damage by rabbits, that, in view of the difficulties of construction which must arise upon this clause at the trial, the case was unsuited to be sent to a jury, and that this was sufficient cause why the proof should proceed before a Lord Ordinary under the Evidence Act, 1866, but the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof altered, by adding the words "before answer." Cadzow v. Lockhart, July 10, 1875, p. 928.

GLEBE. See Church, 1.

HARBOUR. Private Act—Right to Beach Boats.

The fishermen of the sea-coast village of B had from time immemorial laid up their boats for the winter on certain ground belonging to the proprietor of the village, to whom they paid a rent (which from an early period was £1, 17s. 6d.), for their houses and certain other privileges, the right of laying up the boats not being specified in the agreements. In 1845 the proprietor obtained an Act of Parliament for the improvement of the harbour of the village, which authorised him to levy dues on all vessels entering the harbour,—and "on all boats laid up at B for the winter season, 5s." He subsequently charged 5s. from each fisherman on that account, the rent being diminished to that extent. The same system was for some years continued by a new proprietor who purchased the estate in 1865. In 1874 he asserted a right to exclude the fishermen. In a suspension and interdict brought against him by the fishermen, held that they were entitled to the use of the ground for laying up their boats on payment of 5s. until the proprietor provided them with another safe and suitable place, in respect that the Act, in authorising the proprietor to levy dues, had by implication imposed a corresponding obligation to provide the accommodation for the fishermen laying up their boats. Stephen v. Aiton, Feb. 27, 1875, p. 470.

HARBOUR—Continued.

HEIR. See Fee and Liferent, 2.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. Principal and Accessory—Lease—Heir and Executor.
1. Held that when the tenant of minerals under a lease of ordinary duration erects upon the land fixed machinery for the purpose of working the minerals, and dies during the currency of the lease, the machinery is to be considered as moveable in a question as to the tenant's succession. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, p. 258.

Minor.
2. The rule that a minor cannot convey heritage does not apply to subjects which are merely heritable destinatione.
Observations on the case of Fisher v. Dixon, March 6, 1843, 5 D. 775, 15 Scot. Jur. 394; H. of L., June 26, 1845, 4 Bell's App. 286, 17 Scot. Jur. 568. Brand's Trustees v. Brand's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, p. 258.

Fixtures—Sale—Personal Objection.
3. In a question between a purchaser of lands and a person who was entitled to the income of a trust-estate, of which the lands formed part, and who had taken an active part in the sale, held that the latter was not entitled to remove wire fencing which he had put up at his own expense, when in occupation of the mansion-house by permission of the trustees, no notice having been given to the purchaser before the sale was completed that the fencing was not to go with the estate. Graham v. Lamont, Feb. 18, 1875, p. 438.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.
1. Circumstances in which an alleged marriage per verba de præsenti was held not to be proved. (Murthly Marriage Case)—Steuart v. Robertson, June 7, 1875, H. L., p. 80.

Separation and Aliment—Expenses—Agent.
2. A law-agent raised an action against a husband for his wife's expenses in an action of separation and aliment, in which the pursuer had been employed by her, stating that, before any inquiry into the facts, the parties had been reconciled, and decree of absolvitor pronounced, and that a motion by him for his expenses had, at the same time, been refused, on the ground that his claim could not properly be investigated except in a separate action. Held that the action was competent, and a proof allowed.
Observed (per cur.) that the agent's claim for his expenses in such cases may be competently made, either in the original process or in a separate action, but that the Court will in general not entertain it in the original process if the case is settled before there has been any investigation into the facts.
Observations on Smith v. Smith, Feb. 21, 1871, 9 Macph. 538. Clark v. Henderson, Feb. 6, 1875, p. 428.

Aliment—Sheriff.
3. A married woman raised an action in the Sheriff-court against her husband for interim aliment until a permanent arrangement of the rights and interests of the parties should be made in a competent Court, on the ground that the pursuer was obliged to live separately on account of her husband's cruel conduct. It appeared from a proof that at the date of the action, and until a few days before the proof, the pursuer was living in her husband's house. Held that in the circumstances the action was incompetent in the Sheriff-court.
Observed (per Lord Deas), that in granting an interim allowance of aliment to a wife the Sheriff ought to fix a time at which the aliment should cease. M'Donald v. M'Donald, May 25, 1875, p. 705.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Marriage-Contract—Mutual Settlement—Jus Quæsitum Tertio—Revocation—Donatio inter virum et uxorem.

4. Held that a mutual settlement executed by a husband and wife was ineffectual, in so far as it derogated from the wife's rights under an antenuptial contract of marriage, and quoad ultra was revocable by the wife after her husband's death as a donation inter virum et uxorem, the wife not having received any benefit therefrom. Rae v. Nielson, May 14, 1875, p. 676.

Marriage-Contract Provision—Trust.

5. By antenuptial contract of marriage a wife conveyed all her property to trustees for payment of the revenue to the spouses in liferent, and of the fee to the children of the marriage, whom failing, to herself or any person nominated by her, whom failing, to her heirs, executors, and assignees, excluding the jus mariti. When the wife was sixty-five years of age, she, with consent of her husband and of the children of the marriage, all of whom had attained majority, and had offered to renounce their rights, called on the trustees to denude of the trust-estate in her favour. Held (1) that the trust-conveyance by the wife had been intended to secure her liferent as a provision in the event of her surviving her husband; and (2) that it was in its nature irrevocable by the wife, although not expressly declared to be so. Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, p. 507.

Postnuptial Contract—Retention—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 86), sec. 16—Bankruptcy.

6. By postnuptial contract in 1852 a husband and wife who had no antenuptial marriage-contract conveyed to trustees £2600, to which the wife was entitled from her deceased father's estate, while the husband became bound to pay in 1862 a sum of £1999 to the trustees for the purposes of the trust, and in the meantime to grant security therefor, either heritable or by insuring his life to the amount, and assigning the policy to the trustees, and paying to them an annual premium, or, in their option, a single payment sufficient to redeem the annual payments. The purposes of the trust were to pay the liferent of the trust-funds to the husband, and after his decease to the wife if she should survive him, and the fee to the children nati and nascituri. These provisions were declared to be alimentary. The husband did not implement his obligation by granting security or otherwise, and he became bankrupt in 1860.

In a question between the marriage-contract trustees and the trustee on the bankrupt's estate, held (aff. judgment of Second Division), (1) that the husband's right to the annual proceeds of the £2600 was vested in the trustee on his sequestrated estate; (2) that the marriage-contract trustees were not entitled to retain the income, on the ground that the husband had failed to fulfil the obligation he had undertaken; and (3) that the wife was not entitled to a present provision under the Conjugal Rights Act out of the income of the £2600 so payable to the husband. Learmonth, &c. v. Miller, May 3, 1875, H. L., p. 62.

See Parent and Child.

INCOME-TAX. See Revenue.

INDICTMENT. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1057.

INSANITY. Brieve of Insanity—Cognition—Title to Pursue.

1. The cousin-german, not being the nearest agnate, or the heir at law, or one of the next of kin of a person alleged to be insane, purchased a brieve of insanity. Objection to his title to pursue repelled.

Observed, that although the nearest agnate had not come forward to pursue the cognition, he might, after the person was cognosced, and the brieve retoured to Chancery, come forward and claim the office of tutor. Larkin v. M'Grady, Dec. 8, 1874, p. 170.

2. At the trial of a brieve of insanity an objection was taken to the pursuer's title to pursue the cognition. The presiding Judge reserved the question for the consideration of the Court, and allowed the trial to proceed. Held that the procedure was competent. Larkin v. M'Grady, Dec. 8, 1874, p. 170.

INSANITY—Continued.

3. The Act of Sederunt of 3d December 1868, sec. 6, directs that after the trial of a brieve of insanity, if the whole heads of the brieve are not affirmed by the jury in favour of the person claiming as nearest agnate, then the formal writing made out and subscribed by the clerk shall bear that the brieve and claim are not proven. At the trial of a brieve of insanity at the instance of a person who was not and did not claim as nearest agnate the jury returned a verdict cognoscing in terms of the brieve, and finding that the pursuer was not the nearest agnate, and that another person named was the nearest agnate. It was contended that a verdict of not proven should be recorded, in respect that the heads of the brieve had not been affirmed "in favour of the claimant as nearest agnate." Held that the clause in the Act of Sederunt applied only to a case in which the purchaser of the brieve claimed as nearest agnate. Larkin v. M'Grady, Dec. 8, 1874, p. 170.

INSURANCE. Partnership—Trust.
Two trading companies obtained, in the name of a person who was a partner of both firms, an advance from an insurance office, repayable by instalments, upon the security of a policy of insurance which they opened on the life of that partner, he being the youngest member of both firms. The policy was payable to the "executors, administrators, and assigns" of the insured, but the premiums were paid by the companies. Upon the death of the insured the contents of the policy were realised, and a large balance remained after deducting the debt still due to the insurance office. Held, in a question between the firms and the executors of the deceased partner, that the proceeds of the policy belonged to the firms. Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees, June 5, 1875, p. 755.
See Partnership, 3.

INTERDICT. See School, 4.

INTOXICATION. See Bill, 4.

IRRITANCY OB NON SOLUTUM CANONEM. See Superior and Vassal, 3.

ISSUE. Reparation—Criminal Prosecution—Public Officer—Malice.
1. A person was charged before a police magistrate with the crime of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, in so far as he did "wickedly and feloniously, falsely and fraudulently," present and cash at the head office of a bank a cheque on a branch thereof, "he well knowing that he had then no money" in the branch bank. Upon this charge he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. The conviction and sentence having been quashed by the Court of Justiciary in respect that the libel contained no relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, he brought an action for £2000 damages against the procurator-fiscal who prosecuted, and the bank who gave the information. The pursuer averred that he had an account current with the branch bank, and that he had previously drawn cheques upon it which had been duly honoured at the head office. Held that in regard to each defender the pursuer required to put in issue malice and want of probable cause. Rae v. Linton, &c., March 20, 1875, p. 669.

Counter Issue.
2. In an action of damages for personal injury against the proprietors of a ferry the defenders were allowed to take a counter issue of contributory negligence, in respect that the pursuer did not object, but observed that the defence might have been proved without a counter issue, and that a counter issue in such cases was not usual in practice. Donald v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, June 12, 1875, p. 813.
See Patent, 2.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. See Partnership.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Partnership.

1. A woman, who was a partner in a business, married and so ceased to be a partner. She then presented an application to the Court to appoint a judicial factor, with power to wind up the copartnery. Held that the dissolution of the partnership was not a sufficient reason for the appointment of a factor. Russell v. Russell, Nov. 14, 1874, p. 93.

Process—Special Powers.

2. Observed that it is not the practice of the Court to grant special powers under the petition for appointment of a judicial factor. Russell v. Russell, Nov. 14, 1874, p. 93.

*Petition—Sequestration of Estate—*20 and 21 Vict. c. 56, sec. 4.

3. Held by Lord Curriehill (Junior Lord Ordinary) that a petition for the sequestration of a trust-estate and the appointment of a judicial factor, which did not at the same time pray for the removal of the trustees or executors, was competent before the Junior Lord Ordinary. Rhind v. Sheach, &c. July 20, 1875, p. 1002.

JURISDICTION. See Domicile.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Lease.

LEASE. Constitution of Lease—Proof—Writ—Rei Interventus.

1. Letters between the proprietor of a fishing village and his son and factor shewed that the landlord had been negotiating with the fishermen in the village, who were possessing on tacit relocation, as to their either purchasing their houses or taking leases for fifty-seven years at a certain increased rent; that by the landlord's desire the final answers of the fishermen had been obtained and marked by the factor in a list which specified neither the rent nor the term of endurance of the lease; and that thereupon the landlord, wishing that a larger number should purchase, directed his factor to inform the fishermen that the question of lease or purchase might lie over for another year. From the following term the fishermen were allowed to occupy their houses at the increased rent, and continued so to occupy for four years.

   In an action of removing against three of the fishermen who had been marked as willing to take leases, held (1) that verbal contracts for leases of fifty-seven years had been proved by writ of the landlord; and (2) that sufficient rei interventus had followed to prevent the landlord from resiling. Sellar, &c. v. Aiton, Jan. 26, 1875, p. 381.

Executor.

2. A tenant under an agricultural lease in favour of himself and his heirs, in which he bound himself, his heirs and executors, to pay the rent, died before the expiration of the lease. The heir declined to take up the lease, and the executor also refused to do so.

   Question, whether the executor was liable for any loss the landlord might sustain through non-implement of the contract.

   Held, by Lord Gifford (Ordinary), that the executor was liable. Bethune v. Morgan, Dec. 16, 1874, p. 186.

Hypothec—Intromitter, Liability of.

3. The tenant of a farm died in January, leaving a pupil son, who was entitled to take up the lease, and a widow, who procured herself decerned executrix-dative to her husband, and carried on the farm for behoof of her son. With the advice of P, her father-in-law, the widow sold the whole crop and stock, except the turnips in the ground, by the end of October, partly by herself, and partly through P in her name, who received the price of part of the crop and handed it to her. A few days before the crop was removed P received a letter from the landlord's factor asking whether he was to hold him responsible for the rent, to which no answer was given. Held that by his conduct in regard to the subjects of the landlord's hypothec, P had rendered himself, jointly and severally with the widow, liable for the whole year's rent (diss. Lord Gifford, who held that in the absence of proof of any fraudulent conspiracy to defeat the landlord's right, the liability of P was limited to the extent of his actual intromissions). Steuart v. Peddie, Nov. 14, 1874, p. 94.

LEASE—Continued.

Miscropping—Additional Rent—Receipt—Discharge.

4. Held that a landlord was barred from recovering additional rent for miscropping, which, by the lease, was payable at the same terms as the ordinary rents, in respect that the ordinary rents had been paid and settled, and receipts granted by him without reservation of further claim. Baird v. Mount, Nov. 19, 1874, p. 101.

Resumption of Lease—Minerals—Clause.

5. A mineral tenant qualified his lease by a minute of agreement in which it was provided that in the event of his death the landlord might resume possession of the minerals if he should at any time thereafter be dissatisfied with the working thereof by the representatives of the tenant. The tenant died, and the minerals were worked by trustees for a year after his death, when the landlord intimated his dissatisfaction with their working, and his intention of resuming possession. The trustees refused to remove, in respect (1) that there was no ground for dissatisfaction, and (2) that the landlord was acting in mala fide. Held, on a consideration of a proof and correspondence (1) that it was not necessary for the landlord to state his grounds for dissatisfaction, and (2) that the trustees had failed to prove mala fides on the landlord's part. Houldsworth v. Brand's Trustees, May 18, 1875, p. 683.

See Game—Heritable and Moveable—Process, 2, 15—Reparation, 4.

LIFERENT. See Fee and Liferent.

LIS ALIBI PENDENS. See Process, 2, 3.

MAILLS AND DUTIES. See Poinding the Ground.

MALICE. See Issue, 1.

MANDATARY. See Expenses, 2.

MANDATE. See Agent and Client.

MARRIAGE. See Apportionment—Church—Husband and Wife.

MARRIAGE, CONDITION IN RESTRAINT OF. See Succession, 8.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 37), secs. 6 and 25—"Employers"—"Artificers."

Held that a foreman at a slate quarry, although bound by the terms of his engagement to assist the workmen when he saw any of the operations "falling back" or "in need of being pushed forward," was not an "artificer" but an "employer" in the sense of the Truck Act, 1831. Phillips v. M'Innes, Dec. 17, 1874, p. 224.

See Reparation, 3.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT. See Index of Registration Appeal Cases, p. 1056.

MINERALS. Precious Metals—Act 1592, c. 31.

A proprietor of lands obtained from the Crown, in terms of the Act 1592, c. 31, a separate charter of the mines of gold, silver, and other metals and minerals in the lands. He subsequently executed an entail of the lands, without mention of the mines and minerals. Held that the mines and minerals were brought under the entail as parts and pertinents of the lands. Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, June 16, 1875, p. 826.

See Lease, 5.

MINOR. See Heritable and Moveable, 2.

MORA. See Bankruptcy, 3.

MORTIS CAUSA CONVEYANCE. See Succession.

MUNICIPAL ELECTION. See Burgh.

MUTUAL GABLE. See Property, 2.

NAUTÆ CAUPONES, &c. See Carrier—Railway.

NEGLIGENCE. See Carrier—Railway, 4, 5, 6, 7—Reparation, 1, 2, 3, 4—Ship, 3, 4.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Trust, 2.

NUISANCE. Sheriff—Appeal—Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 101, Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 135, 396, and 397.

1. The Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 135, gives power to the commissioners to erect public urinals, "but so that such erection shall not become a nuisance," and declares that "any householder (i.e. any male occupier of lands and premises of the requisite yearly value) who thinks himself aggrieved thereby may appeal to the Sheriff in manner after provided." The only subsequent provisions as to appeal are contained in the 396th and 397th sections, the former of which allows appeal against an order of the commissioners "within seven days next after the making of any such order," and the latter renders the Sheriff's judgment on such appeal final.

   Held that a petition at the instance of the proprietor of a house in a burgh praying for the removal as a nuisance of a urinal erected by the police commissioners was competent at common law. Adam and Another v. Commissioners of Police of Alloa, Nov. 24, 1874, p. 143.

Process—Jury Trial—River—6 Geo. IV. c. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 28—13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 49—29 and 30 Vict. c. 112 (Evidence Act), sec. 4.

2. An action of declarator and interdict to prevent the pollution of a river, being an action for nuisance, must be tried by jury, unless special cause is shewn to the contrary. Hume v. Young, Trotter, and Co., Jan. 19, 1875, p. 338.

3. In an action of declarator and interdict brought to prevent the pollution of a river by water pumped from mineral workings the defence was (1) that the defenders had a prescriptive right to send water pumped from the mines into the stream, (2) that the water was the natural drainage of the lands, and (3) that the pursuers had no interest, as the stoppage of the works would not prevent the flow of water from the mines. Held that the pursuers' motion for a proof before the Lord Ordinary instead of a jury trial should be granted. Proof before answer allowed. White, &c. v. Dixon, July 7, 1875, p. 904.

OATH, REFERENCE TO. Triennial Prescription—Act 1579, c. 83.

1. Held that the Act 1579, c. 83, in limiting a person suing for payment of a prescribed account to a proof "by writ or oath of his party," excludes the oath of the manager of such party. Bertram and Co. v. Stewart's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, p. 255.
2. Held that, when a reference is made to the oath of two parties jointly, it is not competent to sustain it as a reference to the oath of one of them. Bertram and Co. v. Stewart's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, p. 255.

See Proof.

PACTUM DE NON PETENDO. See Bill, 5.

PARENT AND CHILD. Trust-Disposition—Aliment.

1. A person conveyed certain lands, and generally his whole estate, heritable and moveable, with the exception of his household furniture, to trustees for the following purposes, to pay the expenses of management and all debts due by the granter at the date of the deed, to pay the income to the granter during his life,—after his death to pay an annuity to his widow, and aliment and educate A, B, and C, his children, and eventually to convey the estate to the said children upon the youngest attaining majority. The deed was delivered to the trustees on the day of its execution, and was recorded in the Register of Sasines three months thereafter. The granter died about five months after executing the deed, and a posthumous child was born nine months after the date of the deed. Held (diss. the Lord President) that the posthumous child was entitled, as a creditor, to aliment out of the trust-estate. Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, p. 237.

PARENT AND CHILD—Continued.

Pupil—Tutor-nominate—Tutor incertus dari non potest.

2. A father conferred on the trustees under his trust-disposition and settlement a power to assume new trustees, and appointed his trustees "named or to be named or assumed, and the survivors and survivor of them," tutors to his pupil children. Held that the appointment of assumed trustees as tutors was invalid. Walker v. Stronach, Nov. 21, 1874, p. 120.

Custody of Children—Husband and Wife—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 86, sec. 9.

3. In an action of separation and aliment at the instance of a wife against her husband, in which the husband's adultery was proved, and separation granted, held, in the circumstances of the case, that it was expedient that the custody of the daughters of the marriage should be given to the mother, and the custody of the sons to the father, during their respective pupillarities, so long as no other order should be made by the Court of Session, but subject to such regulations as the said Court might consider reasonable for access of each parent to the children in the custody of the other, and subject to an obligation by the parents respectively not to remove the children in their custody from the jurisdiction of the Court. Symington v. Symington, March 18, 1875, H. L., p. 41. Terms of order made by the Court of Session in applying the judgment. Symington v. Symington, July 16, 1875, p. 974.

Illegitimate Child—Proof of Paternity.

4. In an action of filiation and aliment brought by the mother of an illegitimate child, held that the pursuer's allegation of intercourse with the defender was not established by her own testimony, and by evidence of opportunity during the course of an acknowledged courtship, no suspicious circumstances being proved. Gray v. Marshall, July 8, 1875, p. 907.

PARISH. See Church.

PARTNERSHIP. Agent and Principal—Right in Security.

1. A cautioner in a composition settlement between a trader and his creditors obtained an assignation to the trader's business and estate. It was agreed that the cautioner should receive a commission of 7½ per cent on the gross proceeds of the sales, and he bound himself, after providing for the payments undertaken by him and for his own commission, to account to the trader for the balance. Notwithstanding the assignation, the trader was allowed to continue his business without ostensible change, subject, however, to the control of the cautioner. Held that the cautioner was not liable for a business debt incurred by the trader, either on the footing that the business truly belonged to him, or that he was a partner in the same, the true intention and effect of his agreement with the trader being merely to create a security in his favour. Eaglesham and Co. v. Grant, July 15, 1875, p. 960.

Joint Stock Company—Liability inter socios—Companies Act, 1862, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, secs. 38 and 133, sub-sec. 9.

2. Held, in a voluntary winding up of a company limited by shares that after all debts had been paid shareholders who had taken fully paid-up shares in partial payment of a patent sold to the company were entitled to require the liquidators to make a call upon the holders of shares not fully paid up, so as to equalise the actual payments on these shares with the nominal payments of the holders of paid-up shares. Paterson v. M'Farlane, &c., March 2, 1875, p. 490.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

Proof—Statute 1696, c. 25.

3. Held that it was competent to prove prout de jure that a policy of insurance on the life of a person deceased belonged to a company of which he was a partner. Forrester, &c. v. Robson's Trustees, June 5, 1875, p. 755.

See Bill, 3—Insurance—Judicial Factor, 1.

PATENT. Jury Trial—Issues—Note of Particulars—Prior Invention—Prior Use.

1. In a suspension and interdict brought by the holder of a patent to prevent infringement, the respondents alleged that the patent was invalid, in respect that the patentee was not the first and true inventor, and that the invention had been publicly known and used prior to the date of the patent, the respondents stating that an invention substantially the same had been described in seventeen prior patents, which were specified, and had been used by thirty different manufacturers.

Held that it was not necessary for the respondents to specify the passages in the specifications of the respective patents which they intended to found upon, or the dates of the alleged prior use.

Observed, that the record was the proper place for making the necessary allegations of prior use. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co., Nov. 24, 1874, p. 122.

Jury Trial.

2. Observed that in a question of infringement of patent the objection that the patent is bad in law is always open at the trial as an answer to the pursuer's issue of infringement, and the Judge at the trial, if he is satisfied, on the true construction of the specification, that the patent is bad in law, ought to state his opinion in law to that effect to the jury, and direct them to find a verdict for the defenders. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co., July 2, 1875, p. 857.

Specification.

3. The specification of a patent for the invention of "improvements in looms for weaving" set forth that the invention consisted "in new or improved simple and most efficient modes of and arrangements of mechanism for actuating the set or sets of 'compound' or 'multiple' shuttle-boxes of looms for weaving striped, checked, and other ornamental or figured fabrics requiring two, three, or more shuttle-boxes and shuttles in each set." The specification proceeded to describe in detail, with reference to accompanying drawings (1) a complete shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism, and (2) a complete pattern mechanism, but no part of either was claimed or described as new, nor was any part disclaimed as old. The specification concluded by claiming—"First, the construction and arrangements of the parts of pattern mechanism and shuttle-box moving and holding mechanism generally for actuating the shuttle-boxes of power-looms, all substantially in the new or improved manner herein described and shewn in the accompanying drawings, or any mere modification thereof."

Opinion (per cur.), that the patent was not a valid patent for improvements, in respect that it did not describe the improvements and define the novelty otherwise and in a more specific form than by the general description of the entire machines, and failed to limit the patentee's claim to the specific improvements invented by him.

Observed (per Lord President) that a new combination of old parts to produce a new result, or to produce a known result in a more useful and beneficial way, may be a good subject-matter of a patent, but only under the conditions that the combination shall be claimed as a combination, and be so described as to shew intelligibly what is the novelty, and what the merit of the invention. Harrisons v. Anderston Foundry Co., July 2, 1875, p. 857.

PAYMENT, INDEFINITE. See Prescription, 1.

PENALTY. Lunatic—Statute 55 Geo. III. c. 69, secs. 8 and 19.
The statutory penalty of £50, to which a medical man is liable who grants a certificate of lunacy without due inquiry, cannot be sued for by the injured party. Mackintosh v. Weir, July 3, 1875, p. 877.

PERSONAL BAR. See Sale, 9.

POINDING THE GROUND. Maills and Duties—Heritable Creditor—Right in Security.
A creditor who, under a bond and disposition in security, has obtained a decree of maills and duties, is not in possession of the lands as proprietor, so as to render it incompetent for him to bring an action of poinding the ground. Henderson v. Wallace, Jan. 7, 1875, p. 272.

POLICE. See Burgh—Nuisance, 1.

POOR. Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 71—Settlement—Desertion—Notice.
1. A native of Edinburgh City Parish, wife of a native of England, became chargeable as a pauper to Barony Parish on 5th February 1869, and received relief from that parish with short intervals till her death on 18th November 1871. Notice was given by the Barony Parish on 15th April 1869 to the Edinburgh inspector, who did not admit the claim, and a correspondence was kept up from time to time till the pauper's death. When she became chargeable she was deserted by her husband, but he came back in May 1869, and lived with her till his death on 19th January 1870. Notice was again given to Edinburgh on 24th August 1870. In an action by the inspector of Barony Parish against the inspector of Edinburgh, as the parish of the pauper's birth, for repayment of the amount of her aliment during the whole time of her chargeability, held (1) that Edinburgh was liable for the period from February 1869 to May 1869, the pauper being at that time the deserted wife of a man who had no settlement in Scotland; (2) that Edinburgh was not liable for the period from May 1869 to January 1870, when the husband was at home; (3) that the pauper having ceased to be chargeable to Edinburgh on the return of her husband a fresh notice was necessary upon his death, and Edinburgh was not liable from the date of his death till 24th August 1870, the date of the second notice; (4) that Edinburgh was liable for the period from 24th August 1870 till the pauper's death. Beattie v. Greig, July 9, 1875, p. 923.

Settlement—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 76—Continuity of Residence.
2. A miner, who rented a room in his father-in-law's house in the parish of S, went to work in the neighbouring parish of M, at first returning to visit his wife on Saturdays, but after about two months he took a house in M, to which he removed his wife and furniture. After another month he returned to S. Held that the continuity of residence required by the 76th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act for a residential settlement had been broken. Allan v. Shaw and King, Feb. 24, 1875, p. 463.

Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 71—Inspector's Disbursements.
3. In an action by the inspector of poor of a parish against the inspector of poor of another parish (1) for relief of a pauper's aliment, (2) for repayment of the travelling expenses incurred by the pursuer in obtaining information as to the settlement of the pauper, and (3) for the expenses incurred in prosecuting the husband of the pauper for desertion, held that the second and third items could not be recovered under the 71st section of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845. Austin v. Shennan, Oct. 30, 1874, p. 68.

Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sec. 70—Admission.
4. When a parish has admitted liability for the support of a pauper, and acted on the admission for a length of time, it cannot open up the question of liability on the ground that the admission was made in error as to the facts, partly induced by bona fide misstatements by the inspector of the parish to whom the admission had been made. Beattie v. Arbuckle, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 330.

POOR—Continued.

Admission—Rehabilitation.

5. Where a parish had admitted liability for the relief of a pauper, and continued to relieve her for five years and seven months, after which she resided with a sister for five months without drawing parochial relief, but then was removed to an asylum, the medical officer certifying that she had been insane for six weeks before her removal, held that there had been no interruption of the pauperism so as to raise of new the question of settlement. Beattie v. Arbuckle, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 330.

Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 34—Poor Assessments Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 37)—Assessment.

6. In prescribing the manner in which the assessment for relief of the poor is to be imposed, the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, sec. 34, as amended by the Poor-Assessments Act, 1861, requires that "one-half of such assessment shall be imposed upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish or combination, rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages." Held that one-half of the sum to be raised by assessment falls to be laid upon owners as a class, and the other half upon occupants as a class. Galloway v. Nicolson, March 19, 1875, p. 650.

See Arbitration.

POSSESSION. See Fishings.

POSSESSORY JUDGMENT. See Servitude.

PRESCRIPTION. Triennial Prescription.

Indefinite Payment.

1. In an action for payment of the balance due on a tradesman's account, for goods furnished and cash advanced, the triennial prescription was pleaded. Held that as indefinite payments by the debtor credited in the account fell to be applied in extinction of the items on the debit side of the account in the order of date, and as the items left unpaid consisted entirely of cash advances, the triennial prescription did not apply. Maclaren v. Bradley, Dec. 12, 1874, p. 185.

Reference to Oath—Oath of Manager.

2. Held that the Act 1579, c. 83, in limiting a person suing for payment of a prescribed account to a proof "by writ or oath of his party," excludes the oath of the manager of such party. Bertram and Co. v. Stewart's Trustees, Dec. 19, 1874, p. 255.

Long Negative Prescription.

Statutes 1469, c. 28, 1474, c. 54.

3. Held that prescription of a bond may be interrupted by payments of interest, but that these cannot be proved by parole.

Observed, that the statute 1474, c. 54, made no alteration on the law introduced by the statute 1469, c. 28, with regard to the necessity of taking document upon an obligation within forty years. Kermack v. Kermack's Trustees, Nov. 27, 1874, p. 156.

See Fishings, 1, 2.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE.

In a multiplepoinding brought for the distribution of an intestate estate the interest of certain claimants depended on the question whether A B was alive in 1872. It appeared that in 1860, when A B was thirty-four years of age, he had gone to the United States and had joined the Federal army, and had afterwards deserted, and that his friends had not heard from him since 1862. Held that neither his death nor his survivance could be presumed, and that the distribution of the portion of the fund in dispute must be postponed. Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, March 2, 1875, p. 488.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE—Continued.

PROCESS. Record.
Condescendence. See Patent, 1.
Defences—Lis alibi. See infra, No. 23.

Proof.
Diligence—Business Books.
1. In a reduction of an assignation granted by a person who subsequently became bankrupt, on the ground that the deed had been granted in defraud of creditors, at a time when the granter knew that he was insolvent, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the business books and other documents in the hands of certain of the bankrupt's creditors, with a view to instruct his solvency at the date of the deed. The Court refused the diligence on the ground that the documents called for could not be available as evidence of the granter's solvency apart from the examination of the creditors as witnesses. Steven v. Nicoll, &c., Jan. 9, 1875, p. 292.
2. Circumstances under which, in a question between a landlord and tenant as to whether certain services were to be rendered by the tenant in addition to the rent stipulated, the Court allowed the landlord a diligence to recover the books kept by the tenant in relation to the business of the farm, with a view of shewing the actual profit realised by him during his occupancy. Robertson v. Earl of Dudley, July 13, 1875, p. 935.
Conjunct Probation—Proof in Replication.
3. The defender in an action on an account stated a contra account, and pleaded compensation. Proof was allowed to both parties "of their respective averments in so far as not expressly admitted on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation." Evidence was led by both parties, and then the pursuer led his conjunct proof, in which he went minutely into various objections to the defender's contra account raised by him on record, but which he had not touched in his proof in chief. Held that the defender was entitled to a proof in replication.
Observed (per Lord President) that it was the duty of the pursuer in his proof in chief to lead evidence on all the points raised by him on record. Gairdner v. Young, Dec. 10, 1874, p. 173.
Proof before Answer—Procedure-roll.
4. When a case is in the procedure-roll it is the duty of the Lord Ordinary, before allowing proof, to decide whether there should be any limitation of the mode of proof. Simpson v. Stewart, May 14, 1875, p. 673.

Jury Trial and Proof before Lord Ordinary.
Nuisance—River—6 Geo. IV. c. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 28—13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 49—29 and 30 Vict. 112 (Evidence Act), sec. 4.
5. An action of declarator and interdict to prevent the pollution of a river, being an action for nuisance, must be tried by jury, unless special cause is shewn to the contrary. Hume v. Young, Trotter, and Company, Jan. 19, 1875, p. 338.
6. In an action of declarator and interdict brought to prevent the pollution of a river by water pumped from mineral workings, the defence was (1) that the defenders had a prescriptive right to send water pumped from the mines into the stream, (2) that the water was the natural drainage of the lands, and (3) that the pursuers had no interest, as the stoppage of the works would not prevent the flow of water from the mines.
Held that the pursuers' motion for a proof before the Lord Ordinary, instead of a jury trial should be granted. Proof before answer allowed. White, &c., v. Dixon, July 7, 1875, p. 904.

PROCESS—Continued.

Damages—Game—Evidence Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. 112, sec. 4.

7. Where by the lease of a farm, under which the game was reserved to the landlord, it was "expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, or rabbits, during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm," held, in an action of reparation for damage by rabbits, that, in view of the difficulties of construction which must arise upon this clause at the trial, the case was unsuited to be sent to a jury, and that this was sufficient cause why the proof should proceed before a Lord Ordinary under the Evidence Act, 1866, but the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof altered, by adding the words "before answer." Cadzow v. Lockhart, July 10, 1875, p. 928.

New Trial—Personal Injury.

8. In an action of damages for personal injury after several medical witnesses had been examined as to the state of the pursuer and the injury he had sustained, the jury gave a verdict for the pursuer. In a motion for a new trial the defenders produced affidavits from persons who deponed that the pursuer's health had materially improved since the trial. The Court, without deciding on the competency, refused to grant a new trial, on the ground that the affidavits did not shew that the medical witnesses were substantially wrong in the evidence they gave at the trial. Shields v. North British Railway Company, Nov. 24, 1874, p. 126.

Excess of Damages.

9. In advising a motion for a new trial, the Court intimated that they considered the damages awarded by the jury excessive. The pursuer having consented to take a much smaller sum suggested by the Court, a new trial was refused. Johnston v. Dilke, &c., June 16, 1875, p. 835.

Jury Trial—Direction to Jury. See Patent, 2.

Judgment.

Cancelling Interlocutor—A. S. 10*th March* 1870, sec. 3 (1).

10. In an appeal to the Court of Session in a Sheriff-court action for payment of £50, the appellant, per incuriam, printed the summons in another action between the same parties in which the conclusion was for payment of £20. The respondent having taken the objection that the appeal was incompetent, in respect that the sum concluded for was under £25, the counsel for the appellant, who had only been instructed at the bar, being in ignorance of the mistake, admitted that he had no answer to the objection, and the appeal was dismissed as incompetent. A note having been presented by the appellant, setting forth the mistake, and craving that the interlocutor should be cancelled, held that the interlocutor having been pronounced and signed under an error in point of fact, induced by the parties, it was within the power of the Court to order it to be cancelled, and that, in the circumstances, it should be cancelled accordingly. Harvey v. Lindsay, July 20, 1875, p. 980.

Lost Interlocutor Sheet. See No. 22.

Reclaiming Note.

20 and 21 Vict. c. 56—Court of Session Act, 1857, sec. 10.

11. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in disposing of petitions for factors, &c., during vacation, under sec. 10 of the Court of Session Act, 1857, does not exercise his Bill-Chamber jurisdiction, but merely acts in place of the Junior Lord Ordinary, and his interlocutors must be reclaimed against within eight days. Staig v. Johnston, May 21, 1875, p. 701.

Printing Record—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 18—A. S. 11*th July* 1828, sec. 77.

12. A defender was allowed to make extensive additions to the closed record, which introduced an entirely new defence, and formed the main subject of debate in the Outer-House. The Lord Ordinary having repelled the defences, the defender reclaimed, appending to the reclaiming note the print of the original record, with the amendments in MS. Held that, considering the extent of the additions, this was not sufficient compliance with the terms of the Judicature Act and relative Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, sec. 77, which require the record to be printed and boxed with the reclaiming note, and the reclaiming note refused as incompetent. Muir v. Muir, Oct. 17, 1874, p. 26.

PROCESS—Continued.

Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.

13. Held that when the last day for lodging a reclaiming note under the Court of Session Act of 1868 fell upon a Sunday it was timeously lodged upon the Monday. Russell v. Russell, Nov. 12, 1874, p. 82.

Appeal from Sheriff-court.

Competency of Appeal—Sheriff-court Act, 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, sec. 24.

14. In a petition for sequestration for rent in the Sheriff-court an interlocutor was pronounced, granting warrant on a judicial manager to make a payment to the petitioner. Held that this was to be regarded, in the circumstances, as an "interlocutor, giving interim decree for payment of money," in the sense of sec. 24 of the Sheriff-court Act of 1853, and that an appeal to the Court of Session was competent. Baird v. Glendinning, Oct. 16, 1874, p. 25.

Competency of Appeal—Removing—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 44.

15. In an action by the landlord of a farm against the tenant, laid on A. S. 14th December 1756, anent removings, the conclusions were that the tenant should find caution for arrears, and for the rent of the remaining years of the lease, failing which to remove from his farm. The Sheriff ordained the defender to find caution, and subsequently, in respect that he had failed to find caution, decerned against him in terms of the summons. An appeal to the Court of Session refused as incompetent, the 44th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, making suspension the only competent form of review. Fletcher v. Davidson, Nov. 3, 1874, p. 71.

Competency of Appeal—Competition.

16. In a petition for division of the area of a parish church among the heritors the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding that the heritors in a part of the parish which had been disjoined and erected into a quoad sacra parish were not heritors of the original parish so far as regarded the division. The interlocutor did not finally dispose of the petition as regarded the remaining heritors, and there was no finding as to expenses. The heritors of the quoad sacra parish appealed. Held that the appeal was competent, in respect that the process was a process of competition, and that the interlocutor disposed of the whole subject-matter of the competition so far as the appellants were concerned. Duke of Roxburghe, May 20, 1875, p. 715.

Appeal for Jury Trial—Statutes 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 40, and 30 and 31 Vict. c. 100, sec. 73.

17. Where a case, appealed from the Sheriff-court for jury trial, appeared to the Court not suitable for trial by jury, a proof before answer was allowed before one of the Judges of the Division. Laidlaw and Sons v. Wilson and Armstrong, Nov. 24, 1874, p. 148.

18. Where an interlocutor in the Sheriff-court sustained the plea of the triennial prescription quoad a part of the claim under a summons and allowed a proof prout de jure quoad the rest,—

Held (1) that appeal for jury trial was competent; (2) that appeal being competent, the whole case was removed to the Court of Session, and that it was competent for that Court to review the part of the Sheriff's interlocutor sustaining the plea of prescription.

Observation (per Lord President) on Hamilton v. Henderson, June 10, 1837, 15 S. 1105, 9 Scot. Jur. 529. Robertson v. Earl of Dudley, July 13, 1875, p. 935.

PROCESS—Continued.

Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 71—A. S. 10*th March* 1870.

19. The Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870 provides that an appellant shall print and box the note of appeal, record, interlocutors, and proof, if any, within fourteen days after the process has been received by the clerk of Court, otherwise the appeal shall be held to have been abandoned, unless the appellant should be reponed within eight days. A print of the note of appeal was omitted to be boxed along with the other papers in an appeal. Held that, as the mistake was merely in an innocent and formal omission to comply with a regulation as to process contained in an Act of Sederunt, the Court might (although the reponing days had expired), allow it to be rectified, by lodging a print of the note of appeal. Young v. Brown, Feb. 19, 1875, p. 456.

Incidental Procedure.

Fee-Fund Dues—Appeal—Joint Minute.

20. Before an appeal from the Sheriff-court had been heard the parties compromised the case by a joint minute. Held that the minute was not to be regarded as a first step for the respondent in the sense of the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 118, regulating fee-fund dues, and that a 2s. 6d. stamp was sufficient. Cowan v. Proctor, Nov. 20, 1874, p. 115.

Abandonment of Action—A. S. 10*th July* 1839, sec. 61 (Sheriff-court Procedure)—A. S. 11*th July* 1828, sec. 115 (Court of Session Procedure).

21. The pursuer of an action, after an interlocutor was pronounced disallowing proof by parole, obtained a diligence for the recovery of writings. He allowed it to expire without using it, and then presented a minute of abandonment of the action under A. S. 10th July 1839 (Sheriff-court Procedure), sec. 61. Held that he was entitled to abandon.

Opinion that the 61st section of A. S. 10th July 1839, regulating Sheriff-court procedure, was identical in meaning with the 115th section of A. S. 11th July 1828, regulating procedure in the Court of Session. Kermack v. Kermack, Nov. 27, 1874, p. 156.

Lost Interlocutor Sheet—A. S. 28*th December* 1838, sec. 11—Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 15.

22. In an undefended action of divorce, after decree had been pronounced, the interlocutor sheet, kept in terms of A. S. 24th December 1838, sec. 11, was improperly lent out by the clerk, and was lost. Held, on report of Lord Craighill, that the lost interlocutor sheet was not an "original writ" which could be replaced under the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 15. Cofton v. Cofton, March 13, 1875, p. 599.

Particular Actions.

Count and Reckoning—Lis alibi pendens.

23. A husband raised an action against a heritable creditor who had been in possession of subjects destined to the pursuer and his wife, and the survivor of them, concluding that the defender should be ordained to render an account of his intromissions with the rents, and pay the balance due, with interest from the date of citation. This action was allowed to fall asleep, and several years after the husband and wife raised a second action against the creditor, concluding for an accounting, and for declarator that the debt was extinguished. Pending the action the husband died. Held that the surviving wife was fiar of the subjects, and that the plea of lis alibi pendens applied to the second action only in so far as it concluded for an accounting for the rents due prior to the date of citation in the first action. Wallace v. Henderson, July 20, 1875, p. 999.

Multiplepoinding.

24. The outgoing tenant of a farm allowed the incoming tenant to reap his crop, under an agreement by which the incoming tenant bound himself to pay the value of the crop to the landlord, the balance, after payment of rent, to be paid by the landlord to the outgoing tenant. A creditor of the outgoing tenant having arrested the funds in the hands of the incoming tenant, a multiplepoinding was raised by the landlord in the name of the incoming tenant. Objection to the competency of the multiplepoinding, on the ground that there was no double distress, repelled. Park v. Watson, &c. Nov. 21, 1874, p. 118.

PROCESS—Continued.

*Petition—Sequestration of an Estate—Appointment of a Judicial Factor—Junior Lord Ordinary—*20 and 21 Vict. c. 56, sec. 4.

25. Held (by Lord Curriehill, Junior Lord Ordinary) that a petition for the sequestration of a trust-estate and for the appointment of a judicial factor, which did not at the same time pray for the removal of the trustees or executors, was competent before the Junior Lord Ordinary. Rhind, &c. v. Sheach, &c. March 16, 1875, p. 1002.

Special Case—All Parties not called—Statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 63.

26. Circumstances in which the Court dismissed a special case on the ground that certain persons interested were not parties to it, although the parties to the case craved a judgment as between themselves. Mackie's Trustees v. Martins, March 18, 1875, p. 621.

See Cessio—Expenses—Judicial Factor—and Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1057.

PROOF. Settlement of contra accounts—Parole.

1. A, a firm of iron merchants, had an account against B, an iron merchant and broker, for £9562. B, as broker for C, had an account against A for £7536. Both accounts were payable on the same settling day. B's account as broker for C was, at a meeting for settlement, not disputed, but A's was to a certain extent. B paid the balance admitted by him to be due, and the payment was marked as a payment to account on the copy of A's account held by him, and a receipt for the sum so paid was written upon it. A having subsequently become bankrupt, held, in a question between A's creditor and B (1) that the account, with the receipt for the payment to account, though there were pencil markings of figures on the back shewing that the amount of the sum so paid to account had been fixed, after deducting B's account from A's, were insufficient to establish a settlement between A and B by crossing accounts and payment of the balance; and (2) that it was not competent to supplement the proof of settlement by parole evidence. Hannay and Son's Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers and Company, Feb. 2, 1875, p. 399.

Admissibility of Parole Evidence.

2. When a written contract relating to heritage is impugned by one of the parties, and the other, while denying his opponent's averments, admits that the documents do not give a true account of the agreement, the proof is not limited to writ or oath. Grant's Trustees v. Morison, Jan. 26, 1875, p. 377.

3. In a suspension and interdict brought to prevent the sale of a heritable subject by the respondent, who held a disposition in his favour as a purchaser from the complainer's author at the price of £250, qualified by a back-letter, bearing that the disponer should have power to redeem on payment of that sum within a certain time, failing which the respondent should have power to sell, the respondent admitted that he had not paid £250 for the property, but only £125. Held that the complainers were not limited to proof by writ or oath of their averments as to the true nature of the transaction. Grant's Trustees v. Morison, Jan. 26, 1875, p. 377.

Judicial Admission—Qualified Admission.

4. In an action by a manufacturer against his agent for the amount of certain accounts alleged to have been collected by him from customers, the defender produced an account debiting himself with the sums collected by him, and on the other hand stating as an item on the credit side an unliquidated claim of £200 for time and labour spent by him in promoting the business of the agency, which agency he alleged had improperly been taken from him. Held that the pursuer was not entitled to take the admission of the sums collected contained in the account without the qualification contained in the other entries, but must prove his averments in common form. Gelstons v. Christie, July 20, 1875, p. 982.

PROOF—Continued.

Sale of Heritage—Breach of Contract—Reparation.

5. A father and son raised an action of damages for breach of a contract of sale. They averred that the defender had verbally agreed to purchase the stock in trade and good-will of a baking business carried on by the father at a price to be fixed by valuation, and the property of the shop, belonging to the son, at the price of £450. That in consequence of this verbal contract the father had dismissed his apprentices, and made arrangements for retiring from business, and that by the defender refusing to implement the contract the pursuers had suffered loss. Held (1) that, in so far as the contract related to the sale of heritage, it could not be proved by parole, even to the effect of sustaining a claim of damages for non-implement; and (2) on a consideration of the record, that there was no relevant averment of a contract for the sale of the good-will of the business and moveables apart from the heritage. Allan v. Gilchrist, March 10, 1875, p. 587.

See Oath, Reference to—Parent and Child, 4—Partnership, 3—Process (Proof)—Presumption of Life—Railway, 6—Teinds, 2, 3.

PROPERTY. Superior and Vassal.

1. A proprietor granted a feu of a piece of ground described as bounded on three sides by A Street, B Street, and C Street, with free ish and entry by all roads or streets made and to be made for the use of the feuars. A plan drawn upon the back of the feu-contract, and signed as relative thereto, shewed the streets, but this plan was not referred to in the deed. At its date only one of the three streets had been formed. The vassal was taken bound to pay a proportionate part of the cost of making the streets. In a question between the feuar and the superior held that the vassal was entitled to ish and entry by the ground upon which the proposed streets were to be formed, and that the erection of wooden buildings on the site of one of the proposed streets by the superior was an invasion of the vassal's right. Crawford v. Field, Oct. 15, 1874, p. 20.

Mutual Gable.

2. A erected a mutual gable in a burgh, partly on his own ground and partly on that of B, without leaving fireplaces and vents on the side of B's property. Afterwards, when B came to build a house on his ground, he made fireplaces and vents in the gable, and also heightened it. Held that B's operations were not in excess of his rights as joint owner of the gable, no injury to A being alleged. Lamont v. Cumming, June 11, 1875, p. 784.

See Railway, 1—Road—Servitude.

PUBLIC BURDEN. Assessment—Gas and Water Rates.

A truster provided that his widow should have the liferent use of his house "free of rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, taxes, and all other deductions." Held that the trustees were not bound to pay gas and water-rates for the widow. Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger, Jan. 9, 1875, p. 294.

See Poor—Revenue.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. See Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1057.

PUBLIC OFFICER. See Issue, 1.

RAILWAY. Superior and Vassal—Irritancy ob non solutum canonem—Compensation—Bankruptcy—Trustee—Real and Personal—Assignation.

1. The proprietor of a piece of land bounded by the sea flood brought a statutory claim of compensation against a railway company on the ground that the land, which had been used for shipbuilding, had been injuriously affected by the formation of the railway upon the shore, whereby access to the sea was cut off. When the railway was formed the land belonged to a vassal of the claimant, paying a feu-duty of £150, who had been sequestrated. The trustee in the vassal's sequestration did not take up the feu, and the superior subsequently obtained decree of irritancy of the feu ob

RAILWAY —Continued.

non solutum canonem. The trustee, on condition that the superior made no claim for feu-duties, assigned to the superior any claim of compensation competent to him. Held that the proprietor had no title to insist in the claim (1) in virtue of the decree of irritancy, because the claim of damages, if any, was personal to the vassal, and was vested in the trustee, or (2) in virtue of the assignation, as the trustee had no power to grant it.

Question, whether a claim for compensation on account of the value of land being injuriously affected by the operations of a railway cutting off its access from the sea was competent under the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Acts, either to the proprietor of the dominium utile, or to the superior for his interest. Caledonian Railway Company v. Watt, July 9, 1875, p. 917.

Retention—Carrier—Tolls—Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, sec. 90.

2. The 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, provides,—"If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods; or if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid."

Goods were delivered by a manufacturer to a railway company to be forwarded to his agent, who had accepted bills against the consignment. Held that, as against the onerous consignee, the company were not entitled under the enactment above quoted to detain the goods in security of a general balance due to them by the manufacturer for carriage of goods.

Observations on the scope and meaning of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. Peebles and Son v. Caledonian Railway Company, Jan. 20, 1875, p. 346.

Retention—Carrier—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, sec. 7—Special Agreement.

3. Goods were delivered for carriage to a railway company, with a consignment-note initialed on its face by the sender, bearing, "the Caledonian Railway Company will please receive the under-mentioned goods, and forward them, subject to the conditions on the back hereof," one of the conditions on the back being as follows:—"That all goods delivered to the company will be received and held by them subject to a general lien for money due to them, whether for carriage of such goods or for other charges, and in case the general lien is not satisfied within a reasonable time from the day when the company first received the goods the same will be sold by the company by auction or otherwise, and the proceeds of sale applied to the satisfaction of such lien and expenses." Held that this was not an effectual condition, in terms of the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, in respect (1) that the condition was not duly signed; and (2) that if the condition was meant to give the company a general lien over the goods for arrears of carriage due by the sender to the prejudice of an onerous consignee it was not just or reasonable. Peebles and Son v. Caledonian Railway Company, Jan. 20, 1875, p. 346.

Nautæ Caupones—Public Carrier.

4. Where a railway company, which had been in the practice for twelve years of running a fast goods train, by which dealers could send meat and live-stock to N in time for market without paying any special or extra rates, failed on one occasion, as they alleged, from excess of other traffic, to carry some trucks containing pigs from a station on their line to N by that train, and the pigs consequently arrived too late for the market, held that no sufficient cause of delay having been proved, they were liable to the owner of the pigs for damage incurred by loss of market. Anderson v. North British Railway Company, Feb. 18, 1875, p. 443.

RAILWAY—Continued.

5. Where, owing to an accident to a train, the cause of which could not be ascertained, a number of pigs arrived about five hours too late for a market to which they had been forwarded, held that the railway company were not liable to the owner of the pigs for damage incurred by loss of market. Anderson v. North British Railway Company, Feb. 18, 1875, p. 443.

Proof—Onus—Carriers Act (11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 68, secs. 1 and 8).

6. The first section of the Carriers Act provides that carriers are not to be responsible for the loss of certain descriptions of goods carried by them unless the senders declare the nature of the goods and pay an extra charge. The eighth section provides that nothing in the Act is to be held as protecting the carriers from liability for loss of goods through any felonious act of their servants.

In an action against a railway company for the value of goods of the description specified, stolen while in the custody of the company as carriers, held that it was not sufficient for the pursuers to prove that there was a greater probability of the theft having been committed by servants of the company than by strangers. Campbells v. North British Railway Company, Feb. 18, 1875, p. 433.

Reparation—Negligence.

7. It is the duty of a railway company to warn intending passengers of the existence of a block on the line, or other circumstances inferring unusual risk in the journey, before entering into the contract of carriage, and if they fail to do so they may render themselves liable to such passengers for injury caused by accidents, for which otherwise the company would not have been responsible. Jarvie v. Caledonian Railway Company, March 18, 1875, p. 623.

See Carrier.

RATES. See Public Burden.

RECOMPENSE. Meliorations—Bankrupt—Trustee—Heritable Creditor.

Held that a trustee on a sequestrated estate, who had, at his own hand, completed certain unfinished buildings belonging to the bankrupt, and retained possession of the same for two years, was not entitled to recompense from a creditor holding a heritable security over the buildings, in respect that it could not be shewn in the circumstances that the creditor had been lucratus, or that the trustee had not made the expenditure with a view to increase the reversion. Buchanan v. Stewart, Nov. 10, 1874, p. 78.

REDUCTION. See Sale, 1.

REI INTERVENTUS. See Lease, 1.

REPARATION. Negligence—Culpa—Gun.

1. A blacksmith sent for a gun (a muzzle-loader) belonging to him, which he had left unloaded at a farm bothy on the last occasion he used it, about two months before. When it was brought him, he asked the boy who brought it whether it was loaded, and upon the boy saying he did not know he lifted the doghead and found there was no percussion-cap on the nipple. He next attempted to draw the ramrod to test whether the gun was loaded or not, but failed in consequence of the rod being stiff from rust, or from the wood having swollen. Without further examination he placed the gun in a press or wardrobe in his smithy, where it was partially concealed. On the same day, the blacksmith having been called out of the smithy to speak to some one, a boy took up the gun, which from some unexplained cause went off, and severely injured a journeyman in the blacksmith's employment. Held that the blacksmith had reasonable cause to believe that the gun was not in a condition to be a source of danger, and accordingly that he was not guilty of such negligence as to render him liable in damages to the man injured. King v. Pollock, Oct. 27, 1874, p. 42.

REPARATION—Continued.

Negligence—Dog.

2. In order to render the owner of a dog liable for culpably and negligently allowing it to bite one of the lieges it is not necessary to prove that the dog ever bit any person before; it is enough to shew that the owner had some reason to believe that the animal might do mischief in the circumstances in which it was placed.

A dog was put up for sale at an auction, but was not sold. The auctioneer thereupon requested the owner, who was present, to take the dog away. He did not immediately comply with this request, and the dog was meanwhile tied up to a wall of the auction mart, where he bit a boy who was passing. Held that the custody of the dog had reverted to the owner, and that there being sufficient proof that he knew the dog to be of a ferocious nature he was liable in damages. Renwick v. Von Rotberg, July 2, 1875, p. 855.

Personal Injury—Culpa—Factory Acts, 13 and 14 Vict. c. 54, sec. 1, 7 and 8 Vict. c. 15, sec. 21, and 19 and 20 Vict. c. 38, sec. 4—Contributory Negligence—Young Person.

3. A lad between seventeen and eighteen, while employed at night work in a factory, was injured by the belt of a teasing machine, at which he was working, slipping off the drum and catching his arm. The body of the machine was boxed in, but the belt and lower pulley were not fenced. In an action of damages by the lad against his employers, laid on breach of the Factory Acts, which forbid the employment of persons under eighteen at night work, or at unfenced machinery, the defences were (1) that the defenders had been induced by the pursuer's representations that he was above eighteen to engage him as an adult, and had paid him adult's wages; and (2) that the accident occurred through the pursuer's own fault. Held, after a proof, that the defenders had not used sufficient diligence to ascertain the pursuer's age before they employed him at night work; that the machine was not duly fenced in terms of the statutes; and that the defenders had failed to prove contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer, and accordingly that the defenders, having been guilty of a double breach of the Factory Acts, were liable to the pursuer in damages.

Question, how far misrepresentation of his age by the pursuer, or contributory negligence on his part, would have barred his claim, had they been proved. Gibb v. Crombie, July 6, 1875, p. 886.

Culpa—Insufficiency of Building—Landlord and Tenant.

4. The tenant of a store employed a carrier with a horse and cart to remove goods. The horse was killed by the fall of the building.

In an action of damages at the instance of the carrier against the tenant and the owner of the building, after proof, held that the tenant was liable to the pursuer, in respect that the accident had been caused by his fault in overloading the store, and in not warning the pursuer of the insecurity of the building and danger which had been apparent for some days, but reserving to the tenant any claim of relief he might have against the landlord. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock Sacking Co. and Others, May 13, 1875, p. 671.

Breach of Contract—Specific Damage.

5. An iron company sold iron pipes to the owner of a cotton mill to be used in the mill, but failed to deliver them timeously. In an action of damages the millowners failed to prove specific pecuniary damage, but proved that they were put to trouble and inconvenience before they could obtain fulfilment of the contract. Held that they were entitled to moderate damages for the trouble and inconvenience.

Observed (per the Lord President) that where a breach of contract is proved, even in respect of time, an award of damages must follow; that if no inconvenience has been suffered the damages will be nominal; but that if trouble and inconvenience have been caused, though no specific damage is proved, the damages will be substantial. Webster and Company v. Cramond Iron Company, June 4, 1875, p. 752.

Slander—Literary Criticism—Innuendo—Excess of Damages.

6. An atlas was published, entitled "The Edinburgh Educational Atlas of Modern Geography, with complete index, by W. & A. K. Johnston" (being the firm under which the publisher carried on business). A review of the atlas appeared in a journal, which, after adverting to Dr Livingstone's high opinion of the geographical acumen of A. Keith Johnston, a deceased member of the firm, and of his son who bore the same name, proceeded,—"The atlas now before us, though bearing the name of A. Keith Johnston, is the work of neither the primus nor the secundus of that name, for the son is no longer connected with the house established by his late father, ... and not merely from the present work, but from others which have lately come to our notice, we regret to observe unmistakeable signs of the absence of that true geographical acumen which Livingstone so justly lauded." The review then went into a severe criticism of the atlas in detail.

The publisher of the atlas brought an action of damages against the proprietor of the journal for slander, and averred that the article represented that he (the pursuer) had falsely, and for the purpose of deceiving the public, issued, as the work of A. Keith Johnston, an atlas which was not the work of either the first or the second of that name, but of persons not skilled in making an atlas. An issue was adjusted and sent to a jury, who found for the pursuer, with £1275 of damages.

On a motion for a new trial, on the grounds (1) that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and (2) that the damages were excessive, the Court refused to disturb the verdict on the first ground, holding that the innuendo was sufficiently supported by evidence to make it not unreasonable for the jury to find for the pursuer, but intimated that, unless the pursuer accepted £100, they would grant a new trial on the ground of excess of damages. The pursuer having consented to take £100, a new trial was refused.

Observed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk), that if the critic, instead of stating as a matter of fact that the atlas was not the work of either the father or the son, and making that statement of fact the explanation of the inaccuracies which were found in it, had said that, looking to the abounding errors in the atlas, it could not be the work of these experienced men, the innuendo could not have been maintained. Johnston v. Dilke, &c., June 16, 1875, p. 836.

Slander—Privilege—Illegal Retention of Offices.

7. A communication by the principal of a college to the patron of a professorial chair therein to the effect that the appointment of one of the candidates would be injurious to the interests of the university, is privileged.

S, Professor of Humanity in the United College of St Andrews, having been appointed to the office of principal of the college, intimated to the patron of the chair of Humanity his intention of resigning that chair at the end of the current session. The patron wrote to A, one of the candidates for the chair, intimating that he had "great pleasure in determining at once to appoint him to the chair," and requesting him to communicate with his (the patron's) agent "when the proper time arrived for completing the appointment." Thereupon S wrote a letter of remonstrance to the patron, stating that A had notoriously failed as a classical master, and that his appointment would be a heavy blow to the prosperity of the college, and concluding with a request to the patron, if it was still possible, to reconsider his resolution. S, at the request of a large majority of his colleagues, continued to retain the chair, along with the principalship, until A's death, a period of two years. The patron took no steps towards filling the chair by issuing a presentation in favour of A or any one else, and remained entirely neutral. After A's death, his widow and executrix raised an action of damages against S, founded on the defender's having illegally, as she maintained, retained the chair of Humanity after he had been appointed principal, and so prevented A from being presented to the chair, and also upon the slander of her husband alleged to be contained in the letter above mentioned. Held, after a proof before answer, (1) that A had no legal nor enforceable right to the chair of Humanity, but merely an expectation of being appointed, and therefore neither he nor his representative could found upon the alleged illegality of the retention of the chair by S as a ground of damage, (2) that the communication to the patron respecting A's qualifications was privileged, and that malice had not been proved. Auld v. Shairp, July 14, 1875, p. 940.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander—Witness—Privilege.

8. In an action against a medical man for alleged wrongful granting of a certificate that the pursuer was insane the defender was examined as a witness for the pursuer. Held that the privilege of a witness under such circumstances was absolute, and that an action of damages for slander, founded on what the defender stated in evidence, could not be made relevant by any allegation of malice. Mackintosh v. Weir, July 3, 1875, p. 877.

See Carrier—Contract, 3—Issue—Railway, 4, 5, 6, 7—Res Judicata, 2—Sale—Ship, 3, 4—Title to Sue.

RES JUDICATA.

1. Observations on the cases in which a judgment against the pursuer in an action will be available to support a plea of res judicata against him. Earl of Perth v. Lady Willoughby de Eresby's Trustees, March 9, 1875, p. 538.

Reparation—Lunatic.

2. A person who had been confined in a lunatic asylum raised an action of damages against, inter alios, the medical men who granted the certificate on which the warrant for his confinement proceeded. Upon an issue "whether . . . the defenders did wrongfully and without due inquiry and examination grant the certificate, . . . the pursuer not being then insane, nor in such a state of mental derangement as to require confinement in a lunatic asylum, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer," the jury found that the pursuer was insane at the date in question, and that he was justifiably sent to and confined in an asylum. The verdict was applied, and the defenders assoilzied.

The pursuer subsequently raised an action against one of the medical men, founded on the granting of the certificate, and concluding for damages for slander. Held that the action was excluded exceptione rei judicatæ, in respect that the pursuer was attempting to try over again the question which had been decided in the former action, viz., whether or not the certificate was justifiably granted, and that the general claim of damages made and decided upon in the former action included a claim for reparation for injury to character concluded for in the present action. Mackintosh v. Weir, July 3, 1875, p. 877.

RETENTION. See Contract, 2, 3—Railway, 3—Ship, 5.

REVENUE. Succession-Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51), secs. 15, 34, 38.

1. An heir of entail in possession, with consent of the next three heirs, obtained authority to charge, and charged, the estate with debt, the next heir receiving, in consideration of his consent, from the heir in possession, a sum of money and a personal bond of annuity payable during their joint lives. In a question between the next heir and the Crown as to succession-duties, held (1) that the incumbrance was not an incumbrance created or incurred by the next heir in the sense of sec. 34 of the Succession-Duty Act; and (2) that the transaction was not an alienation of the succession, or an acceleration of the next heir's title in the sense of sec. 15,—and, therefore, that, in estimating the succession, the next heir was entitled to allowance for the incumbrance; but (3) that he was not entitled, under sec. 38, to allowance for the lapse of the annuity Lord Advocate v. Earl of Glasgow, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 317.

REVENUE—Continued.

Income-Tax—5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, sec. 103.

2. A husband directed his trustees to pay to his wife, if she survived him, "a free yearly annuity" of £1200, and he further provided that if she accepted this annuity it should be in full satisfaction of all her rights, legal and conventional. The wife survived, and accepted the annuity. Held that it was unnecessary to decide whether the bequest of a free annuity was equivalent to the bequest of an annuity free of income-tax, as, if it were, the widow by accepting the annuity as in full of her legal rights, had entered into an agreement of the nature struck at by the Act 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, sec. 103. Rodger's Trustees v. Rodger, June 9, 1875, p. 294.
3. A testator left to his widow an annuity "free from all burdens, taxes, and deductions whatsoever," and declared it to be in full of all her legal rights. Held that she was entitled to the annuity without deduction of income-tax, and that the bequest was not struck at by the 103d section of the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842. Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, &c., Jan. 15, 1875, p. 312.

Income-Tax—5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100, rule 3, and sec. 159.

4. Held that in computing profits for assessment of income-tax a tenant of minerals is not entitled to make deduction from the gross receipts of sums necessary to replace capital expended in sinking pits, or lost by depreciation of buildings and machinery, in respect that the Act expressly provides that "in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from . . . such profits or gains on account of any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade." Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Feb. 16, 1875, p. 431.

Income-Tax—Assessment.

5. The Glasgow Water Commissioners were appointed under a local Act of Parliament, by which they were authorised to borrow money on annuities and mortgages, and to acquire the works of certain private water companies which had formerly supplied the city with water, and to bring in an additional supply of water. They were empowered to levy a compulsory rate within the municipal boundary, and also a rate on persons who chose to take the water outside the boundary, and to sell the water to manufacturers and others. The Act required the commissioners to levy a rate sufficient along with the other income to cover all annual expenses, including a sum of not less than one per cent on the money borrowed, to be accumulated as a sinking fund for redemption of the annuities and mortgages, and to be applied to no other purpose, any balance to be applied to reduce the rate of the following year. Held that the surplus after paying expenses was not assessable as profits under the Income-tax Acts. Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue, May 26, 1875, p. 708.

Income-Tax, liability to be Assessed for—Master Mariner—Property-Tax Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 1, schedule (D), and sec 39.

6. Held that the master of a merchant vessel trading between Glasgow, the Mediterranean, and New York, who was absent from the country for more than nine months in the year, and was only resident in it during the remainder for short periods of two or three weeks at a time, but whose wife and family resided in Glasgow in a house of which he was tenant, and in which he resided when on shore, was resident in Great Britain in the sense of the Property-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, and was liable to be assessed for income-tax on his salary as master. Young v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, July 10, 1875, p. 925.

Inhabited House-Duties—48 Geo. III. c. 55—57 Geo. III. cap. 25, sec. 1—5 Geo. IV. cap. 44, sec. 4—32 and 33 Vict. cap. 14, sec. 11.

7. Held that the 11th section of the Act 32 and 33 Vict. c. 14, by which it is enacted that any house "occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only, or as a warehouse for the sole purpose of lodging goods, wares, or merchandise therein, or as a shop or counting-house, or being used as a shop or counting-house, shall be exempt from inhabited house-duties, although a servant or other person may dwell in such tenement or part of a tenement for protection thereof," did not apply to houses used as insurance offices with resident servants. Edinburgh Life Assurance Company v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue—Scottish Widows' Fund v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Feb. 2, 1875, p. 394.

REVENUE—Continued.

REVOCATION. See Husband and Wife, 4.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. See Agent and Principal, 4—Assignation—Poinding the Ground—Recompense.

ROAD. Public Right of Way.
In an action brought for declarator of freedom from public right of way by the proprietor of the solum of a through-going close in a town it was proved that the close had been originally formed by the proprietor on his own ground for the use of his tenants, and that a door had been placed at one end of it; it was also proved that the close had been used as a thoroughfare by the public for the prescriptive period, but that frequently, and particularly at night, the door had been locked by the proprietor so as to exclude strangers. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Shand, diss. Lords Ormidale and Gifford) that the acts of possession on the part of the proprietor in shutting up the passage were sufficient to prevent the public from acquiring a right of way. Wallace v. Police Commissioners of Dundee, March 9, 1875, p. 565.

SALE. Bona fides—Reduction.
1. In an action brought to reduce the title of a purchaser of heritage at the instance of a prior purchaser from the same seller, held that it was not necessary for the pursuer to prove fraud on the part of the second purchaser, but only such knowledge as ought to have put him on his inquiry. Petrie v. Forsyth and Another, Dec. 16, 1874, p. 214.

Breach of Contract—Reparation.
2. A father and son raised an action of damages for breach of a contract of sale. They averred that the defender had verbally agreed to purchase the stock in trade and good-will of a baking business carried on by the father at a price to be fixed by valuation, and the property of the shop, belonging to the son, at the price of £450. That in consequence of this verbal contract the father had dismissed his apprentices, and made arrangements for retiring from business, and that by the defender refusing to implement the contract the pursuers had suffered loss. Held (1) that, in so far as the contract related to the sale of heritage, it could not be proved by parole, even to the effect of sustaining a claim of damages for non-implement; and (2) on a consideration of the record, that there was no relevant averment of a contract for the sale of the good-will of the business and moveables apart from the heritage. Allan v. Gilchrist, March 10, 1875, p. 587.

Horse—Warranty—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 5.
3. To establish an express oral warranty of goods sold it is necessary to prove the very words used. Robeson v. Waugh, Oct. 30, 1874, p. 63.
4. In an action for payment of the price of a horse the defender disputed liability, on the ground that the pursuer had represented the horse to be sound while he knew it to be unsound, and that the defender had rejected it on the day after the sale. Held that, although it was proved that the horse was unsound at the date of the sale, the sale was valid, in respect that it was not proved that the seller either warranted it to be sound or knew of the unsoundness. Robeson v. Waugh, Oct. 30, 1874, p. 63.

Express Warranty—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856.
5. Observed (per Lord President), that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act requires warranty to be express, and to prove an express warranty it is not enough for witnesses to say that the goods were warranted. They must specify the terms in which the warranty was granted. Mackie v. Riddell, Nov. 20, 1874, p. 115.

SALE—Continued.

Horse—Warranty—Statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60 (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856), sec. 5.

6. A horse, which was sold by auction, was described in the auctioneer's catalogue, by the seller's instructions, as having "been driven regularly in double and single harness." In an action for the price, after a proof, which was held to establish that the horse was not fit to be so driven, and that the seller was aware of its unfitness, held that the seller was not entitled to recover, in respect (1) of the implied warrandice at common law (the first branch of sec. 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act not being applicable, as the seller was not without knowledge of the defect); and (2) of the implied warrandice under the second branch of sec. 5 of the Act, the horse having been sold as fit for a particular purpose. Rough v. Moir and Son, &c., March 5, 1875, p. 529.

Timeous Rejection.

7. A firm of engineers contracted to make and deliver a machine consisting mainly of two heavy pieces of cast iron, "the whole to be of the best description, and warranted." The two parts of the machine were transmitted to a railway station—the place of delivery—on 7th February. On 17th February the purchaser, after removing one of the pieces, discovered serious defects in it, and at once intimated rejection to the sellers. On 28th February an agreement was entered into between the purchaser and the sellers that the purchaser should then take delivery of the machine and pay the price, the sellers undertaking to pay half the expense of replacing the defective portion of the machine if it should break within twelve months. Five days afterwards the purchaser removed from the railway station the remaining portion of the machine, and on the same day intimated that he had discovered defects in this part also. Held that the purchaser was precluded by the agreement from rejecting the machine for defects which he might have discovered by examination before the date of the agreement. Smith Brothers and Co. v. Scott, March 17, 1875, p. 601.

Ship.

8. A seagoing steamship lying at Glasgow, ready to sail, was sold by missive, "with all belonging to her on board and on shore." Held that a chronometer, previously used in the vessel, which was in the hands of an optician on shore for the purpose of regulation at the date of the sale, was included in the sale, a chronometer being a necessary instrument of navigation, and there being no local or general usage of trade to lead to a different construction of the missive. Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co., Jan. 19, 1875, p. 339.

Fixtures—Personal Objection.

9. In a question between a purchaser of lands and a person who was entitled to the income of a trust-estate, of which the lands formed part, and who had taken an active part in the sale, held that the latter was not entitled to remove wire fencing which he had put up at his own expense, when in occupation of the mansion-house by permission of the trustees, no notice having been given to the purchaser before the sale was completed that the fencing was not to go with the estate. Graham v. Lamont, Feb. 18, 1875, p. 438.

See Agent and Client—Bankruptcy, 2.

SCHOOL. Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62) sec. 60—Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107), sec. 19.

1. The Parochial and Burgh Schools Act, 1861, sec. 19, provides that when it shall be found that "the schoolmaster of any parish is disqualified because of infirmity or old age for the due performance of the duties of his office, or that from negligence or inattention he has failed efficiently to discharge such duties, it shall be lawful to the heritors and minister . . . . to permit or require such schoolmaster to resign his said office,

SCHOOL—Continued.

. . . . and in every case of such resignation the heritors and minister may grant to such schoolmaster a retiring allowance . . . . provided that where such resignation shall not be occasioned by any fault on the part of the schoolmaster the heritors shall grant a retiring allowance."

The Education Act, 1872, sec. 60, empowers school boards to remove teachers if they are "incompetent, unfit, or inefficient," and provides that teachers, appointed previous to the passing of the Act, who may be so removed, shall have the same rights to retiring allowances as were vested in parish schoolmasters by the Act of 1861.

Held that, assuming that a teacher could only have claimed a retiring allowance under the Act of 1861, if removed in consequence of old age or infirmity, inasmuch as these were the only causes for which he could be removed without fault, he might, under the Act of 1872, be removed for other causes without fault, and might therefore be entitled to a retiring allowance although not removed for old age or infirmity. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board, Feb. 5, 1876, p. 417.

Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 60 —Process—Relevancy.

2. A parish schoolmaster, appointed before the Education Act, 1872, was removed by the school board, under sec. 60 of the Act, proceeding on a report by an inspector that there were no pupils in attendance at the school, and that the schoolmaster was unfit for the office of schoolmaster in that parish, and his application for a retiring allowance was refused without a reason being assigned. In an action against the board by the schoolmaster claiming a retiring allowance he averred that the scarcity of scholars was caused by decrease of population, by political feeling, and by sectarian rivalry, which led the inhabitants to support other schools. The Court remitted to the school board to specify the ground of their resolution to refuse the pursuer a retiring allowance, if they still adhered to it. The board adhered to their refusal, and specified as the ground of it the pursuer's inefficiency, caused by his extreme indolence, culpable neglect of duty, and general misconduct, "as proved by the complete absence of scholars, and substantiated by the evidence of the inhabitants of the district." Held that, in the face of this resolution, the pursuer's averments were not relevant, and defenders assoilzied, but without expenses, as they had not at first assigned any reason for refusing an allowance. Robb v. Logiealmond School Board, May 21, 1875, p. 698.

Schoolmaster—Retiring Allowance—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), secs. 60 and 55—Parochial and Burgh Schoolmasters (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 107), sec. 19.

3. In an action brought by a parish schoolmaster, appointed prior to the Education Act, 1872, against the school board of the parish, by whom he had been dismissed, for declarator that he was entitled to a retiring allowance, held that his claim was excluded by the resolution of the board dismissing him on the ground of fault, and that the judgment of the board finding fault proved was not subject to review in a Court of law. Morison v. Glenshiel School Board, May 28, 1875, p. 761.

School Board—Schoolmaster—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 23—Interdict—Sheriff.

4. A petition in the Sheriff-court by a school board against the teacher of a public school praying to have him interdicted "from preventing or excluding the said school board, or members thereof, under the authority of the board, from entering the school during school hours, whenever and so often as they may deem necessary in the discharge of their duties under the Act of Parliament (the Education Act, 1872), or in any other way obstructing the school board in effectually carrying out the visitations referred to," refused, on the ground that the right of visitation claimed was not clear on the face of the statute. Kelso School Board v. Hunter, Dec. 18, 1874, p. 228.

SCHOOL—Continued.

School Board, Powers of—Schoolmaster, Tenure of Office and Emoluments—The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 55.

5. A parochial school was divided into two departments—(1) A grammar school, in which the principal teacher or rector taught classical and modern languages and mathematics; and (2) an elementary school taught by an assistant.

In 1874 the school board of the parish resolved to unite the schools, and restricted the teaching of the higher branches previously taught in the grammar school to one hour daily.

In an action brought by the rector or schoolmaster, who had been appointed in 1858, for reduction of this resolution, and for damages, held that the school board were entitled to make this change, but without prejudice to any claim which the schoolmaster might afterwards be able to establish on the ground of diminished emoluments arising from the proceedings complained of. Hunter v. Kelso School Board, March 5, 1875, p. 520.

Schoolmaster—School Fees—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, secs. 48, 53, 55.

6. The school board of a parish having passed a resolution requiring the schoolmaster, who had been appointed prior to the Education Act, 1872, to collect monthly the school fees, which formed part of his emoluments, and to return a statement of the fees collected quarterly to the treasurer, the schoolmaster raised an action concluding for reduction of the resolution and for declarator that he was not bound to collect the fees, on the ground that by the 53d and 55th sections of the Act it was the duty of the board to collect the fees and pay them to the schoolmaster. Held that in accordance with the usage prior to the Act the duty of collecting the fees remained with the schoolmaster,—and the defenders assoilzied. Buchanan v. Tullialan School Board, June 11, 1875, p. 793.

School Board—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 23.

7. Where, prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the parish school of a parish partly landward, partly burghal, was situate within the burgh, held that, on separate school boards being elected for the landward district and the burgh, in virtue of the 23d section of that Act, the school became vested in the school board of the landward district, and not in that of the burgh. Selkirk Parish School Board v. Selkirk Burgh School Board, June 5, 1875, p. 761.

SEPARATION AND ALIMENT. See Husband and Wife.

SERVITUDE. Sheriff—Possessory Judgment.

In 1814 the proprietor of a village feu A acquired the adjoining feu B, and occupied both down to 1842. Prior to 1814 the access to the back court of each was by means of a passage within its own boundary. During the period from 1814 to 1842 the proprietor sometimes used the passage on B as a means of access to the back court of A. From 1842, when the properties again came to be possessed separately (A having been sold under a bond and disposition in security granted over it alone in 1831), down to 1863, the use of the passage on B as an access to the back court of A was continued and increased, and in 1863 the passage on A was shut up, and from that time till 1874 the passage on B was exclusively used as the access to the back courts of both properties.

In a Sheriff-court process of interdict at the instance of the proprietor of A against the proprietor of B, to prevent him obstructing this passage on B, held (1) that the claim of the proprietor of A was for a servitude right of way over the property of B; (2) that as it was competent for the Sheriff to entertain and decide on the merits of that claim, it was incompetent for him to decline to do so, and confine himself to a mere possessory judgment; (3) that the disposition of A in security in 1831 could not be construed as conferring by implication the right of servitude, the use of the passage on SERVITUDE—Continued.

B not being at that date essential to the convenient enjoyment of A; and (4) that there were no termini habiles on which prescription could be pleaded.

Observations on the case of Cochrane v. Ewart. Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, p. 729.

See Sheriff, 4.

SHERIFF. Abandonment of Action—A. S. 10th July 1839, sec. 61.

1. The pursuer of an action, after an interlocutor was pronounced disallowing proof by parole, obtained a diligence for the recovery of writings. He allowed it to expire without using it, and then presented a minute of abandonment of the action under A. S., 10th July 1839 (Sheriff-court Procedure), sec. 61. Held that he was entitled to abandon. Kermack v. Kermack, Nov. 27, 1874, p. 156.

Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment.

2. A married woman raised an action in the Sheriff-court against her husband for interim aliment until a permanent arrangements of the rights and interests of the parties should be made in a competent Court, on the ground that the pursuer was obliged to live separately on account of her husband's cruel conduct. It appeared from a proof that at the date of the action, and until a few days before the proof, the pursuer was living in her husband's house. Held that in the circumstances the action was incompetent in the Sheriff-court.

Observed (per Lord Deas), that in granting an interim allowance of aliment to a wife the Sheriff ought to fix a time at which the aliment should cease. M'Donald v. M'Donald, May 25, 1875, p. 705.

Servitude—Stat. 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, sec. 15—Possessory Judgment.

3. Where a proper right of servitude is claimed in a Sheriff-court action, as it is competent for the Sheriff to deal with the action on its merits, it is incompetent for him to decline to do so, and confine himself to a possessory judgment. Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, p. 729.

See Debts Recovery Act—Nuisance, 1—Process (Appeal)—School, 4—Servitude.

SHIP. Ship-Measurement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

1. A ship was constructed with an "awning" deck above the main deck, extending from forecastle to poop, with the exception of two gaps 13 feet 6 inches and 8 feet 6 inches broad across the vessel. The gaps were provided with doors in the ship's sides, and could be planked over, if required, so as to cover the vessel from stem to stern, but the doors were not capable of resisting the pressure of the sea, and the coverings of the gaps were not made water-tight. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) (1) that the vessel had not "a third deck, commonly called a spar deck," within the meaning of the provisions of sub-section 5 of section 21 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104); and (2) that the space between the awning deck and main deck was not "a permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," in terms of sub-section 4 of section 21 of the said Act. Lord Advocate v. Clyde Steam Navigation Co., March 11, 1875, H. L., p. 23.

Sale.

2. A seagoing steamship lying at Glasgow, ready to sail, was sold by missive, "with all belonging to her on board and on shore." Held that a chronometer previously used in the vessel, which was in the hands of an optician on shore for the purpose of regulation at the date of the sale, was included in the sale, a chronometer being a necessary instrument of navigation, and there being no local or general usage of trade to lead to a different construction of the missive. Armstrong and Co. v. M'Gregor and Co., Jan. 19, 1875, p. 339.

SHIP—Continued.

Collision—Reparation—Compulsory Pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 388.

3. To entitle the owners of a ship, under the charge of a licensed pilot, where such pilotage is compulsory, to the benefit of the provision of the statute which exempts them from liability when a collision has occurred by the fault of the pilot, it lies on them to prove that it was occasioned solely by the pilot, and that there was no contributory fault on the part of the ship or master or crew.

Circumstances in which held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the owners had discharged this onus. Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Barclay, Curle, and Co., June 18, 1875, p. 842.

Collision—Reparation—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 514, and Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 54.

4. It is competent for the owner of a vessel to present a petition to the Court under the 514th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, with a view to having his liability for damages ascertained or restricted, without admitting liability for such damages. Miller, &c. v. Powell, &c., July 20, 1875, p. 976.

Lien for Repairs—Possession.

5. A vessel was placed in a patent slip belonging to a firm of shipbuilders for repair. When certain outside repairs were completed she was removed by the shipbuilders, for their own convenience, into a public wet dock, into which the patent slip opened, and the repairs were there completed, the vessel being attached to pawls situated within the premises of the shipbuilders, and lying close to their slip. From time to time the vessel was moved for the convenience of those using the slip at the order of the harbour-master, but chiefly by the shipbuilders' men. During the whole time the master was present in the ship during the day, and at night a shipkeeper. Held (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the possession of the ship, and the resulting lien for the cost of repairs, which the shipbuilders had while it remained in their slip, did not cease when the vessel was removed by them to the public dock. Barr and Shearer v. Cooper, Feb. 26, 1875, H. L., p. 14.

See Agent and Principal, 2—Carrier.

STATUTES.

1690, c. 33. See Entail 1.
1696, c. 25. See Partnership, 3.
1705, c. 2. See Lord Chancellor in M'Douall v. Lord Advocate, H. L., p. 56.
Ballot Act, 1872, sec. 12. See Burgh.
Conveyancing Act, 1874. See Church, 1.
Factory Acts. See Reparation, 3.
General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 48 and 50. See Burgh.
Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 5. See Sale, 3, 4, 5, 6.
Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. See Ship.
Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, sec. 7. See Railway, 3.
Revenue Acts. See Revenue.
Truck Act, 1831. See Master and Servant.

SUCCESSION. Mortis Causa Conveyance—Titles to Land Act, 1868.

1. Held that, under the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, a mortis causa deed, in which the testator appointed trustees, empowered them to "realise all his heritable and moveable property," and directed them as to the disposal thereof, but which contained no words of direct conveyance or gift, was sufficient to carry the testator's heritable as well as his moveable estate.

Observed that the statute puts heritage precisely in the same position as moveables, when dealt with in a testamentary writing. M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod, Feb. 28, 1875, p. 481.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Testament—Implied Revocation.

2. Terms of a codicil which held to nominate residuary legatees in addition to and not in room of those appointed by a prior deed. Coxe v. Cox, Oct. 24, 1874, p. 41.

Legacy—Condition.

3. Held, upon the terms of testamentary writings, that a legacy given in substitution of a prior legacy was not intended to be subject to a condition attached to the former. Coxe v. Cox, Oct. 24, 1874, p. 41.

Testament—Implied Revocation.

4. A bequest of a share of residue to each of a testator's nephews and nieces nominatim held to supersede a residuary bequest to them as representing their father, contained in a prior writing. Coxe v. Cox, Oct. 24, 1874, p. 41.

Testament—Destination—Conditional Institute—Heirs and Assignees.

5. In the construction of a will left by a husband, held that a disposition of his whole means and estate in favour of his wife, and "her heirs and assignees whomsoever," was intended to be contingent on the wife's survivance, and that her heirs were not named as conditional institutes.

Opinion (per Lord President) that as a general rule, where there is a mortis causa disposition to a person, his heirs and assignees, failing the disponee, his heirs will take. Findlay v. Mackenzie, July 9, 1875, p. 909.

Testament.

6. A testator directed his testamentary trustees to divide his whole estate equally among his sons and daughters, with the proviso that, should his only unmarried daughter's "share of the division not amount to £150 per annum," the trustees were to "invest in good and safe security as much as will realise that amount," but gave no directions as to the disposal of the capital so invested. The daughter's share of the estate was not sufficient by itself to provide £150 a-year. Held that the additional sum which it was necessary to invest for this purpose belonged to the other children, from whose shares it had been taken, subject to the life interest of the daughter. Mackenzie's Trustees v. Mitchell, &c., Feb. 24, 1875, p. 469.

Testament—Legacy—Falsa Demonstratio.

7. By a holograph codicil a testator bequeathed to his son, "all the gas companies shares that were lately bought by me from Mrs T. Bruce's trustees for £300." There were no gas companies shares purchased by the testator for £300; but he had, about six months before the date of the codicil, purchased from Mrs Bruce's trustees, as one transaction, shares in various gas companies for £798, and some shares in a steelyard for £2. Held that the words "for £300" must be taken as mere falsa demonstratio, and were not used as taxative of the bequest, and consequently that the legatee was entitled to the whole gas shares (but not the steelyard shares), purchased by the testator from Mrs Bruce's trustees. Bruce's Trustees v. Bruce, June 7, 1875, p. 775.

Conditional Bequest—Condition in Restraint of Marriage.

8. A truster directed that a part of the profits of his business, which was to be carried on by his trustees after his death, should be paid to his daughters, "but in the event of any of my said daughters being married her share of said profits shall lapse and fall into the residue of my estate," in which all his children were to participate. Held that the bequest was intended as a provision for the truster's unmarried daughters so long as they remained unmarried, and that the limitation was not invalid as a condition in restraint of marriage, and that a daughter who was married at the date of the settlement had no interest in the bequest. Sturrock v. Rankin's Trustees, June 26, 1875, p. 850.

Surrogatum.

9. A husband qualified a provision of liferent of residue in favour of his widow with the condition that during her life she should give the rents of certain lands to which she had right to a son. The widow having elected to retain the rents and reject the provision, held that the son was entitled to a surrogatum for the rents out of the liferent of residue. Johnston v. Johnston, &c., July 20, 1875, p. 986.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Trust.

10. Where trustees are directed to hold a fund for behoof of children, and to divide and pay the same when it can be conveniently done, and it is declared that in the event of a child dying without issue before receiving his share under the trust the same shall be divided among the survivors, payment to one beneficiary of his share fixes the period of vesting for all. Sutherland's Trustees v. Clarkson, Oct. 29, 1874, p. 46.

Succession—Vesting—Trust.

11. A took the title to heritable subjects which he had purchased in the names of certain persons, who, by deed of declaration of trust, declared that they held subjects in trust, inter alia, for the payment of the free yearly proceeds to A during his life, and after his death to his wife, if she survived him, for their liferent uses allenarly, the wife's liferent to be restrictable to such extent and in such manner as might be fixed by A; and after the determination of the foresaid liferents, in trust for A's children, in such shares and proportions as might be fixed by A, and failing such apportionment, share and share alike; declaring that the fee of the shares should be payable after the determination of the said liferents, and after the whole children who should have survived A and his wife, and who should be alive, had attained majority, or at such other times after the determination of the said liferents as should be fixed by A. A died, survived by his wife, and without fixing the shares of the children. Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the children's shares of the estate vested at the execution and registration of the deed of declaration of trust in the children then born, and in the others as they came into existence. Miller v. Finlay's Trustees, Feb. 25, 1875, H. L., p. 1.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL.

1. Observations on the effect of the tenendas clause in explaining the dispositive clause. Lord Advocate v. M'Culloch, Oct. 29, 1874, p. 27.

Entry—Composition—Novodamus.

2. A vassal who held lands under old charters in favour of disponees, "their heirs and assignees," and by which the duties payable at entry of "heirs and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty, obtained in 1858 a charter of confirmation and novodamus. The clauses of confirmation and novodamus were in favour of the vassal, "his heirs and assignees whomsoever, excluding assignees before infeftment." The duties payable at the entry of "heir and assignees" were taxed at double the feu-duty.

In an action of declarator of non-entry brought by the superior, held (1) that the taxing clause in the earlier charters must be read as applicable only to assignees before infeftment, and not as applicable to disponees; and (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Young), that the taxing clause must receive the same construction in the charter of novodamus, in respect that it did not appear that the terms of the entry were intended to be altered. Magistrates of Inverkeithing v. Ross, Oct. 30, 1874, p. 48.

Irritancy ob non solutum canonem—Railway—Compensation—Property—Lands Clauses Act (8 Vict. c. 19)—Railway Clauses Act (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33)—Bankruptcy—Trustee—Real and Personal—Assignation.

3. The proprietor of a piece of land bounded by the sea flood brought a statutory claim of compensation against a railway company on the ground that the land, which had been used for shipbuilding, had been injuriously affected by the formation of the railway upon the shore, whereby access to the sea was cut off. When the railway was formed the land belonged to a vassal of the claimant, paying a feu-duty of £150, who had been sequestrated. The trustee in the vassal's sequestration did not take up the feu, and the superior subsequently obtained decree of irritancy of the feu ob non solutum canonem. The trustee, on condition that the superior made no claim for feu-duties, assigned to the superior any claim of compensation competent to him. Held that the proprietor had no title to insist in the claim (1) in virtue of the decree of irritancy, because the claim of damages, if any, was personal to the vassal, and was vested in the trustee, or (2) in virtue of the assignation, as the trustee had no power to grant it.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Question, whether a claim for compensation on account of the value of land being injuriously affected by the operations of a railway cutting off its access from the sea was competent under the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Acts, either to the proprietor of the dominium utile, or to the superior for his interest. Caledonian Railway Company v. Watt, July 9, 1875, p. 917.

See Property, 1.

SUSPENSION. See Bankruptcy, 1—Bill, 1, 3, 4, and Index of Justiciary Cases, p. 1057.

TEINDS. Augmentation—Decimæ Inclusæ.

1. In a process of augmentation wherein the heritors opposed the augmentation, on the ground that the teinds were exhausted, process sisted to enable the minister to bring a declarator to try the validity of a decimæ inclusæ right founded on by the heritors, it not being clear upon the face of the documents produced whether the right was well founded or not.

Observed that the Court will adopt the same procedure, as a general rule, in cases where the existence of teind, available for augmentation, is denied by the heritors upon grounds which require investigation. Frood v. Earl of Stair, &c., Nov. 9, 1874, p. 76.

Valuation—Proof—Onus.

2. A decree of valuation dated in 1634 bore to value the teinds of the lands of A, with the exception of a certain ten shilling land, which through lapse of time it had become impossible to identify.

In a locality in 1874 the proprietor of a portion of the lands of A founded upon the valuation as embracing his lands. Held, in the absence of evidence as to the situation of the ten shilling land, that in the first instance the onus lay upon the minister to shew that the heritor's lands fell within the exception, but that in the circumstances that onus had been discharged. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others, Dec. 12, 1874, p. 174.

Teinds, Valuation of.

3. A decree of valuation in 1634 bore to value the teinds of certain lands belonging to a burgh, which had hitherto been paid in rental bolls. Held that there was no presumption that the teinds of the burgh green, which formed part of the lands, and which, though capable of cultivation, was presumably in pasture at the date of the valuation, had not been included in the conversion into rental bolls, and were not therefore included in the valuation. Stevenson v. Magistrates of Rutherglen and Others, Dec. 12, 1874, p. 174.

Sub-valuation—Approbation.

4. In an action brought in the Teind Court in 1874 for approbation of a report of sub-commissioners dated in 1629, valuing the teinds of certain lands, which merely reported that all parties being summoned and called there compeared the heritor, "and is cõtent that the auld rentall of the said lands of . . . stand in tyme cuming as it is and hes bein, to wit, xij bolls meill, baith for p'sonage and viccarage teynds in cais the titular be yr^{wt} cõtentit." Objection to the report, to the effect that the sub-commissioners had not pronounced any direct finding as to the value of the teinds of the lands, repelled, and decree of approbation pronounced. Duke of Montrose v. Earl of Camperdown, &c., June 7, 1875, p. 772.

King's Annuity—Warrandice.

5. In 1632 the teinds of certain lands were sold by the titular to the heritor for a price, the heritor becoming bound to relieve the titular of the king's annuity of six per cent, and of all taxations to be imposed on the teinds, and of the stipend then payable,—the titular becoming bound to warrant the teinds free from all future augmentations. In 1644 the heritor redeemed the king's annuity, and about 1674 these annuities were relinquished by the Crown throughout the country. In 1812 the whole teinds were exhausted by augmentations, including the portion which, in 1632, was payable as king's annuity. Held that the warrandice extended to the whole teinds, including the portion which, in 1632, was payable as king's annuity. Murray v. Countess of Rothes, Nov. 19, 1874, p. 106.

TEINDS—Continued.

TITLE TO SUE. Reparation—Slander—Executor.

A widow, two years after her husband's death, raised an action of damages as his executrix and as an individual, alleging that the defender, by illegally retaining a professorship in a college after his appointment to the office of principal, and by slanderous statements concerning the deceased, had prevented the patron of the professorship from implementing a written promise to appoint the deceased to the chair. Held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the pursuer had set forth a title to sue.

Observations on the maxim of the civil law, Actio personalis moritur cum persona. Auld v. Shairp, Dec. 16, 1874, p. 191.

See Friendly Society—Insanity, 1.

TRUCK ACT. See Master and Servant.

TRUST. Proof—Statute 1696, c. 25—Partnership.

1. Held (dub. Lord Gifford) that it was competent to prove prout de jure that the right to a policy of insurance, taken in name of the partner of a company, belonged to the company. Forrester &c. v. Robson's Trustees, June 5, 1875, p. 755.

Powers of Trustees—Nobile Officium.

2. Held that a petition (not under the Trusts Act) by testamentary trustees for powers not given by the trust-deed was incompetent. Berwick, &c., Nov. 13, 1874, p. 90.

Apportionment—Insanity of Trustee—Exercise of Power.

3. The sole trustee under a settlement was directed to hold a sum for behoof of a family of children, and was invested with the amplest discretionary powers as to the proportions in which the sum should be paid, and the times and manner of payment. The trustee, after making unequal payments to the beneficiaries to account of their shares, became hopelessly insane. She had previously assumed a co-trustee, who after her insanity assumed another trustee under the Trusts Act, 1867. Held that a valid bequest had been made to the children as a class, and that the powers conferred upon the trustee were a burden on that bequest; that since these powers could not be exercised by the trustee named in the settlement, the effect was not that the powers were transferred to the assumed trustees, but that the burden flew off, and the bequest to the children as a class became unqualified, and accordingly that the fund fell to be divided in such proportions as, when added to the payments to account previously made, would produce equality among the beneficiaries. Hill's Trustees v. Thomson, Oct. 30, 1874, p. 68.

Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 14.

4. The Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 14, enacts that "when any person shall be entitled to the possession for his own absolute use of any heritable property, or moveable or personal property, the title to which has been taken in the name of any trustee . . . . or other person who has died or become incapable of acting without having executed a conveyance of such property, it shall be lawful for the person beneficially entitled to such property to apply by petition to the Court for authority to complete a title to such property in his own name, &c.

Held that the above enactment does not apply to the assignee of a beneficiary. Macknight, March 20, 1875, p. 667.

TRUST—Continued.

Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867—Appointment of New Trustees.

5. The Court will not appoint new trustees under an English trust, even where part of the trust-estate consists of heritable property in Scotland. Brockie, July 10, 1875, p. 923.

Trust, Administration of—Remuneration to Trustee.

6. Held that the trustees of a deceased partner, who had become entitled, under the contract of copartnery, to his share in the business, could not transact with the surviving partner, who was also one of the trustees, to the effect of giving him a larger share of profit than he formerly had, with a view of securing the continuance of his services as managing partner, on the ground that he was himself one of their number, and could not, as trustee, be auctor in rem suam. Mackie's Trustees v. Mackie, Jan. 15, 1875, p. 312.

Expenses—Trustee.

7. It is a question of circumstances whether testamentary trustees who have unsuccessfully defended the trust-deed in an action of reduction will be allowed their expenses out of the estate. Watson v. Watson's Trustees, Jan. 20, 1875, p. 344.

Trustee—Power to resign—24 and 25 Vict. c. 84; 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97 (Trusts Acts, 1861 and 1867).

8. A marriage-contract executed prior to the Trusts Act of 1861 provided that if any trustee desired to resign it should be in the power of the other trustees to discharge him. The whole trustees being desirous to resign, presented a petition, founding on the Trusts Act, 1867, for the appointment of a judicial factor and for authority to resign. It was opposed by the beneficiaries. Held that the trustees had power to resign under the Trusts Acts, 1861 and 1867, and that the power was not excluded by the terms of the marriage-contract, and a judicial factor appointed. Maxwell's Trustees v. Maxwell, Nov, 4, 1874, p. 71.

Marriage-Contract Provision.

9. Held that a trust-conveyance by a wife in an antenuptial contract of marriage had been intended to secure her a liferent as a provision in the event of her surviving her husband; and that it was in its nature irrevocable by the wife, although not expressly declared to be so. Menzies v. Murray, March 5, 1875, p. 507.

See Entail, 5—Succession.

TUTOR. Tutor incertus dari non potest.

A father conferred on the trustees under his trust-disposition and settlement a power to assume new trustees, and appointed his trustees "named or to be named or assumed, and the survivors and survivor of them," tutors to his pupil children. Held that the appointment of assumed trustees as tutors was invalid. Walker v. Stronach, Nov. 21, 1874, p. 120.

VIS MAJOR. See Contract, 1.

WARRANTY. See Sale.

WRIT. Testing-Clause—Writer's Name—Statutes 1593, cap. 179, and 1681, cap. 5.

1. In an offer to sell heritable subjects, which was not holograph, the writer was mentioned in the body of the writing as "Mr John Smith, who will prepare the disposition," and was only designed in the testing-clause as "the said John Smith." Held that the writer of the offer was not duly designed, and that the offer was therefore improbative, although in the acceptance, which was written on the same paper as the offer, allusion was made to "the said John Smith as agent for both parties." Mitchell v. Scott's Trustees, Dec. 4, 1874, p. 162.

Attested Deeds—Witnesses—Statutes 1593, c. 179, and 1681, c. 5.

2. Held that the Act 1681, c. 5, did not require the insertion in the testing-clause of probative deeds of the names of the subscribing witnesses, but only of such a designation as, along with their subscriptions, was sufficient for identification. M'Dougall v. M'Dougall, June 15, 1875, p. 814.

WRIT—Continued.

Testing-Clause.

3. In a case in which a testator, who died in March 1874, had left a codicil with a defective testing-clause, which had been supplemented after his death, held that the deed was probative. Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees, June 2, 1875, p. 748.

Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), secs. 38 and 39.

4. Question, how far the provisions of secs. 38 and 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, as to the authentication of deeds, have a retrospective effect. Veasey v. Malcolm's Trustees, June 2, 1875, p. 748.

Attestation—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, sec. 39).

5. A person died leaving a trust-disposition bearing to be subscribed by himself and attested by two witnesses, but without a testing-clause. His representatives presented a petition under sec. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, craving a proof, and thereafter to have it declared that the deed was subscribed by the granter and witnesses. The Court allowed a proof by commission, and thereafter found and declared as craved. Addison, &c. Feb. 23, 1875, p. 457.

CASES DECIDED IN THE REGISTRATION APPEAL COURT.

DEFEASIBLE TITLE. Schoolmaster.

When the master of a parochial side school occupies a schoolhouse and garden in virtue of his office his title to these subjects is not so defeasible as to prevent his being on the register of voters. Wardrop v. Cockburn, Nov. 3, 1874, p. 6.

OBJECTION. Notice.

A claim to be enrolled on the roll of county voters having been objected to on the ground that the claimant's title was nominal and fictitious, held that it was no sufficient ground for rejecting the claim that the claimant, who had not been cited by the objector, did not appear personally, although a claim on the same qualification had been rejected in the previous year on his failure to appear when cited. Rutherford v. Riddell, Nov. 2, 1874, p. 4.

OWNER. Building Society.

1. Held, in accordance with the case of Bishop v. Dove, Dec. 19, 1868, that a member of a building society was not entitled to be placed on the roll of voters as owner of a house allotted to him by an entry in the society's books. Dalglish v. Wright, Nov. 3, 1874, p. 5.

Title.

2. A purchaser of subjects, who has not obtained a disposition to the same till after 31st January of the current year is not entitled to the county franchise in respect thereof, unless he has, before that date, entered into a written contract of sale sufficient to bind both parties. Dalglish v. Wright, Nov. 3, 1874, p. 5.

POOR-RATES.

Held that the poor-rates, which, under sections 3 and 6 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, it is necessary that an inhabitant occupier should have paid before the 20th June of the qualifying year, are only the rates which have become payable by him during the year ending with the preceding 15th of May. Hewat v. Henderson, Nov. 9, 1874, p. 12.

POOR-RATES—Continued.

TENANT AND OCCUPANT. Sub-letting—Demitting Possession.
1. Where the tenant of a house let it furnished for three months in the year, ceding possession to the sub-tenant, but leaving his servant in the house, whose wages he paid, held that he had ceased to retain such occupancy of the house as to entitle him to a vote. Kirkwood v. M'Callum, Nov. 2, 1874, p. 1.

Husband and Wife.
2. Held that a husband's occupation of a house of which his wife was tenant could not give him a qualification as tenant. M'Queen v. Dunn, Nov. 2, 1874, p. 3.

Salmon-fishings.
3. Held that occupancy of salmon-fishings under a lease for twelve months prior to 31st July was a good title to the franchise, notwithstanding the annual close time.
Question as to the effect of a lease granting the privilege of rod-fishing merely. Dunn v. Cotesworth, Nov. 2, 1874, p. 5.

Successive Occupancy.
4. A person left a house at Whitsunday and took another in the same burgh in the beginning of June, and in the interval lodged at an inn. Objection that his occupation of a dwelling-house had not been continuous sustained. Adair v. Kay, Nov. 9, 1874, p. 9.

Objection to Title of Granter of Lease.
5. Objection to a person claiming to be enrolled as tenant and occupant of subjects that the granter of the lease under which he held had several years before granting the lease executed a disposition omnium bonorum for behoof of creditors, and had not been retrocessed, repelled. Douglas v. Adair, Nov. 9, 1874, p. 10.

Dwelling-House.
6. A man who took his meals in his father's house, and generally slept there, rented a small room in the same tenement at 12s. per annum, in respect of which he was separately rated for the relief of the poor, and in which he occasionally slept. Held that he was not entitled to the burgh franchise as tenant and occupier of the room. Adair v. Murray, Nov. 9, 1874, p. 11.

CASES DECIDED IN THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

APPEAL. Competency of Appeal to Court of Justiciary—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 96.
An action was brought under the Debts Recovery Act for a sum under £25, which the Sheriff dismissed as incompetent, in respect that the debt sued for did not fall under the Act. Held that an appeal to the Court of Justiciary was competent. Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe, Nov. 26, 1874, p. 7.
See Public House, 1.

CONVICTION. Conviction Void from Uncertainty—Statute 21 and 22 Vict. c. 90.
Where a complaint charged the accused with a contravention of the Medical Act, 1858, sec. 40, in so far as he did "wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon or apothecary, or other name, title, or description, implying that he is registered under said Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecery," held that a conviction proceeding thereon, bearing merely that the accused was convicted "of the offence charged," was invalid, in respect that it did not specify the act by which the statute was held to have been contravened. De Banzie v. Peebles, March 16, 1875, p. 22.

CONVICTION—Continued.

DEBTS RECOVERY ACT, 1867. Merchants Accounts—Triennial Prescription.

Held that the expression "merchants accounts" in the debts Recovery Act, 1867, was not limited to such accounts as would fall under the triennial prescription. Sandys v. Lowden and Rowe, Nov. 26, 1874, p. 7.

INDICTMENT. Relevancy of Libel.

1. In support of a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, the libel set forth that the accused had wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, caused a cheque drawn by him upon the branch of the Bank of Scotland at Annan to be presented and cashed at the head office of the bank in Edinburgh, he well knowing that he had no money in the bank at Annan. Held that the libel was not relevant, in respect that the facts averred did not necessarily infer the crime charged. Rae v. Linton, Dec. 11, 1874, p. 7.

Trial—Declaration.

2. Question, whether it is competent to proceed to trial against a prisoner on an indictment containing charges on which a declaration has not been taken from him. Keith v. Lord Advocate, June 4, 1875, p. 27.

JURISDICTION. Police Magistrate—Competency—Statutes 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. lx., and 12 and 13 Vict. c. lxxxix. (Airdrie Police Acts, 1821 and 1849).

The Airdrie Police Act, 1821, declared certain acts to be offences, and provided that the provost and magistrates, or a certain number of them, which was specified in reference to each particular offence, should be the tribunal for trying such offences. An amending Act, passed in 1849, created a new magistracy, and conferred upon them the jurisdiction in offences under the original Act. The interpretation clause bore that "the word 'magistrate' or 'magistrates' shall include the provost and bailies, or any one or more of them."

Held that one magistrate sitting under the amending Act could exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon the magistrates or any two of them in relation to an offence under the original Act. Paterson v. Rose, March 12, 1875, p. 20.

LIBERATION. Undue Detention on Warrant of Commitment—Statute 1701, c. 6—Running Letters.

A prisoner apprehended on the 18th and committed to prison on 24th September 1874 on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, was indicted for the Glasgow winter circuit and again for the Glasgow spring circuit ensuing, but on the one occasion the counsel for the Crown deserted the diet, and on the other did not call the case, the Court refusing a motion by the pursuer's counsel to direct the diet to be called. On 29th January 1875 he obtained a warrant for letters of intimation with a view of running letters, but failing to pay the fees the letters were not issued. On 13th May, having been continuously in prison since his first apprehension, he presented a petition for liberation to the High Court of Justiciary. The Court, on 4th June, refused the petition, in respect that a fresh indictment had been served on the prisoner for trial before the High Court on the 14th of that month, and that the public prosecutor had intimated that he was prepared to proceed to trial on that day.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that it was competent for the Court to entertain a petition for liberation at common law, notwithstanding the terms of the Act 1701, c. 6. Keith v. Lord Advocate, June 4, 1875, p. 27.

LIBERATION—Continued.

OPPRESSION. See Proof—Suspension, 1, 3.

PROOF. Discretion—Oppression.
A person was charged before a burgh police magistrate under the adulteration Act, 1860, with selling, as pure and unadulterated, milk which was not so. There being no public analyst in the burgh, some of the milk had been sent by the police officials to an analytical chemist, who reported unfavourably. Held that it was within the discretion of the magistrate to refuse a motion for the accused, that a portion of the milk should be handed to another analytical chemist, whose fee the accused was willing to pay, for an independent analysis, and that his judgment on this point was not subject to review. Bain v. Mackay, June 16, 1875, p. 32.
See Public-House, 1.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Public-Houses Acts—Appeal to Quarter Sessions.
1. An appeal on the merits is allowed to Quarter Sessions against convictions by the Justices in Petty Sessions under the Public-Houses Acts; but there is no provision in those Acts, or in the Summary Procedure Act, for recording the evidence led before the Justices in Petty Sessions, but only for recording the names of the witnesses examined. Held that the Justices in Quarter Sessions are bound to rehear the evidence led before the Court below.
Observed (per Lord Young) that a conviction before the Justices in Petty Sessions must be assumed to be valid until the contrary is proved, and that it is the duty of an appellant to adduce before the Quarter Sessions the whole evidence previously led both for the prosecution and defence. Muckersie v. M'Dougall, Dec. 11, 1874, p. 12.
Certificate—Rei Interitus.
2. Held that partial destruction of the premises for which a person held an unexpired public-house certificate did not put an end to the certificate, so as to subject the holder to the penalty imposed on selling without a certificate, in respect that he carried on business within the partially destroyed building while repairs were being made. Craig v. Peebles, June 16, 1875, p. 30.

RUNNING LETTERS. See Liberation.

STATUTE. Implied Repeal—23 and 24 Vict. c. 84, and 35 and 36 Vict. c. 74 (Adulteration Acts).* Bain v. Mackay, June 16, 1875, p. 32.

SUSPENSION. Competency—Statute 29 and 30 Vict. c. cclxxiii (The Glasgow Police Act, 1866), secs. 131, 132.
1. Held that it was incompetent for the High Court of Justiciary to entertain a suspension of a sentence of the Police Court of Glasgow, sitting under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, on grounds which amounted to defect of jurisdiction, and malice and oppression on the part of the Judge, in respect that in such cases the statute had provided an exclusive remedy by appeal to the Circuit Court.
Observed that if the proceedings had been beyond the statute the primary jurisdiction of the High Court would not have been excluded. Mackenzie v. Lang, &c., Nov. 9, 1874, p. 1.
Competency—Game Dealer's Certificate.
2. Held that a prosecution for dealing in game without a licence was an Excise prosecution, and that suspension of a sentence pronounced under such prosecution was incompetent in the Court of Justiciary. Lazenby v. M'Arthur, Nov. 9, 1874, p. 6.

* Both statutes are now repealed by "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," 38 and 39 Vict. c. 63.

SUSPENSION—Continued.

Competency—Public-House Acts Amendment Act, 1862, secs. 33 and 34.

3. The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, secs. 33 and 34, allows an appeal from Quarter Sessions to the Circuit Court of Justiciary "on the ground of corruption or malice and oppression on the part" of the Justices "or on such deviations in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think have prevented substantial justice from having been done," and excludes any other form and ground of review. Where the Quarter Sessions refused, in an appeal, to rehear the evidence led before the Justices in Petty Sessions, held that they had declined to exercise their jurisdiction, that the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justiciary was not excluded by the above section of the statute, and suspension sustained. Muckersie v. M'Dougall, Dec. 11, 1874, p. 12.

Competency—Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867, sec. 187.

4. Held that notwithstanding the terms of sec. 187 of the Edinburgh Provisional Order Act, 1867, a suspension of a conviction in the Burgh Police Court, on the ground of the irrelevancy of the libel, was competent even after the lapse of fourteen days from its date. Rae v. Linton, Dec. 11, 1874, p. 17.

See Conviction.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB (SUCCESSOR TO JOHN HUGHES), THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Stanford Law Library
3 6105 062 687 350